The CIA began an immediate propaganda onslaught against Allende. As before, local journalists were bribed to write anti-Allende articles, and newspapers and periodicals abroad were fed supporting propaganda. Even Time magazine changed an article written by a Santiago correspondent that supported Allende to an article that showed Allende to be a communist threat.[158] The Chilean newspaper, El Mercurio, received over $3.5 million over a three year period after 1970, and further funds were given to the Christian Democrat Party and the right wing National Party to permit them to buy radio stations and newspapers to step up the attacks on the Allende government. In all, over $8 million was spent.158

After sufficiently tempering the minds of the population, the CIA launched its planned coup. On September 11, 1973, CIA-backed General Augusto Pinochet Ugarte led Chilean Army elements in an attack upon the Presidential Palace. Allende was killed in the assault.

Pinochet moved immediately to wipe out all vestiges of Allende's left-wing power structure. Utilizing secret police tactics, Pinochet rounded up thousands of Allende supporters and confined them inside the national stadium. Over the next few days, large numbers were interrogated, tortured and executed. It is estimated by one eye witness that over 500 pro-Allende leftists were shot in the week following the coup.[159]

The end result was a military dictatorship that owed its creation and allegiance to the Central Intelligence Agency. In a country whose constitution limits the term of the president to six years, and prohibits two consecutive terms, Pinochet has been President for over twenty years. Opposition to Pinochet results in mandatory prison sentences, torture and often, death.

But as promised by the U.S. Government, American corporations have remained free to expand and profit in Chile without fear of nationalization. Pinochet is considered one of the richest dictators in the world.

In a continuing game of chess, the United States and the Soviet Union, by means of their covert intelligence and military organizations, continued to manipulate Third World countries until the fall of communism. It was often hard to tell exactly who was doing the manipulating. The tactics were all the same.

Guns, Drugs and Politicians

Chapter 25

The Enterprise

The imperial and globalist line of thinking exhibited during the Truman, Eisenhower, Johnson, and Nixon years, temporarily checked by the outcome of the Vietnam war and the Watergate scandal, reemerged during the Reagan administration. In a world that was increasingly being consumed by Third World actions, terrorism, and the expansion of Soviet and Chinese communism, the assets of the covert intelligence community once again became the primary behind-the-scenes foot soldiers for those who manipulated countries and governments.

In the 1980s, President Ronald Reagan introduced a new, much tougher, foreign policy that virtually flew in the face of the detente and liberalism that was prevalent during the previous administration under Jimmy Carter. In the new doctrine, the Soviet menace was to be aggressively confronted and resisted wherever it was found, by the use of covert aid when possible, and military intervention when necessary. Operation Urgent Fury, the massive invasion of Grenada, and the peacekeeping mission in Beirut were examples of the latter. Afghanistan and Nicaragua would be examples of the former.

In Afghanistan, the Afghan Mujihadin tribes valiantly resisted the superior Soviet invaders who propped up Moscow's puppet Kabul government. In the end, the Soviet commanders bogged down in a counterguerilla war much like the U.S. had encountered in Vietnam fifteen years before. The constant monetary support and infusion of weapons to the Mujihadin, particularly the Stinger anti-aircraft missile, turned the tide and the Soviets were forced to withdraw in defeat.

Nicaragua would be different.

One of Reagan's first efforts on becoming president was to begin rebuilding the CIA. Under Carter and Stansfield Turner, the CIA had been reduced to a shadow of its Vietnam-era strength. Hundreds of field agents had been fired or forced to retire, which created an overnight surplus of freelance spies and paramilitary types who sought employment elsewhere, often becoming very mercenary in their endeavors.

Under Reagan, who promised during his campaign "to provide our government with the capability to help influence international events vital to our national security interests, a capability which the United States alone among major powers has denied itself," the worm was about to turn. Covert action, and manipulating other governments "for reasons of national security," was back on the agenda.[160]

One of Reagan's first actions was to get rid of Admiral Stansfield Turner and appoint his own Director of Intelligence. His choice was William Casey, a millionaire securities lawyer and former OSS agent, who had just happened to have served as his campaign manager. Casey, who was no stranger to the CIA, immediately began rebuilding the Agency's strength in manpower and increasing its budget. By 1982, the Agency was once again a force to be reckoned with.

It was in Central America that Casey found a cause worthy of his new organization. Two countries: Nicaragua, where the communist Sandinista movement under Daniel Ortega had come to power after overthrowing Anastasio Somoza in 1979, and El Salvador, where leftist guerrillas threatened the U.S. supported government.

The Reagan administration regarded Nicaragua as a second Cuba, and Ortega another Castro. Having a leftist regime between Mexico and the Panama Canal, a bare four hours flying time from the United States, was unacceptable. Reagan, who was determined to be more successful at ridding the Western Hemisphere of Ortega than Kennedy was with Castro, authorized covert military operations in Central America. The mission was to train, arm and support an army of anti-Sandinista Nicaraguans. This army, made up mostly of former Somoza national guardsmen and rural Moskito Indians from three separate regions, were known as "Contras," for contra-revolunaries.

In November 1981, using as arguments the increasing Sandinista support for the guerrillas in El Salvador and the mounting oppression in Nicaragua by the Sandinistas, Reagan persuaded Congress to approve $19.5 million for CIA efforts to establish and equip the Contra force. It was a start, but it would not be enough.

To form the nucleus of the leadership and cadre for the fledgling Contras, members of Somoza's old National Guard (Guardia Nacional) were selected from those that had fled Ortega's Nicaragua and taken up residency in neighboring Honduras and Costa Rica. To supplement these forces, the CIA called upon a few old contacts in the anti-Castro Miami Cuban community and some faithful Cuban/American contract agents that had continued to work with the Agency long after the failed Bay of Pigs endeavor. To organize and lead the efforts, the Agency would rely upon some very interesting old standbys.

Among the people selected to handle the Contra operation were none other than:

Major General John Singlaub, an OSS veteran and CIA officer responsible for China and Korea during his time in Asia. Singlaub's OSS team, which operated in Kunming in China, the very center of KMT drug trafficking during World War II, consisted of E. Howard Hunt, Paul Helliwell, Lucien Conein and Mitch WerBell. According to the Wall Street Journal, OSS payments at this base often consisted of five-pound bundles of opium. One of Singlaub's teammates, Lucien Conein, went on to be the CIA's liaison with the Corsican Mafia of Saigon and had intimate knowledge of drugs being shipped to Europe by the Corsicans.

During the Vietnam war, Singlaub directed clandestine infiltration of secret recon and prisoner snatch teams into North Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia. While in Southeast Asia, Singlaub worked with Richard Secord and Oliver North.[161]

Major General Richard Secord, who flew more than 285 combat missions in Southeast Asia between 1963 and 1968, most of which were in Laos in support of the CIA/Meo operation. He served as commander of all air operations in Laos, which included all sorties flown by Air America. These missions, as previously shown, included transporting opium and heroin. Secord "resigned" from the Agency in 1983 after being linked to renegade CIA operative Edwin Wilson, who was convicted of smuggling explosives to Libya. Secord's part in the Contra supply operation involved secretly moving high-tech weapons systems to Iran where they were sold to the Khomeini regime for use against the Iraqis. The profits of the sales were deposited into secret international bank accounts, then utilized to support covert military actions directed by the National Security Council. Within two years, these funds had also provided "The Enterprise," as it became known, with numerous shell companies and front organizations, two airfields, five airplanes, twenty contract pilots, a boat and huge stockpiles of guns, ammunition and other military equipment. Secord is also credited with milking funds from the Saudi Arabian government for use in the Nicaraguan campaign in return for promised favorable consideration in future military equipment purchases from the U.S. Government. Key in these purchases were sophisticated AWACS early warning planes.

Theodore Shackley, former head of the anti-Castro operation at the CIA's Miami station (codename JM/WAVE), where he served as chief of station, and director of Operation 40. From 1966-68, Shackley, who was sent to Laos by Richard Helms when the Miami station was closed down, served as chief of station in Vientienne. Here, he conducted the CIA covert war, and its creative financing by drug trafficking. While in Laos, Shackley worked closely with Singlaub, Thomas Clines, Felix Rodriguez, and Richard Secord. In 1968, at the height of the Vietnam war, Shackley was transferred to Saigon where he became chief of station and directed Operation Phoenix, the CIA's and Special Forces assassination program in Vietnam. From 1976 to 1977, Shackley worked as Director of the CIA's worldwide covert operations under DCI George Bush. According to reliable sources on Capital Hill, Shackley had been programmed to become Director of Central Intelligence under Gerald Ford if Ford was reelected in 1976. Shackley's role in the Iran/Contra affair was two-fold. First, he had long-standing contacts with Iranian arms dealers that gave the "Enterprise" inroads to the Teheran regime, and at the same time paved the way for the arms-for-hostages tradeouts. Second, he was instrumental in assembling the team that trained, equipped and ran the Contras.

Thomas Clines, Shackley's second-in-command at the Miami station, and deputy in Laos who became head of the Long Tieng CIA base and supervised the creation of the Hmong/Meo army under General Vang Pao, helped Secord arrange clandestine arms deliveries to the Contras. Clines had put together a private aid network even before Reagan had ascended to the Presidency. In 1978, he and Edwin Wilson reportedly began negotiating a $650,000 deal with Nicaraguan dictator Somoza to create a hunter-killer organization to be used against Somoza's enemies. Along with Israeli arms merchants, Clines, who left the Agency on bad terms under the Carter/Turner realm, was operating in violation of Carter's official policy toward Nicaragua.

Felix Rodriguez, a "retired" CIA officer who had served under Clines in Operation 40 as an alleged member of E. Howard Hunt's ZR/RIFLE assassination team, then worked in the Congo, and finally Vietnam, went to work for Clines again in the late 1970s as a representative of his Latin American arms sales business. It was Felix Rodriguez who tracked down Che Guevara in Bolivia and, after capturing him alive, relayed orders from headquarters to the Bolivian soldiers for his execution. In the Contra operation, Rodriguez served as the main supply officer at Ilopango military airbase in El Salvador where arms and drugs were transshipped between the Middle East, Europe, South America, and the United States. In this role, he has been credited with being the Contra's logistics mastermind.

Lt. Col. Oliver North, a decorated Vietnam veteran and National Security Council Coordinator, served as the link between the CIA (William Casey) and the White House. He had worked in Vietnam in counterinsurgency operations and served with both Secord and Singlaub. North also worked with Secord during Operation Rice Bowl, the failed hostage rescue attempt in Iran. North's link to the Iran/Contra affair was as fund raiser, fact finder, and Enterprise/Middle East connection.

Donald Gregg served in Saigon under Shackley and Clines. A seasoned CIA veteran, Gregg was appointed to Carter's NSC as CIA liaison in 1979, then became National Security Advisor to Vice President George Bush during the Reagan years. In the Iran/Contra operation, Gregg served as the NSC-CIA liaison and worked closely with Oliver North and Felix Rodriguez. According to The Iran-Contra Connection: Secret Teams and Covert Operations in the Reagan Era, "Between 1983 and 1986, Felix Rodriguez had 17 meetings with Gregg, three of which included Vice President George Bush." It was Gregg who introduced Oliver North to Rodriguez.

William Casey, former OSS agent during World War II, became DCI under Reagan. Casey was the architect of the Contra/CIA war against the Sandinistas. According to material developed during the congressional investigation of the Iran/Contra affair, Casey was the mastermind behind obtaining illegal funds when Congress voted to end the CIA's arms shipments to the Contras. In one example, Casey managed to convince the Pentagon to give the Contras $12 million in "surplus" military equipment. When Congress discovered this, they prohibited any and all military aid shipments to the Contras. It was at this time that Casey suggested to Oliver North that he should hire Richard Secord to keep the war alive.

Albert Hakim, an Iranian-born business partner of Secord from his earlier Teheran days, managed the private supply network for the Contras under North's supervision. For this, he used Saudi and Iranian oil money deposited in Switzerland in secret Enterprise accounts.

A host of other, less significant, covert operators joined these players in carrying out the aims of the Reagan White House. These included many more of the old anti-Castro hands, veterans of the Shackley/Clines/Hunt/Miami Station days, former Pentagon special operations officers, and ex-CIA/Air America pilots and crews from Laos and Vietnam.

In early 1981, the CIA set up military training camps in California and Florida reminiscent of the anti-Castro training bases created in Florida and Louisiana during the late 1950s. These camps soon began training anti-Sandinista guerrillas, and by the middle of the year, arrangements had been made for these groups to begin raiding Nicaragua from secret bases in Honduras. Funding at this early date was given to the Miami-based Nicaraguan Democratic Union (UDN) led by Francisco Cardenal, who agreed to join the newly formed Nicaraguan Democratic Force (FDN). The last of the three regional commanders, Eden Pastora Gomez, however, refused to join forces with the others due to their links with the Samoza Guardia Nacional. Pastora, a former Sandinista, found such allies totally unacceptable. Still, he pursued his part of the war and was supplied accordingly.

In 1982, with funding increasing to over $60 million, the war heated up. Under 150 CIA operatives and trainers, the FDN reached a strength of almost 10,000 and were conducting commando raids both across the border and into Nicaraguan ports by sea. Contra aircraft supplied by the CIA, and contract agents such as Southern Air Transport (based in Miami), flew both supplies and bombing missions into Nicaragua in support of Contra operations, and boats were supplied for mining operations of Sandinista harbors.

These operations finally brought world attention to the region and eventual exposure of the CIA's involvement. The Nicaraguan government filed an action against the United States in the World Court in the Hague accusing the U.S. of participating in combat inside Nicaragua, and with substantial proof available after the shootdown of a Southern Air Transport C-123 and the capture of crew member Eugene Hasenfus, managed to force a clampdown on CIA activities. In 1984, Congress blocked President Reagan's request for further funding of the Contras. If the CIA was going to continue to assist the Contras, another source of funding had to be found.[162]

In order to get the fast, massive infusion of cash required to continue the war, the Enterprise once again turned to what had kept the war in Laos alive: drugs.

Of the major drug suppliers in the world, South American cartels rank among the largest. From the coca producing countries of Columbia and Bolivia, hundreds of tons of cocaine are produced and smuggled each year into the various organized crime networks of both Europe and North America. The end results are millions of tax-free, untraceable dollars that flow into the coffers of everyone in the drug network from drug lords to pilots to distributors. For the CIA, becoming involved in the drug trade to support a secret war was business as usual. And by 1980, the door to the world of South American drug lords had already been opened.

In 1980, the Argentine Confederacion Anticommunista Latina (CAL) had infiltrated into various countries in a plot to eliminate troublesome Roman Catholic priests and missions that fostered dissent against rightist dictatorships. This rise of religious militantism was not something that came into being overnight, but had been growing ever since the Operation Paperclip and Omega network days of post-war Europe. The Nazis that had been smuggled out of Germany to South America had by the 1950s become well-entrenched in government circles of such countries as Argentina, Brazil, Bolivia, Columbia, Uraguay and Peru. By the 1960s, protégés of this Nazi infrastructure, trained in SS tactics, had moved into other countries, including those of Central America, and had brought with them the Gestapo tactics they had learned. The most militant and capable of the German-trained "trainers and advisors" came from Argentina.

By 1980, CAL plotting had reached its zenith. In that year Argentine officers, bankrolled by the cocaine drug lords, installed Luis Garcia Meza as dictator of Bolivia. Two of the Argentine officers involved in the action were not actually from Argentina, but were wanted Italian terrorists named Stefano delle Chiaie and Pierluigi Pagliai. Another was someone even more villainous: veteran Nazi fugitive and drug trafficker Klaus Barbie, the infamous "Butcher of Lyons."

Chiaie and Barbie spearheaded the CAL operation to identify, locate and exterminate radical priests and troublesome leftists not only in South America, but Central America as well. For the latter, Chiaie met with Major Roberto d'Aubuisson, the Death Squad leader in El Salvador, at the CAL conference in Argentina in September of 1980. This meeting produced an agreement to send arms and money to d'Aubuisson in El Salvador.

But the main thrust of this conference, which was attended by selected rightist dictators and their senior officers, was to export the "Argentine Solution" of death squads from Buenos Aires to Central America. The first target would be Guatemala, but that country would only serve as a jumping off point for similar operations to be put in place in El Salvador, Nicaragua, Panama, Honduras and Costa Rica.

According to the authors of The Iran Contra Connection, the driving force behind these movements was not the Argentine government, but an international partnership that had developed between the Italo-Argentine secret, and politically militant, Masonic Lodge P-2 and the Milan Banco Ambrosiano.[163] The P2 lodge had been identified by the Italian Government as a fascist-oriented secret society of anarchists and neo-Nazis. Considered part of the infamous Illuminati[164] by some, and indirectly linked by others, the P-2 is little more than a front for a secret order of political manipulators independent of the more public network of Masonic lodges. P-2 has come under considerable scrutiny because of its on-going involvement in coup attempts involving covert intelligence agencies, bank manipulations, and terrorist bombings.

P-2 had strong links to the CIA and the Republican Party. Under Nixon, the CIA allocated $10 million of "black" funds, which do not require accountability, for the right-wing parties in the 1972 Italian elections. The funds went through Ambrosiano bank connection Michele Sindona, and Italian Intelligence Chief Vito Miceli, both P-2 members. It should be noted that Sindona's American investments were handled by the Continental Illinois Bank headed by Nixon's first Treasury Secretary, David Kennedy, and his legal representatives in the U.S. was the law firm of Nixon Attorney General John Mitchell.

Finally, P-2 and CAL have one other thing in common: drugs. CAL chairman Suarez Mason, according to the Italian magazine Panorama, became "one of Latin America's chief drug traffickers. Italian terrorist delle Chiai is suspected of being involved in the French Connection case and the Corsican Mafia heroin trafficking. A further connection is Paraguayan Intelligence Chief Pastor Coronel, a member of CAL, who was a smuggling partner with Auguste Ricord, the main Corsican drug buyer in Latin America. Ricord was the connection, via the Corsican Mafia, to the Gambino Mafia family of New York. The organized crime connections and violent means of obtaining funds by the P-2, according to author Penny Lernoux in her book In Banks We Trust, is typical of the time: "the P-2 crowd obtained money from the kidnappings of well-to-do businessmen in Europe and from the drug traffic in South America. Sindona's bank laundered money from the notorious Mafia kidnappers of Anonima Sequestri [Italian Mafia family]...."[165]

After the CIA contributed the $10 million to P-2 for the Italian elections, which followed a large P-2 contribution to Nixon's CREEP (Committee to Re-elect the President) fund, and Nixon's resignation following Watergate, the dealings of the CIA came under intensive scrutiny by the Carter administration and the new DCI, Stansfield Turner. Subsequent investigations and closings of cash flow conduits affected such parallel operations as Edwin Wilson's Iran arms dealings, which forced him to move to the Libyan weapons and hit team deals for which he was eventually jailed, the drug-linked Nugan Hand Bank of Australia, and finally, the failure of the CIA-dependant Banco Ambrosiano. These upper-level CIA reforms, however, were only a temporary setback. The ousted clandestine operators simply faded into the shadows and began building a much more powerful coalition of agents, drug runners and arms merchants.

The end result was that by the time Congress cut off aid to the Contras during the Reagan administration, the means of financing further military operations was already in place. By 1986, a private aid network had been established that permitted cocaine to be smuggled into the United States and arms to be smuggled out.[166]

As the Nicaraguan campaign grew in size and intensity, even the enormous profits of drug running would not be enough to sustain operations. It was because of this that the NSC and CIA operatives were forced to look across the Atlantic for further funding.

The precedent for dealing with the Middle East, and especially Iran, Saudi Arabia, and Israel, had already been established. It merely required servicing to once again become a source of financing.

In late May of 1972, Nixon and Kissinger made the Shah of Iran an offer he could not refuse: unlimited access to America's non-nuclear arsenal in return for a guaranteed flow of Iranian oil and an agreement to serve as the U.S.'s military stalwart in Southwest Asia. The Shah agreed, and soon weapons sales began turning cash dollars for CIA front organizations, and certain U.S. oil companies and banks began generating huge profits.

The windfalls that were brought to the private sector were centered mainly on Eastern banks that specialized in dealing with international oil. Chief among these was the Chase Manhattan Bank of New York, whose chairman, David Rockefeller, was a personal friend of the Shah. The Shah, by way of the National Iranian Oil Company, agreed to recycle much of his oil earnings back into investments and long-term government securities inside the United States, by way of the Chase Manhattan Bank. It is not surprising to find that Henry Kissinger later became chairman of Chase's international advisory committee.

In 1973, Chase Manhattan loaned Teheran $250 million which went for arms and weapons systems purchases. This was the largest loan ever arranged with the Iranians up to that time, but was soon followed by more. One year later Chase established the Iran-Chase International Bank in Teheran to handle the cash flow. By 1975, Rockefeller's bank was handling over $2 billion a year in Iranian transactions.[167]

These transactions were also fortuitous to the American war material industry which was facing massive profit losses as the American military was being pulled out of Vietnam. With no war to generate a need for weapons, the military/industrial complex, along with their investors and bankers, would have to locate new clients or go broke. The Shah, with his insatiable appetite for modern weaponry, became their next client. In 1974, Iran spent 14% of its gross national product on weapons and aircraft. Three years later the annual purchases were topping $4.2 billion. The grand total spent prior to the fall of the royal family exceeded $17 billion.

The armament industry was not the only commercial sector saved by Iranian oil money. The construction companies that had built the ports and airfields of Vietnam were also benefactors to the Shah's generosity. The largest of these, of course, was Lyndon Johnson's old supporters, Brown & Root. It should be mentioned that Brown & Root received the enormous Cam Ranh Bay contract, among others. In Iran, Brown & Root managed to glean an $8 billion contract to build a huge port facility at Chah Bahar, without the annoyance of competitive bidding. The Chah Bahar port was to become the main Iranian naval base for a fleet of vessels to be built by Litton Industries.

The Rockwell International IBEX project has been discussed in a previous chapter, but of interest at this point are the huge bribes paid to Iran's air force commander, General Mohammed Khatemi (the Shah's brother-in-law), to win approval for the $500 million project. Other companies that did business at this time inside Iran and followed the bribes-for-contracts procedure of doing business included Grumman, Northrop and Bell Helicopter.[168]

Not everyone in Washington was happy with the events transpiring in Iran. In 1975, Defense Secretary Schlesinger drafted a memo to then-President Gerald Ford questioning whether "our policy of supporting an apparently open-ended Iranian military buildup will continue to serve our long-term interests." The memo never reached the president. It was blocked by Henry Kissinger, and two months later Schlesinger was fired.

That same year the U.S. established a Military Assistance Advisory Group (MAAG) in Iran consisting of 201 personnel. Two years later, almost 8,000 Americans were working in Iran on military contracts. Among these were Edwin Wilson, Thomas Clines, Theodore Shackley, Richard Secord, and Secord's old Laotian contact, Eric von Marbod. Von Marbod would later become the key player in the Carter administration's proposal to sell eight AWACS to Iran, and Shackley would pave the way for the Reagan administration's arms-for-hostages trades with the Khomeini government.

In Teheran, Shackley was a consultant for an arms company called Stanford Technology Corporation. STC was founded by an Iranian-born arms dealer named Albert Hakim, and did business with the Shah by selling military equipment manufactured by Hewlett-Packard, Olin Corporation, and various smaller companies. Hakim was introduced to Richard Secord by Edwin Wilson, who did business in Libya out of Hakim's offices in Switzerland. One of the contracts handled by this group was STC's $5.5 million deal to supply electronic equipment to the IBEX project, which Secord oversaw. Hakim would eventually work with Secord and others in laundering funds involved in the Iran/Contra arms deals.[169]

The continuing bribes, scandals and exposure of corruption, coupled with the heavy-handed oppression of the Shah's secret police, the CIA-trained SAVAK, eventually contributed to the downfall of the Shah and the reestablishment of Moslem fundamentalism under Ayatollah Khomeini.

David Rockefeller and Henry Kissinger, who both realized what could happen should the Shah's money in the Chase Manhattan Bank become nationalized by the Khomeini regime, moved to block any such attempt on the part of Iran to obtain possession of the assets. With the help of a former ARAMCO attorney, who also happened to be a former chairman of Chase Manhattan, Rockefeller and Kissinger mounted a campaign to grant the Shah asylum in the U.S. for "medical treatment." The attorney who joined Rockefeller and Kissinger to handle the legal aspects and add weight to the case was, not surprisingly, John J. McCloy. McCloy was the architect of the Nuremberg trials, served as former High Commissier of Germany (HICOG), headed the SWNCC during WWII, served on the Warren Commission and presided over the Council on Foreign Relations, some of whose members owned the major oil companies such as Standard Oil and Texaco.

In the end, President Carter, after being told that the Shah would cash in billions of dollars in U.S. government securities if not allowed admittance, agreed to take the Shah in. The consequences, as far as American/Iranian relations, would prove disastrous.[170] But for Chase Manhattan, the main objective was accomplished. The Iranian oil money stayed.

The overthrow of the Shah by the followers of Khomeni seriously weakened America's position in the Middle East. Besides the expulsion of CIA assets and American companies from Iran, which incited fear that pro-Soviet elements or the Soviets themselves would move into the country, and the explosion of Islamic fundamentalism and the spread of its subservient terrorist organizations, there were more highly visible demonstrations of anti-Americanism taking place. Pro-Iranian Islamic groups in other countries in the region began all-out attacks on American holdings and government representatives. In April of 1983, the U.S. embassy in Beirut was almost destroyed by a suicide attack in which an Islamic extremist detonated a bomb at the base of the building. This attack killed sixty people, seven of which were CIA.[171]

Then in March of the following year, CIA station chief William Buckley was kidnapped outside his Beirut apartment and held along with several other hostages by the Iranian-backed terrorist group Islamic Jihad (Islamic Holy War). The U.S. government, in a complete turnaround from the token way the Vietnam war POW/MIA situation was being handled, went to frantic extremes to free Buckley and a handful of international hostages.

Despite President Reagan's public stance on refusing to deal with terrorists, secret moves began almost immediately to bargain with the terrorists, or those who controlled them. In this case, it was the new Teheran government. The price of freedom would be arms and military equipment needed to keep Saddam Hussein of neighboring Iraq from invading Iran during the country's post-revolution reorganization.

But there was an official U.S. embargo on military equipment sales to Iran. A means had to be found by the secret planners to skirt the embargo, remain anonymous from all but those they were dealing with, and still recover the hostages. This means was found in Israel, who agreed to serve as middle-man. Israel was willing to provide the arms-for-hostages deliveries to Iran in 1985 in exchange for sales of some of the latest American weapons systems.[172] For the next several months Israel managed to slip some weapons systems into Iran, but by mid-1986, the NSC had established its own clandestine smuggling routes and Israel was no longer needed. The architects of the new filtering system were Lt. Col. Oliver North and retired general Richard Secord.

By this time Buckley had succumbed to the stress of incarceration and torture and had died. Still, there were other hostages to be rescued, and beyond that, the CIA was concerned that Buckley may have given his captors the names of other agents in the Middle East. The deals continued.

Three direct arms shipments were sent to Iran from the U.S. to serve as payments toward the release of the hostages. The first shipment went out in February 1986, followed by the second in May. This latter shipment was accompanied by North and national security advisor Robert McFarlane who held a bargaining session with Iranian leaders for several days. The third and final shipment arrived in Teheran on October 29th, 1986, after which hostage David Jacobsen was released. It becomes obvious at this point that the U.S. received very little in return for the massive effort put forth, except for one thing: the profits skimmed off of the Iranian deals went to the CIA's Contra program for the purchase of arms. The remaining hostages were not to see freedom until 1991, almost at the end of George Bush's term as president.

In late 1986, revelations of arms-for-hostages/drugs-for-money dealings, dubbed the "Iran/Contra Scandal," rocked the covert intelligence community. CIA director William Casey, who held many of the answers to the obscure affair, developed a brain tumor in December and died the following year. Deputy director Robert Gates was initially picked to replace Casey, but due to his involvement in the scandal, was not confirmed for the post. Instead, FBI director William H. Webster was selected and transferred to the CIA to succeed Casey. Gates would still manage to take over the CIA, after Webster.

The ensuing Congressional investigation brought to light some of the behind-the-scenes dealings that had transpired between the Iranians, the Israelis, the NSC, CIA, Contras, and cocaine cartels. But, partially due to Casey's death, it only scratched the surface. Almost everyone involved who testified before Congress managed to push the issue, and the blame, to a higher level. For some of the questions, especially those fielded by Oliver North who was the White House representative at the NSC, the ball was passed up to the White House and President Reagan, who conveniently could not recall anything of value to the investigators. For others, it was a case of "blame the dead guy." From his grave, William Casey continued to serve the world of covert intelligence by taking full responsibility for the Iran/Contra affair.

The majority of U.S. support for the Contras ceased during the investigation. What remained dwindled until the Contras could no longer depend on their North American allies for arms, ammunition and equipment. They eventually had to resort to basic guerrilla warfare, living off of the countryside as well as they could.

But the cocaine network, and the people who profited from it, continued to flourish. As late as 1993, the Columbian drug lords continued to grow in power and wealth, and the distribution network, and those in it, continued to operate as they had during the war. The end result is that there were more drugs on the streets of America than ever before in history, both cocaine from South America and heroin from Southeast Asia, and the organizations involved, from the cartels to the Mafia, profited in excess of $10 billion per year.

When all of the smoke and mirrors are removed, the true machinations and benefactors of the Iran/Contra affair surface: Hundreds of millions of dollars worth of weapons found their way into Iran illegally; the Contras, as a cause celebre', served as a patriotic motivating factor for the players in case the affair was ever exposed; the handful of hostages in Beirut received more media coverage and financial attention than all of the POWs and MIAs of World War II, Korea, and Vietnam combined; the Chase Manhattan Bank managed to retain the Shah's wealth; and finally, the drug network established to support the Contras not only remained intact, but was by the end of the affair much more efficient and profitable than ever before.

And why not? The drug traffickers and cartels were recruited, organized and trained by people who, by then, had gained years of experience in just such enterprises.

Unsafe At Any Altitude

"I armed my missiles and brought the nose down sharply. It worked! I saw that I had lock-on. The first missile was fired when the distance between us was about five kilometers. Only now I could really see the intruder."

"Very strange people were at work very early on. Within a matter of three hours there were American accents heard in the town. Over that night there were large numbers, by which I mean twenty, twenty-five, thirty people arrived. The next day...there was a whole bevy of people walking down the main street with blue windbreakers and baseball hats with 'FBI' on them...there were a lot of other Americans there who were in town who weren't wearing FBI windcheaters...I know who some of them were, and it certainly wasn't tourists."

David Ben-Aryeah, British journalist
On the bombing of Pan Am 103

"I told them [the FBI] that it was definitely a flare type rocket heading toward the aircraft, then it exploded. It was then suggested that we did not see anything at all and that we were going along with what other people said they saw, just for the excitement of it. I told them 'no way, I know what I saw'...[other men in suits arrived later and] They gave us some money and told us 'never to mention anything to anyone about being witnesses to the crash again.'"

Chapter 26

Ambush Over Moneron

On the dark, cold night of September 1, 1983, a Boeing 747 Jumbo Jet carrying 269 passengers flew placidly over the Western Pacific. Its destination was Seoul, the capital of South Korea.

It would never arrive.

Unknown to the crew, the airliner had strayed off course. For some reason, the sophisticated primary and secondary navigation systems failed to alert them that their course line had altered far to the west of where they should have been, and at that very moment had put them dangerously close to the Kamchatka Peninsula of the Soviet Union. Had they received an accurate plot, they would have been alarmed to know that they were well within the Soviet Air Defense Zone, and the Russians took the presence of intruders seriously. Only five years before, another jet airliner belonging to the same company, Korean Airlines (KAL) had strayed into Soviet airspace and had been intercepted. On that occasion, the Soviet interceptor pilot had twice told Soviet ground controllers that he had identified the intruder and that it was a civilian airliner, even identifying the company and type, a Boeing 707 with KAL markings. Both times he was told to proceed with shoot-down procedures, and both times he refused. However after the third order, and probably realizing the dire personal consequences for failure to obey a direct command, he reluctantly fired a missile which killed two passengers and disabled the aircraft. The Korean crew fought desperately to save their ship and miraculously managed to land the crippled airplane on a frozen Soviet lake. The passengers were released two days later, but the Soviets kept the 707.[173] KAL Flight 007 would not be so lucky.

Besides the error in navigation, something else was occurring. For like the fated 707, they too were being tracked by Soviet air defense radar and would soon be joined by Russian interceptors.

The Soviet radar operators had already spent the night tracking an American air force Boeing RC-135Ca four-engine 707 derivative especially equipped with sophisticated radios and other electronics for reconnaissance and spy work, and were completely alert when the new blip, KAL 007, appeared on their screens. Only this time, instead of assuming the routine race-track oval flight pattern just outside their air defense interception zone (ADIZ), the new target continued southwest at an angle that would place it inside the ADIZ within minutes.

The air defense officer at the radar site made a quick decision. He would scramble the "alert" fighters. Within minutes the Soviet interceptor pilots manned their aircraft, rolled onto the runway and, shoving their throttles past the afterburner detent, roared into the night sky.

Each pilot came up on the radio in turn and was given a steer to the bogey. But for some reason, the radar vectors were faulty. For no matter how hard the frustrated controllers tried, they could not seem to vector their flight to a point of visual contact with the intruder. In the end, after searching until they were too low on fuel to continue, the MiG flight returned to base. Incredibly, the sleek supersonic fighters, even with the aid of a sophisticated ground defense radar network, which was at that time suffering problems similar to 007's navigation systems, had not come within 50 miles of the lumbering Jumbo Jet.

KAL 007, still not realizing how close they were getting to the Siberian coastline, continued on. Then, as other radar sites began to pick up the 747, another flight was ordered into the air. This time it came from the air defense station on Sakhalin, who scrambled four aging Sukhoi Su-15 "Flagon" interceptors (which were not equipped with the sensitive electronic systems of the MiGs).[174] In the cockpit of the lead Sukhoi, No. 805, sat Lt. Col. Gennadiy Nikolayevich Osipovich.

The Korean airliner, flying straight and level at an airspeed somewhere below 500 mph, had managed to fly completely across the wide Kamchatka Peninsula, the 500 mile expanse of the Sea of Okhotsk north of the Kuril Islands, and was approaching Sakhalin Island just north of Hokkaido, Japan, and had managed to do so completely unmolested, which infuriated the Soviet commanders.

The Sakhalin radar operators were more successful than their Kamchatka counterparts in tracking the bogey and vectoring their interceptors. As they were doing so, for some reason, Soviet commanders were changing the radar blip identification from "non-Soviet aircraft" to "American RC-135."

As the flight of four Su-15s converged on the 747, General Ivan Tretyak, commander of the Soviet Far East Military District, and his superior, General Vladimer Govorov, commander of the Far East Theater of Operations, decided Osipovich should maneuver his flight closer to the target for visual identification.

Fearful that pilots might defect, as had Lt. Viktor Belenko who had flown to Japan in a shiny new super-secret MiG-25 eight years before, the interceptor flight's tanks had only been filled with enough fuel for local operations. They would not have much time to loiter once contact was made with the bogey, and a decision concerning what course of action to take next would have to be made quickly by the ground staff.[175]

At 6:15 a.m. Osipovich received orders to close with the intruder and identify it. But before he could do so, he was ordered by Tretyak to "Kill the intruder."

Horrified crewmen aboard the American RC-135, who had been monitoring the Soviet activities, heard this order repeated no less than five times.

KAL 007, which had unknowingly managed to evade the latest and most capable Soviet MiG fighters, was now about to leave Soviet airspace after flying completely across Sakhalin Island. Within a few minutes the huge jet would reenter international airspace and escape. Unfortunately, this was not going to be permitted.[176]

At 6:23 the four Su-15s fell into trail behind the unsuspecting 747. One minute later, Osipovich, reacting to the command to destroy the target, lit his afterburners and activated his missile system which consisted of two Anab air-to-air missiles. Almost immediately his missile seekers locked on to the heat source of the 747's engines and his armament panel began to flash. He reported back to the ground station that he had lock-on and was prepared to launch missiles. The target was now only five kilometers distant, well within range of the Su-15's Anabs. Osipovich, in his own words later, stated: "...suddenly in my earphones I heard this: 'Abort destruction! Match altitude with the target and force it to land.' I was already approaching the intruder from below. I matched speeds and started to flash him [author's note: Osipovich was probably referring to his landing lights]. But he did not respond. 'Give him some warning bursts,' I heard from the ground. I fired four bursts, firing off more than 200 rounds. But what was the sense of that? I had armor-piercing rounds, not incendiaries [tracers]. And it was hardly likely that anyone would see them."[177]

There was no way the crew of the 747 could have seen Osipovich flashing his landing lights. The Soviet pilot was behind and below the large airliner.[178] Yet he goes on to say that "I have no doubt that they noticed me...The reaction of the pilots was unambiguous, they quickly reduced speed. Now they were moving at about 400 kilometers per hour [250 mph]. I was moving faster...I simply could not go more slowly. In my opinion the intruder's reckoning was simple: If I did not want to stall and go into a spin, I would be forced to overtake them. And that is what happened. We had already flown past the island; it is narrow at that point. And it was then that the command was given from the ground: 'Destroy the target.'"[179]

In this statement, Osipovich tells two lies. First, he states that his interceptor could not reduce speed below 400 kph and that he would be forced to overshoot or stall out. This is not true. To keep from overshooting he had two choices: First, he could retard his throttle, drop a few degrees of flaps, even drop his landing gear, and go into a "slow flight" configuration. Obviously the Su-15 could slow to a much slower speed considering that it lands at approximately 105 knots. The second choice would be to reduce his forward progress by maneuvering. Simply put, he could "S" turn while the Korean airliner continued on a straight course. The second lie concerns his use of gunfire. The Su-15 does not have an internal gun. Instead, if armed in advance, it is capable of mounting two GSh-23L 23mm gunpods. Each pod carries two cannon, with 100 rounds of ammunition for each gun in each pod for a total of 400 rounds. Because of maneuverability restrictions concerning external loads (the two gunpods are mounted on belly pylons in the center of the fuselage) external gunpods are seldom carried. Instead, the interceptors rely on the two air-to-air missiles. They can be employed from a far greater range with much more devastating effect. By Soviet doctrine, the GSh-23 gunpods were only carried in the off chance that the fighter might get into a close-in dogfight. Even at this, the Flagon was designed for straight line speed to head off intruding bombers and not for maneuverability. It therefore had to rely on stand-off distance and missile capability to make it a lethal aircraft.[180]

Osipovich chose to maneuver his aircraft in a vertical climbing turn behind KAL 007 to preclude overshooting the slowing target. "I...managed to make a sharp turn and was now above and running on to him. But then I had a thought. I dropped 2,000 [he doesn't say feet or meters, all Soviet aircraft altimeters are marked in meters, which would have him drop approximately 6,500 feet!)...I armed my missiles and brought the nose down sharply. It worked! I saw that I had lock-on. The first missile was fired when the distance between us was about five kilometers. Only now I could really see the intruder. It was larger than an IL-76 and its outline was something like a TU-16.[181] The trouble for all Soviet pilots is that we do not study civilian aircraft belonging to foreign companies. I knew all the military aircraft, all the reconnaissance aircraft. But this was not like any of them."

This last statement is also untrue. The Soviet military encyclopedia contains photographs and identification silhouettes of both military and commercial aircraft. The 747 is represented, and its distinctive whale-like shape is quite unique. Also, if the target did not resemble any reconnaissance aircraft, then why was it later stated that Osipovich confused it for a much smaller RC-135?

But the biggest problem with Osipovich's story is with his time-line of events. For as he was supposedly performing these time consuming maneuvers, the RC-135 radio operators were monitoring the Soviet radio conversations and Japanese air traffic controllers and radar operators were observing the progress of KAL 007. They had just given the KAL pilots permission to climb to 35,000 feet, which might explain why Osipovich thought the aircraft was slowing down in an attempt to evade him. It was actually climbing to a higher flight level, which caused it to slow in speed relative to the pursuers. [Author's note: Why did the Japanese controllers at this point not tell KAL-007 they were off course, far into Soviet air defense territory?]

In actuality, the time span between General Tretyak's 6:15 order for Osipovich to maneuver closer to the radar target and the receipt of the final command to "Kill the intruder," at 6:25, was only ten minutes.

At 6:26, Osipovich said he fired two missiles simultaneously. The Anabs ran true and, according to Osipovich, struck the 747 "one near the tail, and the other took off half the left wing." This would not be true if Osipovich actually was "70 right" of the plane as he reported to ground controllers. The heat-seeking missiles would have homed in on the nearest engine, in this case, number four right outboard engine.

But contrary to later reports, the missiles did not cause the 747 to explode in flight. Even though Osipovich transmitted at 6:26 that "The target is destroyed," the Tokyo air traffic controllers reported that one minute later they picked up a broken radio transmission from KAL 007: "Tokyo, Korean Air zero zero seven...fifteen thousand holding with rapid decompression! Descending to one zero thousand...[10,000 feet]. Tokyo Radio acknowledged KAL 007 but did not advise them that they were off course because they were probably not in range of Tokyo radar which was over 900 miles away.

This is exactly what the emergency procedures call for in such an incident. To the 747 pilots, the explosion of the missiles must have sounded like a rupture in the pressure hull of the aircraft, and possibly shrapnel from the explosive warheads of the Anabs, which homed in on the tailpipe of one of the engines, had indeed pierced the cabin of the airliner. If this occurred, yellow oxygen masks would automatically be deployed from the overhead compartments above the passenger seats and the sudden decompression in the cabin would have been felt throughout the aircraft. The pilots, realizing that there is only sufficient oxygen to sustain human life below 12,500 feet, would immediately begin an emergency descent.

Had the 747 exploded, as the official version later recounted, it would have struck the surface of the ocean in less than three minutes. This did not happen. The Japanese controllers knew that the Korean crew continued to maintain control of the Boeing for another 12 minutes!

At 6:32, KAL 007 descended from Flight Level 35 (35,000 feet) to 16,400 feet. This was confirmed on Japanese radar. Then after a couple of minutes, the big jet began another descent. It appears that the crew could not maintain altitude and was fighting valiantly to save the ship. It is not known if there was insufficient power in the remaining engines to maintain altitude, or if another engine had failed due to fuel lines being severed, or possibly there were further complications from fire. But for whatever reason, the 747 again began to descend and at 6:39 had dropped to 5,000 feet. Three minutes later it fell below 1,000 feet, and at 6:40 a.m. local time, it was lost below radar 1.5 miles from Moneron Island.[182]

Twenty-seven minutes after Osipovich fired his missiles, another Russian pilot reported that he was making "reference point circles" over the wreckage and that "rescue operations were underway." If KAL 007 had exploded, as the official Western reports stated the next day, then why would a Soviet search plane bother to make circles over the wreckage, and rescue operations initiated? What was there to rescue?

Contrary to this, later Soviet press releases explained that the Russian fighter pilots actually reported: "I don't see it" (1829:13); "No I don't' see it"(1835:54); "He doesn't see anything in the area. I just looked" (1838:37). None of Osipovich's comrades could find the wreckage of his "kill" where it was supposed to be. These statement must be compared to the burning wreckage of TWA 800 which crashed into the Atlantic of East Moriches, New York, on July 17, 1996. The fuel from this incident burned for hours, marking the location of the main wreckage site.

Within two hours of the shootdown, Soviet defense stations in Sakhalin were in communication with Moscow. The information they relayed was not good. They had mistakenly downed a civilian airliner, and some of the passengers were American! How could anyone know that any of the passengers were American? Had they discovered floating bodies that still held readable identification papers or passports? According to both Soviet and Western press releases, no bodies were ever recovered, and no wreckage was ever found.[183] This in itself is not only improbable, it is unbelievable. As in every example of an air disaster over water, and in most instances of ship sinkings, bodies surface and are recovered. One case in point is the tragic shootdown of the Iranian Airbus over the Persian Gulf by an American missile frigate Vincennes. Dozens of bodies floated to the surface from the ruptured cabin and were photographed by the world press floating in clusters just below the surface of the sea. Though the colder water in the Sea of Japan would delay such an occurrence due to better temperature preservation of flesh, eventually the bodies would bloat and rise to the surface. With the exception of a few body parts that allegedly drifted ashore in Japan, 250 miles away, which could not be identified as having originated aboard the fated flight, no bodies were reportedly recovered.

Four hours after the shootdown, Marshal Ogarkov could see an already negative international incident rapidly deteriorating into a world relations disaster. The only way it might be salvaged would be by a world-class deception created with layers of lies. Even as a vast armada of Soviet vessels converged on Moneron Island, Ogarkov began formulating a story of intrigue and espionage. According to the rapidly fabricated version of events, the Korean airliner had joined up with the RC-135, which had already probed Soviet airspace on several occasions that night, and then had flown on to cross over Kamchatka, the Sea of Okhotsk, and finally Sakhalin. It was obviously on a spy mission, probably had secret cameras and eavesdropping devices on board, and flagrantly ignored all warnings given by the Russians. The Russians were left with no choice but to shoot it down. The Americans, of course, were to blame. It was them who had placed the 269 innocent passengers at risk for their own selfish reasons. The Americans, by their deceitful actions, had murdered those people and would now try to blame it on the Russians, who had been forced to defend their homeland.

Moscow had a choice. The government could do one of two things: buy the tale and reinforce it, supporting the Far East Defense Command in the process, or place the blame on over-zealous officers and punish them accordingly. This latter choice would have been the easiest. There could be an investigation, a finding of a tragic mistake having been made, blame fixed on the lowest ranking officer who could be pegged as responsible, an apology issued, and life would go on. But instead, Moscow bought Ogarkov's version of the event and began an immediate campaign of disinformation.

The end result is that the world press swallowed the Soviet version and even came up with other reinforcing stories that the Korean 747 had indeed been on a CIA spy mission. The Washington Post headlined a six column article with "Article in Britain Links Ill-Fated KAL Flight to Intelligence Mission." The piece referred to originally appeared in Britain's Defence Attache' magazine. But when the author of the article, who claimed that KAL 007 was engaged in espionage, was finally tracked down, it was discovered that he was a London advertising agent with no technical expertise and no remarkable or inside knowledge of the event.

Then, in 1984, a Yale graduate student named David Pearson, wrote an article for The Nation that stated "...the U.S. government also must be held accountable" for the deaths of the passengers aboard KAL 007, because "It seems probable that Soviet radar systems were jammed at least on Kamchatka Peninsula and perhaps on Sakhalin Island." If this were true, the Russians would have jumped on it to reinforce their disinformation. And beyond this, if the radar was indeed jammed, then Osipovich's flight would never have found KAL 007.

In the end, even after President Reagan denounced the Soviets as murderers and called for an international investigation, the issue faded into history and was all but forgotten. General Tretyak was promoted to head all Soviet air defenses; General Govorov was promoted to deputy minister of defense; and Marshal Ogarkov became personal military adviser to Mikhail Gorbachev.

Osipovich was not so lucky. It seems that in the Russian military, as in other forces, the proverbial excretion rolls downhill. After being told by his commander, Colonel Kornukhov, that he had shot down a foreigner and to "make another hole in your shoulder boards for a new star," Osipovich was instead ostracized. After the arrival of an investigating committee, Osipovich was, in his own words, suddenly "a son of a bitch."

During the investigation, which ironically was reported after the fall of Communism by none other than Izvestiya, the official government newspaper, Osipovich makes a startling statement. "In the grand reckoning," he reflected, "I have no doubt that we were right. A foreign aircraft was in our airspace for two and a half hours, and during that time it covered a distance of more than 2,000 kilometers. All the air traffic control services of foreign states said not a word, remained silent. What order can you give in such a situation? Sit on your hands?" [Author's emphasis].

Izvestiya came out with a 17 part expose' of the Soviet cover-up surrounding KAL 007 which ran between December 21, 1990 and February 6, 1991. The series reported on Izvestiya's efforts to discover the actual "truth" regarding the shootdown, and surprisingly, was considered the most accurate and in-depth version of the incident ever published. According to Izvestiya, the wreckage of KAL 007 was found almost immediately and divers were sent down to examine it. Three flight recorders were found and recovered, and were quickly rushed off to Moscow. But not one body was found! According to a Soviet diver who had examined the wreck, "The main thing was not what we had seen there, but what we had not seen. The divers found practically no human bodies or remains." What had become of the 269 passengers and nine crewmembers?

Unless they weren't there.

If the bodies did not surface, and they were not found in the wreckage, then they had to have been either rescued or recovered immediately after the crash. If this is so, then the survivors, or their bodies, were transported to the nearby Siberian island of Sakhalin, probably to the nearest settlement: Shebunino. If not this small town, then perhaps Gornozavodsk, Nevel'sk, or the larger community of Khomnsk, all of which are along the southwestern coastline of Sakhalin facing the tiny island of Ostrov Moneron. From any of these places it would be reasonable to assume that they would be quickly transshipped to the nearest city: Kharbarovsk, on the mainland of Siberia.

It should be remembered that it was in Kharbarovsk that the Soviets held the War Crimes Tribunals for the Japanese captured at Mukden and Pingfan in World War II, and served as the primary destination for the American POWs taken in Korea, and some of those received from Vietnam, and was the city that contained the largest military installations in southeast Siberia. It was from here that thousands of people had disappeared into the Gulags.

But why would the Soviets care about incarcerating or eliminating innocent civilians? Was it because they were witnesses to the truth? That they could testify that they were ambushed and there was no warning, no gunshots across the nose, no blinking of landing lights from the interceptors?

Hardly. It was more likely that they were victims of a far greater and much darker plot than even the Soviets could father.

Only one small mention was ever made in the Western press of the importance of one of the passengers who perished aboard 007. Buried in most accounts is the fact that U.S. Congressman Larry McDonald of Georgia was aboard the Jumbo Jet. What is not pointed out is that Congressman McDonald was involved in a major investigation of the world banking cartel, the Council on Foreign Relations, the Federal Reserve Board, and other significant entities that were interrelated with each of these.

McDonald was the most dedicated anti-communist on Capital Hill, and the press had noted that "From the time he took his oath of office in 1975 until the moment of the shootdown, Congressman McDonald had systematically carried out a campaign against the Soviet communists of a sort which no other U.S. elected official had ever done on his own."[184] In The Day of the Cobra, author Jeffrey St. John writes: "Congressman Lawrence McDonald had spent his entire career warning against the use of terrorism as an instrument of Soviet policy, particularly the use of the threat of nuclear war by the Kremlin as a weapon to paralyze the United States and its Western allies' will to resist."

But McDonald had gone beyond fighting simple Soviet communism. He had discovered a spiderweb of hidden corridors that linked power brokers in Moscow with those in New York and Washington. This, in turn, made him a threat to the Establishment/international banking cabal. This put him at crossed swords with the Council of Foreign Relations and its international brethren of New World Order and One World Government proponents. In The Rockefeller File, authored by Gary Allen, McDonald wrote the foreword and railed against "the drive of the Rockefellers and their allies to create a one-world government, combining super-capitalism and communism under the same tent."

McDonald went on to establish his Western Goals Foundation, whose purpose was "to rebuild and strengthen the political, economic, and social structure of the United States and Western Civilization so as to make any merger with totalitarians impossible." It is probable that with his discovery of the shadow world of international finance and power brokers, and their goal of globalism and control of international relations, that he had gone too far. It is unlikely that the whole truth will ever be known, but one question will forever remain. Was KAL 007 misdirected over the island of Sakhalin so that an aerial ambush of Dr. Lawrence McDonald could be accomplished?

Since the original data was released and the first investigations were conducted, other information has surfaced. One FAA investigator who was working in Asia at the time discovered that the Japanese at the Tokyo radar site actually monitored the 747 below the 5000 foot level and saw it do something other than the official "crash in the ocean" version. According to them, they watched as the target turned toward Sakhalin Island, descended, and apparently landed on the island! Shortly after the attack, the Rome, Georgia office of Congressman McDonald received several calls from not only KAL officials, but from the FAA claiming they had evidence that the jet landed in Russian territory. One call was recorded by their office:

> "This is Duty Officer Orville Brockman at FAA Headquarters in Washington, D.C. We have just received information from our FAA representative, Mr. Dennis Wilham in Tokyo, as follows: He has been advised by the Japanese Civil Aviation Bureau headquarters, Air Traffic Division, Mr. Takano, T-A-K-A-N-O, who is his counterpart in Japanese aviation, as follows: Japanese self-defense force confirms that the Hokkaido radar followed Air Korea to a landing in Soviet territory on the Island of Sakhalinska, S-A-K-H-A-L-I-N-S-K-A, and it is confirmed by the manifest that Congressman McDonald was on board." [Emphasis mine][185]

This would explain many things, including the lack of bodies and wreckage, plus the Soviet fighter pilots not being able to locate a crash site on the water. It also would explain another cryptic event, an American reporter came out of Russia just prior to the publication of the Izvestiya series and stated that the series would reveal "that Moscow had ordered the bodies of the 269 victims destroyed in a local crematorium." That information did not later appear in Izvestiya. However, if the airplane had landed on the island safely and discharged its passengers, why would orders be given to "cremate the victims"?

Considering the fact that millions of Soviet citizens, prisoners of war, and political enemies and dissidents of the communist government have "disappeared" into Siberia in the past, would it be unusual for the Russians to "disappear" a few more embarrassing foreigners? Orders from Moscow for this event to happen might simply be: "Cremate the victims."

There are many other questions that deserve answers as well. First, how could a modern airliner, which was on a routine IFR (Instrument Flight Rules) flight under positive control of the international controllers have been permitted to stray several hundred miles off course without correction? Osipovich himself reported that "all the air traffic control services of foreign states said not a word...remained silent."

Second, why had not the RC-135, which was conveniently on location, ostensibly there to monitor a missile launch, notified either the KAL crew or the Japanese air control facilities of the 747's incursion into Soviet air space? Every military flight crew realizes all too well the consequences of flying too close to the Soviet Union, and the RC-135, which had radios on board that could monitor the Soviet frequencies, had the capability of relaying the critical information to both the KAL crew and the Japanese controllers. They also knew the Korean crew did not have this capability.

Third, what happened to the 747's navigation systems? Besides on-board radar, VOR and LORAN systems, there are inertial navigation positioning systems that are accurate within a kilometer. Had they failed? If so, why had not the Korean crew notified the ground stations?

Fourth, why did the experienced crew of KAL 007 manage to go over 200 miles off course without realizing it? The obvious answer is that they were directed to do so.

When flying IFR at night, the normal procedure is to be given a steer for a course line until further advised. As an example, such a transmission would be "KAL 007, maintain flight level three-five-zero, steer two-zero-five." Translated, this tells the pilot to maintain an altitude of 35,000 feet and fly a magnetic heading of 205 degrees. What had KAL 007 been told to do?

Lastly, what happened to the bodies?

Or the survivors?

Chapter 27

The Downing of Pan Am 103: Libyans, PLO or CIA?

On the cold, windy night of December 21st, 1988, the villagers of the quaint Scottish town of Lockerbie, Scotland heard a tremendous explosion. Those that were outside witnessed the sky light up with a billowing ball of fire high overhead. Within minutes huge pieces of bent and shredded aluminum wreckage impacted in and around the village, obvious bits and pieces of an airplane.

At first, the local constabulary and the British police logically assumed this event to be either the work of terrorists, who placed a bomb aboard the aircraft, a Boeing 747 Jumbo Jet designated Flight 103Cor a mechanical malfunction that ignited the fuel cells. With their extensive experience dealing with terrorists that range from the IRA to Middle-Eastern terrorist groups, most agreed it was a terrorist act.

The local emergency and police organizations organized quickly, with a command center being established within an hour of the incident by the Lockerbie police, and local residents and medical personnel gathering to form search teams. For that first hour everything appeared to be coming together logically.

But within the next hour things began to become very strange for the British participants in the search and investigative teams. Several things began to happen in various sections of the search area that were described by locals as "most unusual."

George Stobbs, a Lockerbie police inspector, remarked later "On the night I was...started to set up a control room, and by [between] eleven o'clock and midnight, there was a member of the FBI in the office who came in, introduced herself to me, and sat down, and just sat there the rest of the night. That was it."[186]

The unusual activity of this alleged "FBI" agent is striking, but not quite as odd as the fact that Lockerbie is over 350 miles from London, which is the nearest point an American FBI agent might be. To reach Lockerbie that night from London, even if traveling by air, would have taken far more than one hour considering the sequence of events that would have had to occur. Assuming a timely notification, an American agent in London would have had to have been tracked down considering the late hour, notified to pack up for an investigation, rush to Heathrow, board a waiting airplane, fly immediately to the nearest airport that could land a jet transport, obtain ground transportation from there to Lockerbie, then locate the command center. An effort that would require four to six hours at the minimum.

Not a very likely scenario to occur in less than two hours of the blast.

A Pan Am security officer, interviewed at a later date, offered one piece to the puzzle regarding the rapid response: "As far as I can recall, there were about forty people, excluding crew, on board [the Pan Am VIP flight of personnel being sent to the Lockerbie crash site], of which I would estimate fifty percent were Pan Am people. The others, I wasn't aware of their affiliation at all."[187]

The questions at this point are: Who were these people, how did they get to the airport so quickly, where did they come from, why were they in England, and what was their mission?

After arrival in Lockerbie, the unidentified Americans began to behave in a bizarre manner. Instead of organizing to investigate the crash or assisting in the search in a manner consistent with normal routine, the "Americans" made themselves busy elsewhere.

Mr. Tam Dalyell, a member of the British Parliament, related "The local police force...they were concerned. Absolutely swarms of Americans [were] fiddling with the bodies, and shall we say tampering with those things the police were carefully checking themselves. They weren't pretending, saying they were from the FBI or CIA, they were just 'Americans' who seemed to arrive extremely quickly on the scene."

Dr. David Fieldhouse, the local police surgeon, reported a strange series of events in his sector: "I was asked to go to various locations in and around Lockerbie to look for bodies...we [then went] down one large field and identified about ten bodies. We thought we ought to retrace our steps and put some form of identification on them, and so, the only thing I had with me was a block of small white labels and one hundred or so plastic gloves which I carried at all times as part of my usual police surgeon duties. I put a code on every one, DCF-1 right through to fifty-eight. All the bodies in that particular sector. I learned later that when the bodies were taken to the mortuary, all the labels which had been put on them had been removed with the exception of two...but all the rest had been removed and discarded."

Someone appears to have been very intent on disrupting the investigation by obstructing and interfering with the search and recovery process. But who? And Why?

British journalist and Pan Am 103 researcher David Ben-Aryeah answered part of the puzzle: "Very strange people were at work very early on. Within a matter of three hours [after the crash] there were American accents heard in the town. Over that night there were large numbers, by which I mean twenty, twenty-five, thirty people arrived. The next day...there was a whole bevy of people walking down the main street with blue windbreakers and baseball hats with 'FBI' on them. But there were a lot of other Americans there who were in town who weren't wearing FBI windcheaters. I don't know who they were. I know who some of them were, and it certainly wasn't tourists."

Out at the crash site, as the sun rose, small pockets of Americans, keeping to themselves, wandered among the wreckage and strewn bodies, poking, looking, searching...for something. They had been there most of the night. As one searcher, a member of a mountain rescue team that arrived within two hours of the initial explosion, related: "We arrived within two hours. We found Americans already there. The British police and military who were there are still not speaking [about this]. Because of the Official Secrets Act, they are prohibited from speaking."

But Tam Dalyell, a member of Parliament who is very suspicious about the odd activities surrounding the Lockerbie incident, refuses to be shackled by "national security." He told interviewers working on the British documentary about the Lockerbie tragedy, The Maltese Doublecross, that "It was thought it was very odd and strange that so many people should be involved in moving bodies, looking at luggage, who were not members of the investigating force. What were they looking for so carefully? You know, this was not just searching carefully for loved ones. It was far more than that. It was careful examination of luggage and indeed bodies."[188]

And there was more to it than that. Someone was very concerned that Scottish searchers might find something before their own people could. One searcher, Eric Spofforth, told of a helicopter that circled his group for some time as they made their way through the wreckage: "This helicopter was overflying the area. A chap in it was looking at me out of the telescopic sight of a rifle. Probably some secret service man or other. It was a white unmarked helicopter, for all intents and purposes a civilian helicopter."

These unmarked helicopters continued their observations over the crash scene for days. Innes Graham, a local resident, reported that "These helicopters were landing just behind [my house], in the field, quite regular. It was constant, just every day for days on end flying over."

It became obvious to the British investigators at the scene that this was not just an aircraft bombing or terrorist investigation to many of the Americans who arrived so swiftly on the scene. It was something else. Something on the airplane that they were looking for. But what? What was so important about this flight, or the passengers, or what it carried that was of such interest to people who were obviously American "spooks"?

Three individuals that were on the scene or investigated later give three clues. David Ben-Aryeah noted that "The arc [of the wreckage] ran right around the crest of the hills overlooking where the cockpit fell. There were a number of bodies which subsequently became of great interest to a lot of people." David Johnston, a radio journalist for Radio Forth, reported "I'd been told early on that the investigators believed the bomb had been taken onto the plane by a U.S. officer who had been seconded to military intelligence, and the bomb had been planted on him in Beirut."

Finally, there are stories of a large suitcase filled with heroin being recovered by the American searchers. A local farmer, Jim Wilson, told relatives of Pan Am 103 victims that he was there "when the drugs were found." According to Private Eye magazine, Wilson, of Tundergarth Farm near Lockerbie, "found a suitcase packed with drugs in one of his fields. He was worried the substances might harm his sheep and immediately informed the police. He was surprised that the police seemed to know the case was there and were under the impression that it had already been removed." When the drugs were discovered, a team of Americans rushed to the location in an all-terrain vehicle. Wilson noted that the Americans seemed extremely angry over the fact that the drugs had not been discovered earlier by their own personnel.

According to one constable who did not remain silent, the Scottish police had been told to keep an eye out for the drugs early on. He also mentioned that he had overheard the Americans say that there was a drug courier on the airplane, and heard a name: Khalid Jafaar.

In the months following the bombing of Pan Am 103 and the murder of its 270 passengers, the U.S. government broke the case. With a great deal of luck and more than a few fortunate coincidences, a searcher found a tiny bit of microchip in a wooded area that was turned in and recognized as something other than an airplane part.[189] This in itself is extremely interesting considering the amount of electronic parts aboard an aircraft that could have ruptured and scattered solid state circuit boards, microchips and other various electronic bits and pieces over the countryside. It is also interesting to note that the FBI does not have Boeing aircraft engineers or experts on staff that are capable of sorting through the debris and deciding what is and is not a part of an aircraft system. Yet, they managed to allegedly find and identify this part and determine it was suspicious. This one fingernail size piece of plastic is credited with being the key to the solution of the case.

According to the FBI, the laboratory determined the microchip to have been part of a timer built in Switzerland by a Swiss company named MEBO. The timer was sold to Libya, and two Libyan intelligence officers, Abdel Basset Al-Megrahi and Lamin Khalifah Fhimah, used it to construct a bomb inside a tape recorder, smuggle it into Malta, then put it in a suitcase filled with various Maltese clothes, transport it to the airport, tag it for the final destination of JFK international, then place it aboard an Air Malta airplane unaccompanied.[190] The bag then managed to fly to Frankfort, change planes (also unaccompanied), then fly to London, then take off again to explode over Lockerbie. How the FBI decided that Megrahi and Fhimah were the two responsible parties has never been satisfactorily explained. However, they were put on the wanted list, exposed to international media attention, and have not left the confines of Libya since, even though they have volunteered to surrender to an international court as long as it convened in any country other than the United States or the United Kingdom. Neither the U.S. or the U.K. have ever agreed to such a neutral location for trial.

To support the U.S. government's version of the sabotage are the statements of such people as CIA veteran Vincent M. Cannistraro who was an operations officer and director of intelligence on the National Security Council staff. Cannistraro stated: "The principle avenues [of the investigation] led to identification of a foreign role in an act of terrorism was forensic evidence recovered by the Scottish police at Lockerbie themselves. Investigators and townspeople on their hands and knees, crawling along the countryside, picking up minute bits of debris. And one of those bits of debris turned out to be a microchip, which was analyzed microscopically that led to the Libyan connection."[191]

The problem with this statement is that there was not a concrete chain of evidence for the microchip. At the time of the investigation no one had been identified as finding the piece. In fact, there were attempts to make people sign statements a year later saying they had found the microchip. One Scottish searcher, identified only as "Bobby," stated that two years after the bombing a Scottish police officer visited him and asked him to sign a statement: "I got a call from a policeman asking if he could come down to my home, and would I sign to say that I picked those [items] up. He brought with him three small bags about the size of an eight-by-five piece of paper, one of which contained an item of cloth, one of which contained a brown piece which looked very much like a piece of plastic, the third piece I couldn't tell what it was."

Could the "brown piece" have been the microchip?

The U.S. government position was also backed up by the findings of the FBI lab in Washington. According to Tom Thurman, FBI forensics expert, he made the identification of the microchip and tied it to the Swiss manufacturer. He remembered that "June fifteenth of 1990 was the day I made the identification. I knew at that point what it meant, because I was an investigator as well as a forensic examiner. I knew where that would go. At that point we had no conclusive proof of the type of timing mechanism that was used in the bombing of 103. When that identification was made at the time I knew we had it." Agent Thurman does not say, however, how he determined the microchip to not have come from one of the aircraft instrumentation systems, such as the autopilot, radios, clocks, or navigation devices.

According to the FBI, the identification of the chip led to a timer manufacturer in Zurich, Switzerland, the MEBO company. Edwin Bollier, the owner of the company, stated that "Scottish and American FBI officers came to Switzerland. They showed us a photograph of a fragment of a timer. They asked if it was a timer from the O-series...of the first series from our MST-13 timer. They explained that in 1986 two of these timers were confiscated in Dakar and later on in Senegal from two Libyans. I immediately recognized from the photo that the fragment found in Lockerbie was without a doubt from a timer that we ourselves had made."

It is interesting to note here that according to the FBI, they had in their possession two timing devices two years before the bombing of Pan Am 103. That would mean they had the interior components, including the microchips, long before the Lockerbie incident. Perhaps this could explain why the lab could identify such a chip. It might also explain other things, such as how a piece of such a chip ended up in the evidence. This last statement is not unreasonable considering Edwin Bollier's next revelation.

"In 1990 or 1991 I spent a whole week with the FBI because I wanted to see the actual fragment. Then they told me they didn't have it, that the Scottish police had it. So I spent a whole week with the Scottish police, but they refused to show me the piece. They only showed me a photograph." When Bollier asked the FBI to give him more information on the chain of evidence on the microchip, and to explain what was going on, he was told that "this could be explained. Three of his people had sworn that they had found this piece in a piece of a coat and had signed a paper to this effect. I later heard that it was the Scottish police who had found the piece in a shirt that came from Malta."

The FBI was essentially telling Bollier that they had agents in place in Scotland for two years as every piece of material was discovered, turned in, and examined. Then, the Scottish police stated that it was they who found the microchip. But then, it is extremely odd that they actually attempted to have a civilian searcher sign a statement two years after the event that he had found it.

The bottom line on the government story appears to be a smoke screen for what actually happened. The government version is basically that the Libyan government, Crazy Khadaffi, sent two of its intelligence officers to Malta to build a bomb, put it in a suitcase and tag it for JFK, then wait while the suitcase made its way through three countries, in the middle of the European winter when flights are often delayed or canceled due to weather, to explode in an American Jumbo Jet named "Maid of the Seas."

The problem is that there is another story that has begun to surface since that cold, blustery, fateful night in December, 1988.

On July 3rd, 1988, less than six months before the Pan Am 103 bombing, another large aircraft disaster occurred. On that day in the Persian Gulf, the U.S.S. Vincennes, an Aegis class frigate, identified an incoming bogey on its early warning radar scope. As the sailors watched, the blip continued to approach their ship from the direction of the Iranian coastline.

Fearing an attack by an Iranian F-14 fighter bomber, Captain Rogers, the skipper of the Vincennes, gave the order to man battle stations. As the klaxon echoed through the ship's compartments and sailors scrambled to their stations, the Aegis missile targeting system came to life.

The communications division of the Vincennes attempted to contact the inbound aircraft over and over, but there was no response. And when it continued in-bound and crossed into the danger area of missile launch, Rogers decided he had no choice but to protect his ship. He ordered weapons systems to fire. A few minutes later the aircraft, an Iranian A-300 Airbus filled with 290 civilian passengers and crew, plunged into the waters of the Persian Gulf.

The Iranians held America, who they considered "The Great Satan", responsible. And in their Islamic law, it was dictated what such an event had to be answered with "an eye for an eye."

Abulhassan Bani Sadr, who served as president of Iran from 1979 to 1981, remarked "It was a crime. The people of Iran saw this as a crime...shooting down an airplane, killing almost 300 people is a crime. The people of Iran have never forgotten. Had it involved any other country, there would have been legal proceedings. A lot of fuss would have been made all around the world. But here they destroyed the aircraft, and then congratulated themselves. They even gave a medal to the officer who fired the missile at the plane."

Pan Am 103 investigator Juval Aviv noted "After the downing of the Iranian aircraft by the Vincennes, everybody expected revenge. The Iranians had to, religiously, avenge what had happened. It was clear that they would teach the Americans a lesson that they can duplicate what the Americans had done to them. It was only a question of time where an American airplane would be downed in retaliation."

Aviv casts even more light onto an Iranian/Pan Am 103 connection by way of what covert intelligence agents call a "cut-out," or middle man. "Iran would never do it directly," said Aviv during an interview with the investigators for the documentary The Maltese Doublecross, "they would pay $10 million to a terrorist network that knew how to go about it and the contract was out. It was known at the time that the contract was out to down an American airliner."

The contract, known as a Fatwa, was issued to a group of the Syrian-based Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, General Command (PFLP-GC). The leader of this cell, one Ahmed Jibril, was a Syrian-backed terrorist who ran in the highest circles of Islamic terrorism. To him, it would serve three purposes. First, it would earn the PFLP-GC quite a sum of operational money. Second, it would be a major attack against the hated Americans. Finally, it would give him a great deal of stature in the terrorist underworld.

For this mission, Jibril established a special action cell in Neuss, Germany, near Frankfort. In this cell he provided everything his men would need to accomplish the mission, including one Marwan Abdel Razzack Khreesat, bombmaker extraordinaire. Khreesat's specialty, besides building small, but very powerful, bombs, was modifying and incorporating very sophisticated timing mechanisms. Some of his accomplishments included timers connected to altitude detonators. Such systems would allow an aircraft to become airborne, fly a given distance over time, then the bomb would arm and only detonate when the airplane reached a certain pre-selected altitude. Such a mechanism would work in a scenario such as the bomb being loaded onto the airplane in Frankfort, then not arming until the Jumbo Jet had made a stop at Heathrow, then resumed travel to the United States. The bomb would not arm until a given time, then would not detonate until the aircraft reached a given altitude. This would allow for the stop in London, then the resumption in travel. It would also explain why the bomb did not detonate over the Atlantic. The plane was delayed two hours at Heathrow.

All did not go well for the terrorists, however. They were detected in September of 1988 by the German BKA, or Bundeskriminalamt, the West German criminal police, during an operation called Operation Autumn Leaves.[192] A few weeks later, in October, seventeen people were arrested, including Khreesat. The Germans found massive amounts of weaponry, explosives, and timing devices. They also found a Toshiba radio/tape player with a plastic explosives bomb inside which "was designed to blow up an aircraft."[193]

Khreesat was taken in by the BKA and held for terrorist activities. They had more on him than most of the others, for they had intercepted an international call made by Khreesat to Damascus, Syria, in which he stated: "I have made some changes to the medicine. It is better and stronger."

But Khreesat evidently had connections in high places. He demanded to make one phone call from BKA headquarters, and then refused to answer any questions afterwards. Within a couple of hours he was mysteriously released and immediately flew to Damascus.

Former CIA agent Oswald Le Winter, who helped expose the inner workings of the affair to the media, gives us a clue concerning Khreesat's connections. "I had spoken to a German reporter who refuses to go on camera, but who is very close to federal intelligence sources in Germany, who assured me that Khreesat was an agent of the Jordanian service, and an asset of the Central Intelligence Agency." Le Winter also discovered that "pressure had come from Bonn...from the U.S. Embassy in Bonn...to release Khreesat."

The U.S. Embassy? Why would our government be interested in releasing a known terrorist bomb maker? During the course of his investigation, Juval Aviv discovered the fact that Khreesat not only served Jibril, but other terrorist networks as well. According to Aviv, "he [Khreesat] was also reporting his activities for years to Israel, Jordan, and some other countries intelligence departments." This may have included the CIA, and assuredly included the Israeli Mossad, who had infiltrators inside the PLO for years. The Israeli effort was so successful that it has been rumored that Abu Nidal himself is on the Israeli payroll, which is why he has never been picked up or assassinated by an Israeli Kidon hit team.[194]

In April, 1989, four months after the destruction of Pan Am 103, the BND raided an apartment in Neuss. Inside, they discovered three other Khreesat-manufactured bombs concealed in electronic devices. The Germans knew there was a fourth bomb, but it was not found. There were rumors of a fifth. And these bombs were so sophisticated that the top German bomb technician was killed trying to disarm one.

Amazingly, the German government would never request the extradition of Khreesat, and the Scottish police would never be permitted to talk to him. On top of this, the FBI interviewed Khreesat on November 12th and 13th, 1989, and never revealed the details of these interviews to the Scottish police. Later, an investigative journalist managed to interview Khreesat, who told him that he was a secret agent, had been sent to Germany on a mission, and had built airplane bombs for Jibril.

It appears that the U.S. government, or at least certain persons in the intelligence "community," knew in advance of the device and did nothing to stop it. In fact, as the story continues, certain American agents appear to have assisted the bombers. Another clue that the intelligence community knew what was going to happen are the facts that certain high ranking individuals from various governments were pulled from the plane. One example was a South African delegation which included South African president Peter Botha. The Botha party changed its flight booking at the last hour due to a warning from South African state security forces, who are closely aligned with two major intelligence sources, the Israeli Mossad, and the CIA.

Others also changed their mind about flying on Pan Am 103. According to one Pan Am security officer, "It subsequently came to me on further enquiries that they hadn't ignored [the warnings]. A number of VIPs were pulled off that plane. A number of intelligence operatives were pulled off that plane."

But these events have been successfully swept under the carpet in the official American government (FBI) version of events. According to the FBI, here is what happened: Libyan "strongman" Moammar Khadaffi, incensed over being bombed on the April 14, 1986 air raid on Tripoli airport, Bab al Azzizia barracks, Sidi Bilal naval base, Benghazi city, and Benine airfield, sent two of his intelligence officers to Malta to build a suitcase bomb. They then tagged the suitcase for JFK International airport in New York City, put the bomb aboard an Air Malta flight, then sat back to wait for the bomb to make its way through three countries, and their security measures, changing planes twice (Frankfort and London), to explode after the Pan Am jet left Heathrow and flew three hours over the Atlantic.[195]

To back up the findings of this "investigation," the U.S. government relied on its pre-programmed view of Khadaffi being a crazy out-of-control terrorist-supporting killer. CIA veteran Vincent Cannistraro developed a "Libya" policy that fit the National Security Council's desire to hold Khadaffi responsible for the majority of terrorist activities. Cannistraro is quoted in The Maltese Double Cross, "I developed the policy toward Libya. In fact, I even wrote the draft paper that was later adopted by the President."

Howard Teicher, the senior director of the NSC between 1985 and 1987, stated, "Mr. Cannistraro and myself were the coordinators of Libya policy within the NSC, and did have a direct role in coordinating the papers written by State, with input from the CIA, Department of Defense, and other agencies that all had a role." Were any of the "other agencies" perhaps the FBI?

Iran/Contra affair figure Lt. Col. Oliver North, working for the Reagan administration's NSC, paired up with Cannistraro in a program meant to destroy the Khadaffi regime. Coincidentally, Cannistraro later headed up the CIA's investigation into the bombing at Lockerbie. Cannistraro later recounted "The principle avenues that led to identification of a foreign role in an act of terrorism was forensic evidence recovered by the Scottish police...one of those bits of debris turned out to be a microchip, which was analyzed microscopically that led to the Libyan connection."[191]

It has never been satisfactorily explained how this "bit of microchip" led to Libya, verses Syria, or Iran, or Iraq or East Germany. And considering that this vital piece of evidence allegedly found away from the main crash site, in a densely wooded area, could have easily been planted, or shown up in the evidence chain later and simply tagged "found at such-and-such location," it makes this one piece of evidence very suspect. Especially considering the fact that no one seems to know exactly who found it, and at least one Scottish searcher was approached later to sign a statement that he was the finder, even though he wasn't.

Also, we find that dealing with Libya as a terrorist state was much more expeditious and less dangerous than dealing with other, far more dangerous, countries. Howard Teicher mentioned that "Vince was quite aware of what was going on in Syria, and of the Iranian dimension and the Iraqi dimension of their role in state-sponsored terrorism. What emerged in U.S. policy was the tendency to be able to most directly deal with Libya because of Libya's geographic proximity to Europe and the United states, as opposed to Iraq, Iran and Syria. It was much more difficult to deal with other countries."

It was also much more difficult to deal especially with Syria, the host country of the PFLP-GC headquartered in the Bekaa Valley, in the days leading up to the Gulf War. Syria was needed to help oust Saddam Hussein from Kuwait, and to blame Syria for involvement in the bombing would be a political disaster for the Bush administration.

But the Bush administration did know who did the actual bombing. Bush's Secretary of State James Baker visited Syria in 1989, six months after the Lockerbie disaster, and met with the Syrian foreign intelligence minister. At that meeting, Baker was reported to have asked:

> "What are you doing about the GLC group?"
> "What are you talking about," asked the intelligence minister.
>
> "Jibril," answered Baker. "We know they are responsible for Lockerbie. What are you doing about them?"
>
> "How do you know that?"
> "We have the evidence," answered Baker. "And the evidence is irrefutable."

Despite the fact that the U.S. government knew who was behind the bombing, official Washington put on a different face. Marlin Fitzwater, Whitehouse spokesman, announced to the press "...that the investigation has come to this [Libyan] conclusion is not a surprise. We are now actively considering what actions to take." Then the U.S. Attorney General, Robert Mueller, told the American public that "We have no evidence to implicate another country [other than Libya] in this disaster."

The British joined in the coverup with Douglas Hurd, British Foreign Secretary, releasing the news that "I understand the investigation has revealed no evidence to support suggestions of involvement of other countries." Lord Fraser, Lord Advocate of Scotland and head of the enquiry on Lockerbie, clinched the case when he stated that "the two accused are Abdel Basset Ali Muhammed Al-Megrahi, and Lamin Khalifah Fhimah."

With the exception of physically apprehending the villains, the case appeared to be closed. But was it?

It seems there was more to the case than a simple terrorist attack. What was not exposed to the press or the public at the time were the international drug smuggling and the American hostage connections.

In the Bekaa Valley, terrorist groups rub shoulders with heroin drug gangs. Often they are one in the same. According to Steve Donahue, an ex-US Drug Enforcement Administration undercover agent, "The heroin laboratories themselves were located in the Bekaa Valley. The major one is run by Jamil Hamiya who was the target of our investigation. [Jamil's activities were] a method for financing, at the first level, internal military activities within Lebanon. And at the second level, financing terrorist activities abroad."[196]

To this, FBI agent Oliver "Buck" Revell, who supervised the FBI investigation into the Lockerbie case, adds "Lebanon is a conduit for a great deal of drugs, and the organizations that are moving it through are at least supporting the movement, [and] are violent political organizations such as Hizbollah, the Iranian Revolutionary Guards, and now Hamas. They are directly connected with much of the drug trafficking through the area."[197]

In the Bekaa Valley, the Jafaar family sent one of their relatives, a boy named Khalid Jafaar, to Frankfort to stay with "friends," who would find him work in the United States then put him on a plane for America. What they did not know was that Khalid had been selected to perform a mission for the PFLP-GC. One of the members of the Jafaar family explained "Hourani family tell him 'we send you to Germany. From Germany you can go to America.' They give him this address. In Germany he stay with some friend. And what he [the friend] fix in his bag is the tape recorder. Hizbollah is behind Khalid [killing], what he done to him."

The family may or may not have known that Khalid was also taking a suitcase filled with heroin to the U.S., through a system that they thought was safe, but which in actuality was part of a DEA "controlled buy" network. Lester Coleman, U.S. Defense Intelligence Agency agent who was detailed to work with the DEA and CIA in the Lebanese-U.S. drug war, explained that "They could not eradicate the drugs in Lebanon, so they could only do two things: [one], monitor what was being produced and how it was being shipped out, and two; use DEA informants from Lebanon in drug sting operations back in the United States to set up drug buys and catch drug buyers in the U.S. That was a big part of what they were doing...It was arranged by the DIA for me to go over to work for the DEA in this Narcotics Operations Group, headed by Michael T. Hurley, the country attaché. And my main responsibility was to gather intelligence in Lebanon relating to opium production and trafficking and that kind of thing."

The operation was simple. Paid DEA informants would notify the DEA teams when a suitcase shipment would leave Lebanon, the routing, and the description of the courier. The DEA would in turn make sure the courier and heroin would, by means of paid double agents and "in the know" customs agents who worked at the various airports and airlines baggage facilities, travel unmolested between destinations. After the drugs reached the U.S. they were tracked to the recipient, who was at the top of the distribution chain in this country.

Juval Aviv explained that "At least once or twice a week a courier would carry a brown Samsonite suitcase full of drugs from Cypress to Frankfort, where an arrangement in Frankfort with a baggage handler would switch the suitcase with a similar suitcase full of clothing. The suitcase would then go through the security system...then be switched by one of the Pan Am employees...back to the one with drugs. Then it would go on board the airplane, would arrive at Kennedy, and would be picked up. It would then be sold on the local market."[198]

During this time frame another political crisis was underway. Six Americans had been taken hostage in Beirut and were being held in the terrorist underground. The Reagan administration became obsessed with gaining the release of these prisoners, whether by bribery or by force. Besides attempting to gain their release by means of bribery through the Iranians, who supported and exerted a great deal of influence on Hizbollah, other plans were made as well.[199] One of these plans incorporated a military hostage rescue by a team of Delta Force personnel under a Major Charles D. "Chuck" McKee.

But as it turned out, Major McKee was extremely anti-drug. When he discovered that he would be working hand-in-glove with drug smugglers in the hostage rescue efforts, he refused to go through with the mission. Instead, he took his team out of Beirut to Cypress, where he had his commo man notify Washington that he would be returning to the States with his team, complete with all travel details, and would tell them what was going on when he got there. In other words, he was going to blow open the Mid-East international drug smuggling aspect of U.S. government operations in the Iran/Contra affair.

According to The Maltese Double Cross, "The DEA was watching McKee, separately telexing McKee's final travel arrangements to the CIA's Director of Operations in Washington, MI-6 (the British Secret Service), and SPAG (The CIA's Special Action Group) in Germany with overall control of the drugs-for-intelligence operation. Every spook in Europe knew that McKee was flying back on December 21st."

Traveling with McKee on his leg from Frankfort to London, then on to JFK, was Matthew Kevin Gannon, the CIA deputy station chief for Beirut, who was also evidently going to back up McKee's claims. According to a taped telephone conversation between ex-CIA agent Oswald Le Winter and a former colleague, taped after Le Winter left the CIA, the bomb went on board the "Maid of the Seas" in Frankfort, assisted by CIA operatives:

Le Winter: "Are you there?"
Confidential Contact: "Yeah."
LW: "How are ya?"
CC: "Pretty good. Where you calling from?"
LW: "I'm in Wiesbaden. I just got in to Frankfurt, from the airport. Just thought I'd chill out here for the night."
CC: "Are you alone?"
LW: "Of course I'm alone. You don't think I'd be asking you questions with someone around?"
CC: "Hold on. [tone in background of recording device]Hello?"
LW: "Now tell me where you were."
CC: "[tone] Okay.
LW: "What's that?"
CC: "I just turned it off. It was being taped. What the f__k do you want to know this for? You mean the Special Action Group in Wiesbaden?"
LW: "Yeah, yeah. I mean, you're retired from there now, but your still doing, what?, consulting work, right?"
CC: "Sure."
LW: "Alright, now look. Does the name Khalid Jafaar mean anything to you?
CC: "Yeah."
LW: "Who is that?"
CC: "He's a local guy, man, you know who he is."
LW: "What do you mean 'local guy?"
CC: "Come on."
LW: "Who does he have to do with?"
CC: "He's the Lockerbie man."[200]
LW: "Okay. Now, when he came to Germany in '88, who met him? Who met him at the plane? Naw, when he was taken back to get on the plane to leave the country, who took him through security?"
CC: "Oh, we did. Some of my men took him out. We took him on the plane and turned him over to Gannon."
LW: "You mean Gannon was his keeper on the plane?"
CC: "That's right."
LW: "No s__t!"
CC: "That's right. First class. That big mother____r sitting right up there."[201]

Upgrading to First Class after changing planes to Pan Am 103 at Heathrow was Major Chuck McKee. Linda Forsyth, Pan Am ground hostess at Heathrow remembered McKee "...because he asked me for an upgrade. He had a certificate for a program we were running at that time, and I moved his class. He was pleased, which struck up a rappoire over that short period of time. Then later another gentleman came in, which I found out was Mr. Gannon."[202]

At 7:02 p.m., on Wednesday, December 21st, 1988, Pan Am 103Cthe Clipper Maid of the Seas, had reached 31,000 feet on a northwesterly course across Britain. One minute later, over the Scottish village of Lockerbie, almost to the coastline, a bomb exploded aboard the 747. The combination of airspeed, depressurization, and failure of structural integrity caused the Jumbo Jet to virtually shred itself to pieces as it plummeted to the ground.

We have already seen that after the tragedy many curious things happened on the ground during the search of the crash scene and identification of bodies and luggage by the authorities. But one oddity that bears mentioning at this point is a very odd detail that most historians have failed to examine.

Dr. Fieldhouse, who was searching an area near the church, mentioned that "I identified several bodies, amongst those were McKee...I knew that McKee was absolutely correct because of the clothing which correlated closely with the other reports and statements, and the computers that were linked up to Washington."[203]

How did the computers in Washington know exactly what McKee wore as he boarded the fateful flight? The only way was for it to be reported by someone on a special surveillance mission whose job was to do just that. But why?

Also of note is a paragraph concerning the victims in the Interfor, Inc. report [Juval Aviv, working for Pan Am] which states "At least five passengers were CIA: Beirut Dep. Station Chief Matthew Gannon, agents Ronald Lariviere, Daniel O'Connor and Bill Leyrer, and U.S. Army major Charles McKee, assigned temporarily to CIA. They had flown in from Cyprus to connect with Flight #103. Four U.S. Air Force scientists with secret documents were reportedly on the flight. CIA agents quickly arrived at the crash site and acted very strangely and nervously in securing the CIA passengers' luggage."

Investigative journalist David Ben-Aryeah also mentioned the unusual events that occurred around certain bodies: "There were a number of bodies which subsequently became of great interest to a lot of people. Charles McKee, a very brave man, an expert on counter-terrorism, was found just off on the ridge...Matthew Gannon, an intelligence officer...Captain Curry, Special Forces, who according to his memorial was killed in the line of duty. We've never found out what that line of duty was. There were some very strange people whose backgrounds have never really been clarified."

One thing was for sure. Neither Special Forces Major Charles "Chuck" Mckee and his team, nor CIA station chief Matthew Gannon ever had a chance to tell "Washington" what concerned them.

The destruction of Pan Am 103 that icy December night appears to have accomplished three major objectives: The Iranians got revenge for the shootdown of the A300 Airbus; the international drug smuggling and arms-for-drugs network remained intact; and the Libyans received the blame.

And the coverup continues.

Gander: The Crash of Arrow Air 950JW

By 6:15 a.m., on December 12, 1985, it was still pitch dark in Gander, Newfoundland. The winter months in this near-arctic area cause the days to be short and the nights long. For some on this morning, there would never again be another dawn.

At that moment, two Canadian truck drivers, Cecil Mackie and Leonard Loughren, were pushing their big rigs along the Trans-Canadian Highway near the Gander airport when they noted something very odd happening in the dark night sky. Cecil Mackie recalled later that he watched as a large plane flew low overhead, apparently taking off from the Gander runway only 1,000 feet away, and: "...there was a flame on the bottom" of the aircraft, which was so bright that it illuminated the inside of his cab. Mackie, giving a witness report to Canadian authorities, explained that he was positive he saw flames, not just landing lights.

Leonard Loughren saw the airplane at a different angle at approximately the same time. He reported to Doreen Harty of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police that "I think the right side of the aircraft was afire. It was pitch-dark and I could see the tail and parts of the plane from the glow."

A car rental agent named Judith Parsons watched from the parking lot at the airport as the airplane, a four-engine DC-8 belonging to a little-known American firm named Arrow Air, lifted from the runway then disappear into the night as it began its climb. A few seconds later she saw a flash, followed by "a large orange oval object" moving through the sky. It then "blew up, it just went into a million pieces...It was definitely not on the ground." A few seconds later she witnessed a huge fireball erupt in the distance, on the ground.[204]

What these people had witnessed would become one of the greatest aviation disasters of the decade, and one of the least investigated. Even more than Pan Am 103, which occurred almost exactly three years later, the tragic end of Arrow Air 950JW would be swept under the political carpet and buried in layered bureaucracies. The fact that the investigation was a coverup is uncontestable, for the "reason" of the crash that eventually was released to the public was that the airplane failed to go through de-icing procedures, took off with too much ice on the wings, and crashed because it was overweight and entered a fatal stall. Case closed. The problem is that the witnesses and evidence indicate otherwise. But what really caused the airplane to catch fire in midair, and why a coverup?

To understand the series of events that led up to the destruction of the Arrow Air DC-8, one must understand the international political environment of the time. America had lost its main political ally in the Persian Gulf, the Shah of Iran, and had gained a new fanatic enemy in the person of Ayatollah Khomeini. Israel and Egypt were on the verge of war, and American citizens had been taken hostage in Lebanon by an extremist terrorist organization known as the Islamic Jihad (whose sub-organization is the Iranian-backed Hizbollah, or "Party of God").

In an attempt to contain events in the middle east and Persian Gulf, then-president Ronald Reagan dispatched both military and CIA personnel to the region. Marines and CIA officers went to Beirut, where a show of force was supposed to intimidate the Bekaa Valley-based Hizbollah and Islamic Jihad, while a force of soldiers from the 101st Airborne Division, based in Fort Campbell, Kentucky, was dispatched to the Sinai Desert to participate in what had been designated "Multinational Force and Observers" (MFO). The mission of the MFO was to support U.N. activities in the Egyptian Sinai in a buffer zone between the Egyptians and the Israelis. Their job was to conduct reconnaissance patrols, man observation posts along the international boundary, and set up checkpoints for border crossings.

Though the mission was to have been peaceful, the 101st found itself targets on several occasions for hostile activities of the Shiite Moslem Islamic Jihad. Meanwhile, the Marines in Beirut fared even worse at the hands of this same group when they became victims of a truck bomb at their airport barracks at Beirut International Airport. In that attack, an Islamic Jihad fanatic drove a flat-bed Mercedes truck stacked with 12,000 pounds of high explosive, surrounded by cylinders of compressed butane gas, into the front door of the building. The huge explosion caused the entire structure to collapsed, killing 241 Marines. This attack followed an earlier attack by the same group that set off a truck bomb at the U.S. Embassy in Beirut, killing 17 Americans and 40 other nationals. Islamic Jihad also claimed responsibility for the June 14, 1985 hijacking of a TWA jetliner enroute from Athens to Rome; kidnapping 57-year-old William Buckley, the CIA station chief in Lebanon, and twelve other hostages; and numerous other terrorist attacks.

As these attacks continued, the Islamic Jihad announced that there would be more in retaliation for Israeli incursions into southern Lebanon and American interference in the Middle East, not to mention military and financial support for Israel. In one communication an anonymous caller boasted that these attacks would no longer occur only in the Middle East, but would "be aimed at every Zionist, American or reactionary establishment in various parts of the world." He followed this with the threat that future operations would be "immediate, surprising and lightning."[205]

It was under this cloud of international terrorist threats that the 101st Airborne troopers of MFO in the Sinai were withdrawn from peacekeeping duty. For them it was none too soon. They would be exchanging a foreign desert for the hearths of home in Fort Campbell, just in time for Christmas.

But moving a large number of troops out of an operational area consists of more than simply boarding airplanes at the airport, especially when they are scattered throughout an operational area among remote outposts. There was the question of equipment, personal baggage, staging troops and gear, and ground movement to the airlift point. In the case of the Sinai troops, the air transport out of the desert was limited to a couple of small Egyptair 737s, which could not hold the troops with their luggage and the piles of unit equipment. Because of this the gear and baggage traveled by truck from their base camp at Sharm El Sheik to Cairo, where it caught up with the troops the next day. It was then loaded aboard a waiting civilian air contract carrier, a DC-8 owned by Arrow Air of Miami, Florida, for the long flight home.[206]

It was during this stage of the movement that unusual things were noted. Though customs officers from both Egypt and the U.S. searched all baggage and equipment containers at Sharm El Sheik, then sealed the containers on the trucks, the trucks left a full day early and spent the night at the airport at Cairo with only two American soldiers as guards. Then at 4:00 p.m. on December 11th, the truck drivers took over the guard detail so that the soldiers could prepare to depart.

At about 8:00 p.m. that evening, American officers broke the seals on the trucks and gave the order to load the baggage compartments. The loading was conducted not by American soldiers, but by a local Egyptian company contracted as baggage handlers at the airport. It was during this time that the Arrow Air pilot, Captain Arthur Schoppaul, noted something odd. The Egyptian guard, who was supposed to guard the baggage and aircraft, disappeared from his post several times, sometimes for as long as an hour. Then, during one of these absences, Schoppaul witnessed a fist fight break out near a baggage hold between some of the "Egyptian" loaders. This was highly unusual as Arabs almost never touched each other, and to most investigators it appeared to be a diversion. Then there was a period of time when the electricity was cut to the ramp and the lights went out, leaving the area in total darkness.

The next unusual thing that occurred happened after the cargo holds had been loaded. Still sitting on the ramp were the duffel bags of 41 soldiers, personal gear that would not have been left behind under any normal circumstance. But on this flight the bags had been "bumped," because there was other cargo that joined the battalion's gear in the Sinai base camp and took precedent in Cairo, several large wooden crates the size of coffins. These mysterious boxes must have taken priority, for the battalion commander, Lieutenant Colonel Marvin Jeffcoat, ordered the already loaded duffel bags removed to make room for what he described as "very important military material." Also odd is the fact that one of the twenty "mystery boxes" had not been transported to the airport by truck with the other gear, but had flown to Cairo in the hold of one of the 737s that brought the troops out of the desert. No one knows exactly where this box was kept after the 737s were offloaded and the rest of the gear was still being transported by truck from the Sinai.

Even more mysterious is the fact that numerous investigators have attempted to discover the contents of the mystery boxes, but no records or manifest exists in army records that even mention their existence.

After departing Cairo, the Arrow Air flight arrived at Cologne, Germany, for refueling at 1:21 a.m. It was on the ground for almost two hours while the troops changed uniforms (and the baggage holds were opened and left unguarded). At 3:20 a.m. it took off for the long leg across the Atlantic to Gander, the next refueling stop.

The weather in Gander was typical for December. It was overcast, and precipitation consisting of spitting snow and freezing rain cut the visibility to minimums. The airplane landed without incident, refueled and taxied for the runway at 5:40 a.m. Gander time. Five minutes later it was rotating for takeoff. Sixty seconds later witnesses watched in horror as the big airplane dove, on fire, into the woods near the shore of Gander Lake.

David Owen, a former Canadian bush pilot-turned-senior-investigator for the Canadian Air Safety Board, along with Department of Transport pilot George Dewar, arrived in Gander four hours after the crash. But before landing, they located the site and circled it to check the impact pattern and extent of ground damage from the air. What struck Dewar was that they could not identify an airplane crash as such, only a field of burning debris. Owen's participation in the investigation was short-lived, but before he was replaced by investigators from headquarters, he managed to send out the first official memo on what would become Canada's worst aviation disaster:

"JW950 [sic] crashed shortly after departure. No apparent survivors. Aircraft departed Rwy 22. Disappeared below the line between TCH and Gander Lake. Aircraft exploded on contact near the edge of Gander Lake."

It was short and to the point. But it failed to take into account the observations of the witnesses concerning an airborne fire prior to the crash. That would come later, but would still not figure in the final "official" versions of the reports regarding the crash released by both Canada and the U.S.

By 3:00 p.m., A U.S. Army major general named John Crosby arrived with a contingent of military personnel to "assist" the RCMP and the CASB in their efforts. Shortly after his arrival several members of the NTSB and FBI arrived. But before they could entrench themselves in the investigation they were advised by Canadian authorities that they had no jurisdiction there, and that the investigation would be accomplished by Canadian officials. Though agitated, the U.S. officials agreed to bide by the Canadian findings as they awaited the outcome from hotel rooms in Gander. Even though Americans were the victims, and the airplane was of American registry, the FBI remained strangely content to await the outcome of the Canadian investigation without more than token protest.

One caveat did occur regarding the bodies. Any blood and serum toxicology tests conducted had to be performed in Canada and the results sent back to the U.S. The American government agreed to this and awaited transport of the bodies to Dover Air Force Base, New Jersey.

What happened next would be a matter of contention for years. General Crosby ordered the immediate bulldozing of the crash site! No effort was made to reassemble the wreckage, which is standard procedure, nor preserve the site for future, more detailed investigation. Instead, the "crime scene" was destroyed as soon as American officials gained possession of it. Crosby was in touch with Canadian officials in Gander regarding the cleanup of the crash site, and according to witnesses, insisted that "a representative of the Army be present at all times."

Instead of a detailed investigation of the wreckage, conducted by attempting to reassemble the myriad bits and pieces of airplane to determine if there was a mechanical malfunction or sabotage, which is standard operating procedure, the evidence was covered up with little more than a hasty look-see by officials. The only hard evidence examined were the bodies.

Colonel Robert McMeekin, director of the Armed Forces Institute of Pathology, received notification of the crash at 6:30 a.m. on December 12th. He immediately began packing and by 3:30 p.m. that afternoon arrived at Gander airport. The RCMP, under a Memorandum of Understanding between the two governments, permitted Col. McMeekin access to the crash site for purposes of recovering the bodies of the victims for shipment to Dover for identification. It was at Dover that the bodies would be examined, their fluids drawn for toxicology, x-rays would be taken, and identification made.

During the Dover examinations, x-rays revealed that none of the bodies appeared to have any internal indication of pre-impact damage due to explosion, and that all had died as a result of "plane crash." The problem with this finding is that it is a blanket ruling that is not acceptable in a court of law. The cause of death is always determined on an individual basis, such as "broken neck," "fractured cranium," "myocardial infarction," etc. In this case, no individual autopsy "cause of death" was recorded for each victim.

Then more problems arose when the toxicology reports came back from Canada. Dr. David Elcombe, director of the Canadian Aviation Safety Board, released the findings that conflicted with the American ruling. According to the Canadian tests on the blood of the victims each had high levels of carbon monoxide poisoning. Only by breathing smoke for an extended period, from two to five minutes, could such levels be reached. This indicates that the plane, which went down in less than one minute, and burned for hours, obviously held live victims inside that were still alive until they asphyxiated or burned to death. Another observation proves that the fire actually started in flight, filling the cabin with smoke, before the plane impacted with the ground. Many of the victims bodies which held high levels of carbon monoxide had been found decapitated! This trauma could only have occurred upon impact, not in the air. Therefore, they had ingested the gas prior to impact, revealing the plane was on fire when it went down. So much for the "icing" theory.

On June 20th, 1986, Dr. Elcombe sent a memo to Dr. McMeekin stating: "Some of the carbon monoxide and hydrogen cyanide values are striking...and I look forward to meeting with you...to consider their significance." The outcome of such a meeting, if one was indeed held, has not been reported.

There had to be something else that worried the military and the government besides an on-board fire as the cause. Simply trying to hide the fact that something went wrong while the plane was airborne would not justify such extreme measures in covering up the cause of the crash as burying the wreckage without detailed investigation, or trying to hide the cause of death of the 248 servicemen and women. The answer has to lie in the mission of the 3rd Battalion, 101st Airborne, and their mysterious boxes and "add-on" personnel.

It has been speculated by various investigators that the boxes loaded in the hold contained items ranging from HAWK missile system parts rejected by the Iranians during the Oliver North/Bill Casey Iran/Contra dealings, to dead members of a failed hostage rescue attempt by Delta Force. What is known is that twenty members of the elite Task Force 160 were also on board the flight. TF-160, based in Fort Campbell, is the Army's special operations aviation battalion tasked with support of not only Special Forces, but Delta Force and CIA. Dubbed "The Night Stalkers," TF-160 has a huge budget that permits them to have virtually any piece of equipment they want. Items ranging from night vision equipment to exotic weapons to just about every helicopter in military inventory are at the beck and call of the group. Hauling paratroopers around the desert during U.N. operations are not what TF-160 would be deployed to accomplish. Their missions are much more serious, more specialized, more secret.

Paired up with Delta Force, TF-160 would be the air support unit that would participate in any hostage rescue attempt. For this mission they would not only ship their helicopters and support equipment across the Atlantic in C-5A Galaxy aircraft, but would box up and take any specialized equipment, especially that which would give away the mission or current technology, in sealed containers that would stay with the personnel as they went through their movement stage. This would include weapons and explosives. Could it be that TF-160 and Delta Force were using the 101st base camp as a jumping off point for commando operations in the vicinity? Or possibly simply linking up with them for the return home after their secret mission was accomplished or aborted?

Lt. Col. Oliver North had been negotiating with the Iranians for several months regarding their "assistance" in convincing the Jihad terrorists to release hostages in Lebanon. Most of this "negotiating" revolved around arms shipments to Iran consisting of TOW anti-tank missiles from the European "Reforger" stocks and HAWK anti-aircraft missiles. But when the HAWKs arrived, the Iranian technicians determined that they were an outdated model, not dependable, and not up to engaging some of the latest generation of Russian jets supplied to the Iraqis. The Iranians were extremely upset, feeling that North and his Israeli contacts had betrayed them and tried to cheat them. North had to agree to take the missiles back and replace them with newer, updated models. It is not known outside of the most inner circles where the old HAWKs and their spare parts went. Could they have been what were in the boxes?

The Iranians, however, felt they had to teach the Americans a lesson. According to the Islamic law, something had to be done in revenge that was much greater than the original "crime." North knew this, and when told that the Islamic Jihad might condemn some or all of the hostages to death, remarked that the deaths of the hostages would be our "minimum losses."

Realizing this, did North plan a covert hostage rescue attempt? If so, is it possible that he knew exactly where the hostages were located? Or was he relying on the CIA/Bekaa Valley heroine connections to provide unreliable intelligence?

If a hostage rescue attempt had indeed occurred, but failed, did the boxes contain the remains of those killed during the attempt? Would these make up the "maximum losses"? If this was the scenario, then an Islamic Jihad retribution for the rescue attempt, committed on our withdrawing troops by planting a Marwin Khreesat-type bomb in the 101st's baggage, might have been the answer. It must be remembered that the Pan Am 103 bomb managed to be put on the aircraft in Frankfort, take off, fly to Heathrow, land, change planes, then take off to become armed at a given time, past a given altitude as the airplane climbed for the skies over the Atlantic. A similar device would have accomplished the same mission on Arrow Air, without having to change planes. A simple timer permitting a pre-set number of hours of flight time would have done the trick.

Had the Arrow Air flight been on time, the airplane would have caught fire or exploded on its approach to Fort Campbell, sending a terrible message to the "infidels" of America.

Whatever the actual reason Arrow Air 950JW flamed out of the sky at Gander, Newfoundland, on that cold December morning, the official version is a lie.

Fire On The Water: TWA 800

A controller working Departure Control at John F. Kennedy International Airport saw it first: something on the radar screen that shouldn't be there. Near the "target" blip of a TWA 747 that had just taken off from JFK a few minutes before, which now winged its way over the Atlantic paralleling the coast as it climbed toward its cruising altitude, was another blip. The controller examined the scope, wondering if there was another aircraft in the area that might pose a hazard to the TWA jet since the secondary target was not "squawking" a transponder code, which meant it was not under control of any air control facility, and it seemed to be moving rapidly toward the big transport as the big Boeing joined its designated course for Paris.

Then, before any more analysis could take place in the FAA control room, something happened to the tiny double-bar radar blip that was designated TWA flight 800.

The coastal residents of East Moriches, Long Island, first noticed something in the sky when there was a sound that some later described as "fireworks" over the ocean. Looking up, many noticed that there was a small glowing ball of reddish-orange light high over the ocean. Closer examination showed it to be an airplane. But something was wrong with it.

As they watched, they saw the small glow become engulfed by a huge fireball. Then, what was curiosity at first rapidly became a state of shock for some and horror for others as the airplane seemed to break up into two large flaming "comets" and fall for several horrifying seconds until it hit the surface of the ocean. Many could not believe what they had just witnessed, but the lake of fire that floated on the surface of the sea proved that the nightmare was reality.

Hundreds of witnesses along the shoreline and in boats later reported what they had seen. A fisherman recalled that when he looked up what he saw "...started off like a little ball, like a flare. It came down for a few seconds and all of a sudden burst into flames, a big ball of flame."

An unidentified man said that he "...saw a big fireball with pieces coming off of it. I heard two big explosions, like two big firecrackers going off."

A New York Air National Guard colonel flying a C-130 nearby caught the 747 just after the second explosion. He reported that he witnessed "...two large orange fireballs. They looked like comets, coming straight down into the water."

An unidentified woman interviewed by reporters saw more: "There was a loud explosion, which was followed by a fireball. The plane literally dropped out of the sky...and it hit the ocean, sort of like the space shuttle [Challenger] did, and there were five more explosions."

Vic Fehner, a fisherman, said "it started off like a little ball, like a flare. It came down for a few seconds and all of a sudden burst into flames, a big ball of flame."

Jason Fontana, who was standing at John Scott's Raw Bar in Westhampton Beach, saw "a big fireball with pieces coming off of it. You heard two big explosions, like two big firecrackers going off."

Craig Squires, surfing when the plane blew up: "I looked up and saw a trail of fire, and then it disappeared, and I heard an explosion.

Finally, Eileen Daly, a local resident, summed up what many saw and felt when she said, "My first reaction is fireworks, then 'Oh my God, it's an airplane.'"

Almost immediately boats began racing toward the impact area, which was easily marked by a virtual lake of fire as tons of fuel burned on the surface of the water. Residents raced to their telephones and began dialing police, the fire departments of the various beach towns, ambulances, and the Coast Guard. At the same time radio calls began to fill the air waves requesting assistance in search and rescue operations. Like any accident scene, no one seemed to know exactly what had happened, but everyone began trying to do what they could to notify authorities to lend help.

Among the first of hundreds of rescue craft, airplanes, ships and helicopters to reach the site was a U.S. Coast Guard plane practicing search-and-rescue operations nearby, whose pilot witnessed the horrific crash and immediately circled the area, identifying the wreckage and reporting back to his commanders.

Two other aircraft quickly joined the search: an Air National Guard C-130 that had been conducting a "flare dropping exercise" nearby, and ostensibly was the same C-130 whose crew that witnessed the tragedy, and a U.S. Navy P-3 Orion submarine hunter who reportedly heard the radio traffic regarding the explosion and offered to assist.

Rescue craft began arriving immediately, consisting mainly of boat-owning local residents, fishermen and Coast Guard cutters. According to media reports "six Coast Guard helicopters and cutters" joined the search, and throughout the night other vessels arrived to lend assistance in searching for victims, recovering bodies, and eventually recovering wreckage.

By the next morning, Thursday, July 18, 73 bodies had been pulled out of the water. Unlike KAL-007, where no bodies were recovered, many were found floating in the area, none of which wore a life jacket! Many of the bodies had been badly burned, some beyond recognition.

One private boat that arrived early on the scene found among the debris a yellow TWA life vest, inflated and buckled...but no body. According to Jimmy Vaccaro, who hooked the empty jacket into his boat, "It was inflated and it was buckled. These things don't light and inflate by themselves, you have to pull on it or blow through the tube." The reference to a "light" may be to a strobe light attached to the vest that had been activated. This discovery lended credence to an observation that some of the passengers had time to reach for life jackets before they died, but not enough time to put them on. Evidently one such individual inflated the jacket before trying to pull it on, or the CO2 cartridge activation lanyard had somehow snagged on something after being pulled from under the seat and inflated before the jacket could be donned.

The Coast Guard said none of the bodies recovered wore life preservers, suggesting that the explosion came without warning and there was no time to pull out life vests before impact.

As fishermen and other local residents helped recover the bodies of the victims, a temporary morgue was set up near the beach near the little town of East Moriches close to the crash site. As this was being accomplished, local officials cautioned residents to report any wreckage or bodies washing ashore in the next day or so, but not to touch anything that may serve as evidence that could explain what made the jumbo jet suddenly disintegrate into the darkness.

Of note regarding the wreckage and flotsam that was being found along the beach was a special notification from federal officials on the 18th that if anyone came upon any boxes on the beach, not to open or tamper with them because there were two boxes of AIDS-infected blood unaccounted for. No one in the media seemed to ask the sources why anyone would be shipping AIDS-infected blood anywhere, nor was this event followed up on later. In fact, only a short mention was made in the media when CNN aired the statement of a pool reporter who was aboard a Coast Guard 33-foot rescue boat who said that the boat crew retrieved several State Department pouches and seven packages that were labeled as HIV-infected blood (Biohazard), plus instructions on how to use the blood to infect children! Though these alleged "instructions" were not displayed on camera, it should be noted that one of the victims on the flight was the son of the president of a French pharmaceutical firm, Merieux, who is one of the leading researchers in AIDS. It is also pertinent to note that this same firm had earlier been accused of desiring to use unwilling human test subjects, including military personnel, as guinea pigs for their vaccine experiments. None of this seemed to trigger questions in the national media regarding the finding of the blood. The crash itself was the story.

Almost immediately a media feeding frenzy ensued concerning the cause of the explosion. The major networks scurried about, madly racing to interview any think tank or terrorism "expert" they could find. As a sample, among the interviews conducted and broadcast nationwide to explain what "probably" happened were:

James Donoghue, editor-in-chief of Air Transport Magazine, who said "It's got the hallmarks of a bombing, but it could be all kinds of things. Of the number of 747s that have descended in flames, the vast majority have been because of bombs."

Michael Barr, director of aviation safety programs at USC, spoke against mechanical failure when he stated: "Airplanes don't blow up just like that. I've been following 747s since 1970 and I've never seen one blow up like that."

Robert McGuire, president of Kroll Associates of New York, a highly regarded consulting and security firm, and former NYPD police commissioner, who obviously had not heard the eyewitness statements regarding the "small glow" that preceded the huge fireball, said, "The nature of the incident appears to be traumatic explosion. There were no reports of a burning engine, smoke or the normal stuff that happens to these planes before an accident. Because there was no transmission back to the tower, there seems to have been immediate or overwhelming trauma."

Philip Stern, the managing director of the Fairfax Group, hinting he suspected possible terrorist involvement, mentioned that the original departure point of Athens, where the TWA jet had flown into JFK from, was "troublesome" to him. Athens, according to Stern, has long been known to act as a gateway to the Middle East, and Greece has a history of "radical politicians sympathetic to Middle Eastern causes."

Robert Kupperman, senior advisor to the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington and well-known terrorism expert, said that he noted several pieces of evidence that made him believe that this was a likely terrorist bombing. He said the signs indicating a terrorist incident were: All of the eyewitnesses describing a fireball and subsequent explosion; it was a U.S. aircraft enroute to Europe; terrorists in late June attacked a U.S. military facility in Saudi Arabia; and the Summer Olympic Games were starting two days later in Atlanta.

Jack Barker, retired FAA spokesman, said that it was quite likely a bomb, but "You don't want to speculate about what has happened until the NTSB and the FBI have made their investigation, but it certainly is reminiscent of the Lockerbie explosion and in the realm of speculation. The explosion in the air, the fire, there had to be some kind of ignition in the air, and that could be caused by only a very few things. A bomb being on board could be one of them. The other has already been ruled out by the FAA, a collision with another aircraft. Aside from those two things, for anything else to cause an explosion would be very, very rare."

Amazingly, two spokesmen for the TWA 800 disaster were the same "experts" that handled Pan Am 103, Oliver "Buck" Revell (FBI) and Vincent Cannistraro (CIA). Buck Revell told the press that such a jet had never been destroyed in the air by an explosion that was not sabotage, and Vincent Cannistrano said that if it was a bomb "this is another notch up the ladder of terrorism...in the past year domestic aviation security has been tightened considerably." [Because] He said that terrorists have never blown up an airliner with a bomb planted in the U.S.

The government spokesmen were being much more cautious about jumping to conclusions, however. White House spokesman Mike McCurry and others, including President Clinton, refused to comment on whether they felt it was a terrorist event or a catastrophic failure of an aircraft system. Noncommittal, they developed for the media a "wait and see" stance.

But behind the scenes it appeared that other lines of communication between government agencies were being developed and a different message was being sent. There appeared to be drastic discrepancies between what many eye witnesses saw and what the government, especially the FBI, was willing to recognize as a possible cause of the explosion.

Early on many witnesses stated that they saw something that appeared to them to be a flare or a streak of light that seemed to arc up and hit the jumbo jet. Variations of these sightings match what the FAA radar controllers saw on their scope at JFK Departure Control, and what three crewmen on the C-130 witnessed as they flew their "flare dropping exercise."

But the FBI and other federal agencies, up to and including the White House, though not ruling out the "possibility" of a missile attack, consistently attempted to debunk any reference to a surface-to-air missile as a viable cause worth investigation. According to FBI Agent Jim Margolin, when questioned about the three possibilities, a bomb, a mechanical malfunction, or a missile: "Along with a mechanical malfunction, the missile theory rounds out the known universe of potential causes."

Special Agent in Charge (SAC) of the New York office of the FBI James Kallstrom, however, was not quite as dismissing. He appeared to be walking a political tightrope when he told the media that [paraphrased] "Widespread attention being given to the crash may make many eyewitness reports related to the missile theory suspect." He conceded, however, that with similar accounts reported by "numerous citizens" of "events, things in the sky" meant the missile theory could not be discarded.

Then, a mysterious "unnamed Pentagon Spokesman" offered this for mass consumption when the subject of shoulder-launched missiles, such as the Stinger or the Russian SA-7, might be the culprits: "There is no way a Stinger or other hand-held shoulder-fired missile could take down a 747 and a Stinger does not have the range to hit TWA 800 at the altitude it was at." This same spokesman went on to state unequivocally that the plane could not have had a fuel explosion because it was fueled with JP-8. This means the "spokesman" was a Navy man because only the Navy uses JP-8 fuel, and then only on carriers because of its high flash point. Two things immediately discredited this learned source. First, TWA 800 was well within range of a Stinger if it was fired from a boat, and second, the airplane was fueled with Jet A fuel, which is the commercial jet fuel that all civilian jets and commercial airlines use. When this information was brought to the attention of SAC Kallstrom's office by the author no more was heard from this "unnamed Pentagon source."

By Day Three it became evident that there were three powers at work fighting over the bone of contention of TWA 800 and the cause of its demise. First, it became apparent that the National Transportation Safety Board (NTSB) spokesman, Robert Francis, was trying to walk a non-committal line between the FBI, TWA, Pratt & Whitney (the engine builder) and the Boeing Airplane Company. He had by then hunkered down to weather out the storm of controversy by repeatedly announcing that "we are moving slowly forward," and "it's just too early to tell."

The FBI, and the Anti-Terrorism Task Force, however, reminded reporters that though they were not officially taking over the investigation, they were watching for any evidence of a bombing or terrorist involvement. At that time, according to Kallstrom, they would assume the responsibility for the investigation and it would take a new course. Hints over the next week leaned toward nudging the public mind toward acceptance of a probable bomb aboard the airliner, probably in the forward cargo hold or the passenger section just above that location.

TWA, however, did not want the outcome to point to a bomb as that would open the company up to lawsuits by relatives of the victims who would blame lax airport security as the major contributing factor.

The Boeing Airplane Company did not want the investigation to point fingers at a design flaw of the airframe or fuel system as they would then become the object of a massive law suit, and Pratt & Whitney did not want the blame placed on a catastrophic engine failure for the same reason.

In all, it appeared that everyone was choosing up sides and going to their corners to await the outcome of the investigation of the wreckage that was being retrieved by the Navy salvage ship, U.S.S. Grapple. The odd-man out in all of this, however, was the "missile theory." A shootdown by terrorists at sea, using a surface-to-air missile, would leave TWA, Boeing, and Pratt & Whitney out of any subsequent lawsuit regarding negligence. It would not, however, let the government off the hook.

The idea that someone high in government was becoming very nervous about the possibility of a missile strike became increasingly evident as the investigation continued and witnesses were discovered and interviewed. The FBI located and questioned hundreds of local residents, ostensibly to find out what they might have witnessed that night. But they evidently did not like what they were hearing, for as they found witnesses who reported aerial objects striking the jet, or smoke plumes, or flares, or fireworks, or strange lights in the sky, the agents immediately began intimidating the witnesses by telling them that they could not have seen a missile. They told them that none of them knew what a missile looked like, that what they saw was simply "falling debris" and not something that came up from the water. To many of these witnesses, it appeared that the FBI had orders to make the incident a bomb if possible and debunk any missile story, no matter what the evidence or witnesses saw. This falls in line with what the FBI and Justice Department did after the Oklahoma City bombing a year earlier when they dropped the search for John Doe #2 within a few weeks after the event. They then intimidated every witness who reported that they saw JD#2 with McVeigh. These included eye witness sightings at the truck rental agency in Kansas; in the Ryder truck with McVeigh in Oklahoma City when he stopped to ask directions; across the street from the post office a block away from the Murrah Building; and getting out of the truck with McVeigh after parking in front of the building. The FBI then told the press seeing John Doe #2 was just a case of mass hysteria. Would finding John Doe #2 have led the investigation in the politically incorrect direction, as would a missile?

Two witnesses would not be intimidated. A husband and wife, who asked to remain anonymous, wrote a "letter to the editor" to a major city newspaper in California. The letter follows:

> Dear Editor,
> I witnessed the crash of TWA flight 800.
>
> I work in a county office in California. My wife and I were on vacation in New York. We were on the beach when it happened. We talked to many other witnesses who saw the same thing that we did. A very bright fiery light heading upward toward the jet. Then an explosion.
>
> We told what we had seen to some investigators. We told them that we were on our vacation and about to continue on to Florida. They asked us to stay a while longer and said that they would pay our hotel bill until our statements as to what we saw could be taken by other investigators. We agreed.
>
> It turned out however to be more than just our statements taken. They took our social security numbers, drivers licenses and license plate numbers. They wanted to know my place of employment and the names and addresses of our children and relatives. They questioned us in separate rooms and made us feel like criminals. They said that what we must have seen was a shooting star or some fireworks being shot from a boat. I told them that it was definitely a flare type rocket heading toward the aircraft, then it exploded.
>
> It was then suggested that we did not see anything at all and that we were going along with what other people said they saw, just for the excitement of it. I told them "no way, I know what I saw."
>
> After the questioning we were asked to go back to the hotel and stay there until we were cleared to leave. About three hours later two other men we had not seen before came to the hotel. They gave us some money and told us "never to mention anything to anyone about being witnesses to the crash again."
>
> They scared the hell out of us. It was a lot of money and we accepted it out of fear.
>
> If it was a missile that brought down the jet then I could understand that they would not want people to panic. But the way they are handling it is shocking and inexcusable.
>
> My wife and I are outraged and we want people to know how we were treated.
> This letter is not signed out of concern for ourselves and our family.

In an article published in the August 25th, 1996 edition of The Austin American-Statesman, three paragraphs stood out:

"In addition, the notion that Stinger missiles from Afghanistan might have made their way into the United states was a long-standing assumption within law enforcement circles.

"The presence on the crash scene of officials with the National Security Agency and the Defense Intelligence Agency reinforced in some minds that there might have been some intercepted intelligence regarding a missile attack."

On the same day, the Times of London reported: "U.S. officials are investigating reports that Islamic terrorists have smuggled Stinger ground-to-air missiles into the United States from Pakistan.

"Senior Iranian sources close to the fundamentalist regime in Teheran claimed this weekend that the TWA flight 800 was shot down last month by one of these shoulder-fired Stingers of the type used by Islamic guerrillas during the Afghanistan war.

"The sources said the missiles arrived in America seven months ago after being shipped from Karachi via Rotterdam and on to the Canadian port of Halifax. They claimed an Egyptian fundamentalist group backed by Iran was responsible for smuggling the weapons across the Canadian border into the United States.

The article went on to identify the group: the Gama'a al-Islamiya, the same group that attempted to blow up the New York Trade Center under the leadership of Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman. This same group allegedly notified the White House that they had shot down the plane, and even provided a serial number of the missile used. This last information has not been confirmed as of this writing.

The bottom line is that the vast majority of witness statements support the missile contention; federal agents have been attempting to silence these witnesses; and the fact that Stinger missiles have been smuggled into this country by Islamic fundamentalist terrorist organizations is out of the bag.

In the weeks that followed the crash a great deal of wreckage was recovered by the Navy divers. The shredded aluminum and other bits and pieces, including the first three engines (1,2 &4), were transported to an empty Grumman Aircraft Company hangar in Calverton, where the wreckage was being examined and slowly reassembled. Though most of the damage appeared to come from the center of the aircraft, somewhere around the center fuel tank and behind the forward baggage compartment, virtually no chemical residue of explosives was detected that could be pinned to a bomb. There was some evidence of explosive chemicals on the wreckage, but from various locations that included the wings, wing tips, and rear fuselage area. This would not be indicative of a bomb in the cabin or baggage compartment. It would however, be indicative of something else: a missile hit on a hot engine, which then began to disintegrate and cast burning pieces into the wings and fuselage. Especially since the chemicals that were identified also match those used in military explosives, including the warheads of missiles.

For the divers aboard the Grapple, it was tough going. Though the wreckage lay on the ocean floor only 120 feet down, it was scattered for almost three miles in a tadpole-shaped pattern. The water was murky and dark, making it extremely dangerous to navigate through the twisted wreckage. On top of this, the local shark population had sensed the bodies and continued to school in the area as the divers worked. Eventually the crash site became known as "Mako City" after the most numerous of the shark breeds that infested the area.

The debris fields were mainly divided into two areas of concern: the nose and forward section of the fuselage which broke loose and fell first, and the main fuselage area, wings and tail which appeared to fly for several seconds after the aircraft had been "decapitated."

As the divers worked and the debris began to arrive on shore, the investigators on land busied themselves with assembling the pieces of the puzzle. A joint task force consisting of the FBI Counterterrorisim Task Force, the New York Police Department, and the NTSB appeared to the news watchers to be working like a team. In reality, the word behind the scenes gained through law enforcement and government aviation sources is that there was pressure coming down from Washington for federal agents to cover up what really happened, and if they could not blame a bomb or mechanical malfunction, then to drag the investigation out until the public and media lost interest.

But why? Why would the government not want to have the truth come out if it was a missile? Why not warn the flying public? And could it really have been a missile, and if so what type and where did it come from?

To understand some of the past historical events that may have a bearing on the loss of TWA 800, one must dig back into the a series of events that occurred in the 1980s regarding the "loss" of several hundred shoulder-fired Stinger missiles. During the Afghan/Russian war, the CIA, in support of the Mujihadeen guerrillas, smuggled hundreds of Stingers into Afghanistan to counter the Russian MiGs and Hind helicopter gunships. The missiles were so effective that they are credited as being a major factor in the Russian withdrawal from the country. At the end of the war a few hundred Stingers were left over and were offered back to the U.S. government. But for some mysterious reason, the government did not want them back.

The missiles were eventually taken to Islamabad, Pakistan, and put on the open market. Most were bought by Israeli arms dealers and resold at a profit to the Iranians for use against the Iraqis during the border war. The Iraqi air force seldom flew, however, leaving many missiles in Iranian inventory when the border war ground to a halt. Reportedly, these Stingers eventually found their way into the hands of two terrorist groups: Hizbollah and Hamas.

Discounting this information, even if it was not true, other Stingers remain on sale by the Afghanis for $100,000 each, a small sum for terrorist organizations who have a $1 million contract per airplane from the Iranians in retribution for the shootdown of the Iranian A-300 Airbus by the U.S.S. Vincennes. The contract is called a Fatwa, a religious order that cannot be recalled, quite similar to the order to kill author Salmon Rushdie for writing his book, Satanic Verses. This Fatwa was for ten American jumbo jets.

This also matches the story of Pan Am 103 being the first to be destroyed, tracing the bombers back to Syria and the PFLP-GC; and Ramzi Yousef planning to blow up a dozen 747s. Yousef, the New York World Trade Center bomber, was arrested in Pakistan before he could carry out his mission. He was also tightly connected to Islamic terrorists in the Philippines, and to Hamas cells in the United States, including New York City.[207]

CIA sources say at least 30-40 missiles are in circulation in the terrorist ranks (a very conservative estimate), and that these missiles were offered to be given back to the State Department at no charge, but the CIA and Clinton Administration refused to take them back for some odd reason. Author and investigator Rodney Stich, receiving this information from deep-cover intelligence sources, wrote a letter to Senator Arlen Specter on Oct. 20, 1995, "that this refusal suggested a hidden agenda, with possible catastrophic consequences in shooting down commercial airliners." To prove how reliable his information was, the warning even included the serial numbers of some of the missiles, which were provided by one of Stich's deep cover CIA whistle blowers. The offer to give back the missiles was made by Afghan Mujihadeen leader General Rashid Dostom.

According to Stich, the following missiles were issued to the Afghans and may have found their way into terrorist hands: GDP 84D 001-320 362956; GDP 84J 001-320 363602; GDP 86G 001-387 369587; GDP 84G 001 320 363387.

To add to this, Israeli intelligence reported that they received unconfirmed information that 50 Stingers entered the U.S. in January, 1995. They attempted to warn U.S. authorities, but were ignored.

Stingers are not the only shoulder-fired surface-to-air missiles available to terrorists. The Russian equivalent to the earlier American "Redeye" missile is the SA-7 "Grail." According to Intelligence sources, over 120,000 Russian SA-7s have been produced, and about 10% have fallen into the hands of terrorist groups, some with Russian assistance. The SA-7 is responsible for hitting a jet near Oman at a slant range of over six miles, and a British-made Hunter aircraft near Yemen was struck at a height of 12,000 feet. During the Vietnam war, NVA and VC rocket gunners engaged and destroyed aircraft at altitudes of between 11,000 and 12,000 feet with the Grail. The Russian Stinger clone, the SA-14 "Gremlin," is even more effective.

The Stinger, contrary to what the unnamed Pentagon spokesman stated, was more than capable of reaching the 747 from a boat, even if the aircraft was in excess of the latest altered altitude of 13,700 feet. But did any witnesses observe a missile trail originating from the sea below the jet?

According to an Athens newspaper, a Greek commercial pilot saw just that.

Investigative journalist David Hoffman, editor of the Haight Ashbury Free Press, made contact with an Athenian named Yannis Boyiopoulos who confirmed that the Athens newspaper Elftherotypia on August 23, 1996 reported on the front page that a Greek pilot had witnessed the explosion and described what he saw. The pilot was flying behind the 747 when he observed something come up from the water that to him resembled a "rocket." He watched it until it struck the airplane. According to Boyiopoulos "The same person has already testified three times to agents of the FBI and now he is in Greece. His name is Vasilis Bakoynis."

Still, no matter what the witnesses saw or photographed, the Government seemed intent on debunking any story that supported the missile strike scenario. Our unnamed Pentagon Spokesman advised the major media that "...there is no way a Stinger or other hand-held shoulder-fired missile could take down a 747 and a Stinger does not have the range to hit TWA 800 at the altitude it was at."

In this statement are two lies. First, an airplane is a very fragile machine which operates in a very unforgiving environment. Though large aircraft ranging from World War II bombers to the latest air buses have survived after sustaining very serious damage, others have crashed after simple failures of a single component in the flight control or engine systems, not to mention very small bombs that simply breached hull integrity, or baggage doors that blew off to be sucked into engine intakes. A number of crashes and other incidents have been linked to the latter scenario, including one in which a forward baggage door blew off of a 747 and was ingested by the number three engine, which then self-destructed, sending superheated engine parts into the soft aluminum skin of the wings and fuselage. But the jet survived and landed safely.

This is exactly what could have happened to TWA 800 after a missile strike on an inboard engine, such as number three, but with much more catastrophic results.

Multi-engine aircraft engines are numbered from left to right as one looks down at the aircraft. The outermost left engine is number one. The next in, or left inboard engine is number two. Number three is the right inboard engine, and number four the right side outboard engine. In the case of TWA 800, engines one, two and four were raised fairly early in the search. The last engine, described in the first few days as "engine parts" was not raised until several weeks after the crash. The reason it was left on the bottom supposedly was because it had not yet been found, and that only "parts of an engine" had been located. This proved untrue when the number three engine was actually brought to the surface by the Navy.

To those who knew what they were seeing, number three engine told a dramatic story. As it was loaded aboard a flat-bed truck to be transported to the reconstruction site, the educated observer could see that there were several discrepancies. First, the fan section in the front of the engine was only about 30% intact. Most of the fan blades were absent and those that remained, a pie-shaped section on one side of the wheel, were bent at the tips, as if they contacted the engine intake cowling while still turning. The center section of the engine displayed bent and distorted connector rings over the burner can section, and most of the back of the engine was missing! The entire engine appeared to have been burned, and this did not happen underwater.

The next day the NTSB announced that all engines were up and none showed any "problems" that could have contributed to the incident.

The NTSB spokesman, Robert Francis, was quoted in a London publication as reporting that "Investigators have stripped down all four of the jet's engines but found, according to safety board vice chairman, Robert Francis, 'nothing really extraordinary'."[208]

No problems, no clues, no new evidence.

Linda Kabot, an East Moriches resident attending a party near the beach, took a photograph during the event. When the photo was developed, it showed a cylindrical object in the air with one end brightly lighted. The problem with this photograph is that according to Kabot, she held the camera facing north, away from the ocean, which means the "missile" in the photo had to come from inland, which might put it out of range of a shoulder-launched SAM unless it was fired as TWA 800 was passing nearby still climbing. Whatever the case, the photo and negatives were seized by the FBI for analysis.

The second lie told by the unnamed Pentagon source was that a Stinger could not bring down a 747. As discussed, it could bring down such an airplane if it hit an inboard engine, such as number three, which in turn would catch fire and begin spewing bits and pieces of flaming engine parts into the fuselage, and center fuel tank, and the wings and internal wing tanks. Within a minute or two the near empty center tank, now ruptured, might be ignited. A large fuel tank such as this, which only carried about fifty gallons of volatile fuel, is a veritable bomb.

The burned carcass of number three engine notwithstanding, the investigators still continued to deny the missile scenario. There are many plausible reasons why they would take such a stance: First, no amount of airport security could stop such an attack in the future. Next, it could possibly have a giant impact on the flying public and subsequent airline profits. Then, of course, the public would want to know where terrorists obtained such a weapon, which would eventually lead back to U.S. government figures at the highest levels. And how did it get into this country without being detected? And finally, if the word leaked out that the missiles were offered back to the government and the administration refused to take them back, what then? And in an election year?

As the bomb and mechanical malfunction aspects of the investigation began to lose credibility due to lack of evidence, the missile scenario began to build into an acceptable reality. At about this time, another rumor began circulating regarding the possibility of "friendly fire" from a military ship or aircraft that had "accidentally" loosed a missile which struck Flight 800. The day after this rumor hit the Internet and was being repeated in radio talk shows, the Pentagon sent a spokesman to squash the rumors. On CNN that day a full Navy captain appeared before the cameras to announce that [paraphrasing] "there had been no accidental discharge of a weapon that night, and there had been no military exercises in the area, and no military vessels or aircraft."

These statements were quickly countered by very simple and obvious questions: If this was the case, then where did the C-130, two Blackhawk helicopters, the P-3 Orion, and a Navy guided missile cruiser, the U.S.S. Normandy, come from?

This spokesman was never seen again. Nor did the military address the question of friendly fire in the electronic media.

Investigative reporter David Hendrix of the Riverside, CA, Press-Enterprise queried the Navy regarding the statements that there were no exercises being conducted nor military assets in the vicinity. This was done after he secured a copy of an unclassified message from Fleet Air Control and Surveillance Facility, Oceana, VA, to FAA New York Air Traffic Control that read: "Request stationary altitude reservation Tango Billy [area code name] surface to flight level 10,000 feet within (longitude and latitude) 39 degrees 50 minutes North and 72 degrees 10 minutes West, 39 degrees 50 minutes North and 70 degrees 45 minutes West, 38 degrees North and 72 degrees 10 minutes West (excluding warning areas) from 0100 Z [Zulu: Greenwich Mean Time] on the 18th to 0700 Z on the 18th July 96." The local time and date would be the 17th of July at 8 p.m. New York time until 3 a.m. the next morning. This request would take effect about when TWA 800 was taxiing to the runway at JFK.

The impact zone of the wreckage was reported by Associated Press as approximately 40 degrees 40 minutes North latitude, and 72 degrees 40 minutes West longitude. This is between 60-65 statute miles northwest of the northwest corner of the reserved exercise area. Other reports, however, state that the 747 was in close proximity, some within ten miles, of the exercise zone.[209]

Hendrix received a reply to his August 30, 1996 letter to the Navy from COMNAVAIRLANT (Commander Naval Air Atlantic) public affairs office via CINCLANTFLT (Commander In Chief Atlantic Fleet) Public Affairs office. In it the Navy admitted being in the area: "...As previously stated a P-3 Orion submarine patrol aircraft was operating at flight level 10,000 (approximately 3,700 feet below TWA 800) and some distance away when the incident occurred. The P-3's crew heard radio traffic discussing the incident and offered assistance. They reversed course, were vectored to the area, and remained for a short time until released by the Coast Guard. The P-3 carries no offensive or defensive weapons and would not have been capable of causing any damage to another aircraft."

Either this was a deliberate lie, or the Public Affairs officer who wrote the letter did not know, nor did he or she check, what the P-3 is capable of. After all, the Orion is an anti-submarine aircraft. This means it is capable of locating, then sinking, submarines. In actual fact, the P-3 is capable of carrying in its weapons bay one Mk-25 or 39 or 56 mine, or three Mk-36 or 52 mines, or three Mk-57 depth charges, or 8 Mk-43 or 44 or 46 torpedoes. On underwing pylons, the P-3 can carry mines and rockets, or can ferry torpedoes. Maximum weapons load is rated at 20,000 lbs.

The next statement, that the P-3 "heard" the radio traffic and had to be vectored to the scene is also problematic. The flames on the water from the crash could be seen from Long Island, and the P-3 would not have to be "vectored" to the site. The Navy also apparently was parroting the FBI and NTSB news releases that the altitude of the TWA plane was 13,700 feet, disregarding the official FAA radar reports on Day One of 8,000 feet, then the subsequent "corrections" of 10,300 feet and above.

The Navy letter goes on to say: "Also as previously released the guided missile cruiser USS Normandy was conducting routine operations about 180 miles from the crash site. It was not engaged in any weapons firing evolution at the time."

As a guided missile cruiser, the Normandy would carry the RIM-67 Standard SM-2ER semi-active radar homing air defense missiles. This missile has a range in excess of 93 miles and an unclassified altitude range of 100,000 feet. Its speed is in excess of Mach 2.5, and even with a dummy warhead could be deadly to an aircraft.[210]

A later story that circulated in the press was that on the evening of July 17th, the TWA jet took off for Paris, turned on course over the ocean and got too close to an exercise being conducted off shore by a joint law enforcement task force of National Guard, Coast Guard, Customs and Drug Enforcement Agency. They were reportedly practicing how to shoot down drug-smuggling airplanes with shoulder-fired missiles and were using flares dropped by the C-130 as targets. A missile was fired or "got loose accidentally" and locked on to the TWA plane instead of a flare. But according to federal officials, "there was no exercise that night, the air space was available for civilian use, and law enforcement agencies do not have anti-aircraft missiles."

This, like many other government explanations regarding this incident, was not true. The Secret Service has Stinger missiles that they carry at all times when the Protection Detail is escorting the President. These missiles are carried in special boxes in the back of the Secret Service Suburban. Besides this, agents are stationed on roof tops around the White House with Stingers to protect the air space over the building. One SS agent told me when I was flying air cover over a Clinton motorcade that if we flew too close to the motorcade we would be shot down by an agent with a Stinger. He said they always carry them in the back of their escort vehicles along with other weapons.[211]

Also, there were exercises going on that night because we have statements made by military personnel who were involved: New York Air National Guard C-130 crew dropping flares; NY Army National Guard UH-60 Blackhawk crew who saw the explosion; P-3 Orion in vicinity; Coast Guard vessels; and the U.S.S. Normandy "somewhere nearby."

It is odd that the Navy spokesmen would state that the Normandy was 180 miles away. This is exactly twice the range of the Standard missile. This is also almost the exact distance between the TWA crash site and the farthest (southeast) corner of the exercise box requested by the Navy for that time frame.

In weighing the facts and witness statements, the most likely scenario to explore is that of a hand-held surface-to-air missile. This would mean a Mideast terrorist organization connection, something the Clinton administration was loath to consider in the aftermath of the Oklahoma City bombing, and which has continuously disavowed or failed to recognize any domestic problems with such groups.

The missile scenario was not discounted by all media, however. According to The Press-Enterprise (Riverside, CA), in an article printed on August 26th, 1996, "From the beginning, intrigued by eyewitness accounts of something streaking up toward the airplane just before it began to explode, investigators considered the possibility of a missile attack, perhaps from a small boat. There has been mounting concern in intelligence and law enforcement circles that terrorists could use hand-held anti-aircraft missiles to attack civilian airliners. A State Department report cataloged 25 incidents between 1978 and 1993 in which civilian commercial airplanes were shot down by missiles, killing more than 600 people."[212]

Finally, another news source, the International Currency Review (Vol 23 No. 4), published the following information regarding the tragedy of TWA 800: "A KGB defector has informed us that the TWA plane was sabotaged by Russian intelligence. This operation had to be implemented directly, rather than via controlled forces apparently separated from Yevgenny Primakov's global terror apparatus, because it was tightly timed to precede the Group of Seven's meeting on security and terrorism, at which it was agreed that the G-7 countries and Russia would now have access to the FBI's data base, and that a comprehensive exchange of intelligence and cooperation would ensue. Further atrocities will be staged in due course to ratchet up this process, in fulfillment of a secret Soviet sub-strategy to exploit terror and organized crime, which the successor Leninist criminal state is exporting globally, to establish 'global structures' and ultimately, a 'world justice system' which would supplant national security arrangements and legal systems, further contributing to the intended redundancy of the nation state." This falls in line with the Gorbachev Foundation's line for a new form for prosecution of "global issues" intended to render the nation-state redundant, the manipulation of organized crime and terror as weapons which could be used in furtherance of anti-state revolutionary objectives.

This explanation should not be discounted out of hand, for an agenda does exist to bring all nations into a world-wide system of government, even if the peoples of the world have to be intimidated with terror before they will accept such an Orwellian system. This is known as the "Hegelian Principle" after Professor Hegel who stated that to make the people accept a normally repugnant idea, you simply created a problem that they feared, then offer the idea as the only available, and less fearsome, solution. In this case, exhibited incidents of terrorism can be used to convince a population that more drastic "anti-terrorist" laws should be passed.

If international terrorists were responsible for this disaster, then who might they be? The list of suspects is not long:

Ramzi Yousef group (Hamas): Supporters of Ramzi Ahmed Yousef (AKA: Abdul Basit Mahmoud Abdul Karim), currently in prison in New York, was at the time of the incident undergoing trial in NYC. Yousef was trained during the Afghan War and was captured and extradited to the U.S. from Pakistan in 1995. The trial was in its eighth week when TWA 800 went down.

Hizbollah: Pro-Iranian guerrilla organization, now seeking to extract revenge on the U.S. for supporting Israel.

al-Gama'a al-Islamiya (Islamic Group or IG): Egyptian terrorist group from which the U.S. imprisoned its spiritual leader, Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman. Rahman was convicted in 1995 for plotting to bomb the United Nations and several other New York landmarks. He is currently serving a life sentence in a federal prison in Springfield, Missouri.

Hamas: Hamas has vowed to attack the U.S. for agreeing to extradite a known terrorist by the name of Musa Abu Marzouk to Israel. Marzouk was arrested at JFK International Airport in New York last year, and was held and faced extradition hearings in New York. Hamas has 28 cells in the U.S., one in New York City and one in Boston.

Islamic Movement for Change: A Saudi splinter group, it is the only group known to claim any responsibility for the downing of the flight. It supposedly has ties to Saudi Arabia, and claims responsibility for the bombing of the U.S. facilities in Riyadh in November, 1995, and in Dhahran on 25 June 1996. The question one must address regarding this group is: Could it be possible that this new, unknown group, is actually a Russian front that would match the Russian connection article? It may take years to discover the answer to this question.

This chapter was not written as an attempt to solve the mysteries surrounding the destruction of TWA 800, but to simply present evidence of what appears to support a much more complicated case than what has been reported by the controlled media. It was also written to exhibit the continued Modus Operandi by government mouthpieces on not only this case but the ones that came before. When one knows what to look for, it becomes apparent when a pattern of deceit develops in both the media and in the various organs of government.

Was TWA 800 shot down by a missile fired by Islamic fundamentalists as the physical evidence and majority of witness statements indicate?

Did the airplane experience a catastrophic mechanical failure?

Was there a bomb on board that exploded without leaving more than a trace of residue?

Was the plane struck by friendly fire from an aircraft or ship?

It may take years to discover the actual cause of the explosion of TWA 800. For as this chapter is being written, the FBI and other agencies continue their "investigations"....

And their damage control.[213]

But the biggest question of all is: "Why?"

Riding The Tiger, Domestic Terror

"It should be apparent to the investigator that McVeigh and Nichols, virtually unassisted, could not have planned, provided for, financed, and executed the bombing by themselves."

Chapter 30

Terrorism, Foreign and Domestic

Ter-or-ism n. The unlawful use or threatened use of force or violence to intimidate or coerce societies or governments, often for ideological or political reasons. (The American Heritage College Dictionary).

It has been said that one man's "terrorist" is another man's "freedom fighter." In this modern age the truism of this statement is becoming more apparent each day. From age-old religious conflict to modern political friction, groups of people have increasingly aligned themselves through religious beliefs, political ideology, or fear of group persecution into organizations that become not only self-defensive, but oftentimes a threat to others.

There is nothing new about terrorism. It has been a political and religious means of expression, albeit violent, since the beginning of time. Examples of terrorist activity can be found in the Bible, historical texts of the middle ages, and virtually every conflict in the centuries that followed. Terrorism, in its basic definition, is a name given to the activities of either an "enemy of the state," or a weaker opponent that must rely on shock effect to gain the attention of the populace toward their cause. Examples of these "shock effect" tactics have been exhibited in virtually every historical theater of battle or conquest, and in every realm wherein one people exercised political and military control over another. From ancient Greece to modern Belfast, and from the Roman Empire's occupation of Israel to the current "Middle-eastern problems" of Israel/Palestine, events have forced certain elements of society to resist an unwanted or oppressive power by use of whatever weapons and tactics were available.

In almost every instance the only tactics available were those we now call "guerrilla warfare", or, when civilians are involved as casualties, terrorism. For with the communications capabilities of modern technology, small groups of determined people, whether they be termed freedom fighters or terrorists, can multiply their actual influence by the use of shock tactics coupled with media exposure as a weapon. Without the media, there would be no public recognition or attention. And without civilian casualties being exhibited for the world to see in living color, there would be little shock effect among the masses. Only by using the most shocking and diabolical tactics against an unarmed civilian populace, from which no government can completely insure protection, can a fanatic terrorist (or renegade government) organization instill the public fear to accomplish their objectives.

But there is a distinct difference between what is acceptable practice in warfare and unacceptable barbarism. It is because of this that all civilized countries in this age have become signatories to such documents as the Geneva Convention on the laws of land warfare and the various agreements that limit or prohibit the use certain weapons such as chemical, biological and nuclear "weapons of mass destruction." These agreements also specify rules of engagement, declarations of war, handling of prisoners, and conduct of warfare itself. Terrorist organizations, unable to bargain from a position of strength to achieve their goals, instead disregard the "rules" and rely instead on breaking the rules to achieve attention to their causes.

As an historical example, the American colonists under George Washington could not participate in conventional warfare against the professional and mercenary troops of King George during the American Revolution. Instead of rank-and-file Napoleonic tactics of mass firepower and attrition, the colonists relied on the tactics they learned in the Indian Wars wherein they utilized camouflage, concealment, elements of surprise, and ambush to achieve victory. These tactics, to the British, not only violated the standards of European warfare they were accustomed to, but were savage and barbarian. To the British, the colonial army consisted of terrorists. But to the colonists, there was little choice. In the beginning they were outnumbered, outgunned, and did not control the urban centers where logistical assets, such as powder and shot, were located. They did, however, control part of the media, using underground printing presses to publish their own papers and flyers, and most of the rural terrain. It was not until they had captured a sufficient number of cannons, horses and rifles and enlisted a significant number of troops, that they were able to escalate from rural guerrilla warfare to more conventional engagements in major battles.

During the American Civil War, certain "raider" groups from both sides were branded as criminals. Because they penetrated deeply into "enemy territory," which took them far from the actual lines of battle and into civilian areas, where they conducted guerrilla warfare, they were condemned as rogues, renegades and outlaws. Though their main missions were to interdict enemy supply routes, capture important personages, or generally raise havoc behind the lines to draw much-needed troops away from battle, they occasionally crossed the line into what would now be termed as terrorist activities. These actions included looting and burning towns and farms, stealing horses and terrorizing the civilian populace.

Following the Civil War, organizations such as the Ku Klux Klan appeared which formulated and depended upon terror tactics in their attempts to not only intimidate the newly-freed slaves, but to influence local and regional politics regarding separation of races and classes. The hooded "Night Riders" of the KKK terrorized blacks and northern "Carpetbaggers" by burning barns, farm houses and crop fields, and shooting or hanging targeted individuals. These criminal attacks on the populace were meant to serve as examples and intimidate others into fear and submission to local thugs. Little thought was given to making any type of political statement on a national level. Still, certain segments of society today consider the actions of the post-Civil War KKK as racially nationalistic, and are sympathetic to their tactics and objectives, and indeed have patterned themselves after it.

Other violent, illegal and savage activities by secret groups, societies, and organizations that could be defined as terrorist actions have occurred since the end of the Civil War. These include bombings, arson, assassinations, sabotage of federal property, inciting riots and even conspiracies to overthrow the government. The organizations have ranged through such racially and politically diverse names as: the Black Panthers, the Weathermen, the Students for a Democratic Society, the Jewish Defense League, the Order, and other extreme left and right wing organizations.

Domestic "terrorism" is nothing new to America. By strict definition, it has been around since the first colonists were ambushed by Indians, leaving their mutilated bodies behind as a warning to others, which in turn instigated colonists to "scalp" Indian bodies in reprisal. What is new to the American scene, however, is the influx of international terrorism coupled with mass media advertisement of their atrocities. The "combat multiplier" of the media magnifies in the minds of the populace the impact of what otherwise would be minor footnotes to history. A car bombing, a "plot" to blow up a building, or the derailment of a train is focused on by the sensationalist/tabloidist American media to the point in which the events become a major crises. Many recent events have received more press coverage today than was given in the past regarding such tragedies as the explosion of the Hindenburg, the sinking of the Lusitania, or the fact that we left thousands of American POWs behind in World War II, Korea and Vietnam. One can only ask if there is a current agenda behind what is and is not reported in the print and electronic media, and what constitutes today's "big news." By what history has exhibited, it would appear that there now is a secret agenda at work behind the scenes. But why? And who benefits?

Whether terrorism is of the domestic or imported international brand, some basic fundamentals apply. One of these fundamentals is the fact that there are only five types of ground-based terrorist targets. Every target falls under one of these categories, with the exception of what is known as the "Love Boat" scenario. The PLO assault on the Greek liner Achille Lauro falls into this last category, but a ship at sea is not a "land-based" target.

The five land-based target categories are:

1. A private building (or structure including bridges, dams etc.)
2. A public (government) building (or facility)
3. Mass transportation (ground)
4. Mass transportation (air)

6. Large gathering of people (or segment of the population)

What becomes immediately apparent is that between 1993 and 1996, and for the first time in American history, four out of the five listed target types have been attacked by terrorists or terrorist activities inside the borders of the Continental United States. These include the bombing of the World Trade Center in New York City (private building), the bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City (public, or government, building), the derailment of the Sunset Limited near Gila Bend, Arizona (mass transportation, ground), and the destruction of TWA 800 (mass transportation, air). As of this writing the only target left to complete all five categories is the fifth: a large gathering of people, or the "Black Sunday" scenario.

Some might consider that the small pipe bomb that exploded at the Olympics at Atlanta would qualify for the fifth target category. However, this writer feels that though the Olympics themselves would qualify as a prime target with maximum media coverage for effect, and indeed were probably targeted, the effort was too minuscule and unprofessional to effectively complete the list.

The following chapters deal with three of the above tragedies: the World Trade Center bombing, the bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building (in which the author was personally involved in the investigation), and the derailment of Amtrak's Sunset Limited. In all of these events someone benefited and someone took the blame. But it is not who we have been led to believe by the mainstream media.

To the uninitiated, those who have not read and absorbed the preceding chapters, the true "story behind the story" regarding these events is simply incomprehensible and unbelievable. But taken in context with what has already been presented in this book, the learned reader will find the material in the following chapters little more than a continuation of "business as usual" for the powerbrokers of not only this nation, but the world.

As you read, ask yourself if the events you are about to dissect fall under the category of domestic terrorism, international terrorism, or...something else.

Here are the stories that you did not get through NBC, ABC, CBS and CNN....

Chapter 31

Hiding the Truth: The World Trade Center Bombing

It was just after noon on February 26, 1993, when downtown New York City was shaken by a thunderous explosion. Pedestrians who were able to see the origination point through the jungle of high rise buildings could see that black smoke was pouring from the 110-story World Trade Center building. No one realized at that moment that they were witnessing history in the making: the first known international terrorist attack on U.S. soil.

Though damage to the building was heavy, it was not as devastating as had been planned by the instigators. Had the bomb, which had been placed in a rental truck, accomplished the damage intended, and had the target "tower" collapsed, it is estimated that deaths might have exceeded 20,000. As it were, only six people were killed and an additional 1,000 injured.

The New York City bomb squad, police, emergency personnel and federal agents of the FBI and BATF immediately swarmed to the scene. Photographs were taken inside the building of a huge hole blasted through the floor of an underground parking garage, shattered columns, bent rebar rods, and fire damaged automobiles and building structure. Witnesses and victims were interviewed and statements taken from bystanders. All standard police procedures were followed, but little hope was exhibited at the time that the case would be solved because all who deal with bombings know that most of the evidence is destroyed in the blast, and the perpetrators are normally a long way away by the time the explosion takes place.

But in this case the public would be amazed at the speed in which the FBI solved the case. In less than thirty days the FBI managed to round up five suspects, all members of an Islamic terrorist cell located in a "mosque" in Brooklyn. The so-called mosque, actually a floor of rented rooms over a storefront, was headed by an Egyptian radical Moslem fundamentalist cleric named Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman. Rahman, who delivered his anti-American "Great Satan" sermons in two locations:

the Brooklyn headquarters and another mosque in Jersey City, New Jersey, had been exiled by the Egyptian government for subversive activities. Rahman, a follower of Iranian fundamentalist ideology, in which all non-Moslems were worthy only of death until no Christians, Jews or other "pagans" remained on Earth, urged his followers to "spill American blood on its own soil."

Rahman was connected to more than just a few local radical followers. His international contacts included members of the Hamas and Hizbollah, and former Afghan war vets who had served as volunteers for the Mujihadeen. Other connections ran directly to Iran, who provided over $100,000 to Rahman for anti-American domestic terrorist activities, and to Pakistan, where more than twenty former Mujihadeen training camps had been turned over to the Pakistani ISI (Inter-Service Intelligence) by the CIA after the Afghan war. These training camps were, by 1992, training up to 3,700 terrorists at a time. These Pakistani-trained zealots were being trained and armed for one thing: exporting terrorists to non-Islamic countries to carry on and expand the Jihad, the Holy War against non-Islamics.

Two months after the initial arrests, eight other Islamic terrorists were arrested by the FBI in connection with the bombing, five actually caught in the act of mixing explosives. With these arrests information was released that a nefarious plot that ranged far greater than the WTC bombing existed, and that other targets included the New York Federal Building, The Holland and Lincoln tunnels, and the United Nations building. Besides the bombings, the terrorists also planned to assassinate several key figures in world politics including U.N. Secretary Boutros Boutros-Ghali, and New York Senator Alphonse D'Amato.

According to the first official story, the FBI and BATF recovered a small piece of the truck used in the bombing and traced it to a rental agency. And, as luck would have it, one of the bombers returned to the agency shortly after the bombing to explain that the truck had been stolen and to claim his deposit. He was promptly arrested, which led to other arrests.

But according to the second official story, it seems that the FBI had managed to plant an informant within Rahman's terrorist cell, and that the informant secretly recorded conversations between Sheik Rahman and those arrested in a planned terror wave of bombings that were to begin on July 4th. According to the indictment which was filed by the federal court, Rahman had blessed the bombmaking plans, and had encouraged at least twenty-one followers to continue with further Jihad activities. According to court documents all twenty-one were eventually arrested or indicted. This second story, however, does not explain how the FBI lost their "handle" on the case and allowed the event to transpire without taking action to interdict the plot prior to the delivery of the truck bomb.

Even though twenty-one were arrested or indicted, according to court documents one of the main players had escaped the FBI net: Abdul Basit Mahmoud Abdul Karim, now known internationally as Ramzi Yousef.

One of the elusive ghosts of the Islamic terrorist underground network is Iraqi-trained Ramzi Ahmed Yousef. Yousef prided himself as a world-class bomb maker, capable of constructing explosives from easily obtainable chemicals and compounds that are not controlled by government authorities. Yousef is also a skilled actor, traveling around under numerous assumed names and identity cards and passports, and capable of convincing immigration and passport control officials that he was little more than a harmless refugee seeking political asylum from the evil and sadistic Saddam Hussein. Just the opposite was true, however. Yousef was an Iraqi "soldier" who traveled freely within the framework of the international Palestinian, Egyptian, Sudanese and Pakistani terrorist organizations as one of the most dangerous men on earth.

On September 1st, 1992, Yousef arrived at New York's JFK airport and presented himself to an immigration control officer as a displaced Iraqi who, if returned to Iraq, would be executed. He requested political asylum and was granted entry until an INS interview date could be established. He was photographed, fingerprinted, and run through the computer. But, because "Ramzi Yousef" was one of many assumed names, there was no computer hit on "Ramzi Ahmed Yousef."

Exactly how much Yousef had to do with the WTC bombing and the follow-on plans will probably never be publicly revealed. What is known, however, is that on December 8th Yousef requested postponement of his INS hearing because, according to him, he had not yet hired an attorney. Then on the second date, January 26, 1993, a lawyer appeared for Yousef and explained that he had been involved in an automobile accident and could not appear at that time. Another date was scheduled, but before it was reached the bombing occurred in the World Trade Center. By this time Yousef had fled the country and was lurking in the shadow world of Islamic terrorists between Pakistan and the Philippines. Yousef would next surface in 1996 when he was finally arrested in Pakistan and extradited to the United States to face trial for the WTC bombing. At the time of his arrest by the Philippine police he had been busily working on a plan to blow up twelve American 747 jumbo jets over the Pacific.

What must be told at this point is the third story of the FBI "investigation" into the WTC bombing. What you are about to read is not an "official" version.

During the court hearing in New York, information surfaced that there was more to the so-called investigation than had originally been reported to the media, and the American public. It seems that the FBI actually had more than a simple "informant" inside Rahman's terrorist cell. What they actually had was an Egyptian intelligence officer named Emad Salem, who reported directly to his FBI control agent, Special Agent John Anticev. Salem, it turns out, was hired to infiltrate the Rahman group long before the bombing took place, and consistently reported on the activities of the radicals, including their plans to conduct bombings in the New York City area.

What the FBI did not know was that Salem recorded his conversations with his control agents. The tapes tell a far different story than the official versions of the "investigation." According to The New York Times, which managed to obtain secret transcripts of some of the conversations, the FBI knew in advance when the bomb was going to be planted, who was going to do it, the names of everyone in the terrorist cell, and where the truck was rented. But worse, one tape went even further. It seems that the FBI not only knew about the planning, they actually assisted the bombers in obtaining and constructing the bomb!

The original FBI plan was for the informant to provide a non-explosive substance that would be labeled "Ammonium Nitrate," then use it to construct a "bomb" that would not go off. All the FBI needed to show in court was the elements of conspiracy and intent. It would be a classic "sting" operation and the FBI would come out in the media as heroes, a much-needed polishing of their tarnished image since the earlier debacle at Ruby Ridge, Idaho. (The BATF assault at Waco did not happen until two days after the WTC bombing and did not reflect on the FBI or BATF image until fifty-one days later when the final apocalypse of the Mount Carmel facility occurred).

Instead of arresting the conspirators when they received inside information that the bombing was being planned, the FBI instead kept their source in place and continued to monitor the progress of the terrorists in planning and preparing for their goal. According to the transcripts, the plan was changed and the informant was directed to provide the terrorists with real explosive materials. The reasoning behind this may have been simply that showing "intent" might not be enough to make a terrorism case in court, and that if real explosives were discovered then the case would make itself. But whatever the reason, the plan moved into stage two: building the bomb.

According to reports and transcripts, Salem was instructed to not only provide the materials, but to give instruction and help in building the bomb itself. This makes one wonder where Ramzi Yousef was during this time as Yousef was a master bomb maker, which would preclude the need for Salem to provide instruction or materials.

Part of the story regarding Salem's participation surfaced when a transcript of a secret recording he made with his handlers surfaced. According to it, he was questioned about his expenditures on his expense report to the FBI. He explained that his expenses rose during the month the bomb was built because of the cost of "building the Trade Center bomb." In the transcript he admitted that he used government funds to procure the materials and build the bomb for the Rahman group, as he was instructed to do.[214]

Emad Salem, Egyptian Intelligence, was paid $1 million for his testimony against the terrorist cell, and the Egyptian followers of Sheik Abdel-Rahman swore vengeance and further violence against the U.S.[215]

In an AP article that appeared shortly after Rahman was convicted in U.S. District Court, "A militant Muslim group has threatened to attack American targets to avenge the life sentence imposed on Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman for plotting to blow up New York landmarks. 'All American interests will be legitimate targets for our struggle until the release of Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman and his brothers,' the Al-Hayat newspaper quoted the Islamic Group as saying."

The question one must ask at this point is what would be the next target of the Jihad? One must keep in mind the five types of ground-based terrorist targets. The World Trade Center fits the first category: a private building. That only leaves four: a public (government) building, mass transportation air, mass transportation ground, and a large gathering of people.

What would be next?

Chapter 32

Oklahoma City: Terrorism or Politics?

My pager went off at exactly 5:15 p.m. on April 21st, 1995. The number that flashed was that of my office at the Air Support Unit of the Tulsa Police Department. Since my work day ended at 5:00 p.m., the first thought that came to mind was that the dispatcher had issued a call-out for the police helicopter and I was being summoned to fly the mission. I could not have been more wrong. I picked up my microphone and called in to my office.

"Where are you," asked my supervisor, Sgt. Ron Moulton.

"On my way home, at least until now. What's up?"

"The FBI is looking for you," he answered. "They called the chief's office asking where you were."

"That's funny. The SAC has my pager number and office number. Why didn't they just page?"

"I don't know," answered Ron, "unless it's a different agent."

"Okay. I'll give them a call and see what's up."

This was highly unusual. Most of my experience in dealing with the "feds" occurred during duty hours. A hundred thoughts ran through my mind as I looked up the pager number of the SAC, Marty Weber. A few minutes later he returned my page.

"Hey Marty, Craig Roberts here. What's going on?"

"I don't know, why?"

"I just got a page that someone in your office was looking for me and I thought it must be you."

"No," he answered, "but I'll check it out."

A few minutes later he called back. "It's in regard to the Oklahoma City bombing. We could use some help. We haven't a clue what we are dealing with yet, and now we have this guy McVeigh. We don't know anything about him other than he's supposed to be an army deserter from Fort Riley. We know you have contacts that we don't have, and we thought you might put your mind to this and see what you can come up with."

I thought about this for a second, wondering why they wanted to bring an outsider, a local cop, into the investigation. This was highly unusual. "Marty, just exactly what do you want me to do?"

"You know...just put your head to it and see what you can find out through your own network. Just keep us advised. Who knows, maybe you can write another book."

So that was it. Marty had read two of my books, Kill Zone: A Sniper Looks at Dealey Plaza and Hellhound, a techno-thriller about middle-eastern terrorists striking a target inside the United States. Evidently some of his other agents had also read one or both, leading to my summons.

"Marty, if you'll make it an official request through the Chief's office, and he approves, I'll dig in and see what I can find out." I had just gone through a political altercation with the chief, as I had just returned from Washington, D.C., where I testified before Congress against the so-called "assault weapons" ban of the Omnibus Crime Act. Though I took vacation days for the trip, and was therefore off duty, I testified in uniform. Though there was no regulation or rule against such activity, and other officers had demonstrated or appeared on behalf of the Crime Bill in uniform, the Chief had political reservations about my trip. This resulted in a week-long media tennis match that ended in a meeting between myself and the Chief to iron out the situation. All turned out well for both sides, and the Chief issued a press release clearing me of any wrongdoing, which just happened to appear on April 19th, 1995, the day the bomb(s) exploded at the Murrah federal building in Oklahoma City. The article took a back page to this new event.

One of the items on the agenda at the meeting I agreed to was to keep the Chief advised of any outside activities that involved police work or "wearing my uniform at a political event."

The FBI request was definitely going to involve outside police work.

By 6:00 p.m. that evening I had received a phone call from the Chief's office "granting permission" to officially assist the FBI. I began the investigation the next day. Little did I realize that I would work with the FBI until April of 1996, when I retired from the police department after 26 years of service, then continue on my own to this writing, and beyond. What began as a simple call for assistance developed into another investigation on the scale of my investigation into the assassination of John F. Kennedy that resulted in my book Kill Zone.

What follows is my final report to the FBI that I turned in just prior to my retirement. It will serve to give the reader an explanation of many things that did not appear in the media and an idea of the scope and scale of the event as it actually happened, and was subsequently covered up, by the U.S. Government.

The Report:

THE BOMBING OF THE MURRAH FEDERAL BUILDING
Oklahoma City, April 19th, 1995

An Investigative Report by W.C. Roberts

On Wednesday morning, April 19th, 1995, at approximately 9:02 a.m., Central Time, a huge explosion rocked downtown Oklahoma City. In the minutes and hours that followed, the world came to realize that the worst terrorist strike against a civilian target in history had occurred, in almost the geometric center of the United States.

What followed became one of the greatest investigations, and by far the greatest manhunt, in American history. Only the investigation following the assassination of President John F. Kennedy, and the manhunt for John Wilkes Booth after the assassination of President Abraham Lincoln come close. No resources were spared, and even though the prime suspect, former Army veteran Timothy McVeigh, was captured within eighty minutes of the blast seemingly "escaping" from the area through rural Oklahoma, law enforcement agencies pulled out all stops in an attempt to identify and locate other possible suspects.

At first, the original reports from witnesses described two "middle eastern males" wearing blue jumpsuits or jogging suits as being spotted in the immediate area of the Murrah building. The Media picked up on this lead, and with the FBI and international law enforcement agencies rapidly becoming involved, working feverishly to track any such suspects. A single middle-eastern male was apprehended in London at Heathrow Airport, allegedly with bomb-making materials in his luggage. He had left the U.S. earlier that day and came under immediate scrutiny due to description, age, timing and profile. But within twenty-four hours, he was discarded as a suspect and the media attention immediately shifted direction and focused on "right wing extremists."[216]

Oddly, the media was evidently notified of an impending raid on a rural Michigan farm house to be conducted by federal agents. The resident of the farm was the brother of an acquaintance of Timothy McVeigh, Terry Nichols. McVeigh had been identified as "John Doe One" as he was about to make bond from the county jail in Perry, Oklahoma. He had been apprehended by an Oklahoma State Trooper as he sped north on an interstate highway just over an hour after the bombing. Strangely, his car had no license tag, and when he was stopped, even though armed, offered no resistance. Subsequent investigation led to Terry Nichols, then Nichols' brother James Nichols' farm in Michigan. At this point, a raid to serve a search warrant which should have been low key to media exposure, became a major media event. Network cameras arrived with the raid force and set up nearby, using telephoto lenses to record the entry and perimeter teams as they moved into position and proceeded with their search. During this "event" the various news commentators made numerous references to McVeigh's alleged "ties" with the Michigan Militia, described as "an extreme Right Wing fringe radical group."

From this point on, both the investigation and the media centered their enquiries on various right wing organizations, ranging from the Ku Klux Klan and other White-supremacist groups, to the NRA and Christian Coalition.

It rapidly became obvious that the media was being directed, and was not reporting impartially. When independent investigators began to trace the origins of the media, and henceforth the government, focus on the Right Wing (and especially Constitutionalist paramilitary groups and so-called "militia" organizations), what was discovered was self-explanatory. The so-called "experts" in the field of tracking "hate groups" that were feeding the media centered on two organizations: the Anti-Defamation League (ADL) of the B'nai B'rith (described by other Jewish organizations as extremely Left Wing), and the very liberal Southern Poverty Law Center (SPLC), who has reportedly been connected to the ADL. It began to become apparent that these two organizations were using the event in Oklahoma City to their own ends, and to further their own agenda. Evidence of this became apparent as certain liberal politicians, including vociferously anti-gun congressman Charles Schumer of New York, began a massive onslaught through the media against various paramilitary groups, so-called militias, "hate groups," and often Conservative, religious, and Constitutionalist groups in general, including the National Rifle Association, who one reporter attempted to link directly to the bombing by being financially involved.

Meanwhile, the investigation increased in intensity as witnesses were interviewed in various states. From the truck rental in Kansas where McVeigh was reported to have rented the Ryder truck, a composite drawing was made of another individual: John Doe #2. A nationwide manhunt ensued, eventually running down suspects from California to North Carolina, the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico. Still, even though backed by a $2 million reward and hundreds of telephone call takers, law enforcement officers failed to develop but a few significant leads, one leading to Kingman, Arizona, and a third co-conspirator: Michael Fortier, an old army buddy of McVeigh's and Nichols. But Fortier was not John Doe #2, and this portion of the investigation ended when a soldier on leave from Fort Riley, who, with a stretch of the imagination, vaguely resembled the JD-2 sketch, was located, identified, and released as a simple mistaken identity on the part of the witnesses at the Ryder rental.

As the investigation continued, utilizing massive resources from local, state and federal law enforcement, plus independent investigators and investigative journalists, many discrepancies began to appear in the official scenario.

According to the official version of the event, McVeigh, a radical Right Wing loose cannon, planned to attack the U.S. government in revenge for the Waco debacle. He selected the Murrah building after eliminating from his target list two other federal buildings in other cities, then proceeded to recruit Fortier and Terry Nichols to assist with the preparations. Allegedly using funds obtained by selling guns stolen in Arkansas (from an alleged ATF informant who later said that the story was a fabrication), McVeigh bought plastic barrels (blue in color), tons of ammonium nitrate fertilizer, detonation cord, primers, fuse, gallons of some type of fuel oil or diesel fuel, and rented the truck. He and Nichols then took all of this material to a remote location and, by themselves, mixed 2.5 tons of ammonium nitrate and fuel oil in the barrels inside the truck, wrapped them with det cord and time fuse, then McVeigh, by himself, drove the truck to Oklahoma City, parked it in front of the Murrah building, lit the fuse, then ran away to: (1) the yellow Mercury Marquis with no license plate, or (2) a brown GM pickup truck with a smoked glass bug shield on the front end, driven by a dark complected person. All of this was recorded by an ATM video camera (or a Southwestern Bell security camera, or an apartment building camera, depending on which version one reads) and the tape was seized by the FBI and not released to the media, nor excerpts or still prints shown to the public to prove such a tape exists, to assuage any suspicions of a government coverup.

Discrepancies began to develop in the official version of the scenario, and within weeks the matter became extremely controversial in non-mainstream media such as the Internet, newsletters, independent radio shows, shortwave broadcasts, independent newspapers, and other forms of media not tied to the major networks in New York or Los Angeles.

It was at this point that this investigator began attempting to assemble the pieces of the puzzle into a logical pattern. Only by taking all of the information available, filtering out what definitely does not belong, then piecing the mosaic together can one draw a picture, albeit incomplete, of what may have happened. The remainder of this document is written utilizing myriad sources, some of unknown reliability, but many extremely reliable, and contacts both within and without of government circles at local, state and federal level.

Assuming there was a "conspiracy" involved, and that McVeigh and Nichols could not physically (by themselves) do all that had to be done in the time constraints of their activities from the time of the truck rental to the time of the explosion, there would have to be others involved. It would appear, from the information presented on the following pages, that McVeigh and Nichols may be only two members of a "field team" compartmentalized and organized in structured levels. If this is the case, and the following information is even partially correct, the investigation is far from over.

And it goes much higher than McVeigh and Nichols.

Investigatory Techniques Used in this Investigation

What follows is an investigative report (to date) utilizing the standards of:

(1) Follow the money;
(2) Follow the power:
(3) Follow the players;

(4) Look for Linkages, Consistencies, Patterns, and Coincidences (even those that appear remote), and discrepancies that obviously create problems with a final synopsis;

(5) Look for, and attempt to establish, a motive;

(6) Determine who had the means to plan, conduct, and execute the crime, then have the power to possibly influence the resultant investigation;

(7) Observe the outcome of the investigation, was it complete? Did it answer all questions?

The Scene

Shortly after the explosion in Oklahoma City, several events occurred almost simultaneously:

(1) As emergency services responded, two other "bombs" were discovered by investigators and the bomb technicians responded. The first "bomb" was discovered within minutes after the explosion as emergency workers began searching the interior of the building for victims and survivors, and the second within twenty minutes of the first. One was deactivated on site. The status of the second device was not broadcast over television. Both were described as "military canisters," or "devices." Later explanation would be that these were "training" devices left about by the ATF. This explanation did not satisfactorily explain why they were in different spots in the building, far from the ATF offices located on the top floor. Eventually, government media releases would claim that there were no additional devices found, despite numerous eye witness accounts.

(2) Within a very short period it was announced that there had been a "car bomb," possibly filled with ammonium nitrate/fuel oil explosive mixture. But damage to the building, coupled with the size of the crater and secondary damage to surrounding structures, increased the explosive to "truck bomb size." Throughout the morning and into the afternoon, the truck grew in size from a 14 foot truck, to a 28 foot truck. The explosives grew from 1200 lbs to 2400 lbs, then 3200, then 4600. (What is disturbing about this is that in 1985, the IRA in London exploded a large "lorry" filled with over 5,000 lbs of ammonium nitrate/fuel oil explosive in front of a much older, non-reinforced structure, a stacked-block bank building, and the resultant damage was simply front windows being blown out and a much smaller crater in the street).

(3) Within three hours, a fireman on the third floor of the building noted two military box ambulances, unmarked, back up near the building, and saw several men in black or dark fatigues carrying stretchers out to the ambulances from the lower floor or basement of the building. Many of the stretchers had boxes, which appeared to contain papers or documents, and one had what were described as "some type of shoulder-fired missiles or missile tubes."

(4) Many witnesses stated that they heard two to three distinct explosions, the second more powerful than the first. To back this up, two seismograms which recorded the "event" showed three, not two as reported by the media, distinct markings of equal intensity and duration, approximately ten seconds apart, from two separate locations. A later explanation for this would be that the first event (actually circled was the second event) was the initial explosion, and the second (which was the third event on the graph) was the building collapsing. Later charts, recorded when the building was demolished, refuted this, however. The remainder of the building, much larger than the destroyed section, made almost no marks on the graph when it fell due to demolition charges.

(5) A video tape was reportedly discovered that showed the front of the Murrah building before the explosion, then the truck driving up, then the explosion. The truck was identified as a yellow Ryder truck. The first press release explained that the tape came from a nearby ATM machine, even though no ATM machine is in the area. A separate press release was that it was from a Southwestern Bell security camera. A later report is that it was from a security camera atop a nearby apartment complex (to the west of the building). The "tape," wherever it came from, was seized and has not been shown to the media or general public, which initiated many people to speculate that it either did not exist, or that it did not portray what the media reported. This investigator also found it incredible that this same tape was not shown to the Grand Jury that was formed to indict McVeigh, even after they requested to see it.

(6) Witnesses described two "middle eastern males" wearing blue jump suits or jogging suits "hanging around" the front of the building just before the explosion. These descriptions initiated the terrorist hunt that culminated with an apprehension in London, but was then discredited with little public explanation.

(7) Some witnesses described seeing a dark colored, unmarked helicopter, leaving the rooftop of the building a few minutes before the explosion. Oklahoma City Police Department's two McDonnell-Douglas helicopters (black and silver in color) were on the ground at their base at this time. They did not respond until after the explosion. The origin of this helicopter is unknown, nor are there indications that this lead was followed up on.

(8) The only identifiable part of the Ryder truck discovered is the rear axle, which instead of being blown down into the crater, was "thrown" two blocks away. This axle, originally identified as a GM part with a VIN number, was traced through Ryder in Florida, to a truck rental/body shop in Kansas. However, when GM stated that there are no ID numbers on their truck axles, the truck was changed to "Ford."

Other conflicts arose by the hour as other discrepancies occurred. As federal authorities switched tracks from Islamics to Right Wing radicals, and began to trace McVeigh's movements and associates, outside organizations entered the picture and began to point fingers at political rivals and enemies.

(1) The Anti-Defamation League and the Southern Poverty Law Center immediately begin feeding New York City-based media organizations, including the major news networks, "information" identifying various right wing groups as "hate groups" capable of inflaming such activities, and indeed possibly "linked" to the occurrence. Both organizations historically take every opportunity to lump Conservative organizations into the same group, from the White Aryan Resistance to the Christian Coalition, and the KKK to the NRA. As each news program and news magazine interview transpired, the public began to notice more and more that the dialogue appeared to be orchestrated, and that political agendas were being served, but only on the left wing. This made many people suspect that the "government" was somehow more involved in the bombing than the media is willing to expose.

The problem at this point for the observer, is the definition of "government." Anyone who suspects involvement by any governmental agent or agency, whether directly involved, or involved by omission or failure to properly perform an investigation, becomes "debunked" as a "conspiracy theorist." The problem with this, like lumping all right wing groups together, is that a conspiracy in this case does exist, with only the extent not known. Therefore there is no "theory." The issue then becomes this: Exactly who is involved, and why?

To answer this and other questions, the search must follow the previously listed tenets of a proper investigation. To follow the money, the power, and the players, requires a great deal of research into past political events wherein the same names seem to appear, linking events. Though some of what follows does not appear at first to relate to the Oklahoma City bombing, the reader must keep the information in mind as this report progresses to gain a full understanding of the ramifications, and possibilities, of the event. For this, I have discovered that relevant events leading to the Oklahoma City bombing actually appear to have begun in the 1980s.

When the focus of U.S. covert action paramilitary attention changed from Cuba, to Southeast Asia (Laos), to Iran, then back to Central America (where CIA paramilitary operations began in the 1950s), the covert intelligence community adopted the Nicaraguan "Contras" as fighters against Communism and the Marxist government of Nicaragua's Daniel Ortega. But with the Boland Amendment of non-interference, the Agency and NSC ran into problems of finance. This was solved in the same manner as the financing of the Laotian campaign.

In Laos, during the 1960s and '70s, a huge cartel developed around opium trafficking. From the remote tribes of Meo/Hmong who grew the opium poppies, CIA front organizations such as Air America flew the raw opium to collection points within Laos (main base: Long Tieng), then on to Vientienne, where it was processed into pure heroin at the Pepsi-Cola bottling plant (which never bottled any Pepsi). It then left the country through four routes: Hong Kong to San Francisco (picked up by Santos Trafficante's network for distribution inside the U.S.); Air Vietnam to Da Nang and Saigon by Nguyen Cao Ky's distribution network; Singapore to Australia to be handled by the Nugan Hand banking complex representatives; and Bangkok to Marseille, to be distributed by the Corsican Mafia. All proceeds were returned through the Nugan Hand banking complex, but much less actually went back into financing the war. It appears that the majority of the funds went into private accounts after being laundered through Nugan Hand.

After the fall of Vietnam and the U.S. extraction from Laos in 1975, U.S. policy attention shifted to Iran and the Middle East. The same players involved in Laos, and later Vietnam/Operation PHOENIX, showed up in Teheran and Isfahan, Iran. These individuals were instrumental in setting up the Shah's secret police, the Savak, and in selling and trading military equipment and technology for cash and drugs. Two of the individuals involved at this point, Albert Hakim and Edwin P. Wilson, later formed EATSCO (Egyptian American Transport and Services Co.), which, among other things, became involved in the arms-for-hostages efforts of NSC, William Casey, Admiral Poindexter, Richard Secord, Oliver North and others.

After Iran fell to Khomeini and the fundamentalist Moslems, U.S. foreign attention shifted farther west, to Nicaragua. Again, the method of choice for financing the operations became drug trafficking. According to a former member of the CIA team (Terry Reed) and other sources, it worked like this:

Cocaine from the Columbian cartels was flown to Panama, to a Panamanian air force base, where agents of Manual Noriega removed a percentage as their cut (Israeli colonel Michael Harare and Mossad agent Amiram Nir). It was then flown via Corporate Air Service, Ltd., to Illopango Air Force Base in El Salvador and split into three batches: One to be flown to Southern California, the second to Guadalajara, Mexico, where it was to be crated and trucked via land route to Texas, and the last to be flown to Mena, Arkansas, for further distribution. The carrier from Illopango on all three air legs was a Miami-based CIA proprietary air transport company.

It is what happened in Mena that is of interest to this investigation.

Mena, Arkansas, 1982-?

According to Reed (and other sources), cocaine was flown into Mena airport by "Enterprise" pilots coming in from Honduras and El Salvador (on some occasions, from Panama direct). The drugs were then offloaded, then loaded onto smaller aircraft for further distribution within the U.S. Almost all of these smaller airplanes, normally twin engine aircraft, were stolen from private airports and repainted with N numbers registered to similar type aircraft belonging to innocent owners.

According to Reed and other sources, payoff money to Arkansas government officials was flown at night in what were called "green flights" and dropped in duffel bags on property owned by an associate of governor Bill Clinton. The money was then picked up and transported to Little Rock, where it was allegedly laundered through the Rose Law Firm and ADFA (Arkansas Development Finance Authority). Reed goes into detail regarding the money laundering that allegedly connects Rose Law Firm to ADFA, Felix Rodriguez, James and Susan McDougal (Whitewater Development Corporation), Stephens Incorporated (Jackson Stephens of Little Rock), Bert Lance of BCCI, First American Trust, National Bank of Georgia

(Lance), Madison Guaranty S&L, Worthan Bank, and several branches of BCCI. During the Iran/Contra years the FBI, IRS and DEA were investigating the CIA drug running through Mena and other locations. Thousands of pages of investigatory reports were written and kept in Arkansas at the above offices and the U.S. Attorney's office.

1995 Developments

According to information of unknown reliability that has surfaced since the bombing regarding the Mena drug running and money laundering, there is more to the affair than Reed understood when he exposed the Iran/Contra operation to writer John Cummings. Sources have offered bits and pieces of the puzzle that appear to form the following picture:

The key player in the Rose Law Firm money laundering was allegedly Vince Foster. Working as a cut-out under Hillary Clinton and Webster Hubbell, Foster worked through an off-shoot company called Systematics, Inc., allegedly to wire transfer deposits to various small banks around the country, then to a larger bank in Chicago. The funds were then transferred to offshore accounts in the Cayman Islands and Switzerland. At this time Foster allegedly set up a personal numbered Swiss account to handle his "cut."

The proceeds from the drug payoffs allegedly exceeded $50 million, and were supposedly hidden in accounts that if cross-checked, would check to a "Chelsea Jefferson."

When Bill Clinton went to Washington as President, he took Foster and several other associates with him. Foster was named liaison to NSA, a remarkable feat since few of Clinton's staff members could reportedly pass a security background check and therefore receive a security clearance.

According to various sources the Israeli intelligence organization, the Mossad, had been monitoring Foster's activities and had a file on him. Foster, once he became an insider at NSC with access to secrets including codes, was allegedly approached by the Mossad and "made an offer he could not refuse." The Mossad knew of the drug running through Arkansas, having been in on the ground floor during the arms-for-hostages phase of the NSC operation, and even having an agent on hand in Panama during drug transfers and other projects, and providing a design for a replacement weapon for the Contras to be manufactured in Guadalajara by Terry Reed's "machine tool company."

The deal, according to insiders, was simple: Foster was to leak codes and secrets to the Israelis in exchange for their promise to not expose him, his connections with drug running and money laundering for Clinton, and in addition, the Israelis would add to his Swiss bank account, which they had already discovered by means of their very special computer software given them by "someone" in the U.S. government.

Foster, Inslaw, PROMIS, and Michael Riconosciuto

By "following the players," a new individual enters the picture at this point. But to understand his significance, one must backtrack on the time-line to the 1970s.

Stanford graduate physicist and mathematician Michael Riconosciuto, son of a former OSS man (Marshall Riconosciuto), became involved with a project under the Wackenhut Corporation, through a cut-out known as Meridian Arms Company, to develop new weapons and high explosive devices. These experiments were taking place on the small Cabazon Indian Reservation in the middle of the California desert, considered a separate nation by the U.S. government and therefore not directly controlled by federal regulations or firearms laws. It should be noted at this point that among the officials who composed the board of directors for Wackenhut Corporation was William Casey, who eventually became Director, Central Intelligence under President Reagan, and a player in the Iran/Contra affair.[217]

Riconosiuto developed an extremely powerful bomb of small dimensions, one which used a two-phase detonation. The first version, according to former FBI SAC Ted Gunderson, was tested at Nellis Air Force Base at a location near Groom Lake, Nevada. It was so powerful that, according to Riconosciuto, it killed one technician and injured several others. It was after this, and several other unpleasant events centering around Wackenhut, Meridian Arms, FMC Corporation, and various individuals within these organizations, that Riconosciuto left California and attempted his own venture in Washington state dealing with extracting platinum from mine tailings. Before this venture could take off, Riconosciuto was offered a job from a computer software company named Inslaw, Inc. Inslaw had developed a new software program called PROMIS (for Prosecutors Management Information System), which could track data in mainframe computers such as court cases, bank accounts and so on. In actual fact, PROMIS could track virtually anything, but the intended use, by Justice Department contract, was to track drug money laundering and traffic between banks.

Riconosciuto was contracted to develop a "backdoor" in the program, wherein investigators could actually move funds from an illicit account to another depository, like the U.S. Treasury. It could also be used, once installed on someone else's computer system, to explore their data from the outside. The CIA was particularly interested in this aspect. By selling this product to other countries, especially their intelligence services, the CIA data ferrets could remotely enter their computer systems, look around and see what was going on, and leave undetected.

A problem developed when the Department of Justice refused to pay the $2.5 million contract fee for the software. Inslaw sued, but went bankrupt with legal fees, even after being granted the sum by one federal judge (who was not reappointed after this decision). Justice never paid, but did distribute the software to "clients" far and wide. One such client was the CIA, who sold it to the Mossad, among others.[218]

It was after this that a small, compartmentalized group within CIA allegedly discovered something very interesting during use of the PROMIS software.

According to message traffic on the Internet, they had routinely entered the Mossad computer system to check on who was being paid as agents when they discovered several payments going to a previously untraced Swiss bank account, under the name Vincent Foster. They followed up on this and discovered the balance of the account to be in excess of $2.5 million. If this is true, it is obvious that Foster did not accumulate this wealth under normal/legal means.[219]

The story at this point indicates that the "word on Foster spying for the Israelis" was leaked to the White House on purpose to see Foster's and the administration's reaction. If this was the case, it is probable that the following scenario may have occurred: Foster is called by a member of the upper echelon of the White House and advised that "The CIA is on to you, something about spying for Israel." Foster panics. He cannot turn to the White House as they now want to divorce themselves from his activities, which would be disastrous if known by the public, especially in relation to the Clinton staff having such difficulty with security clearances in the beginning, and he can't turn to other federal agencies for help. It would only be a matter of time before he was "visited" by the FBI for questioning, and he had no idea how much information they had on him, supplied by this cell of CIA which has no part in Iran/Contra or drug smuggling and money laundering through Arkansas.

Foster decides to "resign" and hope the Clintons can work out the details to keep him out of harm's way. He decides to leave the country, pick up his money in Switzerland, then disappear for an undetermined amount of time until things "blow over."

The problem, according to these reports, is that the CIA team had used Riconosciuto's "back door" to empty Foster's bank account, transferring the money to the U.S. Treasury. When Foster calls Switzerland to prepare the bank for his arrival and withdrawal of a large amount of cash, the bank explains he now has a zero balance.

Broke and with no place to turn, Foster calls the only people he can turn to: the Mossad.

Speculation at this point would probably follow the line that Foster's Mossad contact asks who has talked to him, then if he has been interviewed by the FBI or CIA, and when he reports to the negative, he is told to "meet us tonight in the parking lot (or the "apartment") and we'll take care of everything."

At this point the story becomes convoluted. Foster was found dead in his car in the White House parking lot, then laying on the ground in Fort Marcy Park. He had a gun in his right hand (even though he was left handed); he didn't have a gun when found; the gun was found in his car. The case, a "suicide scene," was not investigated by the FBI, but instead by the Park Department Police. No ballistics evidence was reported, other than a gunshot to the mouth, and very little blood was found at the scene. It was obvious that Foster's body had been placed there after death. And the autopsy showed the powder burns to be on Foster's hands in a pattern that would show a double hand grip over the top of a barrel and cylinder, not the pistol's grip. It was more in line with someone who was trying desperately to pull a gun out of one's mouth, not jam it in. And there was no way he could have pulled the trigger with that particular hand position. The most likely scenario was that he was in his car when two or more people joined him. They either killed him there and left his body in the car, or they drove to an apartment in the D.C. area (possibly "The" apartment where clandestine rendezvous were alleged to occur) then held him while one jammed a gun in his mouth and pulled the trigger, probably with a silencer. In the latter scenario Foster's body was then rolled up in a carpet and taken to the trunk of his car (carpet fibers were found on his suit coat and trousers). He was then taken to Fort Marcy Park and dumped.

No bullet was recovered, so the murder weapon was not the antique .45 caliber revolver that had been sanitized which was found at the scene.

Shortly after Foster's death, his office was raided by White House personnel who carried off boxes of files and documents to upstairs bedrooms for examination. Several credible witnesses have reported this, even though it has been denied by White House staff personnel. It appears that if this occurred, it would be any drug running and money laundering documents that would be of most concern. Even though most of these documents were burned and shredded at the Rose Law Firm during an all-night "house cleaning," certain players would be uncertain exactly what Foster kept out as personal "insurance." It has been speculated that Foster's body was left at the White House by his killers, but was moved after discovery by White House personnel to change the area of the "crime scene." If Foster was discovered in his car in the parking lot, the crime scene would encompass his office, and the files, which would be searched by police or federal investigators.

Oklahoma City Connection?

Besides the "coincidence" of Michael Riconosciuto's appearance in explosives work for Wackenhut/Meridian Arms, and his software development for Inslaw that may have been Vince Foster's undoing, it is possible that his two-phase explosive invention (identified as an Electro-Hydrodynamic Gaseous Fuel Device by former FBI SAC Gunderson) may have been used at the Murrah building.

However, there is another set of circumstances that must be explored that may enter into the investigation. Sources have reported that during the Mena drug smuggling and Iran/Contra affair, the IRS, DEA and FBI investigated the affair and kept records and reports until Clinton moved to Washington. These investigative documents (or copies thereof) were consolidated at the U.S. Attorney's office in Little Rock. But fearing for their safety during the next four years, they were moved out of state. It has been said that they were moved to the Murrah building. If this is true, it sheds a new light on the investigation and the motive. All that would be needed by someone desiring to destroy these documents would be destruction of the building that housed them. According to Israeli sources (not Mossad), this is a typical operation for Islamic Jihad, Hamas, and Hizbollah. Cases in point are the bombings of the embassy building in Beirut, the subsequent bombing of the Marine barracks at the Beirut airport, and the Trade Center bombing in New York. All were truck bombs, with exception in deference to the explosives. The Beirut bombings were Semtex, a Warsaw Pact plastic explosive similar to C-4Cand were entirely successful with a simple truck bomb. The Trade Center was ammonium nitrate and did relatively little damage in comparison.

The Iraqi Connection

Three items should be mentioned at this point that have not been approached by the media, nor by investigators.

At the end of the Gulf War, over 5,000 former Iraqi soldiers (mainly consisting of officers) were transported (illegally) to this country by the Administration for "humanitarian purposes," and resettled at taxpayers expense. This created a massive stir in the veterans organizations, who remembered how may American POWs had been abandoned by our government in past wars, but was only publicized in their magazines. One of the largest groupings of resettled former Iraqi soldiers, coincidentally, became Oklahoma City. This places the Iraqis who were experts in demolition (re: Kuwaiti oil field destruction) in the same vicinity as the bombing.[220]

According to Israeli intelligence, many of these former soldiers joined 28 cells of the Hamas terrorist group and the Islamic Jihad group here in the United States. One of these groups is located in the Oklahoma City/Norman area, and is closely linked to other cells in Dallas/Fort Worth, Houston, Miami, and New York.

The Hussein/Barbouti Connection

An Iraqi national named Ihsan Barbouti, who worked covert operations (mainly logistical) for Saddam Hussein, was an "architect" involved in very "interesting things." He owned an engineering company in Frankfort that had a $552 million contract to build airfields in Iraq, and also designed Moammar Khadaffi's German-built chemical weapons plant in Rabta, Libya. He owns (or owned) $100 million of real estate and oil drilling equipment in Texas and Oklahoma.

In 1969, after the Ba'ath takeover in Iraq which brought Saddam Hussein to power as the second-in-command, Barbouti "escaped" Iraq, resurfacing later in Lebanon and Libya.

Barbouti later invested in two companies in the U.S.: Pipeline Recovery Systems of Dallas, which makes an anti-corrosive chemical that coats and preserves pipes, and Product Ingredient Technology of Boca Raton, which makes food flavorings. He attempted to invest in a third company, TK-7, which is located in Oklahoma City and makes a fuel additive, but the deal fell through when the Gulf War started and Iraqi assets were frozen.

These are important because TK-7 had formulas that could extend the range of jet aircraft and liquid-fueled missiles (such as the SCUD), and Pipeline Recovery who knew how to make pipe coatings that were useful in nuclear reactors and chemical weapons plants. Product Ingredient Technology made cherry flavoring, which uses ferric ferrocyanide, a chemical that's used to manufacture hydrogen cyanide (which can penetrate gas masks, and was use to kill the Kurds in Northern Iraq).

Barbouti had the companies ship their products to corporations he owned in Germany, which in turn shipped them to Libya and Iraq, all of which was illegal.

In 1989, Barbouti met in London with Ibrahim Sabawai, Saddam Hussein's half brother and European head of Iraqi intelligence. Sabawai made sure the products and production technology was rushed to Iraq to be in place by 1990. According to the former owner of Oklahoma City's TK-7, Iraq was developing an atomic device for Khadaffi that would be used against the United States in retaliation for the 1986 U.S. air strike against Libya.

According to a Nightline broadcast, a New Orleans exporter named Don Seaton, a business associate of Richard Secord, assisted Barbouti with the "exporting" of the products. Secord allegedly connected Barbouti with Wackenhut. Barbouti met with Secord in Florida (headquarters state of Wackenhut) on several occasions, and phone records show that several calls were placed from Barbouti's office to Secord's private number in McLean, Virginia. Secord has since acknowledged knowing Barbouti. During the Bush administration, Secord was business partner with James Tully and Jack Brennan (former aide to Nixon), who were involved in a $181 million business deal to supply uniforms to the Iraqi army which they contracted through Nicolae Ceaucescu's Romania prior to his execution. The partners in this particular deal were former U.S. attorney general John Mitchell and Sarkis Soghanalian, a Turkish-born citizen who had been Saddam Hussein's leading arms procurer who introduced Super Cannon builder Gerald Bull to the Iraqis. Soghanalian later sold 103 military helicopters to Iraq illegally, was caught, and served six years in prison in Miami.

In 1990, 2,000 gallons of ferrocyanide were stolen from the Boca Raton plant, right under the noses of the security guards. The security was provided by Wackenhut.

It should be noted that Wackenhut only had one guard on duty at the plant during the times of the theft, a ten day period in 1990. For this one guard, Wackenhut was paid by Barbouti four checks: $168.89 on March 27th, $24,828.07 on March 28th, $756.00 on April 5th, and $40,116.25 on April 6th! Quite a sum for one minimum wage security guard.

According to research, two former CIA operatives stated Wackenhut helped Barbouti ship chemicals to Iraq, and that Barbouti "was placed in the hands of Secord and the CIA, and Secord called in Wackenhut to handle security and travel and protection for Barbouti and his export plans." Wackenhut was doing a contract for the CIA and allegedly helped ship chemical and nuclear weapons-making material first to Texas, then Chicago, then Baltimore where it was shipped overseas. (This shipment was investigated by Customs and USDA).

Remember that Wackenhut formed a front company called the "Meridian Arms Corporation" and set it up on the Cabazon Indian Reservation at Indio, California, to build explosive devices, chemical and biological weapons, and other items. Former FBI agent Ted Gunderson believes the explosive device used at the Murrah Building may have been developed by Meridian on a design invented by Michael Riconosciuto (who Gunderson knows and says programmed the back door into Inslaw's PROMIS software for Department of Justice), who is now in prison. Also note that Wackenhut has been involved with other strange deals involving explosives and weapons. In the 1980s Wackenhut tried to buy a weapons propellant manufacturer in Quebec, but was turned down by Prime Minister Trudeau who stated "We just got rid of the CIA, we don't want them back." Then we have this: William Corbett, a terrorism expert who was in the CIA for 18 years (and now works for ABC News in Europe) said "For years Wackenhut has been involved with the CIA and other intelligence organizations, including the DEA. Wackenhut would allow the CIA to occupy positions within the company in order to carry out clandestine operations."

Wackenhut also became involved in Iran/Contra arms deals. In 1981, Wackenhut formed the "Special Projects Division," which in turn linked up with ex-CIA agent John Phillip Nichols to set up Meridian Arms on the Cabazon reservation, out of view of Congress, and henceforth the Boland Amendment (non-interference in Central America). Representatives of the Contras came to the reservation to see weapons being demonstrated, then gave recommendations on what to send to Honduras for use in El Salvador.

One of the men hired to provide security analysis for the Florida chemical plant owned by Barbouti was Peter Kawaja, a former federal agent. Kawaja, who has become a Gulf War Disease activist, has stated that both chemical and biological warfare weapons were shipped to Iraq prior to the Gulf War, and that many of these weapons were used on U.S. and allied troops by Hussein. He further states that thousands of documents that detail the Gulf War Syndrome cases and government involvement with both production and shipment, and the disease aftermath, were removed from Houston, Texas, and sent to the Murrah building for "safe keeping." If this is true, could it be possible that the Mena drug smuggling investigation records and the Gulf War Disease records were deposited in the Murrah building together for a reason other than safe keeping? According to federal sources, the records were "destroyed" in the blast.

The Question of ATF Foreknowledge

Several questions have been posed by various individuals concerning whether or not the Oklahoma City office of the ATF had a warning or foreknowledge of the bombing. Some local media sources have reported several items of interest, including:

(1) McVeigh was supposedly seen eating dinner three nights before the bombing with John Doe #2 (an Iraqi), a paid ATF informant, and an ATF agent. It was speculated that McVeigh might have also been a paid informant for the ATF, hence his wanderings at gunshows and visitations to militia meetings.

(2) An eyewitness reported seeing strange activities in front of the Murrah building in the early morning hours of April 19th. He reported driving down the street, arriving to the street in front of the Murrah building, then being directed by someone "directing traffic" to move to one lane as he passed the building. This individual was not a police officer, but was standing next to a marked unit of some type with a "stripe around it, kind of like an Military Police car." As this witness passed, he noted several people on the sidewalk in front of the building with "hoop-like devices, like small 'hula hoops', held over their heads, turning in different directions." His description matches that of ADF direction finding equipment antennas that are used to home in on an electronic emission source, or search for a given emitter of a certain frequency within range of the receiving unit.

As this individual passed, a roadblock was set up behind him and the street was shut off from approaching traffic, which was then diverted. No explanation for this activity was given.

(3) John Doe #2, according to KFOR TV, Oklahoma City, is an Iraqi officer and former member of the Hammurabi Division of the Republican Guard, who was brought in to the U.S. from the POW resettlement program, who lived in north Oklahoma City, and drove a brown pickup truck with a smoked glass bug shield, matching the description of one of McVeigh's reported getaway vehicles. Several eye witnesses saw this individual (later identified by Channel 9 in Oklahoma City, and the Daily Oklahoman as Iraqi ex-POW Alhussaini Hussain) with McVeigh previous to the bombing, with McVeigh in the truck when they asked directions to the Murrah Building at Johnny's Tire Store, and standing by the Ryder truck across the street from the post office one block from the Murrah building as they waited for a parking place in front of the building. Other witnesses saw this individual exit the Ryder truck with McVeigh in front of the building, then speed away with him in the yellow Marquis with the license tag (described as a white tag, not a brown Arizona tag) dangling from the back of the car. The sketches of John Doe #2 closely resemble this individual. Later interviews conducted with this person discovered that he now required an interpreter, even though witnesses state he spoke English on earlier occasions. The interpreter he provided coincidentally is the Jordanian, Abraham Ahmad, who was apprehended on Day Two in London at Heathrow airport as a bombing suspect that had flown to England that day and was returned to the U.S. for questioning, then released. It was this individual who, after being questioned, mysteriously prompted Clinton to announce "there is no middle eastern connection, period." (paraphrased)[221]

(4) A Ryder truck, according to media sources, was seen after the blast two blocks away in an alley. The reporters were being escorted by Oklahoma City firemen around the perimeter, which had been cordoned off, when a Ryder truck was discovered. As they passed the truck, men in black fatigues with no markings came out of a building, got into the truck and drove away. Information that surfaced in January 1996, however, indicates that there were two Ryder trucks rented in Kansas. One was rented by McVeigh, and another was rented by John Doe #2, accompanied by a heavy-set white male with a beard. This second truck was seen at a motel one mile from the motel McVeigh stayed in Junction City, Kansas, during the same days McVeigh was there. A heavy-set white male with a beard was also seen with McVeigh, working around the Ryder truck, in the parking lot of the motel where he stayed.

(5) KFOR reported that a still photo leaked to their station from the seized video tape showed a UPS truck, not a Ryder truck, parked in the spot at 9:00.04. It is probable that this UPS truck was in the parking place where the Ryder truck eventually parked. As McVeigh and John Doe #2 waited across the street from the post office, one block west of the Murrah building, two "dark complected middle-eastern males in blue jumpsuits or coveralls" reported by several eye witnesses, stood near the front door of the Murrah building. It is probable that when the UPS truck left the curb, one of these two individuals signaled McVeigh while the other kept the parking place open until the Ryder truck was repositioned. Once this was done, McVeigh and John Doe #2 left the cab of the truck and hurriedly crossed the street to the pre-positioned Mercury Marquis. They then hastily left the parking lot, almost striking another witness who closely observed McVeigh and JD-2, then noted the white license tag dangling on the back of the car by one bolt. At the same time the two dark complected males left the area in the brown GM pickup truck which had been parked by the curb a few spaces east (in front of) of the Ryder truck.

(6) Several stations reported that on Day One the rescue operation was shut down for an extended period of time, and all rescuers were moved outside of the perimeter while "federal agents" came in and removed boxes of records/files for "national security reasons." When questioned, considering rescue efforts were still underway and people were still trapped under rubble, the FBI spokesman, Gene Pogue, stated "It's unfortunate." (Question: Could these be the missing Mena and Whitewater records moved from Little Rock?)

(7) In late August it was released that an "extra leg" had been found and could not be tied to any of the victims. The leg, complete with combat boot and camouflage trouser material, embedded with blue plastic fragments matching the "explosives barrels" allegedly used by McVeigh in the truck, supposedly was that of a black female. This does not match any of the known victims.

(8) A KPOC television, Ponca City, Oklahoma, investigative team interviewed the truck rental in Kansas and discovered that McVeigh and another person, possibly John Doe #2Chad rented the truck while a third person waited in the car outside. The third person was described as dark complected, and may have been a female. They also discovered that McVeigh and two other people stopped at a coffee shop after visiting the truck rental and were all seen there by patrons.

(9) According to some media sources, the Oklahoma City office of the ATF was on an all-night stakeout the night before the bombing. What was the stakeout location? Was it possibly the Murrah building? If so, did the ATF have foreknowledge of the planned bombing and decide to make the "big arrest" when the bomber showed up? Was McVeigh actually the informant, working on the inside of the group?

(10) If the above (9) has any substance, something apparently went wrong. It has been speculated that the truck was supposed to arrive at 3:30 a.m., when the building was vacant. But McVeigh, or the driver, whoever it may have been, got lost and did not arrive until just before 9:00 a.m. The ATF, realizing by 6:30 a.m. that it was a "no show," had gone home. This would explain the lack of ATF agents in the office at the time of the blast.

(11) To add credence to the "foreknowledge" aspect concerning federal agencies, the Tulsa Police Department received a request to "watch" a Ryder rental truck identical to the one alleged to contain a bomb at the Murrah building. This request came the afternoon after the bombing. When a field lieutenant queried the dispatcher regarding the assignment, asking what tie-in the truck had, and where the information came from, he was told: "The information came from the same source that warned the Feds about the Murrah building, which they didn't take seriously at the time." This means that someone (John Doe #2?) did, in fact, warn some federal agency of the bombing in advance.

(12) Later reports from a McVeigh Grand Jury member were published that stated that a second Ryder truck had cropped up, in Kansas, being driven by John Doe #2, who stayed in a motel one block away from McVeigh during the same time frame McVeigh was in Kansas. This may have been the truck suspected to be in Tulsa at an east Tulsa apartment complex, or possibly the one seen by witnesses a few blocks away from the Murrah building at the same time as the McVeigh truck was pulling up out front. In this second sighting witnesses saw two males in the cab of the truck, one white and one hispanic or "Arabian."

Militia Ties?

Within 48 hours of the blast, just after Abraham Ahmad was hastily released after a brief period of "questioning" by the FBI, the media shifted its attention from the middle-eastern terrorist scenario to so-called Right Wing militias, described in the same sentence as "fringe radical hate groups." Extreme efforts were made by mainstream "reporters" to connect McVeigh with the militia movement, in particular the Michigan Militia. Though McVeigh may have attended one of their meetings, no one could remember him being there, and he later stated that he was never at one of their meetings and was not a member. Backtracking this series of events leads back to the Anti-Defamation League of the B'nai B'rith and the Southern Poverty Law Center, both of which have been designated "experts" on right wing and "hate groups" by the New York City-based mainstream media.

Anyone who has researched the militia movement and other non-paramilitary groups considered part of the "Patriot" movement, will quickly realize the ADL assertions are not only flawed, but appear to be highly slanted, inflated propaganda.

The profile of those in these movements would match people who would guard the Federal buildings, not attack them. Instead of forming to overthrow the government, as the ADL and SPLC suggests, they appear to form to be a local home-guard to resist unconstitutional moves by government officials and agencies. Such moves may be real or imagined, but the fear exists, thus the formation and growth of the movements.

What is highly unusual about this investigation is the fact that the first information available concerning suspects seen by eye witnesses reflected a definite middle-eastern terrorist connection. This aspect should have brought the ADL to the forefront proclaiming the fact that now the "Arab Terrorists" that Israel had had to face for so long, were now initiating terrorist atrocities inside the United States. To the ADL, which has been termed a political arm of the Mossad by former Israeli intelligence sources, this should have been a supreme opportunity to make a point: "Our enemy is now your enemy." What is highly suspect is that this did not happen. Instead, the ADL and SPLC, ignoring all actual evidence and witness statements, shifted the public attention totally away from the actual suspect groups. In most criminal investigations this would indicate intimate knowledge of the act, or complicity in the act itself. Even though McVeigh was the only so-called "Right Wing Radical" involved, according to eye witnesses and all investigators in the field, the ADL and SPLC-advised media shifted the focus completely away from the obvious suspects. The question, of course, is why?

The "Elohim City" Connection

During the course of the investigation information surfaced regarding records indicating McVeigh made at least two telephone calls to a covenant community on the Arkansas/Oklahoma border known as "Elohim City." Investigation into this matter produced the following information:

McVeigh met a member of the Elohim City group at a gunshow, possibly in Tulsa. This member was a German national named Andress Strassmeir. "Andy" Strassmeir is an interesting character, as he managed to enter the U.S. without a place to stay, and succeeded in living in this country, with no means of support, for four years on a six month visa unmolested by the INS. It has been determined that the federal agencies knew of Strassmeir's presence, however were not interested in apprehending or deporting him.

Strassmeir was the "security officer" for Elohim City, a covenant community founded by a Robert Millar (WM-66). Millar's small group accepts offshoot Christian separatists and others indicating a desire to join their community whose beliefs do not conflict with their own. In the past those who would not conform to their doctrine were evicted from their community. It appears, however, that the group became subject to close scrutiny in the following manner.

Strassmeir lived on a credit card for four years, without having to make payments. He is the son of Gunther Strassmeir, the assistant secretary of state under

Helmut Kohl for Germany. He is also reportedly a member of the Mossad-trained GSG-9, the German anti-terrorist police formed after the Munich massacre, and had served in the German army as a lieutenant that worked in military intelligence. It has been reported that Strassmeir was sent into this country to infiltrate neo-Nazi and White Supremacist groups (including the KKK, which is also an ADL/Mossad objective). He did this by using neo-Nazi contacts in Germany to "introduce" him to leaders in the White Aryan Resistance (WAR) movement. It is unknown how the connection was made with the Elohim City separatists, but he eventually ended up infiltrating their organization and establishing himself as a military and weapons expert. In this capacity he convinced the residents that they had to form a "militia" for self defense, had to trade their hunting firearms for military-style weapons, then proceeded to teach them martial arts, military tactics and marksmanship. It should be noted at this time that the actual leader of the community was a former Covenant, Sword and Arm of the Lord (CSA) leader named James Ellison. Ellison served as state's witness against the main CSA leader, Richard Wayne Snell, and thirteen other "White Supremacists" who went to trial for sedition and the killing of an Arkansas state trooper in 1988. Note that Richard Snell was executed on April 19th, 1995Cthe same day the Murrah building was bombed. Ellison married Millar's 14 year-old daughter and effectively took control of the community, using Strassmeir as "security chief." It should also be noted at this point that Ellison and Snell had made statements as early as 1984 that they "planned to blow up the Murrah building."[222]

Strassmeir left the country about eight weeks after the bombing, just after a connection was made through telephone record searches of McVeigh's activities showed that he called Elohim City looking for Andy Strassmeir. According to information received on 27 January, 1996, McVeigh was making contact with Strassmeir. The connection between McVeigh, Strassmeir, and GSG-9 now becomes apparent. The questions at this point are: (1) Was Strassmeir more than an intelligence gatherer, and was he an "agent provocateur"? (2) Was Strassmeir McViegh's "control"? (3) Was the GSG-9 or German intelligence working, as in the past, with the Mossad (and subsequently the ADL) to gather intelligence on neo-Nazis, WAR, KKK and etc.? and (4) Was the information developed by Strassmeir relayed to federal agencies to conduct a sting operation that ended up going bad when a surveillance effort failed to stop the bombing?

It should be kept in mind that there are several Arkansas connections. Among these are: (1) Elohim City is near the Arkansas/Oklahoma border, not far from Mena; (2) WAR has a large following in western and northwestern Arkansas; (3) CSA had its "compound" in the area and its federal trial in Fort Smith; (4) A license tag found one mile from the point McVeigh was stopped on the same highway (95 Arkansas PTA-811Ca white tag) had been stolen from Fort Smith a few days before the bombing (and soon after being reported as found disappeared from the computer records in Arkansas and NCIC); (5) McVeigh allegedly stole guns from a person in the Fort Smith area. It should also be remembered that Mena is in the region, and was selected as a gun and drug running airhead because of its remoteness and the "leave us alone" attitude of the local residents.

The Mexican Connection

Shortly after the Murrah bombing, information was received (May 8, 1995) from sources in Texas that a subject named "Arbego Garcia or Garcia Arbego" (spelling unknown at the time) was involved in the bombing as a "cash provider" for the event. The source said that "Arbego" sent two Mexican nationals to Oklahoma City with a satchel full of cash to finance the bombing. "Arbego" was allegedly a Mexican Mafia chieftain involved in the cocaine and heroin trafficking through Mexico from Guadalajara to Texas. He allegedly was the ground transportation link during the Iran/Contra Mena affair.

I forwarded this information to both the FBI (Tulsa) and the DEA (Oklahoma, Tulsa office) and asked for each to check their files and/or computers, using various spellings, to see if they had heard of such an individual. Neither replied back that they had knowledge of this individual and no further action was taken. [Author's note: In actual fact, the FBI's response was that as far as they knew, no such person existed because "we don't know him. Never heard of him."]

On May 9th, 1995, I followed up the original information with a memo containing all information I received from my source, who was relaying it from a former Texas law enforcement officer who had investigated "Arbego" and several high ranking Texas government officials, and who subsequently testified against them. These officials included a high ranking Texas national guard officer on state staff, and two relations, all of which had extensive special ops training, which allegedly included service in the PHOENIX assassination program conducted in the later years of the Vietnam war.

Later information arrived, with the source now using proper spelling, that (quoting): "Abrego's contact in Texas was a former Colonel...There are three brothers in this particular family. All three had special ops training, were involved in Project Phoenix...one or more involved with the 'Company.' One or more were on a Wet Team...One is or was a professor at Rice University. Two are, or were, fugitives. These boys are the link to Abrego and Texas. Very bad. Abrego probably set up to silence him like Noriega. He was part of same drug importation ring during Iran/Contra and after. Clinton's boys and committee followers have got to get rid of the main contacts to the Mena mess and anyone so associated."

On Tuesday, January 17th, 1996, Juan Garcia Abrego, 51, was extradited from Mexico, where he was arrested in Monterrey on Sunday, January 15th, to Houston to face federal charges of smuggling billions of dollars worth of cocaine into the U.S. Facing a 20 count indictment, he was arraigned on February 2nd. During the arraignment testimony indicated that Abrego's network smuggled $20 billion worth of cocaine into the U.S. every year, and budgeted $50 million to bribe U.S. officials.

The source indicated that even the Texas governor's office was involved in taking bribe money.

Abrego was involved in the Iran/Contra drug smuggling operation that had entry points in Los Angeles (via CIA-sponsored Contra officers to LA street gangs for further dispersal); Mena, Arkansas; Omaha, Nebraska; and other cities in the Midwest (via the Abrego land route) such as Houston, Dallas, Oklahoma City, etc.

Abrego is a member of the Columbian Cali cartel, which shipped 30% of the cocaine used in the U.S.

Abrego was number three on the FBI's "Ten Most Wanted" list since March of 1995Ca month before the Murrah bombing and almost two months previous to my original enquiry to the DEA and FBI in which I was told that Abrego did not exist!

It has now been alleged that the records in the Murrah building that were salvaged for reasons of "national security" on Day One may have tied Abrego in with the Mena drug smuggling, along with "other" players up to, and including, the highest levels of government.

It should be noted that former CIA Chief of Station Theodore Shackley, who (with his assistant Thomas Clines) set up the Laotian heroin smuggling operation in Laos during the war in Southeast Asia, now lives in Bogota, Columbia, and is rumored in intelligence circles to be responsible for forming the Cali and Medillin cartels for the purposes of smuggling cocaine and marijuana into the U.S. to support certain compartmentalized CIA covert operations with a source for black funding. The route of smuggling cocaine and marijuana by the "Enterprise" as it was called at the time, was from Bogota, to Panama (where Manual Noriega and Mossad agent Amiram Nir and Israeli colonel Michael Harare took their respective cuts), to Illopango Air Base in El Salvador, where it was divided into three routings. These routings took the drugs via air to the Los Angeles area, Mena, and to Guadalajara. The drugs at Guadalajara were then transported by truck in crates stenciled "machine tools" to Matamoros, Mexico, then across the border to Brownsville, Texas. Abrego handled this route.

The Cebu City Connection and Nichols' Expenditures

It has been reported that in the two years leading up to the bombing, suspect Nichols expended in excess of $60,000 in expenses traveling to the Philippines. His destination was Cebu City, on the island of Cebu. Cebu is the home of international terrorism in the western Pacific, and includes cells of communist, anti-communist, and Islamic terrorists.

After Nichols' arrest, he left a note to his Filipino wife to look behind a false back of a dresser drawer for an envelope. The contents were hers to keep. The contents proved to be $20,000 in cash.

Nichols had no consistent means of income during that period, and allegedly received this money from McVeigh, who had no job. McVeigh was obviously receiving funding from an outside source, which appears to be a typical "black bag" operation. $80,000 is far more than the duo would have received in trafficking in stolen guns from a single burglary, even if the burglary had occurred.

Anti-Terrorist Legislation and "Cui Bono"

Following close in the aftermath of the bombing was a rapid resurgence of the Foreign and Domestic Terrorism Prevention Act, which had lain dormant previous to the event. The major proponents of the act, which increases federal agency capabilities to conduct surveillance, monitor paramilitary groups, and arrest for a myriad of crimes the same, are organizations that can use the act (such as the ADL and SPLC), once it becomes law, to monitor, harass or attack any rival group that they can cast media attention on as terrorists. It also creates a system of national police by giving added powers to federal authorities, thereby increasing their number of personnel and annual budget.

Synopsis of this Report

As stated at the beginning, several questions had to be answered in an effort to further, if not complete, this investigation. One of the main questions was "Who Benefited?"

First, it becomes obvious that under close scrutiny, especially in light of the events that followed the bombing and the reactions of so-called Right Wing Radicals and militia types, that such an act was the worst thing that could have happened to them and their various "causes." Almost all that were interviewed were both shocked and enraged that anyone would perpetrate such an activity. Still, they became the focus of negative media attention for an extended period, and even investigated by a Congressional sub-committee concerning whether or not they were a "threat to national security."

In the end, not one "right wing" group benefited from the Oklahoma City bombing. Nor could any such group be connected in any way to the event, despite the efforts of the media and select special interest organizations.

However, when the investigation into motives shifts to other possible benefactors, three main groupings seem to become apparent: (1) Drug traffickers and money launderers; (2) Radical Left Wing political organizations, and (3) Certain government bureaucracies currently under investigation. This last is added because it is one of the main focuses of attention by the various citizen's groups and organizations that consider such agencies as the BATF an out-of-control oppressive entity.

The question is in what way to these various entities benefit?

Drug Traffickers and Money Launderers:

(1) If the records from the Mena drug smuggling operation were moved to the Murrah building from Little Rock (or duplicates kept there after originals were previously destroyed or disappeared), then it would prove very beneficial to those about to come under congressional investigation in the following months (May-June '95) to have those records destroyed, or seized and moved for later destruction.

(2) If records implicated Arkansas and international companies that hold ties to covert paramilitary operations (such as Iran/Contra and international drug smuggling), both past and present, then a covert action activity to destroy or "capture" the records is not out of the question.

(3) Two weeks after the bombing, a fireman videotaping the relief efforts accidentally stumbled upon a very suspicious activity behind the Oklahoma City post office, located cater-corner to the Murrah building. Having visited the post office on Day One to tape the relief supplies located in the rear of the building, he had noted a temporary wall and locked door that separated the supply area from another part of the large room. He asked his federal agent "guide" what was behind the wall, and was told that it was mail "that had not been checked" that was being held until it could be screened. The agent did not say what the mail was being "checked" for. On Day Ten the fireman returned to the post office as he video taped subsequent relief efforts and discovered that two all-white unmarked trucks, similar to Ryder box trucks, were backed up to the post office loading area on the west side of the building, and several men in black fatigues appeared to be guarding them. He was told immediately by his FBI "guide" to "put the camera on the ground and do not film this." He complied and stood by to observe the activity. As he watched, he could see that each truck had many SWAT-types dressed in black, wearing black ski masks, carrying submachine guns, standing guard in cordons that ran between the back of the trucks and the post office building. Outside of these shoulder-to-shoulder lines were agents in plain clothes who wore unmarked blue nylon jackets and carried hand-held radios. Several of the blue-jacketed agents were busy loading the trucks with boxes that they were carrying from the post office back room that the fireman had previously noted. He described the boxes as "cardboard file boxes full of documents." Once loaded, the trucks departed the area under guard. Before he was allowed to leave the disaster scene at the end of the day the personnel at the FBI command post watched his entire videotape to make sure the above scene was not recorded. It is possible that the mystery documents were those which were removed on Day One, and then were held at the post office until they could be safely removed to another holding area, or destroyed, depending upon who moved them.

Left Wing Political Action Groups/Entities

(1) Such an event (the bombing) would provide a great boost to sagging liberal policy, considering what has happened since November, 1994. When the power shifted in Congress from the Left to the Right, many things began to happen. One of these was the second look at portions of the Omnibus Crime Bill (such as the ban on so-called assault weapons), the Brady Law, and other previous liberal victories. With the exception of a handful of liberal congressmen and senators, the attack on the NRA, the Christian Coalition, and other conservative groups slowed in intensity to virtually a trickle of what had previously been on the agenda. But immediately after the bombing, this attack renewed its strength.

(2) The dormant Anti-Terrorism bill was revived, inflated, and put on the fast track to passage, a mainstream liberal (and Clinton) objective.

(3) Focus of attention shifted from investigations into Whitewater, Waco, Ruby Ridge, Mena, ATF conduct, and the death of Vincent Foster, all originally scheduled to begin congressional investigations four weeks after the bombing, to "more pressing issues."

(4) Media preparation of the "mind of the public" to accept laws that infringe on the Constitution and Bill of Rights. Shortly after the bombing several polls were conducted asking the question: "How many of your rights would you be willing to give up to be secure from terrorism?" A great number of people responded with "some."

(5) A new "Barbarian at the Gate" in the form of "militias" was created in the media, giving citizens a "domestic threat" to worry about. This follows the typical Hegelian Principle of creating a problem to force a solution not readily accepted by the subject previous to creation of the problem. As an example, one can observe the media and politicians connect guns and drugs. Drugs, according to them, are the problem, but the solution is to take away the guns. This obviously has little, if any, correlation, but the end objective is to use the government-induced "drug problem" as a means of reducing the number of firearms in the hands of the citizenry. Massive amounts of data is available that links various government entities and agencies to drug smuggling. In fact, it was President Clinton that, besides being linked to Iran/Contra drug smuggling, dismantled the drug intervention program shortly after his inauguration.

(6) The Anti-Defamation League and Southern Poverty Law Center benefited by utilizing the media to draw attention to their causes, attack their perceived "enemies", the ADL-identified "hate groups", and bolster their liberal following (and subsequently their financial contributions). Also, the ADL's actions after the bombing created a diversion away from further Iran/Contra exposure to Israel's participation in cocaine smuggling (into the U.S.) and drug profiteering. This issue might, if exposed to the American people, affect American foreign aid to Israel (estimated at $3.5 million per day). This might explain why the ADL and SPLC attempted to use the media to divert attention away from the actual perpetrators.

Government Bureaucracies Under Investigation

(It would be remiss to not mention those government bureaucracies and sub-organizations suspected by many citizens as benefactors of the bombing)

(1) Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms: The BATF, after the failed raid at Waco, the Ruby Ridge debacle (which cost the government/taxpayers $3.5 million in the subsequent wrongful death suit), and other reported "abuses of power," was to come under government/congressional investigation in the summer months. It was rumored that steps were being considered to disband the BATF. Also to occur in May were the scheduled Waco hearings. It has been reported that the Waco investigative documents and all documents seized from the Mount Carmel site were kept in files at the Murrah building. Also, if the story of the stake-out on the Murrah building to "catch the bomber" has substance, and due to timing such did not occur and the bomb did explode after the ATF went off duty, it would be extremely awkward for ATF personnel to come forward in the aftermath and explain why they issued no warning to other agencies and building occupants. At this point the question on "which Federal agency received advance warning from the source that provided the information to Tulsa PD?" must be asked. It has been reported that the BATF in Oklahoma City received advance warning that there was a bomb threat on the building. Could this be the same source? If so, it must be asked if the BATF might be guilty of inaction.

(2) FBI: The FBI would not have benefited. FBI did not have an office in the building, and other than possible references to activities in Waco in the Waco reports/documents, had no connection. FBI investigated the Mena affair, and destruction or loss of such documents would have been detrimental.

(3) DEA: DEA would not have benefited. DEA investigated the Mena affair, and went to great lengths to protect their sources and documents for later use. Destruction or loss of these documents would have been detrimental.

CONCLUSION

It should be apparent to the investigator that McVeigh and Nichols, virtually unassisted, could not have planned, provided for, financed, and executed the bombing by themselves. Much has been written by explosives experts and professional investigators concerning the lack of capability of the single truck bomb, containing only 4600 pounds of ammonium nitrate explosive mixture, to do the damage that was accomplished.

Little is known about McVeigh's activities since he left the Army in 1992. It is possible that he was identified by a "recruiter" during his military service during the Gulf War or shortly thereafter, and was subsequently recruited into the covert intelligence community.

If this is the case, then it becomes apparent that many "theories" concerning the Oklahoma City bombing appear more valid. Examples: There were military high-explosive devices inside the building; McVeigh was working with the BATF to help apprehend the actual "bombers"; a contract "wet-team" organized and executed the bombing to destroy records, inflame public sentiment for political expediency, and embarrass the conservative politicians in power in Congress; drug trafficking and money laundering by the covert intelligence organizations would not be exposed by hard evidence; and other theories and items of suspicion.

Still, one cannot disregard the initial thrust of the investigation linking a middle-eastern connection to the bombing. It has been determined since the event that a "holy Jihad" has been declared against the United States, and that orders have been given to various Hamas, Hizbollah and Islamic Jihad cells in this country to "bring down towers, buildings of finance, buildings with women and children, and other targets" to show the "infidels" that no one is safe from the Jihad. This Jihad can be traced to three countries: Iran, Iraq, and Libya, all supported by clandestine Russian advisors. In fact, an interview with the daughter of a PLO officer exposed the fact that a PLO office exists in Mexico City, and that many POL and middle eastern males passed through the office on their way to America to participate in the Jihad. She stated that they were taught by the Russians, equipped by Islamic Jihad organizations, then sent to destroy buildings and other targets. She also said that the Russians told them to "use American neo-fascists to do the jobs, so they get the blame." When questioned, she explained that the Russians called American neo-Nazis neo-Fascists.[223]

The end result, whether it was a covert operation to destroy records and inflame the public, or an attack by Islamic Jihad terrorists, or a combination of both, is that it appears that other, much higher entities than McVeigh and Nichols are involved.

The investigation should not stop, or even slow down, with the apprehension of McVeigh and Nichols as the only suspects. With leads into the Right Wing, Christian, Constitutionalist, Militia, Patriot, NRA, Conservative, and other groups, with the exception of WAR and the Elohim City/Strassmeir connection, not developing anything of substance, it is now time to explore the other side of the political spectrum.

It is the opinion of this writer that the investigation is far from over.

END OF REPORT

I submitted this report shortly before I retired. My investigation, however, was far from complete. Since then I, along with a team of other investigators, have discovered even more frightening information linking possible covert operations to the Oklahoma City bombing. But one item should be kept in mind above all else, what ever happened to the search for John Doe #2?

In actual fact, there are at least eight "John Does" linked to this case: McVeigh (John Doe #1), JD-2 in the Ryder truck with him, the dark complected person in the car in Junction City Kansas, the heavy- set white male "biker-type" with the beard in Junction City, another "McVeigh" and passenger in a second Ryder truck seen in the Brick Town section of Oklahoma City at the same time the first Ryder truck was pulling to the curb in front of the Murrah Building, the two "Middle-Eastern types" in blue jogging suits at the Murrah building, and a swarthy male who drove the yellow Marquis get-away car from the parking lot north of the Murrah building.

I cannot go into a great deal of information regarding this case in this book. It would take an entire book in its own right to do the case justice. But I can close this chapter with a set of interesting facts for the reader to peruse.

I offer the parallels between Timothy McVeigh and Lee Harvey Oswald, and the Murrah Building crime scene and Dealey Plaza. I wrote and published the following article in Assassination Chronicles magazine (JFK-Lancer):

The Parallels
Oswald and Dealey Plaza
vs. McVeigh and the OKC Bombing

This writer has been personally involved in the investigation of the Oklahoma City bombing since the third day after the tragedy, and the scenario that has developed is chillingly close to that which transpired after 11:30 a.m. on November 22nd, 1963. Following are many of the items to be noted:

Around 9:00 a.m. Oklahoma time on 19 April, 1995, a huge explosion rocked the downtown area of Oklahoma City. Within minutes, during the evacuation of what remained of the building, searching for casualties, arrival of police, fire and rescue personnel, and mass confusion, two more "devices" were found inside the building. Bomb squad personnel had to deactivate at least one of the devices and remove them from the area for safety. Within the hour the media stated that they were "ATF training devices, not actual bombs." If this were so, why were they placed in strategic locations inside the building, on floors away from the ATF offices?

In Dealey Plaza, a scenario quickly developed wherein a lone shooter, from the 6th floor of the TSBD, allegedly fired three shots which amazingly created over a half dozen wounds (including one missed shot) and escaped the scene undetected. Later investigation showed that only two empty 6.5mm shell casings were found on the 6th Floor and turned in, along with a rifle and one live round. Yet these documents were altered during the Warren hearings to reflect three empty cartridges to fit the "Magic Bullet" theory.

Oklahoma City: Two seismic events transpired according to the University of Oklahoma Seismic Center. The tape, which actually shows three equal events, is quickly debunked by the government as being "the initial explosion, followed by the building collapsing" (ignoring the first event entirely). Yet, when the entire remaining building was demolished by controlled demolition, the event recorded on tape was barely noticeable. Still, the investigators insist that only one bomb was used: the Ryder truck bomb allegedly delivered by McVeigh.

Within twenty-four hours the Ryder truck grows from a small van to the largest box-truck in Ryder inventory to contain the ever growing amount of ammonium-nitrate explosives required to create the damage done to the building. Yet, according to sources outside the government, very little indication of nitrate deposits at the scene are found, indicating a different type of explosive.

In Dallas, following the ambush of JFK, damage control seemed to begin immediately with the focus of attention being directed away from the Grassy Knoll to the Book Depository building, and a shooter on the sixth floor. In OKC, the first two leads indicate that two "middle-eastern males" were seen hanging around the scene and were probably involved; and an all points bulletin was broadcast by OKC Police Department to search for a brown pickup truck with a smoked-plastic bug shield. Within a few hours, the FBI canceled both leads, and told the police that they had not issued an "attempt to locate" on the pickup truck. But the OKC PD had the original release from the FBI asking for the APB, and it had been duly noted in their radio logs.

McVeigh is picked up for speeding, in a car with no license tag, for doing 85 mph, by the Oklahoma Highway Patrol. Oswald was picked up, for allegedly shooting Dallas officer J.D. Tippit, after entering the Texas Theater without buying a ticket. In each case, the FBI was notified within a short period of time that a "suspect" was in custody. In Oswald's case, items "linking" him to the Kennedy assassination were "found" in various locations: photos of him with a Carcano, a Mannlicher-Carcano found on the 6th floor, etc. For McVeigh, his license plate was allegedly "found" within two blocks of the bombing scene, having been supposedly ripped from the rear of the car by the concussion of the explosion, yet cars in the parking lot where the explosion occurred still had their license tags, and most had not even been blown out of their parking places!

For Oswald, the Carcano was traced to him by the FBI, who, before the advent of computers and data bases, managed to track the weapon from its entrance into the U.S., to an importer, to Klein's Sporting Goods, to a sale to "A.J. Hidell," to Lee Harvey Oswald. All in two days. Over a weekend!

For McVeigh, the rear axle (differential?) of the Ryder truck was discovered, wherein an ID number was allegedly discovered, which was supposedly traced from the manufacturer, to Ryder, to a truck rental in Kansas, all within hours. Interviews with the rental agent produced two sketches: McVeigh and John Doe #2. The media did not report that a third person was present, who waited outside in a car, and who appeared to be dark complected. And John Doe #2, as a lead, evaporated when the FBI stated that there was a mistake, and that he was a soldier from Fort Riley who rented a truck the previous day, and was not involved with McVeigh. But media outside of Oklahoma did not report that another John Doe #2 was discovered by KFOR TV in Oklahoma City, and that he matched the suspect sketch; was seen by six eye witnesses in a bar with McVeigh and Nichols only days before the bombing; drove a brown Chevrolet pickup with smoked plastic bug screen; and was an Iraqi officer who had fought against us in the Gulf War! It also was not reported that over 5,000 Iraqi POWs had been brought into this country for "humanitarian reasons," and a large segment ended up being settled in Oklahoma City.

In Oswald's case, it is interesting to note that he had connections to the White Russian community of Dallas-Fort Worth, and that these people had been settled here by the OSS when Allen Dulles brought the SS Galizien Division out of Europe at the end of World War II, to Greece, then Canada, then New York City and Dallas/Fort Worth. The teenage children of the Galiziens were later utilized as CIA assets for infiltration into Russia, they spoke Russian and had relatives inside who might provide support after infiltration. (This makes one wonder about the Oswald who, during his time in the Marine Corps in Japan, "taught himself" Russian within a few weeks).

The investigation of the Kennedy assassination rapidly focused on the "lone nut" scenario. Witnesses who did not support this rapidly-building case against Oswald as the lone participant were intimidated, debunked or misquoted in reports. Most who saw something other than a man in the 6th floor window were not subpoenaed to testify before the Warren Commission. In McVeigh's case, anyone who brings forward information that there had to be more than one bomb, or that there were higher powers involved in the bombing, or more than just McVeigh and Nichols involved, is quickly debunked, discredited or ignored. On at least three occasions this has already occurred: Brigadier General Partin (USAF ret.), an explosives expert that said that the ammonium nitrate truck bomb could not have done the damage inflicted on the building by itself; and former FBI SAC Ted Gunderson, who stated other devices exist in inventory that are much smaller and more powerful that could have caused the damage; and Debra von Trapp, a former high level government contractor who brought forth information linking members of the Clinton administration to the bombing, have been ignored or discredited with the full weight of the mainstream media.

Instead, within twenty-four hours of the event the mainstream media, en total, slanted the dagger of suspicion to "far right radicals," such as the burgeoning militia movement. In particular, the Michigan Militia was targeted as being "tied" to McVeigh. In actual fact, though two members of the Michigan Militia stated that they think they saw McVeigh at one of their open-to-the-public meetings, McVeigh himself says he never attended. Still, even if he was seen at a meeting, it could easily have been part of a setup to develop manufactured connections to a group already under scrutiny by certain bureaucrats.

For Oswald, a radical background (this time Left Wing) was built in the press long before Dallas. He was filmed handing out "Fair Play for Cuba" pamphlets on a New Orleans street corner, and was interviewed on television wherein he declared himself a "Marxist" for public consumption. The media has maintained ever since that Oswald was a Marxist by his own admission, and killed Kennedy for radical political reasons.

The media's attack on the militia, who had absolutely nothing to gain and everything to lose in the aftermath of the bombing, resulted in new "anti-terrorism" laws being ram-rodded through Congress in the wake of media-generated public emotion. These laws had been laying stagnant for months, having been written following the New York City Twin Towers bombing but delayed due to their conflict with Constitutional rights. Interestingly, one major result of the Kennedy assassination was the "Firearms Control Act of 1968," which was the first major legislation regarding governmental control of citizens firearms since the 1930s where private ownership of automatic weapons had to be licensed by the federal government, another restriction on Constitutional rights.

Then there are the "Wild Goose Chases" of the national investigation. During the Kennedy investigation, hundreds of FBI agents were sent hither and yon to interview, question, and report on even the most obscure leads and "witnesses." The agents, all trying to do as sterling a job as possible, then sent their reports to FBI headquarters for screening and absorption. Few agents ever saw the "big picture," could compare notes, or even knew just why they were following up on a given lead. The same is happening with the OKC bombing investigation. Hundreds of agents have "followed up" on even the most obscure leads, but, like their predecessors who investigated the Kennedy assassination, they are left out of the grand scheme of things and are only privy to certain pieces of the puzzle. It is also interesting to note that the main question is not being answered concerning the motivation behind any crime: Who Benefits?

FBI agents who attempted to follow the money, and the powers, behind the murder of JFK were quickly redirected by Washington to other activities. The agents who smell a large rodent with the Oklahoma City bombing (as in Who Benefits) are finding themselves subject to the same circumstances. It appears to once again be a system of directed investigation, ignoring or debunking of anything that does not fit the mold of a predetermined outcome ("A Patsy Gets The Blame"), and disassociation with the idea that higher powers are involved.

The television coverage of the transfer of McVeigh from jail to the holding facility at Tinker Air Force Base, outside of Oklahoma City, was quite reminiscent of Oswald's transfer attempt from the Dallas PD jail to the county jail. The only difference was that there was no Jack Ruby to intervene. However, it should be noted that McVeigh was dressed in bright orange, and wore no bullet proof vest! It makes one wonder if an opportunity was not being presented by design.

Until the investigation begins to follow leads concerning "Who Benefits?" it is unlikely the Oklahoma City bombing investigation will progress to a full, believable, conclusion. If the case against McVeigh and Nichols, who the government maintains acted by themselves, was so iron clad, then we must ask ourselves why the government prosecutors had to ask for a ninety day extension on their investigation before attempting to present McVeigh for indictment before a federal Grand Jury.

There's one more element to consider: the video tape. In 1963, Abraham Zapruder's film recorded the events that transpired in Dealey Plaza. It was seized by the FBI, obtained by Life magazine (who employed former OSS and CIA personnel such as senior editor Charles D. Jackson), and not released until much later. When it was released it had been altered. In Oklahoma City, the media reported that the camera on an automatic teller machine (or the Southwestern Bell building security camera, or a camera on an apartment building a block west) recorded McVeigh parking the Ryder truck, then walking away from it to get into a vehicle to speed away. The federal authorities seized the tape for evidence.

Why have we not seen this tape? If it is being kept secret until trial, then it should be released after it has been exhibited in a court room. The question is: will we ever see it?

Many other questions remain to be answered, as in the Kennedy investigation, but will probably never be breached. Questions such as: Was there an Iraqi connection? Were there actually two (or more) explosions? Were there two or more other bombs inside the building? Why did McVeigh's license tag "fall off" his car? Why was the APB on the brown pickup not followed up on, then later canceled altogether and denied to exist by the FBI? Exactly what number was found on the truck axle that would identify the vehicle? Why have we not seen photographs of this number plate? Why was not John Doe #2, the Iraqi Republican Guard Division officer, not followed up in detail by the FBI? And why, after it was shown there was no connection, did the media continue to shift public attention to right wing groups ranging from the NRA to various militia organizations when those entities had the most to lose from such a tragic event? And most of all, what exactly were the documents taken out of the Murrah building's ruins that were so important that rescue operations had to be curtailed?

And one cannot help but wonder if Timothy McVeigh will utter, at some point in time, "So I'm the patsy!"

One last note to consider: The June 25, 1996 bombing of the Khobar Towers apartment building in Dhahran, Saudi Arabia, which killed 23 Americans was briefly referred to by the media as "proof" that a truck bomb could do the damage to a building that the ammonium-nitrate packed Ryder truck supposedly did. But the claims quickly died when it was determined that 1) the building was built with poor grade materials and was not reinforced to American standards; 2) that only the front wall fell and little damage occurred past that point; 3) the Murrah building was built to strict modern codes using the strongest materials; and 4) the explosives used were in excess of 5,000 pounds of RDX and Semtex high explosive. A bomb twenty-five times as powerful as the "Ryder bomb" did only one-tenth the damage.[224]

Chapter 33

Incident at Gila Bend

It was only five months after the bombing of the Murrah Building when the next target on the category list was hit. On Monday, October 9th, 1995, the only "Mass Transportation, Land" target available in the United States was attacked.

The news broke first on television, monopolizing the airwaves on the news channels first, then spewing forth from the mouths of the talking heads of the main networks: Domestic terrorists, calling themselves "Sons of Gestapo," have derailed a passenger train near Hyder, Arizona. According to the news blurbs, sometime around 1:00 a.m. that morning the Amtrak "Sunset Limited" passenger train, enroute from Phoenix to San Diego, jumped the tracks in a remote mountain wilderness area northwest of Gila Bend, Arizona. This placed the location in Maricopa County, outside of Phoenix. Two investigative agencies would come into play: the Maricopa County Sheriff's Office (under Sheriff Joe Arpaio) and the FBI (since the incident concerned interstate commerce).

Three points were made by the news media: 1) the rails had been sabotaged by someone who knew what they were doing, as they had effectively disabled the electronic warning system by using some type of jumper cables to bypass the disconnected rail, 2) the area was extremely remote, almost inaccessible, and occurred on a downhill curve that S-turned onto a bridge over an arroyo, and 3) there was a note found at the scene that pointed directly toward what the media was labeling an anti-government or right wing extremist group. The note was signed "Sons of Gestapo, SOG."

The next morning I studied an aerial view of the scene depicted in an AP wire photo. Four passenger cars, still coupled together, were off the tracks laying on their side to one side of a small bridge, with two angled down into a dry wash. The caption explained that of the 268 people that were aboard one was killed and 100 injured. The article mentioned that deputies found a message at the scene that mentioned Waco, Ruby Ridge, the FBI and the Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco, and Firearms. It was from this single note that the media derived the idea that some extreme Right-Wing group was responsible. The article went on to mention that "An electronic database search of U.S. newspapers big and small found no mention of "Sons of Gestapo." [And] a search of about six months worth of Internet discussion groups and World Wide Web pages also found nothing."

After reading the rest of the article and watching the news network broadcasts for the remainder of the day, I could see that something was definitely wrong. From my experience investigating the Oklahoma City bombing, and digging into the various political groups that were suspect during that investigation, I felt that what was occurring was a continuation of an agenda. I also knew that the Maricopa County deputies would not have access to what we had discovered during our investigation of the Oklahoma City event, and that if the federal agencies followed the same course as they had in Oklahoma, and if they were directly controlled by the Justice Department in Washington, the Maricopa deputies would find themselves left out of the picture concerning what really might have happened and who should be put on the suspect list. I feared that if I was right in my analysis, and if the perpetrators were more than a pickup truck load of local radical bubbas, then the case might go much higher and eventually be covered up by the shadow powers in Washington.

I knew from 26 years experience as a law enforcement officer that there are hundreds of good, honest federal agents who try their best to do a sterling job in investigating criminal events. But I also knew that when certain crimes have a national or international perspective, and politics regarding higher agendas are involved, then the investigation is taken out of the hands of the local federal authorities. When this happens, they are controlled from a much higher level, normally in the Washington, D.C. arena. And because of my experience with the investigations of events that form the preceding chapters of this book, I knew that if a high level political agenda was being served in this case, the chance of a coverup was not out of the question.

I also found the note, signed by a group that neither I, nor any of my contacts, had never heard of, most intriguing. I felt that if I could read the full contents of the note, I might be able to determine if it was a legitimate claim or a false flag. If it was indeed a plant to lead the investigators and media astray, it would mean a great deal to the case in determining the proper direction for the investigation to proceed.

I also found it very suspect that the location of the derailment was in such a remote area. If a small group of saboteurs, bent only on derailing the train, were involved, then they would have picked a much more accessible place to vandalize the tracks. By picking such a remote place, the chance of discovery during a getaway was much greater than simply selecting a location only a mile or so from a highway, unless they did not arrive at the scene or leave by ground transportation. In that case, such a location made sense.

I then spread out aerial and ground maps of the area and began studying the terrain. Both my military and aviation backgrounds came into play as I dissected the terrain features surrounding the crash site and noted several things that made me believe that the job had been planned by professionals who knew exactly what they were doing.

First, the railroad tracks ran fairly straight from Phoenix, southwest to the northeast base of the Gila Bend Mountains. There, they made a gentle curve up through a mountain pass, then began a downgrade toward the bridge. Just before the bridge was a well-defined S-turn. It was here that the perpetrators had selected a rail and pulled 29 spikes, then installed the jumper to defeat the warning system.

Beyond the bridge to the west the tracks ran almost in a straight line to Yuma. The target point selected was in the most remote point along the route, at the end of an S-turn, at a bridge over a dry wash, where a derailment would cause the most damage. Beyond that, the surrounding terrain features told an additional story.

The aviation sectional map showed the bridge to cross a wash at the north end of a U-shaped valley. Mountains surrounded the site on the west, north and east. The most logical access route would be from the south, which was fairly flat and open. What I saw as a pilot was that if the perpetrators came in on the ground, they probably approached from the south, possibly from a mining road that ended at the dry Gila Bend River bed only six miles away. Though a dirt service road ran along the tracks, the distance they would have to travel would be a circuitous route approximately 38 miles in length to the nearest highway, Highway 8, which runs from Eloy (30 miles south of Phoenix) to Yuma. The question that needed to be answered at this point concerned physical evidence that was not mentioned by the media. Were there tracks of a vehicle, either four wheel or dirt bike, going to or from the scene of the crime? If not, and the saboteurs had not driven the rough dirt road at nighttime for 38 miles, then I found myself developing another prospective mode of ingress and egress from the scene.

By coupling my knowledge and background as a military officer with my experience as a police helicopter pilot, I began analyzing the map as if I were going to plan such an operation, taking in the terrain, time of night, weather, and obstacles. First, I would want to be inserted and extracted by air. Taking into account what appeared to be a professional job of picking the target site, I surmised that a team would have been formed and that they might have access to a helicopter. I knew I was reaching, but it seemed a theory worth exploring.

If a helicopter was used, then it would be a simple job to fly in from the south, land near the bridge, drop off a team, then leave the area until called back by radio. Then I'd return to the site pick up the team, then egress the area, all below the hill tops. This, however, meant that the pilot would have to fly in and out twice, which would draw attention from any hikers or campers in the area. If the team was well trained, however, the pilot could remain on the ground for the amount of time needed to pull the spikes, then leave with the team. Risky, but possible. The additional benefit to this particular section of desert is the fact that the mountains would block radar from Phoenix, and a helicopter could fly in low and undetected.

I had additional reasons to consider the air-insertion theory. I had heard of covert operations training that had been conducted for some time only 90 minutes flying time away at a highly secret base called Pinal County Airpark, known in the aviation industry as "Marana." This "airport" is a locked-down secure facility run by Evergreen Inc., reputed to be a "contractor" to government agencies, including the CIA. Rumors had run rampant during the Iran/Contra investigation that the airstrip had been one of several used for drug shipments into the U.S., but little documentation exists indicating this was followed up on during the Congressional investigation into the affair. I knew the facility, which was located near Highway 10 that runs from Phoenix to Tucson, had access to military-type helicopters, and that a great deal of strange "night training" had been reported by passersby. Exactly what went on there behind the front of being a desert aircraft storage facility for the various airlines, no one knew. But very reliable individuals had reported seeing both dark, unmarked helicopters, and skydivers dropping in mass into the nearby desert wearing black uniforms and black square "Paracommander"-style steerable parachutes.

Was some covert paramilitary agency training troops in night commando-style insertions? I couldn't help but wonder if there might be a connection between these strange activities and the nearby train derailment.

I had to know more. And I wanted to see a copy of the actual "Sons of Gestapo" note. On the afternoon of October 10th, I sent the following fax to Sheriff Arpaio.

FAX MESSAGE

To: Sheriff Joe Arpaio, Maricopa Co. AZ
From: MPO Craig Roberts, Tulsa PD, Air Support Unit
Ref: AMTRACK train sabotage case, Hyder, AZ
Date: 10-10-95

Sheriff Arpaio,

I am a Tulsa PD police officer who has worked with our local office of the FBI on the Oklahoma City bombing case. During that investigation, which is still ongoing, I have had occasion to discover many things that may be of interest to you and your investigators regarding your Amtrak case.

First, from the information I have heard on the news and read in the local newspapers, I would suggest you proceed with extreme caution regarding opinions on suspects or suspect groups. The below examination of facts, when evaluated together, paint a very suspicious set of circumstances:

1. Anyone who has been in the military and received training on ground combat operations in a guerrilla environment knows that the number one basic target for partisans, guerrillas, and terrorists who have limited resources are open, non-secured remote stretches of railroad tracks. Simply by removing key structural components, such as spikes, couplings and tie-bars, preferably over a bridge or on a bend near a ravine, an entire train can be derailed. This will tie up a section of rail line for an indefinite period of time. In Special Forces Warfare School at Fort Bragg, training manuals discuss teaching guerrillas to do just exactly what was described. Special emphasis is placed on the facts that it is easy to accomplish, and that the planners should pick a remote area to preclude discovery.

2. This attack could have been accomplished by very few people, maybe only one. Not seeing the scene I cannot comment, however, it definitely would not take a large "team" to do this.

3. Question: Were there any four-wheel drive vehicle tracks on the scene when the first outside elements arrived? If not, then whoever came in and performed the sabotage would probably have utilized a helicopter. If this is so, it is unlikely to be any local militia bunch. And if a helicopter was used, please contact me as I may be able to provide more information on where you might look for leads.

4. Question: Is this section of track normally on the Amtrak run for the Sunset Limited? If not, then someone would have had to know that it was a diverted run, and that the Amtrak train would take it.

5. Question: Did anything in the note reflect on this particular train? Or would the saboteurs have settled for any train? Look very hard at the intelligence gathering capabilities of the sabotage "team" concerning the timing of the train, relative to the remote location, the section of tracks, and the fact that a freight train passed unmolested 18 hours previous.

6. Examine the structure/grammar of the note carefully. The biggest flaw I see is that they call themselves "Sons of Gestapo." My experience is that only those who learned English as a second language have a habit of leaving out the word "the" in a sentence. This is most prevalent in the speech of Eastern Europeans, Middle-Easterners, and Russians. Instead of saying "I am going out to the car to get the book," such an individual would say "I am going to car to get book." These individuals correlate their own native language to ours by using their sentence structure and replacing the words for those in English. If they normally do not use the word "the," then it will be missing. If the writer of the note was someone who spoke English as a primary language, he or she would probably use such a name as "Sons of the Gestapo."

7. The problem here is that no one would choose such a hokey name. Not unless they were trying to shift attention to neo-nazis. Even the so-called "extreme right" would not choose such a stupid and incriminating name. Any amateur investigator can see that whoever did this purposefully attempted to leave "evidence" incriminating so-called militias and other paramilitary groups. Especially with the references to Waco and Ruby Ridge. We ran into the same thing with the OKC bombing, but McVeigh has very little, if any, "ties" to any militia. Still, the bomb was detonated on the anniversary of the Waco climax, which launched the media on a huge right-wing witch hunt.

8. During my investigation of militia groups I have never come across any called "Sons of Gestapo," nor anything remotely like it.

9. Ask yourself this question: "Who benefits?" This is the most important question of all. I think you will find that if anything, these types of attacks are totally against everything the militia groups believe in. In fact, if you can find any local members of such organizations, they will probably tell you that they would help guard railroad tracks, not destroy them. From my investigation I discovered that the vast majority of the paramilitary militia types are people who do not "hate" the government, nor are they anti-government. They simply fear the government and what has happened in Congress over the past two-three years. They especially fear attacks on their Second Amendment rights. But they do not fit a psychological profile of someone who would hurt innocent people.

10. RE: the Waco and Ruby Ridge "rallying cry" on the notes: Neither has anything to do with trains, Amtrak, or Arizona. Someone who wanted to "attack the government, FBI or BATF" would not do so by simply attacking some passenger train with no government connections. They would go after a government facility or personnel.

11. So back to "who benefits?" If the media plays this up, with stage direction from the Southern Poverty Law Center's "Klan Watch," supported by Morris Dees and the ADL, just like what happened on Day Three of the OKC bombing, then the thrust will be pressure to pass the stalled "Anti-Terrorist" bill. If you do not know what is contained in this bill, obtain a copy and read it carefully.

12. Examination of the chronological facts:

1. World Trade Center bombing occurs in NYC. Little national impact outside of the Northeast.

2. Oklahoma City bombing. Massive news coverage, nationwide manhunt, focus shifts from "Middle Easterners" to "Militia" under preplanned manipulation of certain left wing organizations in just over 24 hours. Anti-terrorism bill rejuvenated. Investigation stalls with capture of only McVeigh and Nichols (who obviously are not in this alone). Despite $2 million reward and hundreds of agents no other arrests are made and the search for "John Doe #2" ends.

3. Hyder train derailment. Note(s) left in feeble attempt to point fingers at "right wing extremists," or neo-nazis, or militia groups. Local law enforcement is not so quick to jump on the bait this time. Even the media is being more cautious.

4. What's next? Upon examination of the events, we have these targets that have been subject to terrorism:

A. World Trade Center: Downtown NYC, home of ABC, NBC, CBS. Lots of media coverage.

B. Government building in Oklahoma City, right in the heartland in "good ol' boy" patriotic America. More deaths of innocent civilians, lots of blood, more massive media coverage.

C. Largest mass-transportation vehicle in inventory, a train. Not only a train, it's Amtrak, and it was hit in Conservative Arizona, which also just happens to be an area reportedly inhabited by numerous militia groups. It is also the state where McViegh visited Fortier (Kingman).

> If you follow this pattern you find: The world's largest civilian corporate building, a middle-America Federal Building (with massive loss of lives), and a passenger train. Of the five basic (land-based) terrorist targets, only two remain: An airliner and a large gathering of people (the Black Sunday scenario). If these events are related, (and the same people are involved for whatever motive), it would follow that a civilian airliner or maybe a sports event would be a candidate for a future "domestic terrorism" target. If your investigators would like to visit with me to compare notes, I would be happy to share any ideas, theories, or information that might assist in your case. I think my five months of investigating the Oklahoma City bombing to date might provide a few items of interest that could relate to the Amtrak case.
> I would be particularly interested in knowing if the possibility exists that a helicopter may have been used in this event. If so, I may be able to provide further leads.
> END OF MESSAGE.

Two days after sending the fax I received a phone call from one of the sheriff's detectives working the case. He told me that he had been given the fax and was going to pass it along to the lieutenant in charge of the Sheriff's investigation team. He also told me that "it's a mad house, and the FBI was pulling agents in from all over. All they have us doing is fetching coffee."

I asked if they were sharing information and he laughed. "They're the big FBI pros. We're just a bunch of hick deputies who don't know anything." I sympathized with him. I had been down this same road myself a few times when dealing with the feds. He promised to have the lieutenant call me.

My next step was to begin calling some of my contacts who have expertise in various fields that would be relevant to this case. The first and most important contact I made was with a federal officer who must remain anonymous to protect him from repercussions. For purposes of this story we will call him "Jack." Jack's expertise was in the area of government and civilian aviation operations, and he had contacts throughout the NTSB, FAA, and other agencies.

I called Jack and we spent over an hour discussing the case. Like me, he pulled out his aviation maps and studied the area. And like me, he was also a pilot with military and civilian experience in both fixed-wing and rotary-wing aircraft. We eventually arrived at four possibilities of what may have occurred if this was indeed a professional team-type insertion. First, a helicopter flew in, dropped the team, left, came back and pulled them out. Second, a helicopter flew in, waited on the ground while the job was done, then flew out with the team. Third, they jumped in, then were recovered by a helicopter either just after the mission was accomplished, or when the huge number of medical, news and emergency helicopters arrived after the derailment. In this scenario, it would be simple for a helicopter to show up as one of many, load up a few of the "victims," then leave the scene without anyone taking particular notice. The last scenario would involve a ground insertion and extraction by vehicle. Proof that this last possibility was the case would depend on what information came back from Maricopa County regarding vehicle tracks.

Jack decided that it would be pertinent to check the weather conditions the night of the incident. As he broke loose to do this, I began making notes and compiling a case file.

Meanwhile, the FBI, who had dubbed the case "Operation Splitrail," continued the investigation in Arizona. Within two days they were exploring the possibility that the note was a plant and that the saboteurs might not be a terrorist group after all, but possibility a disgruntled railroad employee. Such an individual might have a working knowledge of how to derail a train, and also disable the warning device, something so-called "militia types" would probably not even think of. Also at this time the governor of Arizona, Fife Symington, told the press that he had read one version of the note that was left at the scene and said that there were several versions, but most were "comparable in terms of content."

Acting special agent in charge of the Phoenix office for the FBI, Larry McCormick, said he believed the case was the bureau's second-biggest crime scene investigation after the Oklahoma City bombing, encompassing over a square mile of rugged desert. Assistant U.S. Attorney Janet Napolitano stated that "We are going to pursue every bit of evidence and every lead very thoroughly...until we find the person or persons who committed this crime." I remembered Janet Reno saying the same thing about the Oklahoma City case.

An "unnamed source" leaked to the AP that the case had been put under Assistant FBI Director Robert Bryant, who heads the bureau's national security division. According to the source, "Bryant's national security division has the case because it has the potential to become a terrorism case, but we have not reached any conclusions yet whether terrorism is the motive or not."

It appeared that the public, by way of the media, was being mentally prepared for the eventuality that the Amtrak derailment would become another case of "domestic terrorism."

When Jack called me back he was elated at what he had discovered. First, the weather on the night in question was this: A full moon, wind out of the south at 8 knots, and a clear sky. It would be an ideal night for air operations. Next, he was almost choking when he said "guess what else I dug up? I pulled some strings and had the Albuquerque Center run their radar tapes for that night and you won't believe what they found. We've got a target."

"What kind of target? You mean over the site?"

"More than that. We have a VFR target squawking 1200 that left Tri-City airfield in Albuquerque on a southwest course, climbed to 10,500 feet, then, when it was exactly due east of the Amtrak site, turn due west and flew a course line that took it one mile south of the site. But just before arriving over the site, it dropped to 8,500 feet. After crossing the target zone, it turned on a southwesterly course towards California at 8,500 feet. Albuquerque contacted the Los Angeles Center which tracked the aircraft to a landing at Montgomery Field in San Diego."

"What was the time frame?" I asked.

"It crossed the valley south of the bridge at 1940 hours."

7:40 p.m. on a full moon night, with the wind out of the south. The plane was one mile south of the bridge, which would compensate for wind drift. Things were beginning to fall in place.

"You know what we need to do now?" asked Jack. "We need to contact the DEA or Air Force guys down at Tucson or Yuma and have them run their radar tapes for that night from their Aerostat drug balloon radar units."

The DEA and Air Force have several tethered "blimp" type balloons staked out along the border with down-looking radar to watch for low flying drug flights. If a helicopter was involved in the pickup, which may have approached from the south as we speculated, then they might have it on tape.

"Can you get that information?" I asked.

"I'll get on it."

My next contact from Maricopa County came from a detective working the case. He had read my initial fax and called to explain that his people were taking an interest in the possibilities I mentioned. For starters, he said that they had conducted a search and had not located any ground vehicle tracks coming into the scene, other than those that they attributed to rescuers and the media. No tracks extended across the desert, and they were now exploring our suggestion of an air insertion being involved. It still seemed far fetched, but the idea of air assets being used was beginning to carry more weight as the investigation progressed. He asked if I would put my ideas together in a more detailed memo and fax it to them for consideration. That afternoon I sent the following memo:

MEMO

To: Det. Div. Maricopa Co. SO
From: MPO Craig Roberts, Tulsa PD, (Air Support)
Re: Amtrak sabotage, Arizona
Subj: Aircraft ingress/egress possibilities

Considering the nature of the area/terrain at the derailment site, it would appear (from the aviation map) that entering by 4WD vehicle would be very unlikely for anything less than the most dedicated individuals. Without having first-hand knowledge of the site, I can only speculate on how saboteurs could have entered the area, sabotaged the tracks, then exited.

Air Assets

If there is a complete lack of tire tracks entering the area after a systematic circumferential search of the crime scene, accomplished at a distance far enough away to preclude contamination by rescuers, then it would appear that air assets might have been used. Two modes of insertion become apparent: helicopter and parachute.

1. The most likely insertion and extraction mode would be by helicopter. The same aircraft could fly in at low level, after dark, from the south, and by following the canyon indicated on the aviation sectional map, fly north from Painted Rock Dam until intersecting the railroad tracks or trestle. It would be a simple matter to drop a few people off, exit the area, then return later to pick them up.

A. A second method of egress would be for such individuals to hide nearby, watch the train derailment, then enter the scene when rescuers arrived. They could then blend in to the mass of traffic and be extracted with victims or rescuers.

2. The second most likely method of ingress would be by parachute, probably HALO (High Altitude Low Opening) method. Please do not rule this out, as there is some basis for this observation:

A. Radar track records show a target (aircraft) "squawking" 1200 (Visual Flight Rules, VFR) on its radar transponder at 1940 hrs (7:40 p.m.) on the night of the derailment, flying east to west at an altitude of approximately 8500 feet. This radar track was recorded by FAA air traffic control assets. This target passed 1 mile south of the wreck site, which put it over the relatively flat open area of the canyon north of the horseshoe bend of the Gila River wash. It would be a simple matter to drop HALO sky divers to this DZ (ground level at site approximately 2100 feet MSL), wherein they could hide their chutes and walk north to the trestle site. They could then be extracted later by one of the above described means.

Items to Note:

1. Organized training for HALO night drops by paramilitary teams have reportedly been conducted in the desert for the past two years in a semi-remote location 1.5 hour's flying time from the wreck site. According to sources, these drops have occurred on an almost nightly basis near an airport located approximately 108 nautical miles east-south-east from the wreck site. The individuals are parachutists who jump from twin-engine cargo airplanes. They jump at dusk or after dark utilizing square steerable parachutes that are black in color. According to some of your local sources and newspaper reporters, some of these individuals have been encountered by hikers in the mountains northeast of Phoenix conducting "military exercises."

2. This same organization also has access to numerous helicopters of various sizes and configurations.

Synopsis

There may be no connection between the above organization and the Amtrak incident, however if ground infiltration and egress is ruled out, and air assets are considered a possibility, then the above information may be of value.

Additional Lead

There is a DEA "Aerostat" tethered radar balloon located near Yuma that has the capability of "look down" observation for low- level aircraft. Your office can request a check of the radar photo records to see if any high or low level aircraft (such as helicopters flying at low level) are depicted in the area in a 24-hour time frame prior to the incident. A request would probably be best served if the time frame was narrowed to approximately the time of darkness to the time of the derailment. Of particular interest would be the radar track to determine point of origination and/or termination of flight. If the flight was picked up near a closed former military auxiliary strip, such as Luke 11 which is just south of the site, further investigation of radar records would be required to determine where a target arriving at that location would have originated.

If anyone from your office would like to visit further on this, I can be contacted at my office number.

The next day Jack called. I could tell the satisfaction in his voice as he said "Bingo!"

"What do you have?" I asked.

"I talked to a master sergeant at Yuma. He said his people would be more than happy to help out with the Aerostat radar search. Seems they get bored and this would give them something interesting to do. Said he'd get back to me as soon as he could."

"Great! If they come up with a low target going into the site from the south, say at 80 or so knots, then I have my helicopter. So with your high level target that came out of Albuquerque..."

"Dumbo."

"What?"

"That's what we'll call the airplane. I love code words."

"Yeah, well, all we need now is 'hummingbird' and we'll have this thing nailed. The biggest question, though, is who are these guys?"

"Maybe Yuma can tell us that if we can follow a radar target back to its base."

"Check."

The next call from Maricopa County was from the lieutenant in charge of the investigation for the Sheriff's Department (Jack codenamed him "Ringmaster"). I gave him a brief oral resume of my background, a short rundown on my experiences investigating the Oklahoma City bombing, and cut to his case.

"So, how's the FBI treating you guys, Lieutenant?"

"Let me put it this way. They are chasing ghosts out here and pissing a lot of people off, and as far as they're concerned, we're just baggage. The Sheriff told me that we have a homicide involved that is our jurisdiction, and that we are going to work this thing until we either make a bust or run out of leads. It doesn't matter what the feds do, we're going to work this case our way, with or without them."

I was always gratified to find other law enforcement officers at the local level who searched for the truth no matter what politics were involved at the national level. We chatted for a few moments then I broke a question I was dying to ask.

"Any chance on seeing a copy of the Sons of Gestapo note?"

"Sure. We've got a copy and I can fax it to you. It doesn't really say much of anything, though."

"No matter. I just want to eyeball it and see if anything stands out that might be of interest."

"Sure. No problem. Here it comes..."

Five minutes later I was reading a copy of the only piece of physical evidence found at the scene (verbatim from original version, including errors):

> ### Indictment of the ATF and the FBI
> Before dawn the women awoke to say their morning prayers. The women slept upstairs. They lit their kerosene lamps because the electricity had been turned off by the FBI. After observing lights in all the upstairs windows, the FBI ordered the teargas bombardment. Afterwards only two upstairs windows were lit. The location of each was recorded. Over the next few hours, ventilation holes were poked into the walls. These holes made the fire burn very much faster. Otherwise the fire department would have had time to put out the fire before the women and children died in the flames. At noon the light from the two kerosene lamps was obscured by bright sunlight. Everyone had forgotten about them except the man who carried their locations written on a scrap of paper in his pocket. He ordered the tank drivers where to crash through. Guess under which two windows. He ordered them to raise their guns. As they backed out, the guns were lowered. The video tape shows clearly the floor being raised by the tank a foot and a half. Guess what happened to the kerosene lamps in the rooms above the tanks. A minute afterwards black smoke started to pour out of the windows where the lamps had burned. This is the normal time needed for a kerosene fire to build up.

> Sons of the Gestapo
> SOG

To me, the note seemed to contradict itself in several areas. I especially noted that there was no explanation of the reason behind the derailment. I also noted that in the last paragraph the writer condemns Nazi Germany and Gestapo tactics, then signs the note: "Sons of the Gestapo." I also saw for the first time that there was the word "the."

But what I saw that really raised my eyebrows were the letters "SOG."

Maybe it was nothing. But as an old Southeast Asia hand, I remember that one of the terms used by Phoenix Program assassins working under MACV-SOG (Military Advisory Command, Studies and Observations Group) was a twisted bar-room version of the last acronym. "Yeah," a drunk trooper would mention. "I'm SOG...a son of the Gestapo."

Was this some type of message being sent to others who would know the meaning? Or was it just a coincidence? Without an arrest or more clues, we would never know.

I typed up a memo regarding my analysis of the SOG note and faxed it to the lieutenant:

Maricopa Co. S.O.
Homicide Division
REF: Amtrak case

Lt. ["Ringmaster"]

Good to talk to you yesterday. I have a large packet of information on the topics we discussed that I will drop in the mail in the morning.

I received the SOG note and have been giving it some study. Considering my research into the various political groups and the mentalities of the various factions we discussed, I have a few observations that may prove useful in your investigation.

1. Was this note given to you by the FBI, and did you have a chance to see the actual original note to make sure they are identical?

2. Is it possible that someone could take the original note, retype it in a computer, and issue the retyped version to you or the media?

I ask these two questions because I wonder why, since they are computer generated notes, the FBI confiscated the suspect's typewriters? Were there other notes sent to the railroad that we do not know about? Also, I can't help but wonder why all the press releases referenced "Sons of Gestapo" on Day One, and the note that we have here says "Sons of the Gestapo." Note the word "the" added.

3. I can't help but note the acronym "SOG" with a line over it, not under it. Is there some significance to this?

4. Regarding the note itself, it appears to be a feeble attempt to hook this thing up with the right wing extremist groups, especially the militias (without specifically naming them). This might be because by the time the wreck occurred, the militias had already fought their public relations battle in the media and Washington to the point where anyone behind this was hesitant to point a direct finger at them for fear of raising the public's eyebrows.

5. It could be that there is absolutely no connection to any right wing political or paramilitary group. The reason is that there is no one on the conservative side that wants bigger government, and especially a super-watchdog or superior federal law enforcement bureau or administration as the note demands.

6. I also find suspect the fact that the writer(s) state "The Gestapo Accounts to no one. This is not Nazi Germany" then goes on to call themselves "Sons of the Gestapo." What in the world is that supposed to mean? I think it's all smoke and mirrors. It appears to me that the whole thing is an attempted diversion away from the real perpetrators.

7. Whoever did the derailment was very dedicated to doing it in that particular spot, as there are so many more accessible locations that would serve the purpose, except for the bridge over the dry wash. Still, they would have to have a topographical map, a railroad map, or an aerial map to see that the tracks made those turns and hit the bridge at that point. The S-turn and bridge area are not visible from any road and would not be known by the average person.

Let's examine the last paragraph and try to get inside this guy's head:

"Who is policing the ATF, FBI, state troopers, county sheriffs and local police?"

This statement is basically "who watches the watchers, and who guards the guardians?" It lumps federal and local law enforcement together in the same boat, which the militias and right wingers do not do. They simply suspect the federal guys, and sometimes distrust the local sheriffs if they feel they are corrupt politicians.

"What federal law enforcement agency investigates each and every choke hold killing committed by a police officer?"

No one on the right wing wants a federal bureau to interfere in local affairs. They do not trust the FBI, nor the federal courts, to be oversight committees.

"each [sic] and every beating of a drunk whether or not a passerby videotapes it?"

Note the non-capitalized "each." Also, this statement obviously refers to the Rodney King affair.

"each and every shooting of a police officer's wife who knows too much about drug kickbacks?"

This might refer to the Arkansas State Trooper's wife who "committed suicide" because she knew too much about the drug smuggling in Arkansas during the Clinton governorship. But now we have a guy who damns and accuses law enforcement, then wants to stick up for us?

"each and every killing at Ruby Ridge?"

This reference, plus the first "Waco" paragraph, are definite finger pointing to groups on the Right (or anyone who questions government).

"The Gestapo accounts to no one. This is not Nazi Germany. All these people had rights. It is time for an independent federal agency to police the law enforcement agencies and other government employees."

Again, no one on the Right would have suggested such a thing. They would have demanded "states rights" and "10th Amendment restrictions on 'federal gestapo agencies.'" They definitely would not have demanded a new or superior federal agency to be an oversight or watch dog outfit.

A last thought: The heading is "Indictment of the ATF and the FBI." What does the railroad, or Amtrak, have to do with the ATF or FBI, or Waco or Ruby Ridge?

This was what I would call a "publicity hit." It was done for media effect, not for revenge or to make a political statement. That's why I can't help but wonder Cui Bono, Who Benefits? I keep coming up with the anti-terrorist bill in Congress.

I would suggest that you do not make the same mistake that the Dallas Homicide Bureau made in November, 1963. I would work this case as a local homicide case and keep the investigation separate from the FBI. The FBI in '63 was more concerned with political damage control than they were with catching the bad guys.

Let me know if there's anything else I can do between now and January when I come out to pick up our new helicopter. Jack will be flying in as well and we can go over what we have at that time.

The investigation dragged on through December with little headway. By then the FBI had raided a suspect's house in California and confiscated his typewriter and some large railroad tools. He allegedly fit the profile of "disgruntled railroad employee." Eventually they let him go and returned to Arizona.

On the same day the California suspect's house was searched I received a fax from a contact that contained an extract the FBI Behavioral Science Unit's psychological report on the "Actor" responsible for the derailment. According to my source, the unit analyzed the "Sons of the Gestapo" note and discounted the "right wing" theory. They then began concentrating on the disgruntled employee theory, which accounted for the raid on the California house. They also had been working on the "local yokel" theory, and that such a person or persons may have intended to "loot the train."

My source wrote: "Another possibility (which brings us back to the Right Winger) may be an attempt to embarrass the FBI so as to allude to their incompetence by not solving this case or possibly suggest the FBI (Feds in general) need to be strengthened to 'prevent' such occurrences in the future, back to "Anti-Terrorist Bill." Cui Bono?

The FBI analysis of the note mentioned that the "possible actor had a working blue collar knowledge, not just familiarity with railroads. Had specific knowledge of the area of the derailment, had a lot of anger directed against the railroad," then went on to ask: "Disgruntled employee/former employee? Local resident affected by the rail road? Railroad customer?"

The end paragraph of the analysis is most telling. In it the writer states that "[It] Appears the note that was left may have been left to distract the investigators away from the actor, as the actor feels that the crime scene would point to him quickly."

In the interim, Jack and I had been eagerly waiting for a response from the Aerostat radar unit in Arizona. Finally, Jack called and reached the master sergeant whom he had first made contact with and was so eager to help.

"Sorry," he said. "We can't help you out."

"What? Why?" asked Jack.

"The plug's been pulled."

"What does that mean?"

The sergeant sounded very uncomfortable when he replied "We really wanted to check this out, but all I can say is the balloons were down that night."

"Why?" asked Jack.

"Maintenance."

"All of them?" asked Jack, incredulously.

"Yes, sir." The sergeant sounded very nervous.

"Why?"

"All I can tell you is that they were ordered down for maintenance. It came from above my pay grade."

That ended it. There would be no cooperation from DEA or the Air Force. We couldn't help but wonder who "above the sergeant's pay grade" had ordered the only radar assets available in the region "down for maintenance." We reasoned the order had to come from Washington. But why would Washington be concerned with routine maintenance, and why all the balloons? It was obvious to us that the balloons had been up and they were ordered not to release the radar information, or someone did not want any "look down" capabilities available that night. No right wing bunch of Gestapo/militia types had the capabilities of pulling that off. It was obvious that this investigation was, like Oklahoma City, being steered away from the truth.

Jack and I decided to get together and compare notes. Both he and I were scheduled to be in Phoenix in January and planned on meeting with some of the Maricopa County investigators. We saw little more that we could do to help out, other than make them aware of the possibilities of where this investigation could go and why we felt there was a higher agenda involved. Beyond that it would be in their hands.

To protect those involved in the investigation who met with us in Phoenix, I can only provide the reader with this: the meeting lasted almost three hours, wherein we went over maps, reports, and the various plausible scenarios regarding the aerial aspects of the case. The Maricopa County element was very receptive, though somewhat skeptical about the possibility of shady commandos parachuting in to sabotage the tracks. We wargamed each scenario, but kept arriving back to the same elements that we could not ignore: the radar track of the unidentified airplane, the time frame it occurred, the fact that all of the radar balloons were mysteriously down that night with an inadequate explanation from the military, the lack of ingress and egress tracks to the site overland, and the evident non-existence of any group before or since who called themselves "Sons of the Gestapo."

There was one other odd element. One of the Maricopa sources advised us that they were chasing down a "rumor" that two campers had reported seeing men in parachutes dropping into the vicinity that night!

At the same time our unofficial meeting occurred, the FBI was busy in the local communities that bordered the wilderness area. According to the Arizona Republic, residents of the vicinity "complained that the FBI is harassing them. But Callahan [FBI] said a majority of those questioned have willingly cooperated. 'I understand that there are some desert rats out there who naturally don't like authority...But we have to follow up.'" Interestingly, the FBI asked the local residents questions about knowledge of any local militia unit. One local replied, "Buddy, you can't get three people out here to get together on what kind of pickup to drive, and you think we're going to form a militia?"

The article mentioned "Of new interest to authorities is the note's reference to an unnamed police officer's wife who was shot because she knew 'too much' about drug-related activities...Officials have failed to connect the reference to an actual law enforcement incident." I couldn't help but wonder if this "incident" was that concerning an Arkansas police officer who was "suicided" on June 12, 1994 in Arkansas. On that date, the body of an Arkansas officer, Bill Shelton, was found dead on his girl friend's grave with a bullet behind his right ear. His girlfriend, Kathy Ferguson, was the former wife of an Arkansas state trooper who was being sued along with President Clinton in the Paula Jones sexual harassment lawsuit. Ferguson had been killed exactly a month earlier, on May 12th, and her death was being investigated as a suicide. Cause of death was a gunshot wound to the right temple. According to The Economist, Ferguson had been collaborating with Ms. Jones and "may have been aware of details" of other activities at the time. Whether these "other activities" included Iran/Contra drug running through Mena was not mentioned. But if the motives behind her death did involve knowledge of cocaine smuggling, it would correlate with the mention in the Gestapo note about a police officer's "wife" being shot for knowing too much about drug activities.

When we left the meeting with our Maricopa contacts, one asked "what do you think we could do next? We're about out of leads."

"If there's more to this than a couple of renegade malcontents deciding to derail a train then leaving a note as a false trail, then I'd say it would be interesting to just fire a shot down range and see who sticks their head up."

"How's that?"

"You might consider leaking the word that your agency was interested in a possible connection between the activities at Marana and what happened at Hyder. You might even mention that you are following up on the idea that someone may have used air assets to attack the railroad, that you've heard rumors of helicopters and guys in parachutes, and that you plan to get together with the Pinal County folks and see about paying a visit to Marana. Then just sit back and see what happens. If you are told to stay away from Marana, or are obstructed from looking in this direction, then that should tell you something."

Whether or not this "bait" was leaked I do not know. But within a week after our visit to Phoenix, the investigation seemed to trickle to a halt and no further mention was made in the media about the event.

The last contact we had with the Maricopa County Sheriff's deputies came in the form of a telephone call from one of our contacts soon after the meeting. "You know the five types of terrorist targets you listed?"

"Yes."

"Well," he said in a very concerned tone, "We've got the Super Bowl coming up in a few days. That would sure fit your 'large gathering of people' scenario."

"Yes, it definitely would. I don't know if they, whoever 'they' are, would try something so close to the last event or not. If my theory holds water, these attacks, if they are related and part of someone's agenda, seem to be geographically spaced across the country. The World Trade Center bombing was in New York, then the Murrah Building was further west, then the Amtrak incident almost to the West Coast. I would suspect that the next incident, if there is one, would be either on the coast or in the northern Mid-West, or possibly back on the East Coast again. But it wouldn't hurt to lay on some extra security."

"We're planning on that."

"One last thing that has been bothering me that you should give some consideration to. If the perpetrators of these crimes have Middle-Eastern connections and are really professional terrorists, don't discount the possibility of a chemical or biological weapon being used. Saddam Hussein and Iran both have access to both. And if they can get them, so can Islamic terrorists. Also, and this sounds like something out of a Hollywood thriller, someone inside this country who wants to blame the Jihad-types might try the same thing. Watch the water and food supplies."

"I don't know how we'll do that, but I'll pass it along."

"One more thing to watch," I warned. "There's two types of targets left: besides a large gathering of people you have mass transportation, air. They just might try for an airliner next."

Six months later, on a major Iraqi holiday, TWA 800 fell from the sky in a massive fireball into the Atlantic ocean.

And then there was one.

Chapter 34

Behold a Pale Horse

A few days after the TWA 800 tragedy, a small pipe bomb detonated at the Summer Olympic games in Atlanta. Following the tried-and-true law enforcement axioms regarding arsons and bombings, the FBI and BATF began looking for the "face in the crowd that enjoys the action the most" and "the 'hero' who helps out the most during and after the event." Within two days the FBI attention focused on a lone security guard as the possible perpetrator. This particular individual was the person who "found" the backpack containing the pipe bomb, then issued the initial warning to the crowd. After questioning him and searching his apartment and conducting follow-up surveillance, adequate proof of his involvement was not obtained. As of this writing the investigation continues.

Whether a small pipe bomb could qualify as the terrorist attack on the fifth category target, "a large gathering of people," is doubtful. Though the Olympics would have made a prime target for this category, the massive amount of security involved may have precluded such a strike.

What few people realize is the fact that those agencies responsible for security were concerned with more than a repeat of the hostage situation exhibited by Black September (El Fatah) in the Munich Olympics or the threat of a bombing. One of the prime threats that security forces were concerned with involved the possibility of an attack by either chemical or biological agents. Military units that specialize in chemical and biological weapons detection and neutralization had been deployed to Atlanta in advance and were constantly on standby. Precautions were obviously taken by monitoring teams, which may have precluded any such attack. Still, the threat was real and precautionary actions were taken.

Indeed, the possibility of a large scale biological or chemical attack on the American population is more probable now than in any time in our history. Because of events in the Middle East, the American population could feasibly be the next target of such madmen as Saddam Hussein, Moammar Khadaffi, or radical Iranian fundamentalists who consider the United States as the "Great Satan."

During the Gulf War, Allied forces nearly annihilated the Iraqi war machine. Thousands of Iraqis were killed by coalition forces not only in Kuwait, but in Iraq itself. Saddam Hussein did not hesitate to use these attacks and their resultant damage to his political advantage. Massive propaganda was generated and broadcast throughout the region vividly showing the aftermath of Allied bombings in Baghdad and other areas, and whenever possible it attempted to convince the populations of neighboring Islamic countries that the Allied targets were buildings inhabited by civilians, especially women, children and babies. In one infamous circumstance, an Iraqi chemical weapons facility was exhibited as actually being a "baby milk factory."

The fact that Hussein had used nerve gas on entire villages of Iraqi Kurds, or on thousands of Iranian troops during the border war with Iran, had little bearing on the anti-American mindset of the Arab population of the region. Nor was the fact that Iraq had built numerous sites where massive quantities of chemical and biological weapons were being created and stored a relevant factor in the propaganda issuing from Baghdad. The point that Hussein was attempting to make was that the Americans were evil and cruel, and had little or no regard for life. These graphic images of "attacks on the innocent civilian population" were reinforced by video footage of burned vehicles and bodies throughout Kuwait, including those of hundreds of vehicles and troops burned and stacked up on the highway west of Kuwait City during the Iraqi retreat.

Instead of pursuing the attack against Iraq by taking Baghdad and unseating the corrupt and sadistic Saddam Hussein, the coalition forces stopped short of what should have been an actual and legitimate military objective and allowed Hussein to remain in power. The excuses made by the senior commanders and politicians at the time were that the U.N. "mandate" only addressed ejecting Hussein's troops from Kuwait, and that if Hussein was removed from power, a "power vacuum" would exist in the Middle East which would be worse than leaving him in power.

Both of these excuses are weak at best. First, 90% of "U.N." forces in the conflict were American, and had the U.S. government pressed the issue, a thrust to Baghdad to unseat a corrupt and dictatorial government that based its power on intimidation, torture, assassination and other violations of human rights, and who threatened the stability of every surrounding country, would have been approved. Second, the Iraqi government was stockpiling tons of chemical and biological weapons, building long range delivery systems, financing and controlling huge terrorist organizations, and was on the verge of completing development of nuclear weapons. These activities alone threatened the stability of not only the Middle East, but the entire world. Third, taking Baghdad and eliminating the Hussein regime would not have created the so-called "power vacuum" that the politicians used as an excuse to not finish the war in a military manner. The U.S. Army and other coalition forces, such as Britain and France, all have units known as Civil Affairs battalions or their equivalent. The specialty of these units is to follow closely behind the combat forces and establish and stabilize governments and government services for the civilian population was quickly as possible after an area has been secured. As an example, during World War II these civil affairs units, working with attached engineer units, set up new governments and reestablished such things as food and water distribution, electrical power, sanitation, mail, and other needful services in virtually every city and town that was liberated. Saying that the elimination of the Hussein government would create a power vacuum is tantamount to saying the elimination of Hitler would have done the same thing. Had the U.S./U.N. taken Baghdad and ousted the Tyrant from Tikrit, many of the terrorist organizations and capabilities that exist now would never have been born.

Today, the U.S. is faced with the infiltration of terrorist cells from virtually every hostile fundamentalist Islamic country in existence. Reports indicate that over a hundred cells exist that have ties to, or are a subcell of, the Hamas, Hizbollah, PLO, Islamic Jihad, Egyptian Jihad and others. And for all intents and purposes, the most capable and threatening of the lot are those staffed with former and current Iraqi soldiers. For it is Iraq that has repeatedly threatened to kill more Americans than the number of Iraqis lost during the Gulf War.

The question now is this: does the capability exist for such an event to occur? According to several knowledgeable sources, it not only exists, a plan is in motion. In the scenario that follows, the "large gathering of people" that would more than qualify as the fifth category target could entail every living person in the United States.

During the week of October 10th, 1996, a microbiologist knowledgeable in the Iraqi intent and capabilities went public on shortwave radio and AM radio talk shows with the allegation that he had acquired information concerning a possible Iraqi plan to distribute massive quantities of deadly disease microorganisms across the U.S. His name was Larry Harris, and he introduced himself as a former CIA microbiological lab technician. According to his story, he received a very personal warning from a female Iraqi terrorist cell member shortly after the bombing of the World Trade Center.

Another event added credibility to what he was saying. Approximately two months before he went public, the military decided to inoculate all American service personnel against Anthrax, a disease normally found in sheep and goats and not considered a threat under normal circumstances. Only two times in recent history has the American military shown concern over Anthrax: World War II and the Gulf War. In World War II, it was General Ishii's experiments with Anthrax, Botulin and Plague that frightened the military hierarchy, and in the Gulf War it was the knowledge of Iraqi experiments with these same bioweapons that initiated the defensive measures for our troops. But why would the Pentagon decide it was necessary in 1996?

By the 18th of October, I had received numerous telephone calls from various individuals asking if I had heard of an impending "attack" by Iraqi terrorists utilizing disease organisms, specifically Anthrax and Plague. Realizing that such an event would fit the fifth and final category of land-based terrorist targets, I began to investigate the rumors. I could not discount them out of hand by simply considering that if there was anything to them, the government would be doing something about it and the media would carry the stories, because I knew by this time that the "government" could not be trusted to be honest with the American people, and the mainstream media was controlled by powers who have their own agendas.

After making enquiries, I received a portion of a long document written by Mr. Harris. In it, he describes his encounter with the Iraqi female, Mariam Arif, and relates her story regarding Iraqi intentions to employ biological weapons against unsuspecting American citizens. This, coupled with other bits and pieces of information and rumors that were circulating, instigated me to write an "executive summary" type report for submission to key personnel in various agencies that would be effective in investigating the accuracy of the data and replying with some type of action to counter the threat, if such a threat actually existed.

The following is my memo:

MEMORANDUM FOR RECORD

To: [Agency's name]
From: Craig Roberts, Tulsa PD (Ret.)
Notes re: Biological Weapons Threat (Anthrax, Plague, and Botulin)
Date: 22 Oct 96
Ref: Iraqi Terrorism and Terrorist Cells in U.S.

SYNOPSIS

1. We have received information that there is a distinct possibility that a planned terrorist attack involving biological warfare agents may occur inside the U.S. The information has come from various sources, but most specifically appears to have originated from a microbiologist named Larry Carrol Harris whose resume includes duty with the CIA Biowar section at Aberdeen Proving Grounds (1969-72), A CIA Biowar lab in Coshocton, Ohio (1985-91), and now is employed as a Epidemiologist and Microbiologist. (See end of report for contact numbers)

2. In February 1993, Mr. Harris interviewed a female Iraqi bio/med student named Mariam Arif at Ohio State University. Arif was a relative of a former president of Iraq, General Arif, who was killed in a helicopter crash in 1966. Ms. Arif told Mr. Harris that Iraq was planning a large scale terrorist operation against the U.S. population inside CONUS utilizing biological warfare weapons. She explained that these weapons would consist of Anthrax and Bubonic Plague. [NOTE: The Iraqis are also reported to possess other bio weapons which include Pneumonic Plague and Hemorrhagic Fever].

4. Arif explained that there are at least a hundred "cells" of Iraqi terrorists inside the country, and that each consists often men and one woman (who serves as a "carrier"). She stated that since the Gulf War, Iraqi females have been smuggling various cultures of Anthrax and Plague into this country by secreting sealed vials in their vaginas. Each vial, upon delivery, is used as a base culture to manufacture large quantities of the end product.

5. NOTE: Other confirmed sources have reported a minimum of 28 Hamas and/or Hizbollah cells operating inside the U.S., and that they coordinate with both the PLO and the Egyptian Jihad (who was involved in the World Trade Center bombing). We also discovered that over 5,000 former Iraqi soldiers, who were captured during our advance into Kuwait, were resettled in the U.S. in various cities. Many of these ex-POWs are "former" members of the Republican Guard Division who participated in the demolition of the Kuwaiti oil fields. Specifically, many are/were members of the Hammurabi Division--one of the most blood thirsty units Saddam Hussein has. Further, there is a definite link between Pakistan terrorist activities and those that have occurred in the U.S.

After the Afghan war, the Mujihadeen training camps used by the CIA to train the Afghans were turned over to the Pakistani ISI (Internal Security Service--secret police). The ISI turned the 100-plus camps into Islamic terrorist training camps specifically to train and export Islamic terrorists to non-Islamic countries for the world-wide Jihad. U.S. military intelligence sources estimate they produce 3,700 trained terrorists at one time. The information I have read does not reflect duration of the training cycles, whether one month, six months, or somewhere in between. However, it is known that some of the countries that have been targeted for infiltration for terrorist operations include the U.S., the Philippines, Saudi Arabia (anti-US and anti-monarchy operations), Israel, Jordan and Egypt. What must be understood is that Pakistan (which has the world's fifth largest army, the U.S. is now seventh) trains guerrilla/terrorist personnel for both Iran and Iraq whether they are Shiite or Sunni Moslem. Many of the instructors are Pakistani Baluch, which have no preference between the two sects. [World Trade Center bomber Ramzi Yousef, AKA Abdel Basit Mahmoud Abdul Karim, is a Baluch Pakistani who worked for and was funded by Iraq].

6. According to Harris, immediately after the World Trade Center bombing Mariam Arif considered her arrest imminent. As a friend, she confided in Harris that something terrible was in the works and that he needed to take precautions to protect himself. She stated that she had personally worked in a germ warfare laboratory in Iraq, and they had taken mycoplasma fermentans (incognitus) and genetically manipulated a relatively benign mycoplasma to be much more invasive and pathogenic and capable of attacking many organ and tissue systems in the body. She also stated that they also had isolated and used a form of Ebola Zaire virus that took over 3-7 years to prove fatal (which she claims was used on the Gulf War veterans).

7. Arif said that "when the time comes Iraq would demand at least one American life for every Iraqi killed during the Gulf War." She explained exactly how the cultures of Anthrax, Plague and Botulin were being brought into the country, and how they were being cultured and produced into an effective bioweapon in various "safe house" laboratories across the nation.

8. Arif explained that many of the Iraqis that have come into the country are pilots, and their mission is to locate for later rental, or steal light aircraft, such as Cessna 152s, which could be used to aerial spray population centers with biological agents. She stated that the targets would be "many hundreds simultaneously across the country. The prime targets would be large metropolitan centers. The subway systems would make a good selective target; who would notice another maintenance man down there spraying for bugs?" Other inviting targets would be the air ducts of large office buildings, or a large gathering of people like at a stadium." [Author's emphasis] She said that they also had ordered external aircraft venturis which are designed to be mounted on the side of airplanes to provide suction for the vacuum instruments, which they have modified to extract the bioweapon product from stainless steel tanks (such as pump-up pest sprayers), for aerial application over cities. [This could explain the "test" flights we've had in the early morning hours over various U.S. cities by low-flying, blacked out unknown aircraft who have been reported flying "grid" patterns between 0200-0400 hrs., some spraying chemicals that to witnesses taste and smell like "insecticides."].

9. Arif also said a plan existed to mount spray apparatus under cars, fed from pressure tanks, which could drive down freeways and deliver the mist from a venturi by simply opening a valve.

10. She stated that Plague and Anthrax are the "bacterias of choice" because they are easy to manufacture and have an extremely high kill ratio. Medical records show that both Bubonic Plague and Anthrax, once in the human population, are approximately 95% fatal in all cases. Prophylactic measures can be taken in advance to preclude infection in the individual provided enough antibiotic compounds are available for mass distribution over a sustained period of time (in excess of 30 days which would include distribution at least 16 hours before the attack to up to thirty days after the attack).

11. Harris, after research, also wrote that four microorganisms would be the most likely candidates for use in a biological attack by a terrorist organization or nation. They are, in order of preference: Yersinia Pestis (plague), Bacillus Anthracis (anthrax), Vibrio Cholera (cholera), and Salmonella Typhi (typhoid fever). Countermeasures include Panmycin, Tetracycline, Terramycin, Tetramycin, and Penicillin.

12. Iraqi Motivation Indicators: In 1994, Saddam Hussein, through the state press, indicated that his remaining unconventional warfare weapons (biological) would be used when Iraqi patience wore thin regarding economic sanctions. On September 29, 1994, the government newspaper Babil, warned: "Does the United States realize the meaning of every Iraqi becoming a missile that can cross to countries and cities?"

Other quotes that followed over a period of time:

"When peoples reach the verge of collective death, they will be able to spread death to all."

"When one realizes that death is one's inexorable fate, there remains nothing to deter one from taking the most risky steps to influence the course of events."

"We seek to tell the United States and its agents that the Iraqi patience has run out and that the perpetration of the crime of annihilating the Iraqis will trigger crises whose nature and consequence are known only to God."

13. ITEM: The U.N. Special Commission (UNSCOM) assured the United Nations that the Iraqi chemical and nuclear weapons manufacturing facilities were accounted for and destroyed. But they admit that the biological weapons manufacturing facilities could not be found and no evidence of their destruction exists.

14. ITEM: According to General Wafiq Samarrai, former head of Iraqi military intelligence, "Tell the allies that they have to destroy Iraq's biological agents before Saddam can use them...Iraq could attack its neighbors by missile, or America through terrorism." Samarrai said that the U.S. might retaliate through nuclear weapons, but by then "the disaster would already have happened."

15. ITEM: The military is now, for the first time since WWII, decided to inoculate U.S. service personnel against anthrax, both overseas and in CONUS.

16. ITEM: We have received unconfirmed information that an Iraqi/Hamas cell may exist in [blacked out], and that such a cell is linked with a cell in the [blacked out] area, which in turn reports to a major cell in Dallas. [blacked out] also has had a large number of Middle-eastern students taking flight training at [blacked out], and the city has experienced nighttime low-level aircraft "grid pattern" flights by aircraft displaying no navigational lights.

This report, plus other documentation that I could gather, was passed on to people I trusted in various government agencies. Most of these people would, like a bomb threat, take the matter very seriously until it could be proved or disproved. The ball was now in their court.

The question then became: if there indeed existed such a threat, what would the Washington level bureaucrats and politicians do about it? The choices they would have would be thus:

1. Ignore the threat and hope it goes away;
2. Diffuse the threat through negotiations with Hussein and lift the embargo;
3. Clandestinely neutralize the threat by locating and arresting or eliminating the "cells" of suspected or known terrorists;
4. Handle the threat by taking public health precautions in advance;
5. Take all necessary precautions and make everyone aware of the threat by use of the media;
6. Say nothing, then deal with the aftermath with disinformation and coverup, using scenarios that provide for later political advantage by blame shifting and spin doctoring. In this scenario a "national emergency" could be declared which could result in the need for "foreign assistance" by foreign troops and medical personnel. This scenario would fill the "UN Takeover" nightmare feared by various politically aware anti-globalist organizations.[225]

As of this writing the situation is still unfolding. The final result will depend upon how the government decides to deal with it should this threat actually exist. The problem now, considering the cases of criminal coverup by government entities presented to the reader in this book as "case files" from what I have dubbed The Medusa File (after the many-headed evil Gorgon of Greek Mythology), is whether or not this issue, or a future one like it, will also be covered up or ignored until it is too late.

The bottom line is this: when we weigh the evidence, using only the samples exhibited in this book, what we have is this:

By the patterns established, it is not beyond certain bureaucratic and political entities in Washington, who infest government offices like cancerous tissue, to use past experiences and the knowledge base gained by those who have gone before to conceal or cover up the truth, and use unfortunate incidents to their personal advantage. In this book, I have endeavored to present a credible set of case files that show how far a government that is no longer controlled by, or answerable to the people can and will go to cover its own political backside, or worse, force the American people to become subject of the Hegelian effect by using fear tactics to achieve a purpose. In the cases presented we have seen people in power violate the trust of the nation by:

A. Breaking their moral contract with our fighting forces and our individual soldiers, sailors, Marines and airmen by abandoning them in foreign lands as prisoners of wars that no longer exist;

B. Use innocent civilian men, women and children, along with unsuspecting servicemen as human guinea pigs in secret, despicable experiments that range from drug experimentation, to mind control, to nuclear aftereffects;

C. Use children in government-controlled international pedophilia rings to gain favors of pedophilic politicians and bureaucrats, both at home and abroad, or in some cases as a means to blackmail or extort high officials;

D. Recruit, hide, and smuggle into the U.S. known war criminals from both Japan and Germany for use by the military in the "arms race," with little regard for what they have done to this nation or our soldiers in the past;

E. Cover up the events, then lie to the American people and our own armed forces about the personal effects of Agent Orange, experiments at Fort Detrick and Edgewood Arsenal, nerve gas and biological weapons releases in Iraq, and the recognition of the causes and effects of the Gulf War diseases;

F. Participate in international drug smuggling and money laundering involving heroin and cocaine in the most massive operation in history, beginning with OSS operations in World War II and carrying through the war in Southeast Asia, the Iran/Contra affair, all the way to our present situation with the White House stopping all drug interdiction and refusing to close off our borders;

G. Lying about or covering up the true circumstances behind the World Trade Center bombing, the Oklahoma City bombing, the bombing of Pan Am 103, the Gander Newfoundland crash of Arrow Air, the derailment of Amtrak in Arizona, the downing of TWA 800, and using these tragedies to pass, then reinforce an Orwellian silver bullet known as the "anti-Terrorism Law" that basically shreds the Constitution and shoves us into the so-called New World Order of the 21st Century, the exact objective of the global-socialist elitists.

Is this the world and the government we will pass on to our children and our children's children? Our shall we educate ourselves and our progeny to be able to understand the basic facts of mankind, that there are only two entities in the world, good and evil, and that we must choose the correct side? Will we eventually learn and pass on to others the fact that each and every person is accountable to not only themselves and the rest of mankind for their actions, but to God himself? And finally, is it too late for this country to make government, and the individuals within the government, accountable for their actions?

These are the questions each and every American must ask themselves at this moment.

Before it's too late.

My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge.
Hosea 4:6

About the Author

Craig Roberts is the author of over a dozen fiction and nonfiction books. A Marine combat sniper in Vietnam and U.S. Army Lieutenant Colonel (retired), Craig spent 27 years with the Tulsa, Oklahoma Police Department, where he served as both an officer and a helicopter pilot. He was also a member of the city's bomb squad and S.W.A.T. team. He worked as a scuba diver for the Emergency Management Agency, after his retirement. Roberts is an investigative journalist, author and lecturer, who seeks the truth beneath what history would have us believe, and the future has yet to reveal. The publisher of Consolidated Press International, he has eBook versions available for sale of the five titles Trilogus Books will be bringing to print and digital formats. Postscript

In The Medusa File I have endeavored to present to the reader a sampling of events that have been hidden from the public by a government that has shunned its responsibilities and violated its trust. Many other examples exist, however not every story can be told in one book. The object of The Medusa File is to provide the reader with a foundation of knowledge from which to build.

Knowledge is in itself power, and power is best controlled and used when it rests in the hands of the people. It is the people who must control government, not the government which would, if not kept in check, control the people.

George Washington put it well when he warned, "Government is not reason; it is not eloquence; it is force! Like fire, it is a dangerous servant and a fearful master."

"The only thing necessary for evil to triumph is for good men to do nothing."
Edmund Burke (1729-1797)

"And I saw, and behold a white horse; and he that sat on him had a bow,; and a crown was given unto him; and he went forth conquering and to conquer...And there went out another horse that was red; and power was given to him that sat thereon to take peace from the earth, and that they should kill one another; and there was given unto him a great sword...And I beheld and lo a black horse; and he that sat on him had a pair of balances in his hand. And I heard a voice in the midst of the four beasts say, A measure of wheat for a penny, and three measures of barley for a penny; and see thou hurt not the wine...And I looked, and behold a pale horse; and his name that sat on him was Death, and Hell followed with him. And power was given unto them over the fourth part of the earth, to kill with sword, and with hunger, and with death, and with the beasts of the earth." Rev. 6:2-8

"And the rest of the men who were not killed by the plagues yet repented not of the works of their hands, that they should not worship devils, and idols of gold, and silver, and brass, and stone and of wood; which neither can see, nor hear, nor walk; Neither repented they of their murders nor of their sorceries nor of their fornication, nor of their thefts." Rev. 9:20-21

"He that overcometh shall inherit all things; and I will be his God, and he shall be my son...He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still; and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still; and he that is holy, let him be holy still...And, behold, I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be...I am the Alpha and the Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last...Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city [of Heaven]...For without are dogs, and sorcerers, and whoremongers, and murderers, and idolaters, and whosoever loveth and maketh a lie." Rev 21:7, 11-15

17. In the Potsdam Declaration, the Allies announced publicly that they intended to prosecute Japanese war criminals and that "...stern justice shall be meted out to all war criminals, including those who have visited cruelties upon our prisoners..."

18. Warren "Pappy" Whelchel died in September 1983, just months after testifying before the congressional committee. He never received government benefits for his war-connected medical problems.

19. The V-1 flying bomb was known as the "Doodle Bug," and the "Buzz Bomb." These names were derived from the strange buzzing sound made by the pulse-jet engine. The engine fired by means of a set of shutter doors on the intake that alternately opened to let ram air into the combustion chamber, then closed to seal the chamber for ignition. This process created a burping sound as the missile flew. The stubby-winged pilotless craft carried a 1,870 pound warhead filled with Trialen, an explosive with almost twice the power of the conventional RDX types. Unlike the later V-2s, which cost over $24,000 per missile, the V-1 cost the Germans only $250.00 per copy. However the range and accuracy left a lot to be desired. Of the 8,000 V-1s that were launched at London, only half ever reached the city.

20. The V-2 was designated A-4 by the German rocket teams. The V-1 "buzzbomb" carried the German designation FZG-76.

21. The first organized project, codenamed OVERCAST, was a JCS approved project whose stated purpose was to bring German and Austrian scientists to the U.S. to aid in developing weapons that might shorten the war with Japan. It was originally limited to "those chosen, rare minds" whose skills could not be utilized in Europe. The caveat to Overcast was the fact that the scientists, once the war with Japan was concluded, would be returned to Germany.

22. The Henschel Hs-293 was the first guided missile of World War II. It's chief designer was Herbert Wagner, who became the first German scientist to be brought to the U.S. Wagner, along with his two assistants, arrived just prior to the inception of Project Paperclip.

23. Hermann Becker-Freysing was convicted at Nuremburg for force-feeding sea water to prisoners and sentenced to 20 years. Strughold's cohort, Siegfried Ruff, who had been charged with killing over 80 Dachau inmates in a low pressure chamber designed to simulate altitudes in excess of 60,000 feet, was acquitted. But of note is the fact that both of these men were on the Army Air Force payroll before their trials to write extensive reports of their experiments and findings.

24. During the same period, the British were secretly exploiting several groups of German scientists under their Operation Matchbox.

28. Like Warren Whelchel in his dealings with the Veterans Administration after his return from Mukden, Gamble found that there were no records of his service connected disability. Despite his own documentation of depressive and suicidal moods and their link to LSD, his compensation claim was denied by the VA, who cited no sign of permanent disability. Gamble also found that the Feres Doctrine, a U.S. Supreme Court ruling, states that the government is immune from civil suits by servicemen in cases "where injury arises out of...activity incident to service."

29. Author and investigator Jon Rappaport writes regarding CIA mind control experiments on children: "Children were trained as sex agents, for example, with the job of blackmailing prominent AmericansC primarily politicians, businessmen and educators. A great deal of filming was done for this purpose. Eventually, people from the inner core of the CIA program filmed each other, and some of the centers where children were used as sex agents got out of control and turned into CIA-operated sex rings...Some children were considered expendable and simply murdered." See Rappaport's book U.S. Government Mind-Control Experiments on Children.

31. Paul Bonacci has described in detail being taken to Washington for use as a sex slave for "clients" of Larry King. On several occasions, Bonacci and others were taken on White House "tours" for male prostitutes by lobbyist Craig Spence, an associate of King in the Iran/Contra money laundering affair. Spence was found dead in a Boston hotel in 1989, soon after the Franklin affair blew up in Omaha and the story was picked up by the Washington Times in a June 29th, 1989 article titled: "Homosexual Prostitution Inquiry Ensnares VIPs with Reagan, Bush".

33. Many of the bodies that were discovered after the mass "suicide" at Jonestown actually died from gunshots to the skull or back. Though it was made to look as if everyone took cyanide poisoning from a vat filled with grape drink, it is now thought that most, if not all victims were forced to drink or get shot. Also, according to the Guyana medical examiner, many victims had unexplained hypodermic puncture wounds to their necks and backs. These facts were not reported in the American press. It should be noted that the first U.S. personnel to arrive on the scene were Special Forces personnel who took control of the camp and did a "lock down" to the media. The next arrivals were from the 82nd Airborne Divison's Rapid Deployment Force, who "bagged and tagged" the remains and shipped them to Dover Air Force Base. No autopsies were done and the bodies were disposed of before any medical evidence could be obtained by relatives. During the events in Guyana, squads of 82nd Airborne troopers engaged Jones' former "security guards" in firefights in the jungle. Most, however, escaped. Some later turned up as mercenaries in Angola.

34. Chris De Nicola, a patient of New Orleans therapist, Dr. Valerie Wolf (who testified before the President's Committee on Radiation on March 15, 1995), said that her (Nicola's) CIA controller was a "Dr. Greene," a name which had been reported by other mind-control victims. According to author Jon Rappaport in an article titled "CIA Experiments with Mind Control on Children" (Perceptions, Sep/Oct 1995), Nicola testified to the Committee that "[Dr. Green] used me in radiation experiments both for the purpose of determining the effects of radiation on various parts of my body and to terrorize me as an additional trauma in mind control experiments." Nicola was eight years old at the time. Nicola continued: "The rest of the experiments took place in Tucson, Arizona, out in the desert. I was taught how to pick locks, be secretive, use my photographic memory to remember things and a technique to withhold information by repeating numbers to myself...Dr. Greene moved on to wanting me to kill dolls that looked like real children. I stabbed a doll with a spear once after being severely tortured, but the next time I refused. He used many torture techniques but as I got older I resisted more and more...[later on] I snuck into his office and found files with reports and memos addressed to CIA and military personnel. Included in these files were project, subproject, subject and experiment names, with some code numbers for radiation and mind-contrl experiments which I have submitted in my written documentation. I was caught twice and Dr. Greene tortured me ruthlessly with electric shock, drugs, spinning me on a table, putting shots in my stomach, in my back, dislocating my joints and hypnotic techniques to make me feel crazy and suicidal." [Rappaport]

35. The nerve gas experiments conducted at Auschwitz were used to determine how fast the compounds would kill Allied soldiers. The helpless victims at first died very painfully. But as the gas was perfected, it was reported that they began to die instantly. According to British intelligence, the experiments were justified--by Ambros--on the grounds that "...the inmates of the concentration camps would have been killed anyway by the Nazis, [and] the experiments had a humanitarian aspect in that the lives of countless German workers were saved."

36. Though Ambros was finally tried at Nuremberg, and found guilty of slavery and mass murder, his sentence was a mere eight years. Chief Prosecutor Josiah DuBois exclaimed that the sentence was "light enough to please a chicken thief."

37. The number of service members exposed to radiation is derived from both those that were intentionally exposed during atom and hydrogen bomb tests and those who were prisoners of Japan near Hiroshima and Nagasaki and those who later occupied the same areas.

38. In testimony to the lack of understanding and training on behalf of the troops, Harry Hall, a B-25 crewman who participated in a flight over Hiroshima to take photographs shortly after the bombing, stated: "As we neared Hiroshima, the clouds thickened and smoke swirled in through the open waist windows...The putrid, sickening smoke wafting up from the destruction below became thicker inside the plane as we dropped down to 50 feet or so above the remaining rooftops. At the time we had no idea we might be exposing ourselves to deadly radiation. Captain Piazzo [the pilot] lowered the landing gear and flaps to drop our airspeed as low as he dared, giving us photographers the best conditions possible."

41. The CIA destroyed almost all of its files on the MK/ULTRA operation in 1973. It was only when some of the files leaked to the U.S. Senate that hearings were held that exposed the significance and scope of the human drug testing conducted by the CIA.

47. Petrochemical poisoning can be ruled out since none of the firefighters that entered Kuwait to put out the oil fires have complained of any sickness, and they were there for three months. Neither have the minefield demo disposal technicians who were there for almost a year.

50. Iraqi medical student Mariam Arif told microbiologist Larry Harris that the Iraqis used a "coctail" mix of biological agents during the Gulf War that would not take effect for months and even years. She claims that this is the real "Gulf War Disease" that surfaced later in U.S. troops after they returned home.

51. Experimental vaccine inoculation programs can be a surreptitious way of introducing harmful infectious agents into an unsuspecting population. Some investigators believe that the polio vaccine programs of the 1950s by the World Health Organization in Africa may have introduced the AIDS virus (HIV) into the black population. The African green monkey is theorized as the source of AIDS virus, and the polio vaccine was manufactured using the kidney cells of the green monkey. Others think the World Health Organization's smallpox vaccine program is connected to the AIDS outbreak in Africa. One report suggested that a dormant HIV infection was awakened in the African population by the inoculation of millions of doses of smallpox vaccine by the WHO during the 1970s. This story was suppressed in the U.S. and never appeared in any major publication. It is interesting to note that the introduction of HIV into the homosexual population occurred the same year the hepatitis B vaccine experiment began in 1978 in New York City. And it was in New York City that AIDS broke out among homosexuals the following year.

52. In a letter to the newspaper, VA doctor Basil Clyman admitted that "many Gulf War personnel were exposed inadvertently or otherwise to a variety of potentially toxic agents, some of which were administered in hopes of protecting them from still worse toxicities, namely those posed by biological or chemical warfare."

53. Under pressure from activist groups, the physician was released from prison after serving eight months.

54. This follows suit for government concerns regarding both military personnel and civilians. Dozens of secret, planned bioattacks were perpetrated on American cities during the 1950s and 1960s, the most notorious being a six-day bioattack on San Francisco in which the military sprayed massive clouds of potentially harmful bacteria over the entire city.

55. Tulsa World, August 29, 1996.

56. There is one other area to be considered regarding GWS. Never in the history of the military have we had the huge number of microwave communications towers, known as "tower farms," located in such concentrated areas close to humans. Most of the soldiers who lived around these commo sites were reservists and lived in canvas tents. Most were rear echelon, such as the Indiana reservists, and were constantly bombarded with microwave radiation for six months, 24 hours a day. It is entirely possible that many of the soft tissue damage and cancers Desert Shield/Storm vets are experiencing actually were initiated by being microwaved.

77. No one has ever satisfactorily explained why brand new military equipment, purchased with tax payers money, was destroyed wholesale simply because the war was over. However, by 1950 war stocks and supplies were suddenly found sadly lacking and massive new contracts for not only new equipment were let, but multi-million dollar contracts in "research and development" for aircraft, arms and weapons systems were handed out to the various manufacturers. It is also interesting to wonder how such items as howitzers, tanks and fighter aircraft could "flood the civilian martketplace" with such surplus "consumer goods."

90. A few months after Rastvorov's report, a U.S. senator asked Assistant Secretary of State Thurston Morton about the Korean POWs. Thurston's reply was: "To the Department's knowledge there are no United States soldiers in the category of prisoners-of-war being held in the Soviet Union." This was a play on words. The Soviets did not categorize foreign POWs as "prisoners of war," especially since in Korea, the USSR was not a belligerant. Instead, they were found "guilty" of "war crimes" and sentenced accordingly. Therefore, in the Soviet mind--and the Department of State--the USSR did not hold POWs.

93. It should be mentioned at this point that during Powers' interrogation by the KGB he was asked if he had ever been stationed at Atsugi, Japan. He was also asked if he knew that U-2s flew out of Atsugi. Though Lee Harvey Oswald's name was not mentioned, Oswald had 90 days earlier "defected" to Russia and had brought with him, being an air traffic controller and radar operator, top secret knowledge concerning the U-2's operational ceiling. This altitude data was vital to the Soviets, who previously did not have information on what altitude to set their SAM proximity fuse. Powers was shot down just before the Eisenhower/Kruschev Summit Conference that was to have taken place in Switzerland to discuss nuclear disarmament and arms control. The conference, because of the shootdown, was canceled. It appears, when weighing the evidence and sequence of events, to have been effectively saboutaged. Eisenhower had given orders to cease overflights of the Soviet Union, the CIA ignored the orders. Allen Dulles was DCI (Director of Central Intelligence).

94. The CIA has never admitted that the SR-71 has flown over the Soviet Union, but Soviet MiG-25 pilot Viktor Belenko stated after his defection that he had often attempted to intercept SR-71s but could not catch them. He stated that even if he could reach their altitude, a head-on shot was impossible due to the aspect ratio, and after the Blackbird passed, he could not catch up with it. Neither could his missiles.

His head had been stuffed into the oven in his apartment and the gas had been turned on. His death was ruled suicide and he was shipped back to the U.S. and buried in a sealed lead coffin near his hometown in Montana. Other players in the 142. Simon Bolivar (1783-1830) brought revolution to Venezuela, Equador, and Peru. This statement, written in his memoirs in 1823, was in reference to his belief that he was involved in a master plan to fulfill the destiny of South America. Interestingly, this was shortly after his return from Europe where he had joined the order of FreemasonryCwhose inner circle, the Illuminati, pursued a course that they hoped would eventually lead to a one-world government, known as the New World Order, which they, and the Rothschilds, would head.

The brief, filed in the United States District Court, Southern District of Florida, (civil cases No. 86-1146-CIV-KING, and No. 87-1545-CIV-KING), is quite verbose in its historical lead-ins to the case, which occured during the Sandinista/Contra affair in Nicaragua.

147. E. Howard Hunt served on an OSS team in Asia during World War II with Paul Helliwell, Lucien Conein (Corsican Mafia contact), and Mitchell WerBell (inventor of the Sionics "sound suppressor" silencer). As with the later Laotian situation, opium was used to finance their operations.

Singlaub was also chairman of the World Anti-Communist League (WACL), an association that includes Latin American Dictators, death squad leaders, neo-fascists, and former German Nazis that had escaped prosecution in Germany. Singlaub helped Oliver North raise $1 million per month between 1984 and 1985 after Congress cut off aid to the Contras. Singlaub's specialties included unconventional warfare, psychological warfare, economic sabotage, disinformation, terrorism and assassination.

162. Further hostility toward the CIA operation appeared when a CIA manual for subversion and assassination was leaked to the press by Edgar Chamorro, a Contra leader. Chamorro, who was opposed to the more extreme ex-National Guard officers of the FDN, revealed the existence of an 89-page booklet titled Psychological Operations in Guerrilla Warfare. The techniques described in the book included assassination, kidnapping, blackmail and murder. The Reagan administration denied that the manual was provided by the CIA, however it was later learned that top White House planners were involved in the production of the bookCincluding, according to Newsweek, UN delegate Jeanne Kirkpatrick. The manual recommended "hiring professional criminals" and neutralizing carefully selected targets such as court judges and security officials. After the exposure, Chamorro was conveniently blackballed by the Agency.

164. Entire books have been written about the Illuminati, or "Illuminated Ones." The secret society is basically a small group of international bankers and financiers, many of which are reputed to be Masons, who control the world banking organizations. The history of the Illuminati can be traced back to the Crusades when the Knights Templars returned to France and Italy from the Middle East with fortunes in plundered treasure. To protect their booty, they employed the Freemasons of Europe to build large, well-fortified castles. The treasures were stored, or "banked," in vaults in the fortresses, guarded by "Banquers." The Knights Templars also developed the use of the "Cheque" to obtain funds from other members of the order while traveling. In 1307, Philip IV of France grew fearful of the Templars and sought to destroy them (hoping also to confiscate their treasures). He had them investigated by the Vatican's inquisitors, who found them guilty of heresy, witchcraft and practicing Satanism. On Friday, the 13th of October, 1307, Philip had all of the Knights Templars in FranceCsave thirteenCarrested. Those taken into custody, led by Jacques de DeMolay, were tied to stakes in Paris and burned as heretics. The remaining thirteen fled into the underground and disappeared into the order of Freemasonry where, as members, they were protected. These became the original "Illuminati." In 1776, a German lawyer named Adam Weishaupt, who was intimate with the House of Rothschild, gave the Illuminati re-birth. It has since become a very powerful and secret international organization of powerbrokers who are intent on the creation of a one world government known as "The New World Order." Because of this, there is a certain degree of commonality with what has been said to be the American counterpartCor branch of--the Illuminati, the Council on Foreign Relations.

When Ochoa was indicted for drug smuggling, the chief witness against him, Bobby Seal, was murdered by Colombian hit men who were supplied with assassination weapons by Miami-based Contras who were involved with heroin-for-guns dealings with anti-Castro exiles. Prior to his murder, Seal helped federal drug agents indict the three major kingpins in the Columbian cocaine cartel: Pablo Escobar, Jorge Ochoa, and Carlos Lehder.

172. In March of 1982, the New York Times cited documents indicating that Israel had supplied half or more of all arms reaching Teheran in the previous 18 months--sales amounting to $100 million. Israeli sources revealed later that they had sold over $100 million in arms, jet engines, spare parts for American M-48 tanks, and other equipment in 1983. By 1984, Israel shipped, by way of a broker in Sweden, hundreds of tons of TNT and other explosives to Iran by way of Argentina. In 1985, Israel sold Iran 45,000 Uzi submachineguns, howitzers, missiles and missile launchers, and other spare military parts. Over the four years of "Irangate" the deals were covered by end-user certificates provided by Ferdinand Marcos in the PhilippinesC showing that the receiver for all of the above equipment was the Philippine government, and not Iran. (The Iran-Contra Connection, pgs 174-175)

173. Shooting down unarmed aircraft was not something unusual to the Soviets. National Security Council member Kenneth deGraffenreid stated in 1983: "KAL 007 was not an aberration; it was part of a murderous pattern. Not only have the Soviets shot down many innocent foreign planes; we know they have also shot down many of their own aircraft, including civilian airliners." Both the American intelligence community and the military knew exactly what would happen to any luckless airplane that strayed within the Soviet boundaries.

174. Some sources say that the interceptors were the later version Su-21 "Flagon-G," or "Flagon-F." However most accounts state that the aircraft flown by Lt. Col Gennadiy Nikolayevich Osipovich was, in fact, the older Su-15 version which is almost identical in appearance.

175. The Sukhoi Su-15 is fitted with two afterburning Rumansky R-11F2-300 turbojet engines rated at 13,668 pounds of thrust with afterburners lit. This mode of operation consumes a considerable amount of fuel. Maximum level speed of the aircraft is Mach 2.3-2.5 (2 1/2 times the speed of sound). Its combat radiusCthe distance it can fly to, engage a target, and fly back to baseCis only 450 miles. However, from Sakhalin island, the home islands of Japan, depending on where one starts on Sakhalin, are only 100 miles away. It is reasonable to assume that only the most trustworthy pilots are allowed to man international boundary interceptors.

176. It has been theorized that the Russians were overly zealous in their activities on this night due to the fact that they were going to violate an arms agreement and test-fire an SS-25 ICBM, hence the reason for the RC-135's presence. The Russians later stated that they originally mistook the Korean 747 for an RC-135, then even after shooting it down and later determining it to be a civilian 747, still considered it to be on a spy mission for the U.S.

177. Aim Report, (Accuracy in Media), May-B 1991.

178. A later Isvestiya report put Osipovich to the right rear of the 747 at approximately five kilometers. According to the Soviet newspaper series on the incident, Osipovich reported at 1809:00, about 17 minutes prior to the missile launch, that "target is 80 [degrees] to my left," then three minutes before launch, "located 70 to the left."

179. Even if KAL 007 had seen the Su-15s, they would not have known what to do. There was no way for the Soviet fighters to communicate with the 747 on the radio because Russian military aircraft are not on the same frequency bands as either civilian or Western military aircraft.

180. Osipovich finally admitted in the Isvestiya series that he did not fire cannon rounds, though he did not mention why he said so in the first place when it was easily determined his fighter-intercepter could not carry both rockets and cannons.

181. The Ilyushin IL-76 is a transport. The TU-16 is a bomber. Neither is as large as a 747.

182. Moneron Island (Ostrov Moneron) is located approximately 50 statute miles west of the southern tip of Sakhalin Island (Ostrov Sakhalin), and approximately 100 statute miles north of the northern tip of Hokkaido in the Sea of Japan.

183. Later reports by Soviet press indicated that divers recovered pieces of the airplane two weeks after the shootdown, however no records were kept and no pictures taken to prove it. Also, American, Japanese and Korean search vessels were not allowed into the impact area by the Russians, even though it was in international waters.

195. The problem with the story of a bomb in a suitcase in Malta being sent all the way to London is two-fold. First, Denis Phipps, former head of security, British Airways, stated "There was no evidence of unaccompanied baggage on that flight [Air Malta flight 100]. [It] had to be checked in by a passenger who actually traveled on that flight." Second, an FBI TELEX sent to Washington on October 23, 1989, stated: "...there is no concrete indication that any piece of luggage was unloaded from Air Malta 100, sent through the luggage routing, was at Frankfort airport then loaded on board Pan Am 103."

A deal was reportedly struck with Al-Kassar in which he could continue to smuggle heroin into the United States if he would use his influence to assist in the release of the American hostages. It should be noted that Al-Kassar used his drug and arms smuggling underground to smuggle arms to the Contras, the secret army supported by "The Enterprise" and Lt. Col. Oliver North.

One entrepreneur was none other than Edwin Wilson, former member of Navy intelligence detailed to Teheran during the reign of the Shah, who later hooked up with Theodore Shackley and Thomas Clines, former CIA chief of station and assistant chief of station for Laos. Wilson advanced $500,000 to Clines to help set up Egyptian-American Transport Services, Inc. (EATSCO), who used insider contacts to obtain exclusive rights to ship military equipment to Egypt (and other places). Wilson eventually was found guilty of illegally supplying M-16s and other arms to Libya and was sentenced to fifty-two years in the Federal penitentiary system. Wilson's partner in EATSCO was Albert Hakim, whose name surfaced during the Congressional hearings into Iran/Contra.

Strategic Policy explained that a "newly structured Hizbollah group under the aegis of senior Iranian leaders held a summit conference in Teheran in June 1996. Hizbollah delegates from over thirty nations attended including the United States, Canada, Italy, France, Germany and Britain." A "joint working committee" of three top individuals (Imad Mughaniyah of the Lebanese Hizbollah Special Operations Command, Usama bin Ladin (a Saudi fundamentalist leader), and Ahmad Salah Salim (an Egyptian Jihad representative) was formed and began working under the chairman, Mehadi Chamran. The principle operations given the "green light" by this council were three terrorist acts that were already beyond planning stages:

1. The bombing of the U.S. barracks in Dharan, Saudi Arabia, assigned to Usama bin Ladin;
2. The fatal stabbing of a U.S. female diplomat, assigned to Ahman Salah Salim, and;
3. The downing of TWA flight 800, assigned to Imad Mughaniyah.

208. The Guardian, August 21, 1996, pgs 2-3.

209. According to Aerospace Daily of August 20th, 1996, The TWA flight was vectored to within 15 miles of the northwest end of the "hot zone" exercise box. If this is so, the AP diagram assigning Long/Lat coordinates 45 miles further northwest as the crash site is incorrect or disinformation. The article said that a Coast Guard spokesman stated that the patrol boat Adak was in the immediate area at the time, but referred the magazine to Coast Guard HQ for more information on what it was doing there. Spokesmen at CG HQ failed to return repeated phone calls to the reporter. TWA 800 was on "Betty Track," one of the two tracks used by commercial flights when areas are set aside for military use off Long Island. A Navy spokesman admitted that Warning Area W-105 was activated at the time of the incident, but refused to discuss what the purpose was. The article stated that the flight reached 13,700 feet before something "went wrong." This is a discrepancy in that the original FAA report from radar put the airplane at 10,300 feet. Some press reports of that night reported the 747 to be at 8,000 feet at the time of the explosion.

210. Of note regarding the Naval vessel aspect of this theory is an unconfirmed story that was reported to William Jasper, the editor of the New American magazine. In this story a sailor came home on leave to Norman, Oklahoma, and said that he was very upset because his ship had fired a missile which accidently knocked down the TWA flight and the whole thing was a coverup.

211. One SS agent told the author when flying air cover over a Clinton motorcade that if they flew too close to the motorcade they would be shot down by an agent with a Stinger. He said they always carry them in the back of their escort vehicles along with other weapons.

212. Other weapons systems were mentioned by theorists:

1. One was the HAARP project in Gakona, Alaska, which is supposed to be a global weapons system capable of bringing down an aircraft as large as a 747 anywhere in the world by using high altitude auroral directed energy to focus on the target. This project is allegedly an offshoot of Nicolai Tesla's electromagnetic weapons designs that disappeared around the turn of the century after Tesla died. It is also supposed to be related to what retired Air Force lieutenant colonel Tom Bearden describes as "Scaler Wave" weapons which use similar technology.

2. Another system is a directed-energy microwave beam weapon that has been accused of knocking down two aircraft in the vicinity of Woodbridge, Virginia (built by Harry Diamond Laboratories on a black budget government contract). One of the aircraft that allegedly flew into the invisible microwave beam and was "shredded" was a Marine VH-60 Blackhawk assigned to HMX-1 at Andrews AFB. This was a presidential transport aircraft and all four crew members were killed prior to impact. All showed massive internal burns, rupturing of the skin, and skin burns. The aircraft did not burn and the fuel did not ignite. The whole thing was covered up by the Marine investigators, blaming the cause of the crash on a defective part in the drive train. They also reported that the bodies were blistered because of contact with spilled fuel at the accident site. However, dead bodies do not blister, and the crew was dead before the helicopter hit the ground as there was no blood at the crash scene! Harry Diamond Labs moved their project to Oregon shortly thereafter. The other aircraft knocked down as a Cessna carrying four passengers, one supposedly a KGB defector or other Russian embassy official (two versions of story). Little is know of this second incident.

3. Another weapons system is a flying laser energy beam that has been developed to destroy missiles. In a test conducted in the 1980s, such a weapon succeeded in destroying five Sidewinder missiles and one cruise missile, according to Colonel Lanny Larfson, director of lasers and imaging at the Air Force's Phillips Laboratory at Kirtland Air Force Base in Albuquerque, which is pioneering work on the systems. Other players in the development of laser and directed energy beam "Star Wars" weapons systems are: TRW, Hughes Aircraft, Lockheed Martin, and Boeing. The platform for such a "flying laser beam" would be a large aircraft, such as a 747, according to Air Force sources involved in the testing of COIL, or Chemical Oxygen Iodine laser system.

213. On September 23, 1996, an article appeared in USA Today titled "TWA Crash May Forever Be A Mystery, Reno Says." In the article, Attorney General Janet Reno laid the ground work for an eventual finding that there would be no finding. Because of the apparent official Clinton Administration denial of the missile evidence, a finding that the airplane was shot down by a SAM apparently would not be released under any circumstances. This appeared to fall in line with what some FBI agents say is an ever-developing unwritten Justice Department directive titled "never let the facts stand in the way of a politically correct investigation."

214. New York Terror Trial Witness Tells What a Liar He Was, San Francisco Chronicle, March 8, 1995.

215. The Administration initially refused to offer a reward in the case of the World Trade Center bombing, arguing that it was an act of domestic terrorism and therefore not eligible for the International Terrorist Information Reward program.

216. Abraham Ahmad, a Jordanian, had actually been spotted acting very nervously at the American Airlines gate in Oklahoma City one hour after the bombing. As he flew to Chicago to make a connecting flight for Rome, American Airlines personnel notified the FBI that he was acting suspicious. He was detained briefly in Chicago, then released. It was British security at Heathrow that not only refused him entry into the U.K., but put him on a plane back to the U.S. as his luggage was intercepted by the Italian police in Rome. His luggage proved to contain wire, tools, and photographs of surface-to-air missiles. When he returned to the U.S. he was not arrested, and only briefly detained. Almost immediately, Clinton and Janet Reno announced there was no middle-eastern connection. Period.

217. Affidavit of Michael J. Rinonosciuto, United States Bankruptcy Court for the District of Columbia, in Re: INSLAW, INC., Plaintiff v. UNITED STATES OF AMERICA and the UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Defendents. Case # 85-00070 (Chapter 11), Adversary Proceeding No. 86-0069.

218. Ben-Menashe, Ari, Profits of War.

219. This data has not been confirmed. It is being shown here because it was part of the original report submitted to the FBI as areas to be investigated. To the author's knowledge, the FBI never followed up on the information or accomplished the investigation.

220. Israeli military intelligence sources report the figure as 30,000 former Iraqi soldiers, many from the Republican Guards Division.

221. A report by a private investigator hired by KFOR TV reveals that Alhussaini

Hussain was in the Hammurabi Division of the Republican Guard, captured by the 24th Infantry Division during a fight on Highway 8, west of Basra. He came to the U.S. in November of 1991, and attempted to settle in Boston. When he discovered he was under surveillance, he moved to Oklahoma City. It should be noted that World Trade Center bomber Ramzi Yousef was also in the Hammurabi Division of the Republican Guard Division during the Gulf War, and was in a Islamic Jihad-type cell in New York City.

222. Intelligence reports indicate that when Terry Reed of Iran/Contra fame moved to Guadalajara, Mexico, he discovered that his neighbor was one James Ellison--the same James Ellison that later surfaced in the Covenant, Sword and Arm of the Lord in Arkansas, then later Elohim City (not far from Mena).

223. Interview with Michelle Tor, conducted 7/23/96 in Dallas, Texas, by David Hoffman and Rep. Charles Key (Okla).

224. In comparison, the crater in front of the Murrah Building was 20 feet deep and 30 feet wide, while the crater in front of the Khobar Towers was 35 feet deep and 85 feet wide.

225. In this scenario, the President declares a national emergency, invokes Executive Order 11490, declares martial law, suspends the Constitution, converts all state governments to be subservient to the "regional" system, orders FEMA to take over local government functions, then calls for assistance from the U.N., which in turn brings in foreign troops to help police this country. These "foreign assets" are then used to disarm the American people, move elements of the population to "relocation centers" (closed down military bases), quarantine sections of the population, restrict or prohibit travel and communications, then initiate a national identification system that would require every man, woman and child to receive a national ID card to get health care, make purchases, etc. The United States would then become a client state of the World Government, i.e. the "New World Order." This scenario also provides for the various biological weapons to take their toll before being brought under control to help reduce the world's population, which would meet the objectives of the various global foundations who have stated that the world population must be reduced 80% by the year 2010.

From World War II until the present, there has been hidden within the highest levels of government secrets that you are not supposed to discover. During the period of 1940-1996 the powerbrokers, working from their positions of trust, have committed and then covered up the most heinous of crimes known to mankind. Investigative journalist Craig Roberts, author of Kill Zone: A Sniper Looks at Dealey Plaza, now provides us with the results of his 10-year investigation regarding the true stories behind such secret events as:

Devil Unit 731 and Japanese WWII germ weapons testing on U.S. and Allied POWs resulting in hundreds of deaths, all covered up by U.S. authorities...

Operation Paperclip and the smuggling of war criminals - including mass murderers - into the U.S. by the military...

CIA and military mind control experiments on unsuspecting citizens - including children...

Secret drug and baterialogical weapons experiements on the American population by the CIA and the Department of Defense...

Atomic Guinea Pigs, Agent Orange and the Gulf War Syndrome...

What really happened to over 30,000 POWs and MIAs in World War II, Korea and Vietnam - and why Russia knows...

Where did the CIA come from - and who really controls it?

International assassinations, drug smuggling and money laundering, all orchestrated by officials of the U.S. government...

Terrorism in the Air: What the media did not tell you about the shootdown of KAL-007; the bombing of Pan Am 103; the Arrow Air crash in Gander; the shootdown of TWA 800...

The true stories behind the bombing of the World Trade Center;
the Oklahoma City bombing; the derailment of Amtrak's Sunset Limited; and what could happen next to the American people on a nationwide scale...

A Marine combat sniper in Vietnam and U.S. Army Lieutenant Colonel (retired), Craig spent 27 years with the Tulsa, Oklahoma Police Department, where he served as an officer, helicopter pilot, and as a member of the city's bomb squad and S.W.A.T. team. Roberts is the author of over a dozen books, an investigative journalist and lecturer, who seeks the truth beneath what history would have us believe, and the future has yet to reveal.

PREFACE

What would you do if you discovered the end times and the Antichrist were somehow interconnected with giants, modern conspiracy theories, aliens, vampires, secret societies, and fairies? What would you do if you learned refugees from another Apocalypse dutifully encoded dire warnings into worldwide testimonies preserving them for a specific generation, this generation concerning an ancient and ongoing conspiracy to enslave humankind? Would you simply walk away? Seriously, would you really tell anyone? Or would you disregard the personal onslaughts that would be sure to follow the exposé of such controversial discoveries?

My spiritual pursuit has been analogous to my motivation to write this book. I have pursued my beliefs with all the energy contained within my spirit, even though at times I have dropped the quest with such coldness that I wondered whether or not it had ever permeated my consciousness. And yet I returned, not perceiving why or how. It is akin to a haunting voice, whispering in the wilderness, drawing ever closer, yet continually evading me until confusion once more sets in. Just when I no longer can hear the calling, it once more permeates the darkness drawing me back. This thirty-year journey has taught me that if I was not a Christian contrarian, this composition would not have been started, completed, or published.

Frankly, mysteries contained within Scripture and other ancient sources do not pastorally coexist with contemporaneous, secular science during this season of reason suppressing faith. Nor do these mysteries pastorally coexist with status quo dogma offered by most monotheistic religions.

Sadly, most of monotheism ignores the message from the Messiah to resolutely uphold truth and grace,[1] no matter the times or the implications.

Hence, this unsettling quest will teleport you to an unfamiliar place snared somewhere between faith and reason. This quest will challenge your perceptions of what you thought the Bible said, as well as transform your current view of the world as dictated by modern secularism.

This quest tenders disquieting questions, exposing dissonant conclusions concerning Scripture and the currently accepted secular dogma of antiquity. Prehistory is submerged in foggy waters, an unnerving conundrum for historians, who demand scientific benchmarks buttressed with evidence and archaeological corroboration. But if we whisk away the confusing haze, clarity emerges about the first written history, revealing key relationships and instructions for this generation.

We will reexamine Genesis, the balance of the Bible, and other scriptures as if they were just discovered, transforming illogical and preconceived notions regarding creation and the ancient epochs and disclosing historical imperatives that have rippled down through the generations. The reader will learn what has taken place, what is taking place, and what must take place. Therefore, I urge you to keep a Bible and the footnotes at your fingertips to validate the accuracy and context of the vast amount of Scripture applied in this work which is set alongside the volumes of secular and polytheist testimonies.

A Greek historian and philosopher, Plutarch, circa 46–125 C.E. employed more than 250 works from additional ancient authors, of which many have been lost to history,[2] in his quest to record ancient history as it was viewed from his milestone in history.Plutarch wrote regarding the difficulties beyond a certain ancient historical point of selecting a spot of sure footing, where reason is able to continue the reach back into real history: "… beyond this there is nothing but prodigies and fictions, the only inhabitants are the poets and inventors of fables; there is no credit or certainty any farther."[3] Scripture will be our historical foundation stones for certainty and credibility, for just as C. S. Lewis has noted that whatever else the Gospels might be, they clearly are not legend;[4] and in this writer's opinion, they are accurate, monotheist history.

With this in mind, understand that most scriptural principles eventually and without explanation return to the beginning, Genesis. Genesis methodically tilled the soil for the balance of the Bible and humankind, sowing the seeds for the many doctrines and plots cultivated throughout Scripture. Once the plots and doctrines are fully developed, one finds oneself inexplicably returning to Genesis to fully comprehend the insights, revisiting the little known and misunderstood agrarians of Genesis. This book begins in Genesis and ends in Genesis. Genesis is both the cornerstone and the Rosetta Stone for Scripture, decoding the true history of humankind, our future, and this quest.

In this spirit then, the Bible ought to be viewed as a reliable and accurate believer's history, but not a document designed to meet current, secular standards for history or archaeological research. God did not intend Scripture to be an encyclopedia, nor did He intend it to be a clinical, historical, scientific handbook. Moreover, Scripture frustrates science's need for visible, undeniable proof complete with corroborating reference points. Conversely, God designed Scripture to hold the history of a people's God, their religion, and the tribulations of their Holy Covenant. Scripture was written to nourish faith, not reason. It is through this lens we must read it—just as it was written in a literal sense to the faithful believers, not through the lens of godless, secular cynics or interpretive, mystical revisionists.

We will enlist the historian Josephus as well as Albert Mackey's legends of Freemasonry to investigate the mysteries of prehistory. We will put these alongside numerous Gnostic gospels, including the Nag Hammadi Library; the Dead Sea Scrolls; and a host of historians, authors, and clerics, including a broad sweep of legends, mythologies, and religious literature from around the world, drafted for anecdotal backdrop. All impart important testimonies, redefining otherwise unaccountable ancient civilizations, their misconstrued religions, and their perplexing conundrums. Indeed, as C. S. Lewis once noted, myth points to reality.[5]

Accordingly, we will often consult Enoch. His visions were recorded in several Gnostic gospels, alongside the famous book of Enoch discovered in Ethiopia in 1785 C.E. and copied by a famous Freemason named James Bruce. From these and other Gnostic sources, Bruce produced the Codex Bruciannus, one of the few Gnostic reference books until the discovery of Nag Hammadi.[6] Bruce was a direct descendant of the famous historical figure Robert the Bruce, as well as a descendant from an obscure Jewish order of priests from the time of Jesus,[7] the Essenes.

The Nag Hammadi texts were discovered in Egypt in 1945 C.E., and they date back to 290–346 C.E.[8] The Nag Hammadi Library was composed while the Roman Catholic Church purged heretical Gnostic movements; the library's purpose was to pass onto future generations the knowledge to free humans from their earthly bondage through the cult of knowledge.[9] Hence, the Tripartite Tractate refers to The Organization, a secretive and mysterious organization that fights against the dark forces of ignorance, while preserving ancient knowledge and building impressive monuments to represent spiritual places[10] (themes that dominate this composition). Always remember that behind the thick, steel door of superficial history taught by the educated elite sleeps an obscure version that elucidates the enigmatic events of history. Regrettably, there is a shadowy second history hidden from public viewing: a shocking saga of secret societies, lost civilizations, unexplained events, and an unaccounted for hidden hand of history.

Unidentified quotations by famous figures of history and biblical references from Ezra, Jude, 1 Peter, and 2 Peter suggest that not all the Enochian literature has been discovered.[11] Roman Catholicism initially ascribed the book of Enoch among the Apocrypha of the Old Testament,[12] and it was excluded later from the official Bible canon;[13] although, it is cherished as sacred text in some circles.[14] Apocrypha refers to fourteen books included in the Septuagint but excluded from the Old Testament. The Good News Bible describes the Apocrypha as gospels of unknown or doubted authority.[15] However, Tertulian defended the authenticity and sacred character of Enochian gospels, while Clement of Alexandria often quoted directly from them.[16] Some conclude Enoch literature was part of the seventy-scroll Hagiography referenced in Ezra but not included in the final Palestinian canon.[17] Hagiography, meaning holy writings, was a third division of the Hebrew Old Testament called "The Writings," but it was so arbitrary it was not accepted as proper.[18]

Some scholars believe Enochian scriptures are fragments from a much earlier lost book, the book of Noah.[19] Enochian scripture is further believed to have drawn upon other lost books that originally told the Genesis story, such as the book of the Wars of Yahweh, The Book of Jasher, The Toledoth of Adam, and The Toledoth of Noah.[20] Some believe Jude refers to the book of Enoch when Jude quotes the prophecy of Enoch.[21] One further wonders what insights Christians might take from the Targum or the Pesherim if they were employed as commentaries to help elucidate the Torah, alongside other non-Canon and Apocryphal scriptures, such as The Apocalypse of Baruch, The Book of Jonah, The Life of Adam and Eve, The Assumption of Isaiah, and The Assumption of Moses,[22] studied by the priests of the Second Temple, which included the contentious Josephus.

Josephus, an indispensable historian, recorded Jewish history for the Romans at the time of the Diaspora and Jewish wars so that Israelite history would not be lost forever. Josephus was a first-century (reformed) Jewish pacifist,[23] who was born into the age of the birth of Christianity and died during the persecution of the early church, after the destruction of Jerusalem.[24] He was an eyewitness of the times of Jesus, referring to Jesus twice in his writings, noting Jesus was called and was the Christ, fulfilling the words of the prophets. Josephus recorded Jesus was a wise man, if it was lawful to call him a man; a teacher to people accepting the truth; one who drew large numbers of Jewish converts; and a man who did wonderful works, who was then condemned to die on the cross by Pilate and Jewish elders.[25]

Josephus was noble, from the old aristocracy descending from the first twenty-four lines of priests spawned by Aaron and Moses, a descendant from the Maccabees on his mother’s side, and a priest of high rank in the Jerusalem temple. He spent three of his most impressionable years among the Essenes and then converted back to the Pharisees’ sect, all the while taking time to study the Sadducees’ sect.[26] In the Jewish revolt of 66 C.E., Josephus commanded an angry band of zealots, entrenched on a stronghold, who resisted the Roman siege for 47 days.[27] He prophesied his captor, Vespasian, would become Emperor of Rome and was set free when the prophecy was fulfilled.[28] Josephus then travelled to Rome, where he received Roman citizenship, an apartment in Vespasian’s former mansion, and an annual pension to underwrite his literary endeavors.[29] Josephus nurtured strong relationships with the Flavian imperial family, as well as the next two Flavian emperors, Titus and Domitian.[30]

Additionally, Masonic history is elemental to this investigation, specifically the primeval history penned by Albert Mackey (1807–1881 C.E.), History of Freemasonry.[31] He spent the last year of his life as the Secretary General of the Supreme Council of the Thirty-Third Degree.

Mackey was a physician, an editor, a teacher, a publisher, and an author. He wrote many books about his obscure order. His books are considered the most authoritative and definitive works on Freemasonry.[32]

Freemasonry has its roots in once secret information believed to be older than the New Testament; its arcane rituals contain puzzling references to the flood,[33] placing unexplained importance on the antediluvian achievements of their obscure order.[34] Hence, most Legends of the Craft begin with an abstruse descant on the Seven Liberal Arts and Sciences. Freemasonry then is unaccountably connected to shrouded and important antediluvian and postdiluvian events; it is an organization built upon foundations from older European masonry Guilds, the Brotherhood of Builders: Operative Freemasonry.[35] Modern Freemasons divorced themselves from the worker traditions and were known from that point on as Speculative Freemasons.[36] As the sixteenth century closed, increased numbers of aristocrats joined the fraternities, which eventually transformed the union of trade guilds into a philosophical fraternity.[37]

In 1721 C.E., the English Grand Lodge created a Masonic constitution. It asked Dr. Anderson, a Scottish preacher, to examine old manuscripts to update them for one instructional manual. In 1723 C.E., Anderson's published work was recognized as both The Ancient Charges and The Book of Constitutions, and it became Freemasonry's most significant document. It is still utilized around the world today.[38] The Anderson Constitution then abolished any references to the Holy Trinity. It further demanded a pledge of devotion by all initiates to Freemasonry's supreme god, the Great Architect of the Universe.[39]

All this prompted a very chilling retort from the Roman church, resulting in a Papal Bull in 1738 C.E. by Pope Clement XII, excommunicating any Catholic who was a Freemason.[40] In 1884 C.E., Pope Leo XII labeled Freemasonry satanic in his edict Encyclical Humanum Genus.[41] In 1917 C.E., the Roman church's Code of Canon Law declared Masonic membership punishable by automatic excommunication, but by 1983 C.E., Freemasonry had vanished from the list of prohibited secret societies.[42] However, Pope Benedict XVI declared that Freemasons live in a state of grave sin and are prohibited from taking communion. Freemasonry and Christianity do not pastorally coexist, and that reality is yet another elemental theme dominating this book.

Of the host of contemporary authors I employ in this work, Laurence Gardner[43] stands out. Gardner was the past Master Mason of the United Grand Lodge of England for twenty years. He also held a plethora of other distinguished positions and titles.[44] He was a noted prior of the Celtic church's Sacred Kindred of St. Columbia, Prior of the Knights Templar of St. Anthony, and internationally recognized as a sovereign and chivalric genealogist. Gardner was distinguished as the Chevalier Labhran de Saint Germain and was the Presidential Attaché to the European Council of Princes, all while being formally acknowledged as being attached to the Noble Household Guard of the Royal House of Stewart founded at St. Germain.[45] Gardener was appointed Jacobite Historiographer Royal, a Fellow of the Society of Antiquities of Scotland, and a Professional Member of the Institute of Nana Technology.[46] In addition to all this, Gardner was an attaché to the Grande Protectorate of the Imperial Dragon Court, 1408 C.E.[47] His positions and titles underline the relevance and validity of his shocking testimony, which will become evident as this work unfolds.

This book is a 6,000-year-connect-the-dots investigation, beginning with Adam. Modern theologians and academics have examined some of the anomalies covered in this investigation, but they have left some other mysteries to the imaginations of believers or ignored them completely because of the extraordinary implications recognition would bring. Catholicism has collected much of this arcane knowledge for close to 2,000 years, storing it in a protected depository within the safe confines of the Vatican.[48] Many believe the Vatican guards the world's largest library on the occult,[49] a library rivaling that of Freemasonry's own.

With this in mind, this undertaking does not shy away from secular, mystical, or Christian criticism. It will present Scripture literally. This is, in truth, the millennium-old scriptural schism between the literal translation adopted by Judah and Israel, the early Jerusalem church, the Roman church, and the Muslims and the interpretive, scriptural application adopted by mystics, Gnostics, and rogue Islamist Fascists, which has been part of the seditious lining of the contemporary Genesis 6 Conspiracy. This quest will contrast itself against the cynical, secular, and numinous world by arguing from a literal, scriptural perspective of Christian, Jewish, and Muslim orthodoxy, even though it will employ a vast volume of both mystical and secular support for the furtherance of the quest. In short, this book is only about the literal truth as it was, as it is, and as it will be.

The Nephilim enigma of Genesis 6 is curt narrative, included without explanation with the flood narrative, not to mention, Nephilim were recorded in many Old Testament books like Exodus, Numbers, Joshua, Ecclesiastics, 1 Chronicles, Psalms, and the Apocrypha. Nephilim are crucial to understanding the Antichrist prophecies and the last days. And yet, who really knows who or what these Nephilim were? What imperatives and warnings must this generation discern from this abstruse mystery? And how are Nephilim related to aliens, fairies, vampires, secret societies, and world government? We will answer these questions and many more as we plunge into diverse scriptures to examine The Genesis 6 Conspiracy. Evidence will be presented supporting my contention that there is an ongoing, 6,000-year conspiracy by dark angels, secret societies, and the descendants of Nephilim that is bent on enslaving humankind under an oppressive government that is hostile to God.

SECTION I: The Antediluvian Epoch

THE AGE OF GREAT HEROES

CHAPTER 1

HEROES OF OLD

The Nephilim were on the earth in those days and afterward, when the sons of God went to the daughters of men and had children by them. They were heroes of old, men of renown.

—Genesis 6:4

The unexplained Nephilim narrative originates in the book of Genesis, during the time of Noah. Readers are not provided with any defining details or with appropriate context as to just what Nephilim were. Readers are only instructed that sons of God coupled with daughters of men, which curiously produced the renowned heroes of old.

But isn't this a very strange anecdote in the preamble to the flood narrative? Why were Nephilim provided print just before one of the epic tales of Scripture? Why were these cryptic Nephilim people described as both heroes of old and men of renown? Surely, all this cannot be a coincidence. It is my contention that Scripture has been brilliantly diligent in its accuracy and historically precise in its application of text.

The ancient application to the appellation hero is not generally understood today in the same context that hero was applied and understood in ancient texts and thus, it is comprehended in a completely different connotation in the everyday life of the ancient epochs. The ancient recollection of heroes is more akin to our contemporary phenomena of superheroes, such as Superman and Spiderman. Indeed, these contemporary superheroes reflect allegories of forgotten secrets to epochs past, fond memories by some harkening back to an age of superhuman heroes. These contemporary cartoon characters eerily whisper something seductive, something secretive, and something sinister from the misty fog of prehistory that we dismiss at our peril.

Consider this: one definition provided by Webster's New Format Dictionary (1986) defines hero as "a man of superhuman powers, a demigod." If the original translation for hero then is applied to Genesis 6, we indeed have a cryptic enigma, in that a race of superhuman demigods is part of the flood narrative. Just as curious, and without explanation, all renowned men of antiquity were depicted as heroes that persistently and continuously bubbled to the surface from the murky depths of primeval history as part man and part god, reigning for long durations.

The Encyclopedia Americana testifies that among the ancient Greeks, heroes were those who were legendary for their bravery and achievements and who possessed exceptional strength. Homer's Iliad generally referred to heroes as kings and sons of kings. They were fierce warriors, who did mighty deeds and waged mighty battles in the shadow of the common human's fate. The Odyssey describes heroes as wise and venerable beings (such as Hercules/ Heracles) who lived to great ages. Homer further noted these mighty heroes were always doomed to gloomy fates.[1] The Roman poet Ovid authored Heroides, a series of twenty-one poetic love letters written to heroic lovers/ husbands by the women of the Heroic Age that included letters between Paris and Helen, and Leander and Hero.[2]

The etymology of hero is not conclusive, but experts believe hero to be closely connected to a root word meaning "strong," or one who guards or protects, suggesting soldierly (or militaristic) qualities. In truth, the concept of heroes from all races around the globe refers to a specific race of an early age (antediluvian), before historical records were written of their race, and to legendary characters of divine dignity analogous to that of gods. Teutonic and Celtic heroes were also figures descending from gods like Odin, Loki, and Danu.[3] But what is most intriguing regarding these ancient accounts is that all denote these pre-flood heroes as both a venerable and a distinct race of powerful demigods, separate from the mundane and mortal humans.

Greek heroes were noted to be mythological beings; their positions among the sanctioned hierarchy of beings were placed somewhere between mortals and gods, making them semidivine. Hesiod recorded Aegimius, in a composition by the same name, as the ancient hero of the Dorians.[4] Hesiod eloquently provided Macedonians a fabulous pedigree akin to Greek heroes descended from Hellenes: Dorus, Patriarch of the Dorians; Xuthus, Patriarch of the Ionians; and Aelous, Patriarch of the Aeolians. Zeus fathered both Macedon and Magnes with Thyria, producing a proud people who rejoiced in horses and dwelt near Olympus. The first Macedonian kings hailed from a warrior-chief clan descending from the southern Greeks, the Argead.[5]

Hesiod, whom Herodotus claims was a contemporary of Homer, circa 900 B.C.E.,[6] further recorded heroes in his famous work Works and Deep as "men of great renown." Herodotus was the Greek historian considered the Father of History, circa 485–425 B.C.E. He was a follower of Hecataeus in the development of historical science, transcending the rational criticism of epic traditions characteristic of his predecessors. Herodotus drew his knowledge from his extensive geographical, historical, and literary knowledge, as well as from his firsthand experiences in the many countries he visited.[7]

Hesiod's exacting language that specifies "heroes and men of renown" cannot be a mere coincidence, nor can it be considered completely independent of the precise text employed by Genesis. Hesiod buttressed through the testimony of his days, the validity of Nephilim recorded in Genesis, to beyond 900 B.C.E., and forthrightly in his text, all the way back to the antediluvian epoch. Even more striking, Hesiod stated in Works and Days that he evidently belonged to the period immediately following the Trojan War.[8] This dating, if accurate, would likely trace Hesiod's testimony back several hundred years beyond 900 B.C.E.

Hesiod additionally recorded Greek heroes, commonly known as Titans, warriors, demigods, and "depotentiated gods" from a former age of heroes.[9] Hesiod recorded the birth of the gods, the giant, semidivine Titans, and their achievements into a library of the oldest known fables from his age, creating a work called Theogany.[10] Homer's Iliad also referred to these Titanic heroes as demigods.[11] To this conclusion, the Greek philosopher from the third century B.C.E., Euhemerus, became famous for stating Greek myths were in fact dim memories of historical events from an earlier age, a theory that became known as Euhemerism.[12]

Consider texts from clay tablets from ancient Mesopotamia on display in the great museums around the world, then quoted in the textbooks of schools and universities as part of secular revisionist history. These ancient legends descending from the antediluvian Sumerians were inherited by postdiluvian Babylonians/Chaldeans, Akkadians, and Assyrians, and they became a critical component to their cultures, religions, and societies. These fantastic Sumerian legends that include the Epic of Gilgamesh curiously refer back to an Age of Heroes reigned over by semidivine Anunnaki giants, which thrived before the flood catastrophe and then somehow survived into the postdiluvian world.[13]

Hesiod cryptically understood these heroes as the mysterious and infamous fourth race of beings created by the gods.[14] Does “the four races” refer to the mortal humans, the centaurs, and two distinct races of heroes/Nephilim? Or does Hesiod refer to the two races of humans, the sons of Adam and the people of day six, along with the centaurs and heroes? Or does Hesiod refer to the fairy folk, Nephilim, centaurs, and humans as the four races? We will learn about all these races as this book unfolds.

What is clear, however, is that the Bible and most other ancient transcripts, scriptures, legends, and mythologies all recognized and testified to a powerful antediluvian race of superhumans reigning as kings and demigods over the mortal and mundane humans. The first personalities (heroes) from memories of written history, according to author and historian Susan Wise Bauer, universally testify to a rein of obscure kings documented as part man and part god, which somehow descended from heaven on eagle’s wings.[15]

It is my contention that somehow these ancient Nephilim perished from this world. They have been forgotten by the modern, secular psyche and accepted history; all accounts have been marginalized to the sidelines as fanciful mythology and legend, as a wistful yearning back to a revisionist golden age of pastoral peace and prosperity. Sadly, Western historians, according to Bauer, have trained in university systems that believe only science is infallible; these historians do not trust in the tales from prehistory and position themselves as scientists, dismissing any historical material that departs from Newton’s universe.[16] They deny that the Titan/Nephilim race was both real and powerful, a shadowy race of demigods who left a large and visible impression upon the ancient epochs.

It is essential to understand Nephilim as a legendary race of giants mythologized to have coexisted with humankind in the ancient world. Nephilim cultivated a new culture, religion, and knowledge base. But do we really know the sources and inspirations of this ancient but mysterious race that is lost to the accepted secular chronicles of antiquity? What impact, if any, did their culture, religion, and or knowledge have on the ancient world? Did Noah know the Nephilim? Did the Nephilim have anything to do with the flood? How were Nephilim introduced into the world? And what kind of people were they? To resolve the Nephilim mystery, we must backtrack to understand obscure and unexplained events preceding the flood in the antediluvian epoch.

This venture into the ancient epochs of the Old Testament and the divergent transcripts, mythologies, and legends from a vast variety of cultures, writers, and organizations will deliver a series of shock waves to the standard modern theology of Genesis and secular history. Be prepared. Be aware! The truth will set you free, but the truth may not be what you have thought or what you want.

CHAPTER 2

THE DAUGHTERS OF CAIN

> Male and female he created them. God blessed them and said to them, "Be fruitful and increase in number; fill the earth and subdue it. Rule over the fish and the sea and the birds of the air and over every living creature that moves on the ground."
> —Genesis 1:27–28

After God created Adam and then Eve, one generally expects a pastoral world with a wonderful climate and peaceful coexistence, notwithstanding the Cain incident, and perhaps this was the case in the beginning. But by the time of Noah, Scripture records that the world had slipped into a state of violent chaos.[1] So how did this happen in just ten generations?

The answer is shrouded behind misconstrued prehistory. We must learn about little-known prehistoric Brotherhoods of the Snake, the oldest secret societies in the world, all surreptitiously dedicated to world domination and the enslavement of humankind.[2] The societies' various incantations are all linked to the Serpent in Eden, the Tree of Life, the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil, heroes, and Genesis's misunderstood history.

We begin with Josephus, for he has some answers to the questions about Adam's descendants. Josephus recorded that the sons of Seth continued their reverence to God as the Lord of the universe for seven generations.[3] Cain was the first born of Adam, while Abel who Cain murdered, was the second born. Therefore, we may conclude that the seeds of the deluge were well planted in the first generation after Adam. Seth, then, was the third born son of Adam and Eve. According to Josephus, Adam and Eve begat thirty-three sons and twenty-three daughters;[4] although, the Bible only records that Adam and Eve bore other sons and daughters.[5]

However, during these first seven generations, the passing of time slowly eroded the righteousness of all humankind, perverting all but Noah by the tenth generation. Even the descendants of Seth began after seven generations to dishonor God by not attributing to God all things, even though God had appointed all things. The posterity of Seth became more and more like the peoples around them, who demonstrated no concern in the administering of justice or respect towards their fellow humans or towards God. The people of Noah’s generation displayed their deeds with a double degree of wickedness, whereby they declared God to be their adversary.[6]

During this period, a vile act of rebellion occurred. The sons of God began to procreate with the daughters of men, producing as their posterity the heroes of old. But just who were these sons of God, and why would the daughters of men copulate with the sons of God to produce a new race of humanoids? Some say the sons of God were the descendants of Seth and the daughters of men were the posterity of Cain and that the progeny of Seth procreated with the daughters of Cain to produce these famous heroes of old. From the mainstream Christian point of view, this makes perfect sense —end of story. But this was not the case; the sons of God were not the sons of Seth. In addition, humans mating with humans could not have produced a new, physically superior race of humanoids of that sort of magnitude, unless the term giant is greatly overstated, for Nephilim were thought to be a powerful race of giants.

Generally accepted theology concludes the daughters of men were Cain’s progeny, born after Cain was banished from Adam and Eve. According to this line of thought, Cain chose a wife from one of Adam’s many daughters, even though this marriage recorded in Genesis does not specifically state the female was from the posterity of Adam.[7] The standard conclusion is that because there were not any other kinds of humanoids on earth at that time, the female must have come from the loins of Adam. Cain therefore became the progenitor of the first family branch from the tree of Adam, while Seth, who was born later, became the second branch of Adam.

It was from Cain's posterity, as this line of thought goes, that violence and evil first imprinted the antediluvian world; although, the Bible does not record this as such. This theory can be only biblically supported through the Genesis account of Cain murdering Abel and then extrapolated by charging Cain with further degeneration into evil and corruption. Similarly, the New Testament only states that Cain belonged to Satan for murdering Abel[8] and that evil was the way of Cain.[9] Genesis did not plainly record this transfer of transgenerational evil onto generations of Cain's posterity; oddly, it recorded only the first progeny of Cain and their accomplishments.

What Genesis records and what is does not record is puzzling, simply because if Cain and his progeny were indeed thoroughly corrupted, why would Scripture have diligently recorded for all time their accomplishments? Why wouldn't Scripture only have focused on the righteous accomplishments of Seth's progeny? Moreover, why would Scripture not have diligently recorded the iniquitous exploits of Cain's posterity as a matter of theological and historical record for all generations to contemplate? We do not find the answers to these puzzling questions in the biblical text.

Biblically undocumented transgressions by Cain's descendants are then summarily drafted in standard Christian theology as the source for evil and violence. And thus they are seen as willing partners, who helped spawn the Nephilim race of giants-via the copulation of the degenerate daughters of Cain with the enlightened sons of Seth. But since Genesis does not explicitly cite this either, this conclusion is nothing more than conjecture, unless other sources can substantiate it.

Indeed, there are other sources that we can look to in establishing that Cain's progeny were a corrupt and vile branch of Adam's posterity, who were willing participants in violating the sacred laws of creation. We can also find out just who the sons of God were.

Let us begin with summarizing Genesis's account of the posterity of Cain. Cain bore a son, Enoch, and Cain named the city he built after him. Enoch bore Irad, who bore Mehujael, who bore Methushal, who was the father of Lamech. Lamech married two women, Adah and Zillah, and was thereby pronounced the first polygamist, a violation of the law that the Nephilim would later prize as a cornerstone of their rebellious culture.

Adah gave birth to Jabal, the first nomad who raised livestock. Adah also gave birth to another son, Jubal, the first to create the art of music. The second wife, Zillah, bore one son, Tubal-Cain, who was credited with inventing smithcraft. Zillah also bore a daughter named Naamah, but Genesis does not accredit Naamah with inventing anything. The account of Cain's progeny ends with Lamech, stating he killed a man for wounding him, and that if his ancestor Cain was sentenced to suffer seven times over, then he would be judged to suffer seventy-seven times over.[10]

Although this account does provide some transgressions, such as the polygamy of Lamech and the killing of a man by Lamech, compounded by the sin of murder by Lamech's ancestor Cain, it does not establish requisite groundwork for the level of violence and corruption compiled by the tenth generation, particularly when one considers the sons and daughters of Lamech form the sixth generation. And as I have already noted, the erosion of righteousness took hold during the first seven generations, when it gripped the posterity of Seth, corrupting the righteous branch almost completely by the tenth generation. Therefore, something more must have been taking place in the lineage of Cain to so corrupt his posterity, in addition to crossing the genealogical branches of Cain and Seth, or another outside source must have been at work as the source of this corruption.

Cain was thought to have traveled over many countries with his wife, finally establishing a city he named Nod, where he and his wife settled and had children. Louis Ginzberg, author of Legends of the Bible, notes that Cain built monuments to immortalize his name, as well as sixty cities, all with walls,[11] thereby suggesting military fortresses. Josephus interjects that Cain did not accept judgment or punishment from God for murdering Abel. Cain did not repent but rather increased his transgressions and wickedness, procuring everything for his own pleasure, even though it obliged him to be injurious to his neighbors. Cain became wealthy through plundering his neighbors with violence and robbing them of all that he could pillage. Cain further urged his followers to do the same; he became a great leader of men, leading them into wickedness.[12] Who were these plundering hordes led by Cain? Where did they come from?

Josephus wrote that Cain introduced weights and measures into the world, where before the introduction of this system, humankind lived innocently and generously. Cain led humans from innocence into cunning craftiness, where all things were weighed and measured. He established boundaries for all lands and established many cities with fortified walls, naming one Enoch after his eldest son.[13] Ginzberg suggests that Cain sinned to secure his own pleasure, even though he severely injured his neighbors. Cain was likely one of the proponents for violence and war in the antediluvian world.

Josephus and Ginzberg both label Cain as the father of evil, violence, and corruption. These accounts stray significantly from the Genesis account, where Cain was not overtly charged with corrupting the antediluvian world. It was implied so subtly that one may wish to look closer at Cain for impropriety. With Cain planting these kinds of seeds in just the second generation, it is not difficult to conceive the entire antediluvian world, other than the lineage of Seth, being totally corrupted by the sixth generation, with Seth's posterity being completely corrupted by Cain's descendants from the seventh to the tenth generations and after the Nephilim incident. With the arrival of Lamech, however, antediluvian life became interesting. Josephus recorded, just as the author of Genesis recorded, that Lamech became the first recorded polygamist, marrying both Zillah and Adah. Altogether, they procreated seventy-seven children. Lamech was also noted as being very skilled in the art of divine revelation.[14] Of those seventy-seven children, three were noteworthy by Josephus's standards.

Jubal, son of Adah, specialized in music, inventing musical instruments. Tubal-Cain, son of Zillah, exceeded all other men in strength and excelled in the martial arts, foreshadowing characteristics of the Nephilim. Josephus noted Tubal-Cain as procuring the pleasures of the body through his natural attributes, again foreshadowing another characteristic of the Nephilim. No doubt, Tubal-Cain also inherited and embellished all the sins and corruption of his forefather Cain, as witnessed by his name. Josephus then credits Tubal-Cain with inventing the art of manufacturing brass.[15] Nelson's Bible Dictionary defines Cain as meaning "a metal worker," thereby attributing Tubal to being his first name, and Cain denoting his expertise, just as his forefather must have been some form of metalworker or smith. The third distinguished progeny was the daughter of Zillah, Naamah, meaning "pleasant."[16] Josephus does not credit anything special to Naamah, but again, to be noted in the Bible, one must be worthy of either good or evil.

Josephus went on to strike deep into the character of Cain's posterity:

> Even while Adam was still alive, it came to pass that the posterity of Cain became exceedingly wicked, everyone successfully dying, one after another, more wicked than the former. They were intolerable in war, and vehement in robberies; and if anyone was slow to murder people, yet was he bold in his immoral behavior, in acting unjustly, and doing injuries for gain.[17]

They were, indeed, their father's sons and daughters. Corroborating evidence from non-Biblical sources more than fills in the blanks left by Genesis. Josephus described Cain's posterity as despicable to the bone—a vile branch that degenerated into more iniquity with each passing generation. By the sixth generation, Cain's rebellious posterity was a human cesspool, looking to spawn a great evil into the antediluvian world. And of course, they succeeded. But before we continue with that, it is time to enter the Freemasonry Brotherhood and its legends into the mystery.

The Dowland Manuscript of the Legend of the Craft lists the Seven Liberal Sciences: "Grammere" to teach humankind to both speak and write truly; "Rhethoricke" to teach humankind to speak in subtle terms; "Dialectyke" to teach humankind to discern between truth and falsehoods; "Arithmeticke" to teach humankind to compute all manner of numbers; "Geometrie" to teach humankind to measure the earth and all things (this is the Science of Masonry); "Musicke" to teach humankind song and the language of musical instruments; and finally, "Astronomye" to teach humankind the course of the planets and stars.[18] Rhetoric's original state was the art of persuasion, while grammar was the molding and education of men through reading.[19] Note how several of these sciences were unexplainably credited to Lamech's children in Genesis and Josephus.

The Hutchinsonian Theory from Brother William Hutchinson's work The Spirit of Masonry offers this commentary:

> … to Adam, while still in a state of innocence, this knowledge was imparted, as well as that of all science and learning which existed in the earliest ages of the world. When our first parent fell, although he lost his innocence, he still retained the memory of all that he was taught while in the Garden of Eden. This very retention was, indeed, a portion of punishment incurred for his disobedience. It, however, enabled him to communicate to his children in the sciences which he had comprehended in Eden, and the knowledge that he had acquired of the Nature and the God of Nature.[20]

The History of Freemasonry also cites the Anderson Legend in the book by Dr. Anderson, The Book of Constitutions,[21] and the Oliverian Theory by Rev. Dr. Oliver in his book Antiquities of Freemasonry,[22] supporting the theory that the Seven Sciences were first taught to Adam by God while he still dwelled in Eden.

It is these unexplained Seven Sciences that inexplicably weave their way through Genesis and numerous polytheist legends, religions, and cultures. Recognizing the impact of the Seven Sciences is crucial for context and is a critical backdrop for comprehending the antediluvian epoch, for these sciences spawned secretive Snake Brotherhoods in all antediluvian cultures. We must, therefore, follow the mystical history of the Seven Sciences throughout this book and their unexplained relationships to antediluvian history to fully appreciate what took place. So what were these obscure sciences that were ignored by Christian orthodoxy?

The sciences bestowed to Adam were of unimaginable worth, for they contained the secrets of the universe. Humankind was bequeathed the knowledge to control the universe in which they lived, provided they mastered the wisdom provided for them and did not use this divine gift for evil. This extraordinary, advanced knowledge possessed by both the antediluvians and the early inhabitants of Babel was subtly expressed in Genesis 1:28 and 11:6 in these words of God: “Fill the earth and subdue it” and in this: “If as one people speaking the same language they have begun to do this, then nothing they plan to do will be impossible for them.” Hence, Adam was an active practitioner of the craft while in Eden and also after.[23] Unfortunately, though, both Eve and Adam ate from the Tree of Knowledge of both Good and Evil.[24] They were instantaneously corrupted by the knowledge of evil and were consequently driven from Eden by God—incidentally, an essential doctrine to this book’s discussion of the schism between monotheism and polytheism.

Freemason legends record that Adam did not lose control of the memory of the Seven Sciences and continued to practice them in a limited way after being banished from Eden, but he continued to practice in a righteous manner.

The obscure importance of these sciences dictated that they must not be lost. They needed to be preserved among Adam’s descendants, provided that Adam’s descendants applied this divine knowledge for good. In fact, this was just what Adam did. Adam communicated this knowledge to two of his sons: Cain and Seth.[25] Adam passed the Sacred Sciences onto two very different branches: Seth, whose descendants remained righteous until the seventh generation, and Cain, whose descendants were vile and treacherous from the time God ostracized Cain. The Sacred Sciences were preserved and utilized in two very different manners by the two very different branches of Adam's descendants.

Seth and his descendants focused on the seventh science, astronomy.[26] This should not be surprising, for Sethians were agrarians until the time of the deluge. Even after, Noah and his three sons were still considered people of the land.[27] The application of astronomy would have helped enormously in understanding and appreciating the movements of the heavenly bodies as they applied to the seasons for both planting and harvesting. Josephus labeled the seventh Sacred Science, which Sethians promoted, as a sort of peculiar wisdom, one that was concerned with the heavenly bodies and their order.[28]

Seth was proficient with the other six sciences also, preserving and cultivating them in righteousness to his progeny, who continued to practice the craft.[29] Sethian genealogy recorded in Genesis was a testimony to their righteousness and to their Adamic racial purity,[30] from which the human race was reseeded with their descendants after the flood, through Noah. In fact, the Oliver Legend of Freemasonry described Seth as one who associated only with the most virtuous people of his age, who were celebrated as the sons of light.[31]

According to the Anderson Legend, Cain took to the sacred knowledge, practicing the disciplines with uncommon vigor.[32] From this knowledge, and particularly the fifth science, geometry or masonry, Cain built a city named Hanoch (Enoch), after his first-born son,[33] and of course, Cain sixty-five other cities after Hanoch. The Anderson Legend also recorded that the employment of masonry was practiced vigorously up until the deluge, noting many a curious work was built, likely alluding to such projects as the Great Pyramids.

The introduction of weights, measures, and boundaries for the land by Cain, noted by Josephus, additionally testifies to Cain applying the fifth science; all things were measured in this discipline. Even though Cain and his descendants were corrupt to the core, no evidence thus far has been tabled to suggest that the Cainites used the Seven Sacred Sciences for evil. We must turn to the Oliver Legend to find any such allegations. In this legend, Cain and all of his descendants were accused of perverting the Seven Sacred Sciences.[34] Two of Cain's descendants were fingered as particularly corrupt in the application of the Sacred Sciences: Enoch and Lamech.

Enoch and the deluge are elemental components to the origins and oldest forms of Freemasonry[35] and its Snake Brotherhood. In the Anderson Legend, Enoch was considered an expert in science, geometry, and masonry. Enoch was credited with the invention of sacred symbols and hieroglyphics; hieroglyph is translated by the Craft as "sacred carvings." Enoch invented hieroglyphics as a means to both preserve and transmit the sacred truths in a manner safer, more accurate, and more efficient than the verbal manner, which was employed before. The Jewish writer Bar Hebraeus credits Enoch with inventing writing and books and with teaching men the art of building cities (masonry).[36] Orientalist writers note that Enoch received knowledge bursting with secrets of the most mysterious sciences, while the Babylonians noted that Enoch was an expert on the stars, who also invented astrology.[37]

The book of Enoch describes Enoch being instructed in the Seven Sacred Sciences by a people known as watchers,[38] a shadowy group we will discuss later. Enoch discovered the zodiac and was the first to initiate worship through religious rites.[39] Essenes particularly valued the Book of Jubilees that recorded Enoch as a mystery figure conversant in the esoteric and scientific knowledge. They believed Enoch was the first among men to learn writing and that he wrote in a book the signs of heaven, assigning them to the number of months in a solar year.[40] Again, the Anderson Legend credited Enoch with being the one who taught the sacred mysteries in religious rites and ceremonies. He appointed festivals and sacrifices to the sun at periods when the sun entered each of the zodiacal signs. Enoch was also associated with the sun and its worship thereof; Enoch was considered an idol worshipper.[41]

We already learned about the corrupt and vile nature of Cain and his posterity, but now we learn just how some of this vile nature manifested itself. Enoch, first son of Cain, embraced the Seven Sacred Sciences and perverted their knowledge with evil. The sacred knowledge of the universe was in the hands of the haters of God. Remember, Cain did not agree with his punishment and made it his personal goal to augment as much wickedness in the antediluvian world as he possibly could muster. Now Enoch, who most definitely was his father's son, set out to pervert the sacred knowledge, enslaving it to the augmentation of wickedness and mysticism. This hijacking of sacred knowledge and segregating that powerful knowledge into exclusive and secretive Snake Brotherhoods, by Enoch (and likely Cain), was the naissance to The Genesis 6 Conspiracy. The sullied liberal arts from that point forward were earmarked for the elite, while philosophy was reserved for even fewer.[42]

Consider the list of sinister sacraments Enoch introduced. From astronomy, he created astrology and sun worship. Enoch and his counterparts and descendants became idolaters, worshipping other gods rather than the true God of the universe. Enoch implemented pagan rituals, ceremonies, and rites with this new, repulsive religion. The knowledge could then only be passed on to initiates, the selected guardians of the knowledge that was then cloaked in mysteries and secrets. This is why he was called Enoch, for the Hebrew translation means "initiated or consecrated."[43]

Lamech was the other descendant of Cain who achieved notoriety with respect to the perversion of the sciences and the naissance to the Genesis 6 Conspiracy. From the Oliver Legend we learn the nefarious application of the sciences waned sometime after Enoch but was once more renewed under Lamech and his children. The children of Lamech not only maintained these perverted practices but also cultivated them. One can then deduce that the three sons and one daughter of Lamech listed in Genesis would have been the key progeny in further contaminating the Seven Sacred Sciences and the entire antediluvian world.[44]

Lamech brings us back to the sixth generation, where descendants of Cain were so corrupt, so violent, and so anti-God they became susceptible to another nefarious outside influence. Lamech, Lamech's progeny, and likely other Cainites used their daughters of men to violate the divine rules of creation. An outside force partnered with the descendants of Cain, thoroughly violating what was left of their innocence, so as to leave their original nature unrecognizable. Numerous biblical legends recorded the daughters of Cain coupling with the sons of God to produce giants.[45]

In the Ethiopian work The Kebra Negast, "the daughters of Cain" was substituted for the phrase "daughters of men"[46] that was employed in the Bible. In fact, the derisive daughters of Cain, according to Andrew Collins, were believed to have been easily led into unbridled debauchery that led to the unholy unions with sons of God.[47] Now, these unexplained Cainite-led “daughters of men,” who curiously increased in great numbers on the earth, seem to refer back to the nomadic “other race” of humans created on day six that Cain married into, those who were blessed obscurely to be fruitful and multiply on the earth.[48] These unexplained humans were not the domesticated, agrarian Sethites.

It is now time to scrutinize the dissonant antediluvian sons of God.

CHAPTER 3

THE SONS OF GOD

Where were you when I laid the earth’s foundations? Tell me, if you understand. Who marked off its dimensions? Surely you know! Who stretched a measuring line across it? On what were its footings set, or who laid its cornerstone—while the morning stars sang together and all the angels shouted for joy?*

—Job 38:4–7

Interpreting that the sons of God were the descendants of the righteous line of Seth is plausible but incorrect. This conclusion is supposition, not fact. The Bible does not support this position whatsoever. So, if the sons of God were not the progeny of Seth, then just who were these unexplained figures?

It is possible to establish whom Scripture refers to, but it does require a little investigative work. To discover just who the sons of God were, we must first turn to Job 1:6–2:1: “One day angels* [the term angels is Hebrew for “the sons of God”] came to present themselves before the Lord.” The defining notation identifying sons of God to be angels is annotated at the bottom of the page in the New International Version. Angel is interchangeable with sons of God. Job further notes the sons of God, or angels, shouting for joy at the creation of the universe. Deuteronomy 32:8 uses the term "the sons of Israel," but if we check the notation at the bottom of the page, we find an intriguing, alternative translation. The NIV Bible (1973 edition) clearly cites that the alternative translation for this appellation is "the sons of God," citing the Masoretic text (the authoritative Hebrew text of the Jewish Bible) the Septuagint, and Dead Sea Scrolls, while the Access Bible prefers "other gods" and also cites the Masoretic Text for its translation.

Nelson's Dictionary cites three variations of the term sons of God as recorded in the Bible.[1] First, it cites Job, as I have with the same conclusion, as well as Genesis 6, where Unger's offers two conclusions: first, that it could mean angels and second that it could also mean human beings (Sethians), for Matthew 22:30 clearly states that angels do not marry.[2] I will clarify the Matthew reference shortly, but I concur with Unger's first option, that sons of God are undeniably angels. Nelson's, however, underscores that those in the Job passages were angels who presented themselves before God along with Satan.[3] I will clarify the third variation of the New Testament sons of God shortly.

Using the alternative angelic sons of god or gods translation in Deuteronomy 32:8 brings logic and definition to the passage; otherwise, the passage would make no sense whatsoever: Israel was not yet a nation in the days of long ago (before the flood), when in generations long past the nations were assigned to angels. Moreover, this alternative Deuteromic translation is supported in the Gnostic gospel Basilides Teachings, which states the earth was divided, along with its various nations, among the angels who helped create the earth, and chief among these angels was the God of the Jews, who wished to subject all nations unto Himself but was repelled by other rulers/ angels that resisted him.[4] This redefined Deuteromic passage will become indispensable when set alongside the disparate antediluvian myths from the pantheistic cultures defining the antediluvian order.

As a critical, historical anecdote, understand that the Greek Septuagint in its original Greek translation, dating from 100 B.C.E. or before, translated this Deuteromic passage as "the sons of God." The point to all this is that the sons of God, according to Scripture, were, indeed, angels. Other sources, such as Unger's Bible Dictionary, support this conclusion that God created both astral and terrestrial beings, with the astral beings renowned as "sons of God" and "hosts of heaven."[5] In fact, sons of God were known as angels or astral beings in many of the early cultures, such as the Canaanites, the Phoenicians, and the Ammonite traditions.[6] Conversely, from the Gnostic perspective, "sons of God" meant heavenly angels; although, the Hebrew original, bene ha-elohim, should really be translated as: "sons of gods."[7]

A learned Christian monk, George Syncellus, in his opus Chronographia from 808 C.E., equated, watchers and Grigori, a specific rank of angel, with sons of God. These watchers took wives from mortal men, producing giants.[8] Remember, Enoch was unexplainably tutored by watchers/angels. Finally, in defining Nephilim, Unger's Dictionary states the sons of God were, in fact, angels,[9] just as "The Other Bible" names the giant angels as the sons of God, who sinned with the daughters of men.[10] This shocking biblical revelation unbelievably recorded angels copulating with humans, producing a new race of humanoids. This is one of the forgotten races that became celebrated in myths and legends as the heroes of the ancient world, men of renown. Josephus also confirmed this vile act saying, that iniquitous angels did indeed couple with daughters of men.[11] Many other sources confirm the very same conclusion, but all have gone relatively unnoticed.

Even The Encyclopedia Americana notes: "History, both sacred and profane, makes mention of giants."[12] The Enochic Book of Giants noted giants were, of course, the offspring of fallen angels.[13] In his book Signs in the Sky, Adrian Gilbert quotes the book of Enoch's statement that fallen angels "begat children with the daughters of men."[14] Gilbert further quoted Enoch's mention of children who became giants that were begat from fallen angels and women.[15] And, again, Alan Alford quoted from the book of Enoch in his book When the Gods Came Down, adding that 200 fallen angels came down from heaven, married women, and had children by them.[16] From the first book of Enoch: "They [the angels] transgressed the word of the Lord, the law of heaven. And behold, they commit sin and transgress the commandment; they have united themselves with women and commit sin together with them; and they have married from among them, and begotten children by them…. And upon the earth they shall give birth to giants, not of the spirit but of the flesh."[17]

In addition, the book of Enoch further recorded watchers/fallen angels that left heaven to sleep with the daughters of men.[18] And finally, from the second book of the Secrets of Enoch, the Grigori, giant fallen angels, went to the earth and saw that the daughters of men were beautiful, whereby they seized them as wives for themselves.[19] Clearly, the antediluvian premise that fallen angels mated with the offspring of humans is not an unknown doctrine; it has simply been shelved by modern Christianity, for it is an embarrassment to rationalize with the arrogant, secular mindset of our times.

Now, with respect to the third argument—that the sons of God were human—as understood from New Testament application, it seems clear to me that the sons of God were not human in the Genesis account, but angelic. The "sons of God" appellation from the New Testament indubitably applies to humans of the New Covenant, just as the phrase "children of God" does. These are those who have accepted Jesus as their Lord and Savior and who have reserved a permanent dwelling in heaven, in the presence of the Holy Spirit. This title was effectively enacted at Pentecost, when the Holy Spirit sealed the New Covenant.[20]

Romans recorded the apostle Paul encouraging Christians not to live according to the flesh but by the Spirit, because those who are led by the Spirit are the sons of God, in a figurative and adopted sense.[21] Nelson's explicates that this is a process described as adoption, by which the believer then becomes a child of God and a joint heir with Jesus.[22] This concept is supported in Galatians, Hebrews, John, Philippians, and the book of 1 John.[23]

Nelson's Dictionary further supports this conclusion regarding the New Testament sons of God, who then became sons of God in a Covenant relationship, adopted and grafted into the Covenant.[24] Nelson's went on to state that the sons of God were part of the Covenant relationship recorded in Isaiah, noting this phrase does not appear with this meaning in the Old Testament, but the idea is implied. For example, God referred to the scattered children of Israel as "His sons and daughters."[25] Hosea 1:10, in a similar fashion, records: "In the place where it was said to them, 'You are not my people,' they will be called the 'sons of the living God." Both Isaiah and Hosea are making clear future references and prophecies concerning the millennium and after, when Israel and Judah will be reunited under one leader:[26] Jesus. Hosea and Isaiah prophesied a promise similar to the New Testament promise that we are the "sons of God," a promise that will be fulfilled in the millennium and afterwards into eternity.

Furthermore, when one looks at the Old Testament application for the appellation "the sons of God," with the exception of Genesis 6, only angels could be in the presence of God or at the point of the creation of the universe or part of the heavenly host in the beginning. Certainly, humans were not present at this time, but the sons of God were. Humans will eventually be elevated to angelic-like status, but this will not occur until the end of the millennial reign.

Finally, Josephus most certainly understood the sons of God in Genesis 6 to be angelic, for this was a constant opinion in antiquity. And keep in mind the fact that Josephus wrote before the assembly of the Canon and from a historical Jewish perspective. He stated, "For many angels of God coupled with women, and begat sons that proved unjust, and despisers of all that was good, on account of the confidence they had in their own strength; for the tradition is, that these men did what resembled the acts of those whom the Grecians call giants. But Noah was very uneasy at what they did."[27]

Interestingly enough, there is debate as to whether or not angels were capable of engaging in sex with humans. This argument generally derives from the notion that nowhere in the Bible does it explicitly suggest angels have any sexual capabilities, nor is there anything to note anywhere else in the Bible of even one fallen angel impregnating a women. But this is only true if you interpret "sons of God" from Genesis 6 as sons of Seth. This argument generally is further followed with testimony from Matthew, stating there will be no more marriage after the Resurrection of saints into eternity, for we will be like angels in heaven.[28]

Answering this argument is really quite simple. Genesis 6 in fact does suggest angels can have sex with humans. Genesis 6 nullifies the notion that angels are not identified as sexual beings. Note as well what 1 Corinthians 11:6–10 says (italics mine): "For man did not come from woman, but woman from man; neither was man created for woman, but woman for man. For this reason, and because of angels, the woman ought to have a sign of authority on her head."[29] The New Testament is recognizing that without a seal of authority, women are fair game for angels, at least for the misguided fallen angels! The church father Tertullianus (160–230 C.E.) seemingly concurred when he noted Paul, in 1 Corinthians 11:10, instructed women ought to wear veils so as to not entice angels, for dark angels love unveiled women with their beautiful hair.[30]

Moreover, I must point out that just because the Bible does not explicitly cite the angelic realm possessing sexual capabilities, the Bible also does not specifically negate this possibility. The notion of no marriage, and thus no sex in heaven, does not clearly state that heavenly beings do not have sexual capabilities. Rather, it only denotes that it does not take place in heaven, home of the spirit beings. Therefore, this does leave open the possibility that angels were, and are, capable of copulating outside of heaven in the world of flesh, even though they may not be authorized to do so.

Humankind is permitted sex because we are mortal. Humans require sex to reproduce; otherwise, we would obviously disappear from existence. Just as the book of Enoch states: "… because they perish, I gave them wives so that they might impregnate them, have children, and have nothing be lacking on earth. But you [angels] were spiritual and immortal for all generations of the world. So I gave you no wives, for heaven is your proper dwelling place."[31] All this underlines the doctrine of no marriage and no sexual encounters in heaven, but just as clearly, this doctrine does not extend outside the heavenly realm, even though there may have been requisite laws governing angelic promiscuity outside of heaven.

Conversely, the Kabbalistic Zohar recognizes angels possess the remarkable ability to transform themselves into either male or female in the physical realm.[32] The Zohar was the first translation of Kabbalism; it was a system of Jewish mythology adopted by mystics and wizards in Europe.[33] An occultist of the Kabbalah, Guillaume Postel, translated it during the Renaissance.[34] Postel was a practicing sorcerer, alchemist, and an expert in Enochian mysticism.[35]

According to the Zohar, angels do not have a sexual gender, even though they can adopt one; this changeling ability documented in the Zohar is held up to be the explanation of how angels were capable of copulating with the daughters of men.[36]

Ginsberg backs up this shape-shifting doctrine.[37] Evidently, angels lost their transcendental qualities while on the earth; they took on sublunary bodies so that they, indeed, could mate with human females,[38] and likely each other, to create lower forms of gods on earth. This doctrine was succinctly captured in The Testament of Reuben: "… for it was thus that they [women] charmed the watchers, who were before the Flood. As they continued looking at the women, they were filled with desire for them and perpetrated the act in their minds. Then they were transformed into human males [italics mine], and while the women were living with their husbands they appeared to them. Since the women's minds were filled with lust for these apparitions, they gave birth to giants."[39]

Let me now quote Jude: "… the angels who did not keep their positions of authority but abandoned their own home—these he kept in darkness, bound with everlasting chains for judgment on the great day. In a similar way, Sodom, Gomorrah, and the surrounding towns, gave themselves up to sexual immorality and perversion" (Jude 1:6–7 niv). Jude is linking sexual perversion of angels during the time of Noah with another form of sexual perversion in Sodom and Gomorrah, and possibly a second postdiluvian violation against creation. This passage, echoing Enochian Scripture, cannot be interpreted any other way; angels most certainly do and did have sexual capabilities.

Referring once more to the Kebra Negast:

> … daughters of Cain with whom the angels sinned, conceived, but they were unable to bring forth children and they died. Of the children who were in their wombs, some died and some did come forth by splitting open the bellies of their mothers. They came forth by their navels, and when they were grown up they became giants.[40]

All the originating Nephilim mothers died, for their physiology could not cope with such monsters. Many of the Nephilim infants died at birth, with only the babies delivered through a barbaric form of Cesarean birth, saving any of them at all. No doubt, it was a panic-stricken butchery of the mothers in favor of the baby demigods that killed the naive mothers. The point of course is that the Kebra Negast also testifies to the fact that angels can be sexual beings if they choose.

Analyzing other non-biblical accounts and references reveals a similar story and conclusion. Giants were renowned by people in many other ancient cultures, such as the Egyptians, Romans, Greeks, Phoenicians, and other Mesopotamian people. Egyptologist R. A. Schwaller De Lubicz, author of the books The Temple of Man and King of Pharonic Theocracy, believes mankind devolved from an advanced race of giants. So, too, did the famous German astronomer, Hans Hoerbiger, author of Glacial Cosmology, believe in the giants of antiquity recorded in the Bible and the Epic of Gilgamesh.[41] All primeval cultures teem with fabulous stories of famous heroes, people of great size and great strength. These superheroes all derived from a sexual union between immortal gods and humans. The most famous of these Titans were Theseus, Hercules, Jason, Cadmus, and Perseus, all who, inexplicably, were avid dragon slayers.

Theseus, the founder of antediluvian Athens[42] and the hero who fought against the Amazons,[43] was born out of wedlock by the gods through Neptune/Poseidon and Aethra.[44] Generally, these Greek superbeings were known as Titans, who all seem to be connected by concealed but close ties to the other giant demigods of the Mediterranean cultures. In Homer's Raising of the Dead, both Pirithous and Theseus were recorded as great friends and mighty sons of gods! Theseus was further described as a being of no ordinary size, a warrior of tremendous strength, quickness, and bravery. He was the cousin of Hercules and a great hero, whom people proclaimed was a "Second Hercules."[45]

Hercules, the most famous of the Greek Titans, was the hero son of Zeus and Alcmena.[46] Hercules was renamed from his birth nomative Alkeides by the prophetess of Delphi. Hercules is famous in legends for his great feats and his participation with the gods in fending off the ten-year Titan rebellion against the gods. Hercules slew the leader of the rebellious giants, Alcyoneus. Hercules is also famous for slaying a dragon in his quest for the Golden Apples (Tree of Life) that granted immortality, which was located in the Garden of Hesperides (Eden).

Jason is the celebrated hero who quested after the Golden Fleece, the Golden Pelt of Aries the Ram, guarded by a dragon. Jason was son of Aeson, King of Thessaly, half-brother to Neleus, and one of the twin sons of Poseidon.[47] Aeson was a Nephilim, and so was Jason. Jason's ship, Argos, was constructed by Argus; his crew was known as the Argonauts. Hercules was a member of Jason's crew.[48]

Cadmus was one of three sons of the Phoenician King Agenor and brother of the female Titan Europa. His two other brothers were Cilix and Phoenix.[49] Cadmus was the founder of antediluvian Thebes and the progenitor of the Egyptian nobles of Thebes. Cadmus is credited in tradition with having taught the Greeks the Phoenician alphabet.[50] Then there was Perseus, who was the fabulous Greek hero, the son of Zeus and Danae, who was led by the infamous and enigmatic Hermes to travel to the Gorgons to slay Medusa.[51]

Central to all the primordial cultures was the famous, mythological sea god Poseidon, who fathered five sets of scurrilous twins through sexual relations with the daughters of men. Poseidon was brother to the god Zeus, the god who overthrew the rebellious Titans.[52] Poseidon‘s twins grew up to be giants, Titan/demigods, who reigned over the mythological continent and civilization of Atlantis. Atlantis was, of course, the mythological civilization that most pantheistic cultures of antiquity linked themselves to as the source for their culture. What is most intriguing with the legends of Atlantis is that the Freemasons would like to recreate the Atlantean antediluvian Age of Enlightenment, which had ten kingdoms with ten governments and ten kings, famous for being the helm of antediluvian world government. Freemasons fever to reincarnate world government, rebuilt with the Atlantean model of ten kingdoms, where fallen angels had regular sexual relations with humans. This is the root doctrine to The Genesis 6 Conspiracy.

The same notions were nourished in the Mesopotamian legends and, in particular, in the various Gilgamesh epics that I will reveal to you in a subsequent chapter. But understand that the Mesopotamian legends burgeon with giants and sexual relations between humans and angels. The giants/demigods that persistently bob their way to the surface from the earliest records of prehistory were all offspring of gods, who were fallen angels; inexplicably, this is an all too common theme in ancient, pantheistic mythology. These bewildering Titans inherited an unabashed, belligerent bias for battle and brutality, just as the Nephilim did. One wonders whether or not there might be a direct relationship between the giants of Greek and other cultural mythologies and the Nephilim of the biblical record. Perhaps the disparate giant mythologies from other cultures were originally rooted in the biblical Nephilim narratives.

Dark angels that committed sexual perversions became branded as “fallen angels;” they rebelled against God, along with Satan. Even though the apostate offspring of angels thrived for a time, God did not look favorably upon the fallen angels, who partook in such a vile act against the laws of creation. God locked the impassioned fallen angels away until the time of the end, in the Abyss,[53] as retribution. These were the unexplained spirits to whom Jesus preached after He was crucified, during the three days he was still in the grave.[54]

After Eden, humankind was granted a mortal spirit, albeit longed-lived because Adam and Eve, and thus their progeny were banished from eating from the tree of life for violating God's instruction to not eat from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. Reference: Genesis 2:9; 6216-18, 3:2-13, 3:21-24; 5:1-32. Then the immortal Spirit of God was transplanted into a new race of humankind via the fallen angels. God then intervened against this perversion to the natural order of creation by restricting the life span of all forms of humankind to 120 years, including the future posterity of the fallen angels and Nephilim.[55] The Qur'an confirms that God, indeed, did intercede to limit all life spans of this world to a fixed time.[56]

From that point on, when: "the Lord said, 'My Spirit will not contend with man forever [or remain in note b], for he is mortal {or he is corrupt}; his days will be a hundred and twenty years" (Genesis 6:3), the original Nephilim were permitted to have children, but the children were strictly beings of the flesh and not of the spirit as the parents were.[57] Before God introduced this edict, it was not uncommon for the descendants of Adam through the Seth branch to live for 300 to 800 years.[58] But then the rebellious angels procreated a race of giants that would live forever, like gods. It is a fantastic notion to believe that angels could produce offspring in cooperation with human females, let alone that they could pass on the inheritance of their immortal spirit through their procreation, but it is factual, just as the Bible testifies.

One can quickly appreciate the anger God must have had to pacify, punish, and imprison those fallen angels for attempting to circumvent the natural order and mortal process of creation, where humankind is destined to endure for a time in order to achieve immortality. Consider the words from the book of Enoch: "… and now, giants, offspring of spirit and flesh, will be called spirits on earth, and the earth shall be their dwelling. Their bodies emitted evil spirits because they were born from human women and holy Watchers."[59]

Evil spirits remained, destined to haunt the earth in spirit form only, after their physical, giant bodies died, just as God ordained His immortal

Spirit would not remain in humans.[60] These roaming immortal spirits of bodiless giants are demons.[61] The immortal spirit did not die from the original Nephilim offspring of angels; only their bodies withered away. God condemned the illicit spirits to the earth, preventing them access to heaven, until the time of the judgment, in which they will be cast into the lake of fire.[62] These are the scurrilous spirits that cause mayhem on earth; they are derisive demons documented in the New Testament.[63] Demons are defined by The New Testament In Today's English as evil spirits with the power to harm people; they are regarded as messengers and servants of the devil.[64] Demons are inferior spirit beings, and Satan is their ruler.[65] They are his ministers.[66] Demons are the vagabond ghost gods of Daoism, followed in homes where families pasted pictures of celestial masters, or talismans, charmed with a red stamp to their doors to guard against the vitriolic, vagabond ghost deities. Dao traditions recorded powerful heroes, believed to be their ancestors, were gods; subsequent Chinese generations worshipped spirits of heroes.[67]

In fact, cult hero worship likely derived from this source. Cult heroes are believed in by the scholar Rhode, based on the glorified spirits/souls of dead, ancient heroes that are worshipped as gods.[68] Cult hero worship was a constant reminder to people of a superior race of mortals, demigods who lived in the Heroic Age. When the hero died, he went on to live a shadowy life in the depths of the earth, but his spirit was still active in the community. Rites at the tomb were designed to appease the anger of the dead hero, who had previously become enraged at the knowledge of his mortality. Heroes were prideful beasts, filled with selfish, excessive hubris. Hubris comes from a Greek word meaning "pride, selfishness, excessive behavior, the refusal to stay within due bounds, and egotism." After the Trojan War, Hesiod noted the refugee Titan remnant fled to the blessed isles on the edge of the world;[69] likely England and Ireland.

Enoch wrote this prophecy:

> … because they are born from men and from the holy Watchers in their beginning and primal origin; they shall be evil spirits on earth, and evil spirits shall they be called…. And the spirits of the giants will afflict, oppress, destroy, attack, do battle, and work destruction on the earth, and cause trouble…. And these spirits shall rise up against the children of men and against the women, because they have proceeded from them.[70]

Collins states that “demons and devils” is a more appropriate term for the evil spirits used in this quote.[71]

In one quick and abhorrent act, dark angels undermined God’s plan for humankind, causing God to react swiftly with imprisonment and divine judgment towards the offending angels, as well as overruling the immortal spirit of the Nephilim, while restricting all new physical life thereafter to a maximum of 120 years (Jude 1:6-8; Genesis 6:3). The immortal spirit was not passed on to subsequent generations, nor did angels ever copulate with human females again (that we are aware of); although, the Sodom and Gomorrah incident leaves this question open for speculation.

If fallen angels were able to pass on their immortal spirit to their offspring, then what other superhuman traits were they able to equip this new race of people with? It is a safe and logical deduction that the Nephilim were not an ordinary race of humanoid; after all, they gained a notable reputation that found its way into the annals of the Bible. They were the heroes of old and men of renown, both before and after the flood.[72] Josephus’s account in Antiquities notes this illegal union produced giants.[73] According to Josephus, this was common knowledge and opinion of antiquity.[74] Not only was the doctrine of giants descending from rebellious angels a doctrine of antiquity, but also this belief was upheld by Christianity until the modern era. All such fantastic and or politically incorrect doctrines have been neatly tucked away in theological vaults, so they will not see the light of day again in our so-called season of tolerance and enlightenment.

But does the Bible confirm the preposterous claim of giants? The answer is yes! Most notably, the book of Numbers makes a clear reference to the Nephilim and their size: “… all the people we saw there were of great size. We saw Nephilim there (the descendants of Anak come from Nephilim). We seemed like grasshoppers.”[75] Look for other references to giants during the time of Noah in the Apocryphal books of Wisdom, Sirach, and Baruch.[76]

Nelson’s Dictionary states that Nephilim translated as giants in several Bible translations, including the King James translation. It goes on to state that giants were god-like creatures produced through the union of fallen angels and the daughters of men. Unger’s Dictionary defines Nephilim as giant demigods, who were considered the sons of angels. Moreover, giants are described by Unger’s as those abnormally tall and powerful, who dwelled in the ancient lands of the Bible. Let it be fully understood:

Nephilim, according to the Bible[77] and other source documents, were, indeed, a forgotten race of giants.

The Enochic Book of Giants clearly states the offspring of fallen angels were giants.[78] From the book of Enoch, we read about a fallen angel known as Azazel, who lay with women, who bore giants into the antediluvian world.[79] The Kebra Negast also confirms that the offspring of women and angels grew up to be giants, [80] just as the first book of Enoch does.[81] The book of Enoch, too, concluded giants were, indeed, the offspring of the sexual union between human females and watchers. Enoch reiterated this conclusion in the second book of the Secrets of Enoch, where Grigori, giant angels, produced marvelous, great men that were giants.[82] In Chronographia, Syncellus revealed a narrative about watchers, who copulated with mortal women to produce giants.[83]

Is it any wonder giants became the ancient world's heroes and men of renown? Nephilim must have quickly gained an amazing reputation among their human rivals, who viewed them with great fear, awe, and wonder. Nephilim would have been the great warriors of their time by virtue of their sheer size and strength. They must have succeeded as leaders of the cities and civilizations. Who could have stood against them? But were they benevolent giants, working for the betterment of all humankind? Or were Nephilim corrupted by their strength and power, blighting the antediluvian age? Before we address these questions, let us first turn to inquire further into the gargantuan Nephilim monsters and the epoch they thrived in.

CHAPTER 4

THE GIANTS OF ANTIQUITY

> Here in early times the famous giants were born.
> —Baruch 3:26

Nephilim (Anakim) were people who struck fear into the hearts of the average man. Carol Rose describes them as enormous and terrifying giants.[1]

Nephilim were great warriors. They were much taller and much larger than the average Israelite and possessed considerably more strength.[2] But does giant refer to just a larger race of humanoid or to a distinct beast that dwarfed humankind? Postdiluvian Israelites described themselves as “mere grasshoppers” compared to Nephilim, known variantly as Anakites. Israelites did not just say the Nephilim were bigger than they were but also that they seemed like insects in their presence![3] This is a startling but graphic comparison. Anakites were considered in biblical legend to be giant demigods: half men and half angels; even their daughters were giants who possessed enormous size and strength.[4] In Peake’s Commentary on the Bible (1962 Edition), N. H. Snaith states that the term Anak defined a strain of giants that survived the deluge and inhabited the hill country of Palestine before the conquest by Israel.[5]

We must be clear on this point. Nephilim were giants. The Old Testament, the Apocrypha, Josephus, the Gnostic gospels, and a myriad of other sources, all testify to the same. These giants, did indeed have a large impact on the evolution of both the antediluvian and postdiluvian worlds, but before we dig deeper into their legacy in ancient history, let us first quantify just what we mean by giants so as to better understand who these monsters were.

Their size was staggering. Goliath—I will later link Goliath to the Nephilim—was affirmed to be over nine feet tall.[6] That would be four feet taller than the average height of a person of that time, or almost twice as tall! Iris Freelander, an ordained minister, who holds hold degrees in psychology and theology, notes that depending on which Bible scholar tells the Goliath narrative, he was anywhere from eight and a half feet to thirteen and a half feet tall.[7] In antiquarian measurements, Goliath's height was six cubits and one span.[8] A cubit was either a common eighteen inches or twenty-one royal inches, while a span was nine inches.[9] This then tallied Goliath's height at nine feet, nine inches on the common measure, but because Goliath was of royal Nephilim bloodlines, one could argue Goliath's true height at eleven feet, three inches. That calculation would align perfectly with an account from the time of Alexander, where a conversation between Midas and Silenus noted Titans grew to twice the size of humans and lived twice as long.[10]

King Og of the Amorites owned a bed that was more than thirteen feet long and six feet wide,[11] requiring him to be at least nine feet tall, and even up to twelve to thirteen feet tall. Og was described in legend as being of such immense size that waters only lapped at his ankles.[12] All of Og's beds and furniture were made from iron, for his weight would crush any furniture made of wood.[13] We can only speculate as to what size some giants may have grown to or even how large the pure original offspring might have been, before they intermingled with humankind, diluting their size and strength throughout the generations. The Genesis giants must have been monsters.

We can only attempt to imagine beings that were nine feet tall or taller, with body weight ranging from 600 to 900 pounds of pure muscle. Nephilim were not just extraordinarily tall like the modern basketball player. Nephilim were built more like the modern football player or the modern WWF wrestler. Fallen ones recorded in Theogany by Hesiod (907 B.C.E.) were described as a monstrous race ("fallen ones" translated from Hebrew into Greek is gigantes),[14] just as Nephilim is translated from

Hebrew into Greek as giants.[15] They were bulked by muscle, gifted with strength. Og's height to breadth ratio, as a classic example, was an astonishing two to one, establishing Og as being incredibly broad, for the average human maintains a three to one ratio.[16] Furthermore, Nephilim were fleet of foot and famous for their quickness, dexterity, and adeptness with their hands.[17]

Nephilim inflicted terror with both their height and their breadth. They were powerful beasts, who dressed with armor and weaponry that would force the average man to collapse from the weight.[18] This no doubt left the average man awestruck with amazement and fear, especially when they'd see such feats of strength and the giants sporting their armor into battle and then waging war from underneath it. They were known to have a company of menservants just to carry their armor behind them; the average man could only bear to carry one piece of their armor at a time, thus requiring a harem of servants. Nephilim were fearsome warriors, heroes of old.

Some were described as having six fingers on each hand and six toes on each foot.[19] Similarly, Carol Rose describes Og as having multiple fingers and multiple toes, insinuating that Og possessed more than five of each.[20] The hands and feet must have been intimidating not only from their great size but also from their mutation. Size twenty-five or thirty foot-wear (modern measurements) would not have been unusual. The notion that these giants were a mutated form of humankind is much more than mere speculation. Josephus confirmed the same scenario that the Nephilim possessed an extra finger and toe on each hand and each foot.[21]

One needs to only reason that such large beings must have been designed and bioengineered differently in order to support such size and weight. Unless these beings in fact were engineered differently, they could not have been considered mighty warriors or heroes of old. They would have been considered deformed, uncoordinated, pathetic creatures, deserving more of our sympathy than our respect or fear because of the terrible beasts that they were. Without specifically altered bioengineering, Nephilim would have been nothing more than ancient sideshow freaks.

We look to Josephus once more for rare insights as to whether or not Nephilim were indeed a mutated form of humankind or just mere sideshow freaks. Josephus indicated that the countenances of the giants were entirely unique from normal human anatomy.[22] Nephilim descendants were terrible and surprising to the sight, just as they were fearsome to the hearing. The translation is simply that Nephilim were a very frightening attack on the senses due to their monstrous size and the thunderous strength of their voices. In addition, Nephilim were terrible to look upon, just as their serpentine fathers had been, for they both possessed the face of a viper,[23] a snake.

More importantly, though, Josephus placed into the historical record that even the bone structure of giants was unlike that of normal human beings, which, as I have already underlined, must have been the case for those giants to have supported their great size and weight.[24] Josephus does not indicate exactly what the differences might be, only that they were quite different than those of normal humankind. This completely different Nephilim bone structure may explain why contrived scientific investigations discount fossil bones attributed to giants as possibly (but not conclusively) being assigned to mastodons or mammoths.[25]

Josephus went on to state that the bones of those creatures were kept on public display for all to wonder at. In fact, they were on public display even up to the time of Josephus, which clearly tells us that these anatomical wonders were available to view up to and as late as 70 C.E.[26] Even more startling, living giants were publicly viewed as spectacles and wonders in Rome. Posio and Secundillia, a giant and giantess in the time of Augustus, were both ten feet, three inches tall. Gabbaras, a giant from the time of the reign of Claudius, was nine feet, four inches tall, while a Thracian giant was measured at nine feet tall during the reign of Maximin.[27] Publicly displayed Nephilim bones do not describe what the bones were like, but they do contrast the significant anatomical uniqueness of these bones. The bone structure of those giants must have been a marvel to gaze upon, based not only on their size but also on many other anatomical things as well; at least, we can speculate that this must be the case since they held public attention for so long a period and still confuse modern scientists as to the nature of their fossils.

Indeed, in addition to the Josephus record, giant skeletons have even been confirmed by archaeological recovery, as noted by Charles Sellier, where he quotes Charles Missler, an author and researcher published in more than forty publications. Missler insisted there is absolute, scientific evidence for tribes of giants, confirmed by archaeological recovery of oversized skeletons in Palestine. Missler went on to note tall, fair-skinned

Anakim and Rephaim were memorialized on several Egyptian monuments.[28]

The countenances of Nephilim weave their way throughout the historical record of the Old Testament, appearing and reappearing in various names of peoples. Deuteronomy and Numbers list the many varied names of the Nephilim races in the postdiluvian period:

> I have given the land of Ar to the descendants of Lot as a possession. (The Emites used to live there—a people strong and numerous and as tall as the Anakites. Like Anakites, they too were considered Rephaites, but the Moabites called them Emites).
> —Deuteronomy 2:9–11, (emphasis added)

> That too was considered the land of the Rephaites, who used to live there, but the Ammonites called them Zamzummites. They were people strong and numerous, and as tall as the Anakites. The Lord destroyed them from before the Ammonites, who drove them out and settled in their place. The Lord had done the same for the descendants of Esau, who lived in Seir, when he destroyed the Horites from before them. They drove them out and lived in their place to this day. And as for the Avvites who lived in the villages as far as Gaza, the Caphtorites coming out of Caphtor destroyed them and settled in their place.
> —Deuteronomy 2:20–23

“We saw Nephilim there (the descendants of Anak come from Nephilim),” states Numbers 13:32. We must conclude then that Nephilim not only survived the flood but also flourished as a distinct race in the early postdiluvian age. Anakite and Rephaite references suggest they were considered the root or surviving giant nations from the flood. Various nations, however, applied their own vernacular names, such as Emites, Zamzummites, Horites, Avvites, and as we will later investigate, possibly even Amorites and Amalekites. The shared scriptural designation among various postdiluvian Nephilim was Rapha. Rapha appears regularly and without coincidence in the David and Goliath story. Rephaim is regularly understood as “ancient giants” in the King James translation.[29]

From further examining postdiluvian Nephilim nations, we can reconstruct an accurate picture of the Nephilim appearance. First let us look to define Anak: “long necked, i.e. a giant,”[30] that the sun touched their necks[31] because they were so long, like those of snakes. Zamzummites were noisemakers,[32] which likely accounts for Josephus accounting Nephilim as fearsome to the hearing. Author Frank Joseph describes the godlike giants having voices like Atlas’s, when he bellowed from the depths of his mountain.[33]

Nephilim were believed to have a frightening (snake-like) appearance, just as Josephus and others have stated. They were terrible to behold, just as emim translates as “inspiring fear,” and rephaim translates as “causing one’s heart to grow weak at a glance.”[34] To be specific, Josephus described the Anak as a famous race of giants that were of such tremendous size, and that their countenance was so completely different compared to humans, that the Anak were extraordinarily surprising, frightening, and terrible to both the senses of sight and hearing.[35]

Nephilim mirrored their fathers, fallen angels, for watchers possess the face of a viper[36]—serpents identified as seraphim,[37] employed as liaisons between heaven and earth.[38] Satan took the form of a seraph when he deceived Eve in the Garden of Eden.[39] Serpent-like angels were recorded in the Gnostic gospel Origin of the World, possessing faces that were long and narrow, prominent cheekbones, elongated jawbones, thin lips, and slanted eyes (similar to aliens), while their offspring looked just like them.[40]

In fact, Nephilim and watchers were both referred to by the antediluvians as serpents.[41] Unaccounted for long-headed skulls, dating back to the antediluvian epoch, have been unearthed in both Sumer and Egypt, lending further credence to the viper look of the Nephilim. Further, Nephilim eyes were said to have been glowing and solid gold or honey colored, while their skin was white and rough.[42] The mythological antediluvian Titans of Greek lore were originally acknowledged to be born of the gods Gaia and Uranus; the Titans were part human and part serpents,[43] according to Carol Rose, just as they were an interracial specie of human women and seraphim angels. Atlantean Titans were known to have sharp aquiline features, determined mouths, oval heads, with a slight upward slant to their eyes.[44]

Let’s include in this debate the fact that the Egyptian official insignia of kingship for Egypt was the cobra,[45] and the portrayal of serpent-like creatures in antiquity starts to become real. The cobra was unaccountably etched onto the crowns of Egypt from 4000 B.C.E., and perhaps before.[46] Note too, as previously discussed, Egyptian monuments recorded both Anakim and Rephaim as unusually tall and fair-skinned.

Postdiluvian Nephilim are also captured in Canaanite art, which clearly portrays beings with long, serpentine necks, heads like cobras, small mouths and coffee bean eyes.[47] Rephaim, surprisingly enough, crop up often in Canaanite texts, where the appellation translates as “divine beings."[48] We will return many times to the Canaanites in this book, with particular reference to Nephilim and their cult of the bull.

Again, similar images of serpentine beings have been found in ancient monuments from both Egypt and Central America, which ostensibly date back to the antediluvian epoch.[49] These sculptures appear to be images of long-necked and sloped-headed Anakites.

According to biblical scholar and author J. R. Porter, archaeologists have revealed that serpents were widely venerated in Egypt, the Near East cultures, and not least, in Canaan.[50] Similarly, the Ubaid culture of ancient southern Mesopotamia, a culture which Gardner suggests as predating the Sumerian culture, portrayed their gods and goddesses with distinct serpentine facial characteristics.[51] Generally speaking, the Ubaid culture refers to a period of civilization in lower Mesopotamia from 4000–5000 B.C.E., while the Uruk period was classified as 4000–3200 B.C.E., with 3200–2900 B.C.E. being the Jemdat Nasr period.[52] The Jemdat Nasr is the time of the flood.

In this context then, Ninkhursag, goddess of the Sumerian pantheon, was referred to as the "Serpent Lady," just as the shadowy, giant Sumerian demigods, the Anunnaki, were referred to in the Kur-Sag Epic as princes and splendid serpents.[53] In the same spirit, Eve was associated with fertility goddesses of the Near East, where Eve's name somehow derived from or is related to the word snake, and Eve was an original serpent goddess of fertility and life.[54]

Inserting a strange anecdote out of archaeology, one finds an unexpected practice that was prevalent among the aristocracies and priesthoods of two seemingly distant and unrelated cultures. The postdiluvian cultures of Central Americans and Scythians from the Tartarus and Transylvania Black Sea region practiced a mysterious ritual of flattening the forehead to represent a receding skull, a viper-like trait. The Scythians believed that such an appearance gave a certain aristocratic distinction.[55]

As for the Central Americans, the practice of flattening the skull was likely an attempt to approximate the image of an early civilized and dominant people,[56] perhaps the Nephilim. Remember, as well, that the Central American culture and religions were oozing with serpentine imagery.

And finally, Ignatius Donnelly, the famous author of one of the oldest and definitive books concerning Atlantis, Atlantis, The Antediluvian World, states this: “We have but to compare these lines with the skulls of the Egyptians, Kurds, and the heroic type of heads in the status of the gods of Greece, to see that there was an ancient race marked by a receding forehead.”[57]

Finally, biblical records and legends did record an interesting anecdote regarding the physical attributes of Nephilim at the birth of Noah. Lamech mistook the holy nature of Noah as possessing the startling physical characteristics of baby Nephilim.[58] This was additionally described in the first book of Enoch:

> And after some days my son, Methuselah, took a wife for his son Lamech, and she became pregnant by him and bore him a son. And his body was as white as snow and as red as a rose; the hair of his head as white as wool and his demdema [long, curly hair] beautiful; and as for his eyes, when he opened them the whole house glowed like the sun…. And his father, Lamech, was afraid of him and fled and went to Methuselah his father; and he said to him, “I have begotten a strange son. He is not like a human being, but looks like the children of the angels of heaven to me, his form is different and not like us…. It does not seem to me that he is of me, but of angels.”[59]

So, too, did Atlantean giants, according to Frank Joseph, author of The Destruction of Atlantis, possess ruddy, white skin, with blond and red hair and glowing eyes.[60] We will learn of other ancient giants that also possessed fair skin and were known as lucent, or “shining gods,” and giants such as the Tuatha Denaan and fairy folk from the Ring Lord tradition, whose appearance was identical to the portraits etched into the Egyptian monuments.

In short, the colossal Nephilim were a race of giants that were tall in stature and mighty in size, strength, and dexterity. They were voracious hunters with unending appetites. Their appearance was frightful to the eyes and their sounds harsh to the ears. Nephilim were beasts with long necks and faces like serpents, similar to aliens we now mythologize. They were indeed a mutation onto themselves, a distinct race that partnered with misguided humans to sponsor Snake Brotherhoods that eventually usurped all the governments of the antediluvian age.

CHAPTER 5

THE SCHISM OF ANTEDILUVIAN FREEMASONRY

Cain was then building a city, and he named it after his son Enoch.

—Genesis 4:17

Most of what has been tabled with regard to the introduction of the original pantheistic or pagan religion has been speculation. Therefore, how did this new, heretical, antediluvian religion introduced by Cain's progeny impact the antediluvian epoch?

This spurious religion enforced by Nephilim somehow swept the people into utter rebellion against God the Most High, which led directly to the deluge. The Encyclopedia Americana described the giant rebellion as a struggle against the "order of creation," against the gods[1] (God). It is this obscure, ancient, antediluvian mysticism that has been reborn in our generation, to a frightful level of hidden authority and power, breathing new life to The Genesis 6 Conspiracy.

Let us once more fall back to the Legends of the Craft preserved by the Masonic Brotherhood. As we learned in chapter two, the Seven Sacred Sciences taught to Adam by God in Eden were passed onto both Seth and Cain. Cain grew to be a hater of the true God, living in total defiance, rebelling against God, and corrupting, along with his descendants, all the Sacred Sciences.

Cain's posterity polluted these Sacred Sciences with idolatry and mysticism, applying the knowledge for their own impious agendas. It was this corruption of divine knowledge mixed with pantheism that was then intermingled with the offspring of angels, which formed the axis of The Genesis 6 Conspiracy. Nephilim were sprinkled throughout the antediluvian world, with superior size and strength to enforce the new, mystical state religion. Nephilim combined their power with idolatrous pantheism, which left no restrictions on the application of their power, both physical and abstract.

As I mentioned the divine knowledge of the Seven Sciences was passed on to both Cain and Seth. This was the antediluvian split, known as "the Schism of Freemasonry," according to Dr. Oliver and the Oliverian Theory, recognized as the "pure" and the "spurious."[2] This schism of antediluvian Freemasonry can be more easily understood as the wedge splitting monotheism away from spurious, mystical polytheism.

Webster's New Compact Format Dictionary defines spurious as "bastard, illegitimate, not genuine, sham, forged, simulating, but essentially different." And this is exactly what took place. Masonry practiced by the descendants of Cain right up until the flood was the bastard form of the divine knowledge, practiced in a manner that simulated the pure form but was intrinsically different at the core. Masonry, as Dr. Oliver continues, was a relic from idolatrous mysteries embedded in the antediluvian schism, descending from the spurious branch of the Seven Sciences.[3]

As the day of the deluge approached, something had to be done by the spurious forces. Again, in the Oliverian theory of the Legend of the Craft, it was the children of Lamech, those curious children whose names found their way into the book of Genesis for no real apparent reason other than their being the inventors of a few innocuous skills and trades (Jabal, Jubal, Tubal-Cain, and Naamah), who preserved and then revitalized the spurious branch.[4] They were not recorded in Scripture for their positive contribution but rather for their sullied influences. They were not heroes to be revered but rather infamous curators of evil.

Their vile legacy was not confined to just the antediluvian age, however. The children of Lamech additionally were credited with preserving the Corrupted Sciences on two pillars designed to survive the deluge so that numinous religions could be transmitted via hieroglyphics to the postdiluvian world to corrupt that age,[5] and thus continuing The Genesis 6

Conspiracy. As we will soon discover, the children of Lamech were very successful in transmitting those heretical doctrines of corruption to the postdiluvian world. Again, this further underscores the legitimacy for Scripture recording Lamech's children by name for their incredulous infamy.

Conversely, Seth's posterity was the righteous branch of Adam's seed. Seth was recorded in the Oliver Legend as only associating with the most virtuous men of his age, known as the sons of light.[6] His posterity remained righteous, uncorrupted by the progeny of Cain, until the seventh generation, during the time of Methuselah, son of Enoch. Seth presided over the Craft until the time of Enoch, when Seth appointed Enoch leader and keeper of the uncorrupted Sacred Sciences.

Enoch, too, was a righteous man, recorded in Scripture as walking with God. Enoch was so righteous that God raptured Enoch to heaven without his suffering the first death.[7] Only two other saints in biblical history were afforded such an honor: Elijah and the disciple Jesus loved.[8] Most Christians believe that the disciple Jesus loved was John, but it is more likely it was Nethanael, even though Gnostics believe it was Mary Magdalene. Nethanael was not included amongst the twelve named apostles although Phillip was (Matthew 10:1-4; Mark 3:13-19; Luke 6:12-16) even though Jesus called Phillip and Nethanael at the same time (John 1:43-51). Nethanael disappears thereafter which seems very odd to me, but one presumes he remained amongst the disciples after be called. Note what Jesus said when He first met Nethanael: "Here is a true Israelite, in whom there is nothing false' (John 1:47); "How do you know me?" Nethanael asked. Jesus answered, "I saw you while you were still under the fig tree before Phillip called you." Then Nethanael declared, [and right from their first meeting and well before Peter acknowledge Jesus as such] "Rabbi, you are the Son of God; you are the King of Israel." (John 1:48-49); "you shall see greater things than that." He then added, "I tell you the truth, you shall see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending on the Son of Man [implying Nethanael would be present at Jesus' ascension] (John 1:50-51. Then at the last supper: "Peter turned and saw that the disciple Jesus loved was following them. (this was the one who had leaned back against Jesus at the supper and had said, "Lord, who is going to betray you?") When Peter saw him he asked, "Lord what about him?" Jesus answered, "If I want him to remain alive until I return, what is it to you?

You must follow me.” Because of this, the rumor spread among the brothers that this disciple would not die. But Jesus did not say that he would not die; he only said, “If I want him to remain alive until I return what is that to you?” This is the disciple, who testifies to these things and who wrote them down. We know that his testimony is true.” (John 21:2025). All twelve apostles, including Matthias who replaced Judas Iscariot were present at Jesus’s ascension and afterwards when two angels descended and ascended to heaven with Jesus when the heavens opened up to receive Jesus (Acts 1:7-14), but the one praised seemingly beyond the other disciples and called by Jesus from under the fig tree was not named. Odd indeed unless Nethanael is indeed the one Jesus loved.

Whoever it is, though, the person must be male, for he was recorded as “he” in the book of John.[9] Both Elijah and the disciple Jesus loved have been reserved to return to earth during the tribulation to suffer the first death.[10] Only the elect of the saints during the tribulation of the last days will receive the same tribute as Enoch by not suffering the first death; they will be raptured and transformed directly into heaven.[11]

Josephus recorded Seth’s posterity as people who imitated the virtues of Seth, for he was virtuous and of good character.[12] Josephus also recorded, just as the History of Freemasonry does, that the posterity of Seth were inventors of the peculiar wisdom of astronomy.[13] Because the progeny of Seth all the way to Noah were all agrarians, knowledge of the planets and seasons was vital to their prosperity. Their specialization may have been very advanced astronomy, but Seth and his descendants were very well versed in all of the other six sciences.[14] This continued until the seventh generation.

The Anderson version of Craft Legend recorded the righteous employment filtered down to the select few who remained loyal to the true God, until eventually there was just one righteous man of his day, Noah[15] The pure brand worked in direct opposition to the polluted variety employed by Cain’s posterity.[16] The pure brand included worshipping and honoring of the true God, with no rites and ceremonies;[17] whereas the spurious brand did not credit God for anything. They worshipped a pantheon of gods inundated with idols, rites, ceremonies, and mysticism. The Oliverian Theory notes Seth’s descendants continued the pure approach, void of so-called sacred but secretive symbols and ceremonies employed by Cain’s branch. Sethians practiced a system of morals and pure religion.[18]

The pure branch survived the deluge through Noah, the last of the Keepers of the antediluvian epoch. It resurfaced immediately following the deluge through Noah’s three sons Ham, Shem, and Japheth, who continued the practice in a more limited manner.[19] Noah, according to Kabbalists, was a wisdom figure who understood the secret Mysteries; he was thought to know the mysteries of the highest angels and of all living things[20] from the Mysteries of wisdom taught to Adam, wisdom that may have been recorded in lost Scriptures called the Book of Light and the Book of Creation.[21]

In the Gnostic gospel The Apocalypse of Adam, Adam passed down to his son, Seth, and his seed, Adam’s heavenly knowledge, despite the so-called attempt of the Creator to destroy humankind through the flood:[22]

> Now then, my son Seth, I will reveal to you the things which those men whom I saw before me at first revealed to me after I have completed the times of this generation and the years of the generation have been accomplished. For rain-showers of the God Almighty will be poured forth so that he might destroy all flesh from the earth by means that which is around them, along with those from the seed of the men who passed the life of knowledge, that came from me and Eve your mother. For they were strangers to him.… And no seed will come from you [Noah] of the men who will not stand in my presence in another glory. Then they will become as the cloud of the great light. Those men will come who have been cast forth from the knowledge of the great Aeons and angels.[23]

And so, we have uncovered the manner in which both the spurious and the pure brands of the heavenly Sciences survived the deluge to impress themselves once more on the postdiluvian world via the pure branch bridging the deluge through Noah and the spurious branch bridged the deluge via the Pillars of Lamech. Only this time, the polluted branch did not marry with the postdiluvian Nephilim with the same degree of success, sparing that epoch from the horrors of the antediluvian age, until the end of this age, our generation. Even so, the Spurious Sciences did marry another disturbing and overlooked force of antiquity at Babel.

Bringing forth all this anecdotal information on the antediluvian religious sciences forms the basic understanding in comprehending the corrupted snake religions and Snake Societies that spawned from the preservation of the heavenly knowledge, which then caused the flood. Revealing the basic forms of mystical pantheism that germinated from the Seven Sacred Sciences is elemental to comprehending the collective impact Enochian mysticism imprints on modern society.

Understand, as well, that the era before the incorporation of the Royal Society, the introduction of modern thought, was a time before religion tolerated what science had to say. This was an indefensible era that was intolerant to new ideas and concepts, even though it was an era loyal to the literal translation of Scripture.

Since the naissance of modern science, theology has been infected with allegorical interpretation. It is this great schism between literal and interpretative translation that divided the literalists of Christianity, the early Christian churches of Jerusalem and then Rome, from the interpretists that formed numinous sects of early Christianity and the mystical, interpretive forces of the modern era, which have worked their way secretly into contemporary Christianity.

The allegorical versus literal interpretation is the modern wedge of The Genesis 6 Conspiracy. In The Cathars, Malcolm Lambert describes this schism from the Gnostic perspective in this way:

> … then, at the very moment when Christianity triumphed over multiple competitors to become the state religion of the Rome Empire, the Devil pulled off his most cunning trick, a clique within the Church that insisted on literal translation of the Scriptures—rather than the more allegorical approach favored by Gnostic Christians—seized control and rapidly began to persecute as heretics all those who disagreed with them…. Church Father John Chrysostom (347–407 C.E.), who is indeed known for his ‘literalist’ views, was a ring leader of this clique of early heresy-hunters.[24]

We must now sidestep briefly to investigate an exceptionally puzzling antediluvian patriarch credited with much related to the defining nature of the Sacred Sciences. We need to consider whether or not his application of sciences ought to be considered spurious or pure. This famous patriarch was Enoch, the founder of mysticism and author of several apocryphal books of Scripture.

CHAPTER 6

ENOCH AND HERMES

> When Enoch had lived 65 years, he became the father of Methuselah. And after he became the father of Methuselah, Enoch walked with God 300 years and had other sons and daughters. Altogether, Enoch lived 365 years. Enoch walked with God; then he was no more, because God took him away.
> —Genesis 5:21–24

There can be no question that Enoch, fifth generation from Seth, keeper of the pure branch of the heavenly Sciences, must be considered an untouchable when considering the sources of the spurious branch.

And mysteriously, it is on the very same ecclesiastical Enoch and his progeny that Freemasonry and the spuriously evolved forms of postdiluvian pantheism also stake their claim.

But if Freemasonry, and its forefathers, the postdiluvian, pantheistic religions, are and were the corrupted branch of the sacred knowledge as I have and will continue to put forward, then how can Freemasonry make such an outlandish claim? Surely, one of the most righteous people of all time could not be associated with the rebellious and perverted branches of religious worship, let alone one of the key instigators causing the flood. Let us then investigate the connections of Enoch to the spurious branch of Freemasonry.

Craft legends overflow with their self-proclaimed evidence declaring Enoch, his forefathers, and his posterity as patriarchs for their ancient society. Quite frankly, Enoch is looked upon as the Craft's legendary founder[1] equally with his descendants, Lamech and the sons and daughters of Lamech.[2] In the sixth generation after Seth, Seth appointed Enoch as his successor as the Keeper of the Craft, celebrated in Freemasonry as the Grand Superintendent. When Enoch resigned his position of authority, he appointed his son Lamech to reign over the government of the Craft. Lamech appointed Noah as Grand Superintendent, who reigned as Overlord of the Craft until the time of the flood.[3]

According to the Orientalists' version, Enoch received a divine gift from God. He subsequently filled thirty volumes with sacred knowledge from heaven. Enoch amassed great knowledge in astronomy; he was an expert in science, geometry, and masonry.[4] Furthermore, Enoch was attributed with perhaps the greatest of all human inventions, for Egyptians attributed him with inventing letters and writing, as do Greeks and Romans.[5] Some even suggest that Enoch was the founder of books and the art of building.[6] The form of writing that Enoch created was, and is, called hieroglyphics, translated as "sacred carvings," from Greek hieras, meaning "sacred," and gluphein, meaning "to carve." This was a picture language, representing objects and geometric symbols. Enoch invented hieroglyphics solely for the intent of preserving and communicating throughout the generations the knowledge of the heavenly sciences. The Jewish writer Bar Hebraeus noted the same about Enoch, who did so while building many cities and teaching others the arts.[7]

Enoch was considered a kind of supreme being; through him humankind was incomprehensibly elevated and placed in communication with God. Enoch was similar to the Greek god Mercury, which is also consistent with Enoch having walked with God.

Thus far, all appears to be correct and compatible with what the Bible recorded concerning Enoch, but once we burrow past this point regarding Freemasonry's historical recollection concerning Enoch, substantive paradoxes begin to coalesce that become irreconcilable with the ecclesiastic Enoch.

Freemason legends unaccountably connect their legendary Enoch to well beyond his time in the antediluvian epoch. This perplexing Enoch was vicariously considered the founder of the Egyptian religion. To the Egyptians, Enoch was renowned alternatively as Hermes. Through Hermes, the Egyptians communicated with the gods, just as Enoch and Mercury did. Hermes was concluded to be an ancient Egyptian priest, who was the inventor of all the sciences, again consistent with the recollection of Enoch. The Egyptian Hermes was also accredited with the writing of 36,525 books on all kinds of knowledge, once more, just as Enoch did. Hermes was additionally enlisted as the patron saint of Alchemists.[8]

Enoch (Hermes) was further reputed to be Taut (Thoth) in other legends, the Egyptian god of science and writing; he was deified by the Egyptians and placed alongside Osiris and Isis in stature. Hermes, synonymous with Thoth, was the mythical counselor to both Osiris and Isis,[9] and surprisingly, he was a moon god.[10] Thoth was the god who identified evil for humankind and the god who provided the remedy to evil. He is believed to have lived around 3000 B.C.E. or before,[11] once again, consistent with the life of Enoch.

Thoth was the keeper of the magical arts that made him the Master of the Gods, the one who revealed all knowledge of the Seven Sacred Sciences and religion to humankind.[12] Thoth was the one who transmitted mystical secrets to his obscure followers, members of a reticent Snake Order we will examine later. Thoth, too, was regarded to be the deity credited with being the god of wisdom, the inventor of letters and writing. Thoth was transformed into a god through wisdom.[13] We know also from other sources that Thoth invented hieroglyphs and was the one who brought science, geometry, and architecture to humankind.[14]

Thoth was further celebrated as the Greek Hermes.[15] The Greeks and Romans identified Hermes with their pantheistic god Mercury.[16] Mercury was the patron deity of learning, the chosen scribe for the plethora of gods. He served as their ordained messenger, again consistent with that of Enoch’s responsibilities. Mercury was the son of Zeus (Jupiter) and Maia;[17] Mercury also was attributed with the invention of writing. In addition, Mercury signed sentences onto the souls of the dead.[18]

Unger's recites a similar version, conceding Hermes was Mercury and that Hermes was the son of the god Zeus and the (Nephilim) daughter of Atlas, a person named Naiad. Unger's further claims Hermes wore winged sandals (eerily identical to medical snake motifs), as well as wings on his hat, all the while being a guide for the dead into the underworld.[19]

Even though Enoch was rendered to be Hermes/Thoth among the Egyptians and Mercury was Enoch's appellation among the Greeks, Enoch was also known as Hermes among the Greeks. The Greeks, interestingly enough, identified their Hermes/Mercury with Thoth/Hermes of Egypt, believing he built the pyramids in Egypt.

Adding to Enoch's alternative reputation, the mystical Hebrews, according to Timothy Freke and Peter Gandy, who co-wrote The Hermetica, The Lost Wisdom of the Pharaohs, referred to Enoch as Idris.[20] The Phoenicians knew Enoch as Thaut, which is very close to the Egyptian Taut or Thoth, while the Arabians knew Enoch as Edris.

The twelfth-century C.E. Sufi philosopher Yayha Sufrawardi claimed ancient Sages preached a single doctrine of wisdom revealed to Hermes, whom Yahya identified with one unified individual—Idris of the Qur'an, who is Enoch of the Bible.[21] Sufis believe the first of three Hermeses lived during the antediluvian epoch in Upper Egypt; he was skilled in the sciences and was originally identified as Idris, whom the Jews call Enoch.[22] Some conclude that the Qur'an equates Hermes with Idris, the one who lived before the flood (Enoch), while other Islamic scholars also equate Idris with one who lived in Babylon and was mentor to Pythagoras and to another who lived in Alexandria, forming the Trismegistus.[23] This most famous of individuals to so many ancient cultures, seemingly known by many names, appears to be one individual.

There were three beings in Egyptian mythology that held the name Hermes, as recorded by Manetho the Egyptian priest and quoted by Syncellus.[24] Hermes Trismegistus implies three greatest Hermeses (thrice). Trismegistus means "thrice greatest" because of his knowledge of science.[25] However, in my opinion, this definition could also mean three different individuals known as "Thoth the god," Enoch the antediluvian patriarch, and of course, Hermes the postdiluvian father/priest of the Mysteries. And as it turns out, Hermes, better known as Hermes Trismegistus, was more than just one individual.

The first Hermes Trismegistus lived before the deluge; he invented writing and the stylus, whereby the children of Lamech inscribed the Sacred Sciences onto pillars. Hermes/Thoth/Enoch was worshipped as a god, but he was still a man, a man who wrote secrets on an obelisk for the benefit of future generations because of the impending deluge,[26] and he was also the Enoch who constructed nine hidden vaults to protect the seven spurious sciences from the impending deluge.[27] This was indeed an antediluvian Enoch, but he was not necessarily the ecclesiastic Enoch.

The second Hermes was traditionally thought to be the son of a person called Agathodemon; although, as we will learn in the last chapters, the Gnostics have a completely different twist on which Hermes was called by that name. It was this postdiluvian Hermes of Babel who was believed to have translated the precepts of the first Hermes from the antediluvian epoch from the Pillars of Lamech.

The third Hermes was thought to be synonymous with Thoth, the counselor to Osiris and Isis, the patron god of science and knowledge in the era of Babel. Thoth may or may not have been Hermes/Enoch, for wisdom was said to have transformed the mortal Hermes/Enoch into a god. Secondly, the god-like Thoth may have been a fallen angel who begat an ultra-secret Snake Order, which then corrupted the heavenly knowledge illegally derived, and perhaps Thoth was the fallen angel Azazel. Whichever the case, the third party of Hermes Trismegistus in this version was entrenched in postdiluvian Egyptian mythology and religion.

The latter two Hermeses were fused into the first Hermes, forming the legend known as Trismegistus Hermes in later ages,[28] where Hermes Trismegistus became mythologized as a spiritual guide, or prophet, along the same spirit of Moses, John the Baptist, Mohammed, and Buddha. Further to this, the Greeks named Thoth “Hermes Trismegistus” to distinguish the Egyptian deity from their own Hermes and to honor Thoth’s sublime wisdom.[29]

Sufis believe the antediluvian Idris/Enoch was the first Hermes, while the second Hermes (of Babel) carried the sciences, magic, and alchemy to Memphis after the flood, creating the Egyptian religion. Arabic writers claim that, indeed, there were three separate Hermeses: one who built the Great Pyramids (Thoth, Idris, and Enoch), one who came from Babylon (Babel) and taught Pythagorus, and a third who lived and wrote later in Egypt regarding alchemy. They believe that the three Hermeses describe the origin and continuity of Hermetic tradition.[30]

Another account has recorded the designation “Hermes Trismegistus” to be the system where Egyptians combined the teachings of Thoth and the Greek god Hermes into Greek writing for its preservation.[31] Finally, Hermes Trismegistus was so named “thrice Hermes,” honoring his accomplishment of being first among men to attain all knowledge and secrets of the gods that he inscribed onto stone tablets with sacred hieroglyphs, which he concealed for future generations.[32] At the end of the day, all are likely true to some extent.

The question that comes to mind is this: How did the name Enoch make the transition into “Hermes”? Hermes derives from the name Hermarynes. This mythical Hermarynes was recorded in the Legends of the Craft as the son of Cub, who was the son of Shem. However, the Table of Nations does not record Cub as one of Shem’s sons—only Elam, Asshur, Arphaxad, Lud, and Aram are listed.[33] Again, I will reconcile this riddle from Gnosticism in the last chapters. One then begins to ponder whether or not Hermes was, in fact, a postdiluvian Nephilim because of his curious, non-biblical genealogy.

Hermarynes was later called “Harmes,” which later became “Hermes.” Hermarynes was the legendary individual who originally discovered one of the two pillars left by the descendants of Enoch and translated the spurious sciences, teaching the people of Babel the Corrupted Sciences of the antediluvian epoch.[34] Because of this, Hermes was the discoverer of Enoch’s antediluvian knowledge. Hermes and Enoch then became intertwined over time in legend, just as others preserving the knowledge of Enoch and Hermes would later become fused with the same name.

CHAPTER 7

ENOCH THE EVIL

Cain lay with his wife, and she became pregnant and gave birth to Enoch.

—Genesis 4:17

If Hermes translated the spurious branch of masonry from Enoch's pillars, then the antediluvian Enoch must have been the keeper for the spurious branch of the Seven Sacred Sciences. But what evidence is there among the Legends of the Craft to support this notion?

When Enoch imagined writing in the form of hieroglyphics, he unwittingly set in motion the technology that would fuel all of humankind's advances. For without an efficient manner for preserving ideas and advancements and accurately communicating them to others, whether in the current generation or future generations, humankind would be locked in a virtual state of never-ending ignorance, forgetting into oblivion any noteworthy ideas or advances.

As enlightening and significant as this creation was, the motivation for hieroglyphics was not as pure as its results would suggest. Enoch invented writing, according to Mackey, to employ the secretive, sacred symbols, known only to the selected elite, as a vehicle to transmit the sacred truths and Mysteries in a way that was free from discovery by the masses not considered worthy enough to learn about those sacred truths and mysteries.[1]

It was the Mysteries that Enoch was associated with that are of important value.

With hieroglyphs, Enoch recorded all the sciences of the spurious branch into great books, while building nine subterranean vaults to protect the wisdom from the looming deluge. Enoch is even credited by Adrian Gilbert with the building of the Great Pyramids to preserve this corrupted antediluvian knowledge. In addition, Egyptians owe their origins (and hieroglyphics) to Hermes Trismegistus. Furthermore, Hermes was thought to have founded the ancient Egyptian city of Hermopolis,[2] the home of the infamous Great White Brotherhood, which we will discuss in detail later. Enoch was attributed with the building of the first antediluvian ziggurats in Sumeria. Enoch was also renowned in lore to be the first real builder of cities,[3] after the spirit of Cain. Enoch then, was the first Master Mason.

All this suggests that the antediluvian Enoch was the first sponsor of preparation for the deluge. He saved the corrupted ancient knowledge through hieroglyphs and secret storage houses for the spurious knowledge, which were then further enhanced by the children of Lamech and eventually found by Hermes after the flood. The nine hidden vaults were believed to be subterranean vaults stacked one on top of the other, while one of the two famous Pillars of Lamech was manufactured out of marble so that it would never burn and the second out of laterus, some type of brick, so that it would not sink. The pillar of brick had inscribed on it the seven spurious sciences, while the pillar of marble had inscribed on it directions to find the nine vaults.[4]

According to the Craft legends, the history of the sciences and their doctrines, along with the arcane rituals and ceremonies of their implementation, were later preserved by the children of Lamech on a brass pillar in hieroglyphs. This was the brick pillar mentioned earlier that contained the Archives of the Masons.[5] Gardner noted that the two pillars were originally known as Mazzebah Stones of marbyl for the marble pillar and latres for the brick/brass pillar.[6] The latres pillar is thought to have been corrupted somehow in translations in some writings to laterus and then reconciled later as laterite, red, iron-based clay used for making bricks and road surfaces.[7] Gardner believes that the original nature of latres remains obscure; although, early Masonic tradition presumes it to have been some form of metal.[8] The brick/brass pillar was the pillar Hermarynes discovered at Babel, from which he translated and renewed the practice of the spurious branch of the Sacred Sciences.

Again, from Craft legends, the children of Lamech inscribed the information as to the whereabouts of the nine vaults of knowledge on the marble pillar. The marble pillar was rendered to be, in early Masonic writings, some form of obscure crystalline rock.[9] The information discovered on the marble pillar, of course, is why Hermarynes led the people of Ham back to Egypt after the Babel incident.

According to the Legend of Enoch, Solomon discovered these nine vaults during the excavation of the First Temple.[10] Solomon did in fact excavate and discover antediluvian knowledge, but it is unlikely that this discovery was the original antediluvian knowledge; this Judean version of antediluvian knowledge likely came to be stored in Jerusalem as a secret and sacred relic of the exodus from Egypt. It is reasonable to expect that the original antediluvian knowledge was buried in Egypt, beneath the Great Pyramids, and in either Sumeria, beneath antediluvian ziggurats, or in Britain.

From the sacred hieroglyphs Enoch taught the original mysticism of the Sacred Sciences, complete with secretive, sacred ceremonies and rituals. Freemason Adept Albert Mackey informs us that Enoch was both idolatrous and a worshipper of the sun.[11] It is clear that the branch of the sciences taught by Enoch, according to the Legend of Enoch, was not the pure brand but rather the spurious. The pure branch did not contain any mysticism whatsoever. It did not contain any secret rituals or ceremonies, and it was not kept in dark dungeons, hidden from the believers and followers of God. This reticent religious worship was only practiced by Cain’s descendants and, therefore, was contrary to that of the ecclesiastical Enoch, who was the posterity of Seth.

Enoch (the evil) was then also attributed with implementing the worship of God through religious rites, a pillar of mysticism.[12] The further we unveil the details from the legends of Freemasonry with regard to Enoch, the larger the contradiction becomes between the biblical records of the righteous Enoch and the legend of the numinous Enoch revered by Freemasonry. Yet Freemasonry regards the mystical Enoch as the ecclesiastical Enoch. Strange indeed, unless one considers that Freemasonry truly upholds the doctrine that mysticism is in fact the pure religion and the pure branch of heavenly knowledge that descended from Adam through

Seth and Noah, coupled with the concept that orthodox Christianity and orthodox Judaism are, in fact, equal partners in the evil religion.

Enoch fuses to mysticism when we consider the second definition of the Hebrew name Enoch. Not only can Enoch be translated as “consecrated,” which applies perfectly to the biblical Enoch, but also it can be translated as “initiated,” which applies perfectly to the Enoch of Freemasonry.[13] You see, mysticism comes with secret ceremonies to initiate the selected elite into secret societies, thereby preserving the sacred knowledge and truths with the elite, who were known as the initiates.

Abbey Robin, who authored Recherches sur les Initiations Anciennes et Modernes in 1780, traced the ancient initiations to the virtuous intercessors with the gods, which is certainly how Freemasonry looks upon Enoch.[14] Certainly, Mercury was considered a messenger to the gods that could also be viewed as an intercessor, just as Thoth was viewed as an intercessor with the gods of Egypt. Furthermore, Hermes was the one who transmitted the knowledge of the gods concerning their secret names, weaknesses, and abilities to control the gods to humankind, again suggesting he was an intercessor with the gods. Enoch most certainly was considered as one who interceded with the gods. Finally, Enoch is one of the Craft’s legendary founders who gave humankind the art of building (masonry).[15]

Therefore, the Enoch who invented hieroglyphs was attributed with introducing formalized mysticism that corrupted the antediluvian and postdiluvian worlds. According to the Anderson Theory, Enoch was credited with founding the Craft, no doubt because he was the first to formalize it in written form.[16] Understand then, that masonry, the Seven Liberal Sciences, the additional illicit heavenly knowledge from the fallen angels, and mysticism, in which all this has been cleverly encoded, are all part of the same spurious religion of Enoch, Cain, fallen angels, and Nephilim. It is no wonder that Enoch was held in such high regard by the descendants of the spurious religion of the postdiluvian epoch. Enoch was truly the spurious patron saint, the founding father of mysticism and Freemasonry.

As we draw back the veil from this infamous hero of antiquity, we learn even more about his corruption. The Babylonians affirmed Enoch was an expert on the stars, just as the Enoch of Seth’s lineage would have been an expert in the peculiar wisdom of the stars, as recorded by Josephus and Craft legends. However, the Babylonians stated Enoch used his knowledge of the stars to invent astrology, an obvious perversion of the intended application for astronomy. In The Legend of Enoch, Enoch is the patriarch who discovered the knowledge of the zodiac, which he wrapped into astrology. He also established festivals and sacrifices to the sun during the periods when the luminary began to enter a new zodiacal sign, of which there are, and were, twelve.[17] This is known in occultism as zodiacal precession.

Enoch was also associated with the sun and the solar year. The Mythology of the Hebrews by Goldziher, a German ethnologist, clearly identifies Enoch with both.[18] Enoch was a sun worshipper, as testified to by his festivals and sacrifices celebrated to the sun during its procession through the zodiac. Hermes collected 36,525 books (the exact number of days in a solar year: 365.25), kept secretly in the temples, just as Enoch wrote his knowledge into 365 secret books stored in subterranean vaults.[19] Enoch lived for 365 years, a solar year, before he ascended to heaven—a solar feature in legend.[20] The worship of the sun was a classic anti-God act by the rebellious Cain lineage and not a violation likely to have been committed by the faithful posterity of Seth and the ecclesiastical Enoch.

No matter how one attempts to reconcile the Enoch of Genesis and the Enoch of Freemasonry, one cannot accomplish it. Therefore, which characterization of Enoch is correct: the one in the Bible or the one in Legends of the Craft? Perhaps both are correct. Perhaps both are describing different individuals of prehistory, even though the Legends of the Craft do not advertise their malevolent misdirection. Could there have been two Enochs who lived at relatively the same time in prehistory? Could one have been from the line of Seth, who upheld the pure branch, while the other was from the lineage of Cain, who upheld the spurious branch, formalizing it into hieroglyphics and mysticism? I believe that this was, indeed, the case.

CHAPTER 8

ROYAL BLOODLINES

This is the written account of Adam’s line. When God created man, he made him in the likeness of God. He created them male and female and blessed them. And when they were created, he called them “man.” When Adam had lived 130 years he had a son in his own likeness, in his own image, and named him Seth.

—Genesis 5:1–3

Unexpectedly, Genesis 5 dutifully underlines two competing factions and possibly two distinct races clearly, if one cares to take note. The passage hints at competing royal bloodlines that were in a continuous battle for legitimacy.

Why is Cain never referred to as a being in the image of Adam in Scripture? Why does the passage first state that God created man in singular, referring to him as “him” and then noting that God created “male and female” together, using the plural? Why does the passage refer to male and female as “them,” blessing them just as the people of day six were blessed? Think of these as two different creations, the creation of Adam and the creation of day six, a notion I will develop.

The passage appears to be bouncing back and forth between the creations of two distinct races—between a singular and a plural creation. Similarly, Genesis 4 notes Cain proceeded to build numerous cities, as did Enoch. For whom were these cities built? In the early years of the Adamic epoch, we are led to believe by standard Christian orthodoxy that only a few souls existed; only a few hundred if they had populated vigorously from both branches. Building numerous cities only makes sense if day six people already existed in great numbers and were subjugated by Cain and his descendants.

Genesis 5:3 then goes on to specifically and mysteriously underline that Seth was a son born in the likeness and image of Adam. One wonders what this means. Seth’s likeness to Adam is likely an intended but unexplained contrast, suggesting differences between the Cainites and the people of day six and the Sethites. This likeness of Seth to Adam hints that perhaps Cain was different somehow from Adam. Seth’s likeness to Adam may also be a reticent reference to the distinct difference between Sethites and Nephilim. I suggest it refers to all three.

Acknowledging the Bible documented distinct genealogies descending from Adam through Cain and Seth, as well as acknowledging the Bible documented an additional race of Nephilim inserted into creation by dark angels, and further opening your thinking to the notion that perhaps Genesis subtly suggests differences in appearance between Cain and Seth are primary principles for discerning: how and why two distinct religious belief systems following two distinct gods emerged. However, this contrarian hypothesis should not be interpreted as a ploy in any way to summarily denigrate or stigmatize any race or people of different skin colors; nor should this contrarian hypothesis in any way be applied to summarily judge or condemn any individuals, or groups of people, simply because they may carry genetic traces of DNA and or bloodlines descending from Cain, Nephilim, or any other race I will refer to in this book. I do not believe the God Most High summarily judges anyone based on genetics; we are all judged in the same equal manner on what we do and what we believe; through our free choice to choose God or not. Nor is it my place to tread on the turf of the Divine to summarily judge, even if I disagree with the actions of others; only God judges. I leave that to Him.

Conversely though, and as a primary principle, we must understand that duplicitous, secretive Snake Brotherhoods and their descending genitive secret societies do disingenuously employ genetic distinctions. Alleged genetic distinctions, in these rival belief systems are reserved for only the rich and powerful; the elite; the Adepts of those secret societies. Therefore I will build upon throughout this book the distinctions the selected elite of secret societies endorse regarding Cain, what they believe are their genetic connections linking them back to Cain and Nephilim, as well as building on the notion that Day 6 and the creation of Adam were two separate events.

Freemasonry believes the antediluvian people were highly advanced in the Seven Sacred Sciences.[1] Freemasons resolutely believe that when humans abandoned their nomadic lifestyle (people of day six, which Cain likely married into), they formed builder associations to erect monuments and buildings to worship their gods, and architecture transformed into an art that demanded exacting science and knowledge.[2]

There has always been the need or belief to link masonry with the holy patriarchs of the antediluvian world. The need to trace masonry's history back to the patriarchs and, in particular, to Adam, was ostensibly a requirement to establish indisputable authority of the knowledge and sacred truths, at least during the Christian era, thereby showing the patriarchs descended from Adam himself, who received the Seven Sacred Sciences from God. One may either debate this from a point of legitimacy or from a diabolical disguise that hides the true source of masonry's knowledge from public and Christian scrutiny.

It is in this zealous endeavor of establishing the genealogy beyond the deluge and back into the antediluvian epoch that the legends and reality become irreconcilable. Fusing the righteous posterity of Seth with the mysticism of masonry becomes so contradictory that it does not remain credible unless one supersedes the Bible, redefining it as being totally corrupted and inaccurate, which is what pagan, pantheistic, Gnostic, and theosophist authorities do. We will explore this allegation in the last half of this book. But it is in fusing Freemason recollections with the historical biblical account of antediluvian patriarchs that we can secure, understand, and rationalize the mystery between the Bible and Freemasonry's legends.

Let us reconstruct the genealogy of Adam to Noah via the Seth branch and compare it to the Cain branch.[3]

Seth Branch	Cain Branch
1) Adam	Adam

2) Seth	Cain
3) Enosh	Enoch
4) Kenan	Irad
5) Mahalalel	Mehujael
6) Jared	Methusael
7) Enoch	Lamech
8) Methuselah	Jabel, Jubel, Tubal-Cain, Naamah
9) Lamech
10) Noah

Notice how similar Enosh is to Enoch, Jared is to Irad, Mahalalel to Mehujael, and Methuselah to Methusael. One can argue that these names are essentially the same with the same enunciation. Consider as well that both chronologies contain an Enoch and a Lamech, the two most important characters in the Freemasonry's take on the origin of their Craft.

Cain's evil Enoch then invented hieroglyphics to ensure the corrupted, sacred knowledge was not lost, and he did so in the first generation after the sons of Adam so as to not lose or corrupt the new doctrines. The difference was only that the line of Cain rewrote the Sacred Sciences with idolatry, pantheism, and mysticism, and the differences needed to be written to ensure the continuity of the new, spurious branch created by Enoch and his father, Cain.

The spurious sciences were then rejuvenated in the days of Lamech, when the spurious branch gained momentum and power through the rise of the notorious Nephilim in the sixth or seventh generation. The children of Lamech then built two pillars and recorded on them with hieroglyphics all the important knowledge of the spurious branch for the postdiluvian world to recover. It is not difficult to see how confusion took hold between the two bloodlines, all while they were charging one another to have been contrived. Perhaps the defenders of the corrupted religion after the rise of Christianity tried to put a face of integrity on their history by associating and disguising themselves among the posterity of Seth and by saving themselves from violent inquisitions from the Roman Church.

Crossover fusing of the two chronologies becomes even more apparent when one looks closer at the details from the legends of Freemasonry. For example, the four children of Lamech, the descendants of Cain, who were noteworthy enough to be recorded in Genesis along with the sciences they invented, were attributed by the legends as founding the Seven Sciences, this according to the Legend of the Craft and the Legend of Lamech's Sons.[4] In addition, the Enoch of mysticism was also known as the third great leader of the Adamites,[5] which could only be possible if Enoch the Evil was son of Cain, son of Adam.

We already know that the children of Lamech did not invent the Seven Sciences, for they came down from God to Adam and then to both Cain and Seth, but that Lamech expanded and evolved the knowledge with the aid of fallen angels. We also know that Cain and his son Enoch thoroughly perverted the Sacred Sciences, committing them to idolatry, pantheism, and mysticism in written form via hieroglyphics. We also know from the Oliver Legend that the children of Lamech ignited a renaissance of the spurious branch of the sacred knowledge, from the written knowledge passed down to them from Enoch, four generations before.[6]

To this end, we further understand that the lineage of Seth was corrupted by the lineage of Cain in the seventh generation, the generation of the Nephilim, likely as a casualty of the spurious renaissance ignited by Lamech, who was also in the seventh generation of Cain, and the intimidation of the scurrilous Nephilim tyranny they partnered with. This likelihood is much more conceivable based on the Genesis account and the Oliver Legend; the children of Lamech simply expanded on the Seven Sciences in partnership with Nephilim and the fallen angels, bringing them into practical everyday life, as they were credited with inventing music, smith craft, weaving, and geometry.

In fact, Lamech's children, indeed, did receive additional and illicit knowledge reserved for only the heavenly realm from fallen, rebellious angels, which further enhanced the spurious Sciences. To the contrived Masonic conclusion, the children of Lamech were thus considered patriarchs of the purported pure branch of antediluvian masonry, but Freemasonry, of course, subversively regards them, or deceptively disguises them, as being descended from the loins of Seth, from the Lamech of Seth and the ecclesiastic Enoch branch. These were the same spurious sons and daughters listed in Genesis under Lamech in the genealogy of Cain. And if this is the case, then the Legends of the Craft were writing of two totally different Enochs.

The first, whom they wish to be fused with, was Enoch of the posterity of Seth, who was so righteous he walked with God and was subsequently transformed to heaven without dying. The second Enoch was the son of Cain, who invented hieroglyphics as part of the villainous master plan to corrupt and preserve the Seven Sacred Sciences as an act of revenge and rebellion against the true God. Freemasonry and its collaborative religions and organizations believe that, in fact, they are the true and pure branches, while Christianity and Judaism are the spurious, corrupted, and evil religions of this world.

It is this evil Enoch that Freemasonry and the mystic religions have based their belief systems upon, and not the ecclesiastic Enoch. It was the evil Enoch and his mystical religion that contributed so much to the cause of the flood catastrophe that Freemason authors Christopher Knight and Robert Lomas actually suggest, no doubt from privileged, inside information, that the evil Enoch's lineage was subversively transferred by Freemasonry to Seth, all to hide (except from the Adepts) their acknowledged connections to the transgressions of Cain and his descendants,[7] just as I have already put forward. Dr. Robert Lomas is a Master Mason,[8] a prolific writer on Freemasonry and its history, and a popular lecturer on Masonic history.[9]

It is only in the Oliver Poem that Freemasonry acknowledges that the progeny of Cain corrupted the sacred knowledge.[10] Dr. Oliver declared the masonry practiced by the posterity of Cain was a schism of the true Freemasonry corrupted by idolatry and mysticism and that modern Freemasonry was a relic of those idolatrous Mysteries.[11] This stance was not looked upon favorably, however, for it fused masonry with the vile lineage of Cain; whereas, masonry prefers to superficially fuse itself with the righteousness of Seth's posterity for a false veil of legitimacy and its own protection.

In fact, Dr. Oliver was forthrightly attacked for this stance. He was declared biased in his approach because he was a clergyman of the Church of England, to which he was subservient to the esprit du corps that sought to bring every opinion under its particular and slanted sectarian view. Dr. Oliver was then said to interpret every allegory as a theologian and not as a philosopher. Freemasonry also charged Dr. Oliver with not basing his conclusions on historical facts but rather on fanciful fictions of legends and lore.[12]

I disagree. I do not see a difference between the Oliver Poem and any of the other legends; they were all based on a combination of historical fact and legend. The only difference, though, is that Dr. Oliver did not confuse the beginnings of masonry with the righteous line of Seth, in which masonry self-deludes all of its lower-level initiates.

It is easy to make confusing and inaccurate deductions, just as the legends have done. Associating the invention of hieroglyphics to the Enoch of the Seth chronology is perfectly understandable. Both the ecclesiastic Enoch and the Lamech of the Cain chronology were the seventh generation, just three generations from the deluge. Placing the ecclesiastic Enoch in the same generation as the Lamech of Cain's chronology makes for an easy fusing of the righteous Enoch to Cain's posterity. If one assigns to the ecclesiastic Enoch the invention of hieroglyphics, one quickly understands how two different legends might arise as to who constructed and wrote upon the pillars of brass and marble.

The Legend of Enoch credited Enoch with this feat, while the Oliver Poem bestowed this dubious honor upon the children of Lamech. However, the Legend of Enoch could not be accurate in attributing to the ecclesiastic Enoch the building of the two pillars, because this Enoch was neither part of the spurious branch, nor did he invent hieroglyphics. Meanwhile, the evil Enoch may have already died by this time, for he was born five full generations before. The Oliver Theory carries much more credibility, since Dr. Oliver attributes the corrupting of the sciences to the posterity of Cain. Furthermore, this is the time-honored doctrine of the Masonic Adepts.

The next indictment intertwining the history of Freemasonry to the chronology of Cain is the notorious seventh generation. Josephus stated that the posterity of Seth remained pure until the seventh generation, when the progeny of Cain began to corrupt the posterity of Seth. Ginzberg acknowledges that in the generation of Methuselah, of the lineage of Seth, the Sethites became corrupted like the Cainites.[13] The Sethites finally capitulated to the tyrannical mysticism and authority of the Nephilim. This, then, was the generation during and immediately following the ascension of the ecclesiastic Enoch to heaven. Lamech and his evil children began a renaissance with the spurious branch of the sacred knowledge in an unholy alliance with Nephilim and fallen angels during this infamous generation. Nephilim arrived on the antediluvian stage in the previous generation, the sixth generation, the generation of Jared, father to the ecclesiastic Enoch.[14]

Biblical legends clearly attribute the generation of Jared as being depraved, due to the influence of the fallen angels and the Nephilim[15] and the influence of the mystical, state-sponsored religion enforced by giants. It was these three Cainite generations—Methusael's, Lamech's, and his children's, supported by the Nephilim and fallen angels—that together polluted and enslaved the entire antediluvian world by force. Through Nephilim, they imposed tyranny, which would eventually bring on judgment by water. The descendants of Cain were so successful, according to Collins, that the Sethites became like the Cainites, entering into marriages with Cainites and producing more mortal giants.[16]

This was how and why four of the many children of Lamech, of the chronology of Cain, found their way into the book of Genesis—because of their great and nefarious individual roles in the corruption of the antediluvian world, which brought upon them the great deluge. These infamous four conspired with the fallen angels to create a super race of sinister giants, armed with the knowledge of the corrupted sciences, in an attempt to completely change the natural order of creation, all against God's will. Thus, the Nephilim were created by Cainites and dark angels to rebel (against God) in what the Encyclopedia Americana called a struggle against the order of creation.[17]

Of the princely sons of Lamech, the progeny of Jabel were tent dwellers of Assyria, who in the King List of Khorsabad detailed seventeen kings of Jabel, who reigned in direct opposition to God's intentions. Tubal-Cain was revered as the great Patriarch of the Master Craftsmen, an instructor of every artificer of brass and metal, and regarded in the Craft as the greatest metallurgist.[18] He is the patriarch Freemasonry attributes with inventing agriculture and with the ploughshare.[19] In fact, Tubal-Cain has been recorded in Freemasonry as a Third Degree or Master Freemason, as the instructor of metal artificers from 3500 B.C.E. According to Gardner, Tubal-Cain was recorded as "Tobalkin, the prince of Southern Mesopotamia" and the son of King Akalum/Lamech.[20]

Naamah the Charmer, also known in Sumerian lore as "Nin Pu Abi" and "Queen Shub of Ur," married an Anunnaki[21] (Nephilim). This, then, was the culmination and the inner circle for the foundation of The Genesis 6 Conspiracy. Naamah, according to Jewish legends, married and copulated with Shamdon, producing the giant Asmodeous.[22] All four children were credited, to varying degrees, with beginning the Craft in the world: TubalCain—artificer/smith; Jabal—geometry/freemasonry; Jubal—music; and Naamah—weaving.[23]

A key premise drives this book: all associated snake organizations and religions, along with Freemasonry, are in a 6,000-year-old, subversive struggle against God and in a 2,000-year-old struggle against Christianity. Particularly in the last 2,000 years, mysticism in all its various forms was driven underground in the West, for its adherents feared for their lives from a vengeful Christianity and specifically, the Catholic Church. Therefore, spurious forces have taken on the guise of Christianity, but they worship a pantheon of gods in reality.

To this end, one can easily appreciate just why Western, spurious organizations would endeavor to hide their origins within the friendly and righteous patriarchs of Seth, as opposed to the corrupted progeny of Cain, for fear of Christian retribution. They deliberately did so, and continue to do so, to covertly hide their true faith and objectives. And, as I will detail in the last chapters, the spurious forces evidently do adhere secretly to a doctrine linking themselves directly to Cain and all his descendants that the spurious forces say have been illegitimately slandered and maligned by God and all His priests throughout history.[24]

Spurious organizations, according to Gardner, believe the biblical genealogy of Seth in Genesis was contrived by Judeo/Christian conspirators to mimic the (spurious) genealogy of Cain, as a witness supporting their own corrupted and false royal lineage and in an endeavor to dismiss, libel, and cover up the true (spurious) royal descent originating with Cain.[25] In addition, theosophists believe two of Noah’s sons were descendants of Cain. The spurious organizations believe Judeo/Christian organizations virtually copied the Sangreal (royal bloodline) of Cain as a contrived attempt to legitimize themselves and their historical roots. I believe the opposite is true—that the spurious forces have contrived their legitimacy.

What is all important in the segregation of these two royal bloodlines is that each branch followed a different God. This religious polarity between the bloodlines has resonated throughout history and into this prophetic generation. Each competing branch carries its own Messianic promise: the Lamb/ Lion Messiah from Adam, Noah, Abraham, David—Jesus—competing against the Dragon Messiah from Cain, Tubal Cain, Nimrod, and Nephilim.

The Cainites and Nephilim formed various antediluvian royal houses of the Dragon, and they have dominated history through their seditious, evil, and violent activities. The Houses of the Dragon have consistently been aligned in direct opposition to and persecution against the posterity of Seth, Noah, and Abraham. These distinct, competing royal and Messianic bloodlines will collide with unbelievable consequences in the not so distant future, when the world witnesses the mystery of God and the revelations of both competing Messiahs.

CHAPTER 9

ANTEDILUVIAN MASONRY AND THE SEVEN SACRED SCIENCES

Pharaoh then summoned his wise men and sorcerers, and the Egyptian magicians also did the same things by their secret arts; each one drew down his staff and it became a snake.

—Exodus 7:11

Although Freemasons may not consider their organizations to be religious institutions, they are. Because we are employing Masonic source documents to understand ancient religions that ran counter to God's divine revelation, it is important to understand Freemasonry's reticent connection to its ancestors, the curators of mysticism.

It is the contention of Freemasonry that just the Fifth Science of the mystical Seven Sciences, geometry (also known as masonry), is applicable to their modern societies. However, if Freemasonry does, indeed, hold the knowledge of the Fifth Science, is it not logical to assume that they do possess the knowledge of the other Six Sciences? Is it not logical that this knowledge was passed down through the generations, from Hermes, and that it constituted the building blocks for modern mysticism?

In fact, the other sciences were originally founded upon geometry: "It teaches the initiates to measure and ponder all things."[1] And if these are the corrupted, spurious branches of the Seven Sciences, then indeed the Freemasons are practicing a modern form of antediluvian religious idolatry and mysticism, complete with initiates and initiation rituals. Hence, Freemasonry holds within its mystic realms the keys to the Seven Sacred Sciences and the illicit, additional heavenly knowledge. Masonry, the corrupted Seven Sacred Sciences, and mysticism are essentially one, having the same source rooted in antediluvian sedition.

The acceptance of Freemasonry practicing ancient mysticism is, of course, fully recognized in the various Craft Legends, even though the modern Masons are not likely to acknowledge this, at least in the public domain. One must conclude, however, that the select coterie must recognize this. Modern German, British, and French scholars trace Freemasonry back to the mysticism of paganism; they conclude masonry was an offshoot or imitation of the pure branch of the sciences.[2] Even though modern masonry would like to place distance between itself and any form of religion, it cannot. According to William Hutchinson's book The Spirit of Freemasonry, Freemasonry was never based on architecture but rather on moral and religious tenets.[3] Hutchinson comments:

> Before the Flood there was a system of religious instruction, which, from the resemblance of its legendary and symbolic character to that of Freemasonry, has been called "antediluvian Masonry" by some authors. This system was preserved by Noah, and after the Deluge was communicated, according to the Legends of the Craft, by him to his immediate descendants. This system was lost at the time of the dispersion of mankind, and corrupted by the Pagans in their Mysteries.[4]

This was, of course, the fate of the pure branch that modern masonry would prefer to disguise it history behind but cannot. The transfer of the spurious branch to the postdiluvian world came about through Hermes, who translated the two pillars carved by the children of Lamech. Even so, it is intriguing to note that even in the history of the pure branch, it, too, fell into paganism and mysticism. Either way, modern masonry cannot avoid its relationship to religion.

Adam first taught the pure brand as a religious system designed to worship and honor the true God, void of rituals and ceremonies. Antediluvian masonry was originally a religious code, leading to the knowledge of the God of nature, according to the "Hutchinsonian Theory."[5]

This was the pure form that passed down to Noah, not the spurious brand of Enoch the Evil and Lamech's children, for what they passed on to the postdiluvian world was steeped in symbols, secrets, secret ceremonies, initiations, and Mysteries.

Let us again read from The Spirit of Freemasonry:

> The lessons that had been taught by the antediluvians fell into confusion and oblivion and were corrupted by many peoples, so that the service of the true God, which had been taught in the pure Masonry of the first men, was defiled by idolatry. These secessionists from the Pure Adamic Masonry formed institutions of their own, and degenerated, as the first deviation from the simple worship of the God of nature, into the errors of Sabaism, or the adoration of the Sun, Moon, and stars. They adopted symbols and allegories with which to teach esoterically their false doctrine [the religion of Enoch the Evil].[6]

The origin of modern masonry was built on the spurious form of masonry, which practiced the operative form of the Seven Sacred Sciences and the sun-worshipping religion of mysticism. What we do not know is this: How was it implemented throughout subsequent generations? And how was it inherited by Freemasonry?

We can deduce that it was practiced in a very similar manner as it was in antediluvian times, for God interceded once more, dispersing the people of Babel and confusing their languages so that they could no longer communicate with each other.

The practice of the mystical, idolatrous religion did not miss a beat once Hermes rediscovered it. But after the dispersion of the people of Babel, what happened to the knowledge discovered by Hermes? Again, we will rely on the Freemasonry legends as our source. This was the time of Nimrod, the Tower of Babel, the confusing of the languages, and the dispersing of humankind to the four winds of the earth. It would be remiss to deduce that the spurious masonry had nothing to do with this very famous biblical narrative.

The people that remained in the land of Shinar, where Nimrod and all of his followers built Babel, continued to be governed by Nimrod. The names of these people became known to the world as Akkadians, Assyrians, and Babylonians. After the dispersion, the Seven Liberal Sciences became lost to most of the peoples, save one, the Babylonians. Nimrod and the ancient Babylonians, in the Craft's Anderson Theory, preserved the Seven Sacred Sciences in Shinar.[7]

This should come as no surprise, for as absolute dictator of the postdiluvian age before the dispersion, Nimrod was provided with the knowledge from Hermes and used its power to his own ends. When the dispersion came, Nimrod, who was the grand superintendent of this first postdiluvian Secret Snake Society, naturally maintained, preserved, and continued to apply the corrupt knowledge, even after the dispersion.

The followers of Nimrod, the Chaldeans, were renowned as wise men. They were priests known for their expertise in mathematics, known later as Magi, who preserved the sciences.[8] Note again that from the beginnings of the post-dispersion, spurious masonry had a renaissance in a religious environment preserved by pagan priests. Chaldea, or Babylon, was known as the birthplace of postdiluvian knowledge, obviously deriving from the seven corrupted sciences. The Chaldean sages in the Legend of the Craft were remembered as primitive teachers of the Seven Sciences.[9] Not only did the Magi preserve the Seven Sciences but also they nursed them back to prominence so that the Sacred Sciences once more flourished. From Chaldea, the corrupted knowledge was exported to the other countries of the world.[10]

The ancient Babylonians were superseded by the Akkadians and then the Assyrians. Assyrians based their culture, myths, religion, and science on the literature stored on cuneiform tablets created by the ancient Babylonians, who were descendants of Nimrod.[11] Of particular note is that both the sons of Nimrod and their descendants kept the same religion, gods, and mystical ceremonial rituals as those of the antediluvian Sumerians. This was no fluke of history, for the Babylonians had direct access to this antediluvian knowledge from Hermes, Nimrod, and Sumerians that somehow survived the deluge.

The Semitic language belonged to a people from Mesopotamia who settled among surviving Sumerians; Semites were agrarians who brought with them their language, agricultural skills, and a basket of other skills for civilization.[12] The Semitic rulers established their kingdoms and languages all at the expense of the Sumerians, according to Thomas Cahill.[13] They also replaced the Sumerian language with Akkadian, a language closely related to Babylonian, Assyrian, and Hebrew,[14] which obviously descended down through Noah and Nimrod. The Mesopotamians further inherited the Sumerian cuneiform writing, mythologies, and belief systems in a seemingly seamless fashion, which is why the Epic of Gilgamesh has been found in Sumerian, Akkadian, and other ancient languages.[15]

The Babylonians, Akkadians, and Assyrians continued to practice operative masonry. They built the same ziggurats and repaired the antediluvian Sumerian ziggurats, while keeping alive the antediluvian Sumerian legends. The Akkadians are generally thought by historians to have arrived in the land of Sumer around 2400 B.C.E. or just before. The Akkadians preserved and stored Sumerian cuneiform tablets in the many cities of the empire, such as Nineveh and Calah in the land of Assyria and Babylon and Erech in Shinar, cities that Nimrod built.

Freemasons believe the Corrupted Sciences were exported from Babylon and Assyria to Egypt first. Freemason legends recorded two possible means of export: one that endeavors to support the legitimacy of modern masonry with a pure legend and the more likely spurious legend. It seems clear to me that the knowledge exported to the nations of the world is steeped in mysticism. This suggests to me the spurious legend is likely the more accurate legend, and perhaps, the pure version was overlaid atop the spurious version sometime later.

As pure legend goes, Abraham and his cohort, Euclid, carried masonry to Egypt. In the Genesis account concerning Abraham going to Egypt, there is, of course, no mention of this transfer of divine knowledge or any mention of Euclid.[16] Laurence Gardner further notes that the Cooke Manuscript somehow confused Euclid's lifeline with that of Abraham's, since Abraham and Euclid lived 1,700 years apart, when the Cooke Manuscript (erroneously) endeavored to elucidate how geometry and masonry were synonymous crafts in ancient Egypt.[17] However, Josephus does interject that Abraham evidently did teach the Egyptians the sciences of arithmetic and astronomy, for the Egyptians were void of this knowledge before Abraham taught them.[18] In fact, another legend from 150 B.C.E., recorded by a Jewish writer named Eupolemus, wrote (in error) that Abraham actually invented astrology before he traveled to Egypt.[19] Abraham evidently did not teach the balance of the pure Sacred Sciences to the Egyptians.

As the Legend of the Craft goes, Shem, son of Noah, remained in the land of Ur, in the land of the Chaldeans, after the various peoples were dispersed. Shem then taught the pure form of the Seven Sciences he had learned from his father, Noah, to his progeny Peleg, Serug, Nahor, Terah, and Abraham.[20] That he did so is quite possible based on Shem being recorded as living some 400 years after the flood. The total years from the birth of Arphaxad to the birth of Abraham were 292.[21] The legends denoting that Shem taught mysticism to his descendants and created a special order, in particular with respect to Abraham, are likely the ties that entice mysticism to confuse Shem with Melchizedek.

Two Craft legends, the Legend of Euclid and The Tower of Babel, both noted that the Seven Liberal Sciences were taught to the Egyptians because Egypt was inundated with so many sons and daughters who had nothing to do. The knowledge of the sciences allowed those unemployed Egyptians to make an honest living.[22] Paul Naudon, author of The Secret History of Freemasonry and a noted Freemason, clarifies this legend by noting Abraham and Euclid taught only the Egyptian nobility geometry, for it was the nobility who had produced great numbers with nothing to do.[23] Thus, the Egyptian nobility constructed churches, towers, castles, and all kinds of buildings from stone.[24]

The alternative, spurious legend, from the Craft's Anderson Legend and The Cooke Manuscript, states that the Corrupted Sciences were transported to Egypt at an earlier point in time.[25] This occurred almost at the outset of Egyptian colonization. The father of Egyptians, Mizraim, the son of Ham, son of Noah, carried the knowledge to Egypt; Mizraim is the alternative name for Egypt.[26]

Although Egypt's colonization would only predate the legend of Abraham by a few hundred years, accepting the notion that the Corrupted Sciences were transported to Egypt in some way before seems more plausible, simply because the Egyptian culture seems to have been born with its mystical religion. In addition, Egypt's civilization appears to have sprung instantly to life with spontaneous knowledge and technology. Freemasonry believes the Egyptian culture and civilization did not develop instantaneously on its own; rather, according to Legends of the Craft, the Egyptians developed their advanced civilization and achievements from the knowledge obtained from the Pillars of Lamech,[27] likely taken to Egypt with Ham, Hermes, and Mizraim after the Babel dispersion. Whichever the method, the Egyptian civilization was the first one to receive the corrupted knowledge after the Chaldeans.

The closeness of the Egyptians to the Hermes cult would suggest a close tie to the times of Babel and Hermes. Remember, the postdiluvian Hermes was reputed to be Thoth, the deified counselor to Osiris and Isis, two of the founding gods of the Egyptian religion. Hermes was further lavished with the honor of founding the Egyptian religion. He was an Egyptian priest of the highest order, who was considered the inventor of the sciences, of which 36,525 books of his knowledge, known as religious encyclopedias, were stored in the temples of Egypt. It was Hermes who elevated the Egyptians to speak with the gods.[28]

It makes much more sense that Hermes, the discoverer and translator of the Pillars of Lamech, traveled with Ham, Mizraim, and Mizraim's people, the Egyptians, to the land of Egypt, to the antediluvian home of the "first time" Egyptians who built the pyramids, once God confused the languages and dispersed the peoples from Babel. Remember, the second Pillar of Lamech contained directions to the location of Enoch's nine vaults buried at the foot of the pyramids. Hermes escaping to Egypt with Ham, Mizraim, and the Seven Sacred Sciences provides the solution as to how Hermes founded the Egyptian religion. He was the councilor to both the initial Egyptian gods and the Pharaohs, while also solving the mystery to the immediate and great rise to the Egyptian civilization. This further explains how hieroglyphics found their way into the hands of the Egyptians. It was Hermes who decoded the hieroglyphics for Nimrod at Babel. Hermes then took the ancient form of writing with him to Egypt.

From Egypt, the new religious cloak draped over the Corrupted Sciences was transferred to the Greeks and Romans, and to many other nations of the Mediterranean. Osiris and Isis were used as the model for the other pagan nations; Demeter and Dionysus were their Greek counterparts. According to Mackey, the personality of Osiris was best known among the ancients in an epigram of Ausonius; where the Egyptians called him Osiris, the Greeks of Eleusis called him Bacchus, the Mysians of Asia Minor referred to him as Phanoesus or Apollo, the Indians named him Dionysus, the Romans knew him as Liber, while the Arabians called him Adonis.[29]

The spread of this form of mysticism was not limited to just the Mediterranean. According to the Craft Legends, one must conclude that all the pantheistic religions grew out of the spurious form of masonry, either from the Chaldeans or the Egyptians. Furthermore, the religious doctrine of all the pantheistic religions is essentially the same. Alford wrote concerning the Mysteries of Egypt, India, Greece, and Rome, which were believed all to be founded on the same sun god allegories[30] (from Enoch the Evil's sun worshipping mysticism).

Included in the spurious Masonry honor role, although modern Masons view them as pure Masons, are the Chaldeans, Magi, soothsayers, and astrologers of Babylon. The spurious honor roll further includes the priests of Egypt, the Greek and Roman philosophers, the Brahmins and the gymnosophists of India, and the Druids and bards of both Briton and Gaul. Modern Masons attribute the great discoveries in astronomy, chemistry, and mechanics to these various religious groups, due to their disciplines in the alleged pure science.[31] This esteemed list of numinous curators co-opted their corrupted knowledge to spin off all the pantheistic religions and spurious sciences of times past and present, inclusive of the alchemy influence, an offshoot of masonry, which adopted Hermes as its patron saint.

So how does the founding of polytheist religions relate to modern masonry? Well, Dr. Oliver stated that modern masonry is a relic of the idolatrous Mysteries. Modern German, British, and French scholars traced masonry back to the mysteries of paganism, finding it was polluted with idolatry. Modern masonry derived its murky initiation ceremonies from pagan mysticism. It is nothing more than an Egyptian religion.[32] And finally, as you will recall, modern Freemasonry is not based in architecture or geometry, but it is immersed in the moral and spiritual tenets and ceremonial rituals.

Modern Freemasonry is not just a benevolent, philosophical movement. It is not merely a benign institution, where members are taught to develop their character and altruistic instincts through a series of catechisms and ritual dramas.[33] Quite frankly, Freemasonry is the very same ghostly belief system that caused the deluge. It is the same shadowy Snake Brotherhood that will once more bring about global catastrophe, only this time by fire, at Armageddon.

CHAPTER 10

ENOCHIAN MYSTICISM

You have trusted in your wickedness and have said, "No one sees me." Your wisdom and knowledge mislead you when you say to yourself, "I am, and there is none besides me"…. All the council you have received has only worn you out! Let your astrologers come forward, those stargazers, who make predictions month by month.

—Isaiah 47:10, 13

What is intended by the Masonic cloak-and-dagger ceremonies, their arcane rituals, and their surreptitious initiations? Why are there two sides to this clandestine brotherhood—one for the elite and one for the mundane masses? Why was and still is there a necessity for secret Snake Societies?

As with all of these stealthy forms of religion, the true face is always hidden beneath a veil of mystery and lies. Specious societies and religions are always reinforced with ceremonial rituals, some secret and some for public consumption. We have already read that Enoch, son of Cain, first introduced ceremonies, rituals, secret allegories, and other mysticism into the pure antediluvian masonry.

Enoch the Evil consequently changed the order of access to the holy knowledge by establishing selected elite to garner and preserve it. Enoch the Evil was alternatively recorded as Uanna, the great Mesopotamian sage who traveled with the Anunnaki/Nephilim and was one of the Shadowy Seven (Snake) Sages,[1] one of the builder gods that we will speak of later, who helped transfer antediluvian knowledge to the postdiluvian epoch.

Hermes partnered with Nimrod, king of all humankind at that point in time, sparking a renaissance of mysticism in the early postdiluvian age that was both spiritual and visibly physical in its application. Please appreciate that the York and Anderson legends credit Nimrod with establishing and enforcing the first constitution for the renewed postdiluvian mysticism.[2] Both Nimrod and his people, the descendants of Ham, along with the descendants of Japheth, were bestowed by later writers with the responsibility of completely corrupting the already Corrupted Sciences. The sons of Noah rebelled against God, filling the spurious form of Masonry with a comprehensive and secret system of rituals known as “the Mysteries.” Craft legends recorded that the Chaldeans and Magi later propagated this altered form of mysticism after the dispersion,[3] which was then exported to Egypt and then the balance of the known world.

This line of thinking does remain consistent with the other legends recorded in Freemasonry, providing one observes the information in the correct scriptural perspective derived from the Table of Nations, the historical records from Adam to Abraham recorded in 1 Chronicles 1 and Genesis 10. Nimrod descended from Cush, a son of Ham, along with Mizraim, Put, and Canaan. Mizraim was the forefather of the Egyptians, while Put was the founder of the Algerians, Libyans, and other North Africans. Cush not only fathered Nimrod and his descendants, the Akkadians, Assyrians, and Babylonians, but also other descendants, from Cush who migrated to Africa, intermixing with the Black African nations.[4]

The confusing Canaanite clans, of course, were the forerunners of the people of Tyre, the Hittites, the Amorites, the Jebusites, the Sidonites, the Hivites, and others of the Palestine region.[5] The Amorite confederacy included seven different Canaanite nations that occupied the Covenanted Land.[6] The Canaanite clans scattered, claiming the lands from Sidon toward Gerar as far as Gaza and then toward Sodom and Gomorrah, Admah, and Zeboiim, as far as Lasha.[7] All of the descendants of Ham became ardent advocates of the mystic religions before the advent of Islam. The descendants of Ham, not coincidently, also became the archenemies of Israel.

Japheth was the seed for most of the northern Mediterranean societies of antiquity, stretching into the Celtic-dominated lands of Europe. Included in the descendants of Japheth were the Greeks and Romans, who along with all the other descendants of Japheth also eagerly supported and nurtured disparate forms of mystical religions, all based on the model designed in Egypt by Hermes. Specifically, the Romans were the Kittim, son of Javan, son of Japheth; Romans were part of the sons of Javan that first migrated to Cyprus as the maritime peoples.[8] Magog, too, was a descendant of Japheth,[9] a character that played a prominent role in founding the Celts, Galatians, Gauls, Trojans, Sarmatians, and the Scythians.

It is the Hermes form of mysticism that is referred to when modern masonry is stated to be rooted in pagan Mysteries that include religious rituals and ceremonies. Those rituals and ceremonies included secret worship that was branded as the Mysteries or mysticism. Craft legends demonstrate that Freemasonry believes mysticism was thought to have been invented in Egypt,[10] but this is simple confusion. Hermes first invented the renewed form of mysticism at Babel and then carried it off with him to Egypt, where it took on a slightly different style of mysticism than that of the Chaldeans, but Hermes was the father of both.

Egyptian mysticism was famous for its secret ceremonies and rituals that were designed to teach doctrines to lead believers into Sabaism, the worshipping of the sun, moon, and stars, the religion of Enoch the Evil. The secret doctrines, knowledge, and gods were known only by the Secret Snake Order. Romans and Greeks did exactly the same.[11] This was very common in all the polytheistic religions from those in India to the Druids.

Druids cultivated arcane knowledge and sacred wisdom; they were central to their Celtic education.[12] Druid is thought to have derived from dar, meaning "oak," and uid, meaning "hidden,[13] concealed, secret, or illicit knowledge from creation." Like Hermes, Druids interceded as religious officials between this world and the gods; they received and held knowledge of the past, present, and future, acting as guardians for the Celtic tradition and knowledge.[14] This is the reason Dr. Oliver states that masonry was engaged in communicating abstruse doctrines of religion and philosophy.[15]

Secrecy was the key to those religions. Secret worship was called mysticism. Religious truths were, and are, concealed within the secret rituals and ceremonies, guarding them from common inspection. They were, and are, only taught in secret societies, known only to the initiates. Not only was secretive knowledge taught within the confines of these secret societies, the elite would also worship in secret, separate from the lower-level initiates, with even more secretive rituals to the pantheon of gods that sponsored those corrupt religions. The secrets were required to be housed in secret societies to teach only the elite, for the knowledge contained within the heart of the religion was considered improper to be taught to, or known by, the masses or lower initiates.[16] Secret societies, and societies within societies, were, and are, Enoch's ancient style of mysticism.

There were, of course, distinct degrees of deception. The Lesser Mysteries could be revealed without fear of incrimination, through public ceremonies and rituals immersed in allegories. As for the Greater Mysteries, these were forbidden to be written down or disclosed in any form to the mundane masses. In this spirit, then, Alan Alford writes that the true secrets nurtured by numinous societies have never been fully divulged, a comment that one can apply to modern Freemasonry and modern mysticism. Alford notes that initiates were sworn to secrecy, just as they are today in Freemasonry and all of their associated organizations, under the threat of their life should they divulge any portion of the Greater Mysteries to the vulgar, uninitiated masses. Alford further adds that only at the final level of initiation, the Third Level of Perfection, or at the Thirty-Third Level of Freemasonry, is the "Secret of Secrets" revealed, which would not only astound the initiate but also is believed in legend to be of such earth-shattering meaning that its revelation would overturn any preconceived opinions.[17]

A requisite for secrecy and Mysteries brimming with unbridled knowledge was the attraction these tantalizing groups garnered. These secret societies played upon the curiosity of their prey, luring the privileged elite, deemed worthy to join those societies. This is how it works today with modern Freemasonry: one must be judged worthy to be invited, or sponsored, to join their clandestine ranks.[18] Such is the way of secret societies and elitist groups in general, for they consider themselves to be superior to the average human being. This hubris is yet another foundation stone in The Genesis 6 Conspiracy.

Just to be clear, Enochian pantheism that Freemasonry is anchored in is a doctrine denying the personality of God, while worshipping gods of different creeds. Pantheism depersonalizes God to a universal life force, to an impersonal energy.[19] This universal life force is pure energy and believed to be the father of creation, allegorized as God, Buddha, the Force, Yahweh, and others; it is the singularity and the unicity point that sparked the Big Bang.[20] Pantheism, according to Webster, is derived from the root word pantheon, defined as "a temple of all gods, and as a complete mythology." The word pantheon is derived from two Greek words: pan, meaning all, and theos, meaning god(s).[21] Pantheism is not compatible with monotheistic religions.

The Bible does not state definitively that fallen angels, and likely many demons (immortal spirits of the original Nephilim), are the false gods worshipped in pagan and pantheistic religions. The Qur'an does state that postdiluvian disbelievers did, however, rebelliously reestablish alleged equals to God in their new religions, ignoring how many generations had just been destroyed before them by the flood for worshipping idols and false gods.[22] The Qur'an further notes: "On the day He gathers them all together, He will say to the angels, 'Was it you these people worshipped?' They will reply: 'they worshipped the Jinn—most of them believed in them.'"[23]

The Qur'an is very clear not to establish any being, no matter how powerful, to be the equal to God, the partner of God, or the female sexual partner of God,[24] for there is no such being or possibility of a being as powerful and omnipotent as God. God neither takes wives, nor any form of female counterparts, nor does God procreate sexual offspring of any kind;[25] God merely speaks, and it is.[26] Only those who will burn in the hell fire—fallen angels, Jinn, demons, and those who follow them, claim that God has kinship with the Jinn and or with fallen angels.[27]

The Jinn are beings made from smokeless fire before Adam; these are the beings in paganism set up as equals to God, even though God created them.[28] The Qur'an is likely referring to beings noted in the Bible as servants/angels that are flames of fire, while the winds are His messengers/angels. (Psalm 104: 4 and note a and Hebrew 1:7). The Jinn are unseen and evil beings assigned to every prophet/messenger by God[29] to keep them humble. The objective of the Jinn, as permitted by God, is to seduce great numbers of humans away from God so that they will be judged with the hell fires.[30] Jinn can no longer enter heaven, which is protected from the Jinn by stern guards equipped with powerful shooting stars;[31] the Jinn are unrighteous beings that did not believe God would create a resurrection for humankind.[32] It seems clear then that the Qur'an distinguishes fallen angels from loyal angels as being Jinn, and thus demons/Nephilim were the sons of Jinn, the likely root for genie. In fact, Iblis/Satan is referred to as Jinn, as well as one of the false gods of paganism.[33] However, it is possible that Jinn may include the offspring of angels that may have mated with other angels to create a lower god, similar to demons.

The term mysticism and its genitive religious words were derived from the word mystic and are defined by Webster's in these ways:

- relating to or containing mystery: involving a sacred or secret meaning revealed only to a spiritually enlightened mind;
- one who seeks for direct intercourse with God in elevated religious feeling or ecstasy;
- mystically and mysticism: the doctrine of the mystics, in an effort to attain direct spiritual communion with God;
- mystify: to make mysterious, obscure, or secret: to puzzle;
- mystique: a set of beliefs or attitudes developing around an object, or associated with a particular group or "cult."[34]

The Mysteries were created to both conceal and teach the initiated two great truths, along with the secrets to the Seven Sacred Sciences and other illicit knowledge from heaven, which had to be kept secret from the masses. The two great truths were (1) the unity of God and (2) the immortality of the soul in a future life. The translations of the two truths are very simple and consistent with the definition of pantheism and mysticism.

The first truth, the unity of God, represented by the All-Seeing Eye or the Eye of Osiris, pictured prominently on the American one-dollar bill, atop a great pyramid, is the nonpersonal, universal life force and not a single entity, omnipotent God proclaimed by monotheistic religions.[35] The All-Seeing Eye, however, known also as the allegorical sun god, is merely a symbol for the creator, the hidden god, the Architect of Heaven and Earth.[36]

This is the secret that supposedly changes all preconceived minds alongside the illicit knowledge from heaven.

The second truth, immortality of the soul, is commonly known as reincarnation. The individual is on an evolutionary path to godhood, where eventually, that person, too, will join the pantheon of gods. These principles were a common theme in all the mystical, pantheistic religions, from Hinduism to Celtic mysticism. The death of Osiris symbolized his change from mortal king to an immortal god—this is the allegory of the doctrine of future life.[37] The initiate was provided with all the secrets necessary to navigate the netherworld of death so that he, too, would secure a blissful afterlife, culminating rebirth;[38] certainly, a secret worthy enough to keep from the mundane masses!

The mystical religions generally break the earthly, spiritual evolution of the initiate into three parts, known as degrees. The Third Degree is the level of spiritual evolution known as perfection, where all the Mysteries have been revealed and completed and the Secret of Secrets is revealed. The initiate only learns more of the sacred truths as he climbs the spiritual ziggurat, the secret society. Some subdivide the three levels, or degrees, into many more degrees or levels, such as the Scottish branch of modern Freemasonry, in which there are thirty-three degrees, but essentially the three degrees remain intact, just as the English Rite of Freemasonry maintains the three degrees to perfection.

Appreciating that the sacred knowledge is withheld within secret societies, one should not regard the sacred knowledge being encoded as surprising. The manner in which the knowledge was, and is, concealed was through symbols, allegories, metaphors, figures, and enigmas.[39] These various forms of allegories encrypted in secret rituals were taught under the banner of the Mysteries. Essentially, the secret ceremonies and rituals were created for the maintenance and teaching of the truths to the initiates, through their encryption into the various allegorical rituals. The purpose of employing the allegories was to conceal the truths from those undeserving, the mundane masses, while allowing the deserving to decode and understand the truths: Legominism. Legominism is the occult practice of concealing the truth within the superficial text or symbols in art, which are only understood by those within the Craft, symbols such as those in Holy Grail literature, in many of Da Vinci’s paintings (especially The Last Supper), and the obscure symbols in Freemasonry.

The discriminating style of mysticism and its initiation was by design, according to Craft records. The secret societies protected themselves from the masses through the secret rituals and allegories, in which initiation was completed en route to perfection and godhood was sure to follow. The initiated believed they were protecting the sacred knowledge from those not deserving, which were usually the poor. They believed, according to Freemason legends, that it was improper to teach the masses the sacred knowledge; therefore, secrecy was a must.[40] This was how the ritualistic style of the Mysteries sprang up around the corrupted knowledge from heaven.

Hence, Nimrod was the first Grand Master, who framed the first constitution of the Masons. The Anderson and York legends support the Craft first establishing appropriate laws under Nimrod at Babel.[41] The postdiluvian Mysteries were, however, based entirely upon the antediluvian Mysteries that were etched in hieroglyphic writings invented by Enoch.[42]

One should expect the joint efforts of all mystical religions and organizations of our modern age to put forward an all-out, united effort in the not so distant future to rekindle the rebellion against God that first took place at the time of Noah and then again at the time of Nimrod and the Tower of Babel. This harmonious convergence will combine with the so-called secular institutions of government, known as the New World Order, when world government will be the cornerstone of humankind’s survival and evolution into godhood. Secular institutions supporting world government, in which Freemasons are an integral part, will then partner with a new global pantheistic religion, bringing all the religions and government under one umbrella, just as it was in the time of Nephilim and Nimrod, reincarnating the original Genesis 6 Conspiracy.

The proposed future global religion will be the same mystical religion of ages past. Only the elitist initiates will be privileged to know the real doctrines at the core. For the public, a pastoral form of polytheism will be promoted, just as public worship in antiquity was based on superstitious polytheism. Once more, there will be a public form of worship, complete with the Lesser Mysteries, where all gods are welcomed, and then there is the private or secret form, known as the Greater Mysteries,[43] which is reserved only for the Adepts.

Each pagan god of antiquity had secret worship paid unto them, just as they will in the future, as well as the public form of worship that was, and will be, designed to hide from the public the true gods worshipped—Satan and his rebellious angels. Secrecy in the future will once more be a must, just like it was in antiquity, for if the general public, past, present, and future, understood whom the true gods were, are, and will be, that they are worshipping, they, of course, would not worship them. It is the ultimate deception to lure humankind away from the true God.

The delusion comes in all forms, just as it did in the past. To provide an example is not all too difficult. Remember, the corruption of the sacred knowledge is designed to lure and deceive people away from the true God and into worshipping Satan and the fallen, rebellious angels.

The Seventh Sacred Science is acknowledged to be astronomy. The corruption of astronomy led to astrology, the study of the positions and the motions of the heavenly bodies to determine their (supposed) influence on the fate of men.[44] It is the corrupted offshoot of the pure form of astronomy.

Similarly, the other six Sacred Sciences were corrupted in the same manner. Astrology is a derivative of the word astrologers that appears in Isaiah, where Babylonians are associated with stargazers, who were powerless astrologers and monthly prognosticators.[45] Astrology was also noted as being associated with magicians, sorcerers, Chaldeans, wise men, and soothsayers. Astrology also has a connection with the wise men, or Magi, who saw the star of Jesus and may have been a cult of astrologers. Babylonia closely related stars with gods to stress their impact on human affairs.[46] In fact, the sign used by Babylonians to distinguish a god's name was the sign of a star.

Going to the stars for guidance was considered the same as idolatry to biblical writers; the prophet Samuel equated the two in his denunciation of Saul.[47] Astrology assumes that the true God does not control history but that history is governed by pagan gods revealed in the movement of planets.

Freemasons believe that astrologers were committed to truth and enlightenment, just as the Magi and soothsayers were, along with the Brahmins, druids, and philosophers of the Greeks and Romans.[48] Clearly, Scripture considers astrology to be the corrupted form of astronomy, just as Freemasonry upholds astrology as an extension of the pure form of the sciences. Now, Enoch discovered the zodiac,[49] from which astrology is based. Enoch is also attributed by Craft legends as being the originator of the worship of the stars with religious rites. He initiated festivals and sacrifices to the sun at periods when the sun entered each of the zodiacal signs.

Although astrology today is not taken seriously by a great number of people, many today still ponder over it and wonder. There are a select number of powerful potentates who do take astrology very seriously, living their lives around it and infecting as many as possible with it. Astrology will become even more popular as time goes on; it is a deceiving force used to lead humans away from God. Astrology is pantheism for the public consumption of the Lesser Mysteries, leading people to the stars and false gods associated with those stars. It is idolatry designed to coax people into placing their faith in the stars (gods), instead of placing their faith in God. It is the denial of the power of the true God and the recognition of the false power of Satan and his fallen angels.

Freemasonry, theosophy, Gnosticism, New Age beliefs, and mysticism are the contemporary purveyors of the antediluvian seditions. The end times will be marked with numerous numinous signs in the night skies. Astronomical signs will be drafted by the astrologers of the mystical occult forces to deceive the naïve masses of the world so that the spurious forces can incite rebellion against God, thus leading to the judgment by fire.[50]

Astrology and mysticism formed the rival antediluvian religion of Enoch the Evil in its purest sense; it was imposed through state-sponsored tyranny upon the antediluvian world. This epoch was steeped in corruption, idolatry, mysticism, and pantheism. Mysticism was created by the posterity of Cain through the sponsorship of fallen angels, and it was passed on to the Nephilim to terrorize humankind of that epoch. Cainites, mysticism, and the Nephilim were the three-part axis of evil sponsored by fallen angels. This ancient axis of evil brought the antediluvian age to its knees through rebellion, which ultimately brought the deluge upon their cryptic civilizations.

CHAPTER 11

THE GREAT DELUGE

Now the earth was corrupt in God’s sight and was full of violence. God saw how corrupt the earth had become, for all the people on the earth had corrupted their ways. So God said to Noah. “I am going to put an end to all people, for the earth is filled with violence because of them. I am surely going to destroy both them and the earth.”

—Genesis 6:11–13

The Nephilim imprint on history and the flood has been completely ignored, overlooked, or perhaps deliberately kept from common knowledge throughout the modern era.

God separated out Noah in the days leading up to the flood and selected him for the purity of his Adamite lineage, free from Cainite, day six, and Nephilim bloodlines. He further selected him due to his purity from evil and corruption and complete loyalty to the true God.

Noah and his family were the only Adamites among humankind that God deemed worthy enough to regenerate the earth after the flood, providing humankind with a second chance. So then, how could all the other descendants of Adam have become so corrupt in such a short period of time, when their roots were so solidly planted with the rule of God? What impact did the Nephilim imprint upon the greatest catastrophe to strike our civilization to this time, the legendary event recalled as “the great flood” or “the deluge”?

We will expose the far-reaching explanations to these questions. Moreover, we will begin to establish that Nephilim, indeed, did survive the deluge, driving us to the possibility and conclusion that not only did the descendants of Adam and Noah survive but also possibly even the descendants of other humankind, the people originally scattered around the globe as nomadic hunters created in day six. The notion that Nephilim survived opens possibilities to others surviving the cataclysm. Consider Genesis’s precise text: “I will wipe mankind, whom I have created from the face of the earth” (Genesis 6:7); “Everything on earth will perish” (Genesis 7:17); “I will wipe from the face of the earth every living creature I have made” (Genesis 7:5); “Every living thing that moved perished—birds, livestock, wild animals, all the creatures that swarm over the earth, and all mankind. Everything on dry land that had the breath of life in its nostrils died. Every living thing on the face of the earth was wiped out… Only Noah was left, and those with him in the ark” Genesis (7:21-23). What if safe havens not on the face of the earth were provided by dark angels? What if dark angels provided various arks and safe havens for other races around the globe? Perhaps a selected number of rebellious refugees additionally survived. Do not summarily dismiss this seemingly biblically contrarian hypothesis. Sorting out prehistory, the potential of others surviving the Flood, and The Genesis 6 Conspiracy is biblically consistent, but this jarring precept for many requires placidity for a short time.

Let us once more take some time to bridge some of the Mysteries and background of this mythical antediluvian period, concerning those legendary heroes of renown. The word Nephilim derives from the Hebrew language, and specifically the Hebrew word nopelim or nepelim. The root word for nopelim is npl, meaning “fall.” The suffix im translates as “the ones.”[1] Therefore, by piecing these two words together alongside their literal translation, we find the definition of nopelim as “fallen ones,” just as Josephus described the infamous ones, the fallen angels, those who procreated with the daughters of men. Additionally, Nephilim is also the root Aramaic word for Nephila, for the “Orion” constellation suggesting to me that Nephilim are somehow directly connected to Orion.[2] In legend, Orion is the constellation where the fallen angel Shemyaza/Azazel is believed to be hung; therefore suggesting Nephilim somehow derive from Shemyaza/Azazel.

Remember, Nephilim were considered giant demigods, the unnatural offspring of the daughters of men and fallen angels, violating God's natural order of creation.[3] Demigod is defined as "one whose nature is partly divine — a hero fabled to be the offspring of a god and a mortal,"[4] bringing all sources into perfect harmony. Nephilim were recorded in the Bible as heroes of old, the offspring of fallen angels, demigods, and/or heroes of renown, who were partly divine until God interceded, forcing mortality back into their spirits— and, of course, they were giants. Nephilim were named "fallen ones" after their progenitors, the rebellious angels of the angelic realm who had already fallen from grace in the great rebellion fought against God and led by Lucifer.

In Genesis, "men of renown" and "heroes of old" are phrases derived from the Hebrew word gibborim, in the original Hebrew transcripts. Gibborim were mentioned again in the original Hebrew translation of Genesis 10 with regard to Nimrod, who ruled in Babylon just after the flood. Nimrod was said to be the mightiest of warriors and hunters of his time. Gibborim, at that time, were fearfully renowned as potentates, ones who held absolute power, just as Ezekiel speaks to potentates (original Hebrew transcripts gibborim) in Ezekiel 26 and 32.[5] Webster's defines potentate as "one who possesses power, a prince."[6]

The mysterious Nimrod was regarded as a gibborim, but Genesis does not state that he should be considered Nephilim. Nimrod was a mighty warrior, a fearsome king who held absolute power. He, too, was recorded in Genesis 10 as being a man of renown. Nimrod must have been a celebrated individual of great importance of that era to be considered worthy of having his name recorded in the ancient annals of the Bible. Even so, Genesis does not give any details as to what made the life of Nimrod so noteworthy.

Assembling this information, we find that Nephilim were leaders of the ancient peoples, the princes and kings, mighty warriors, heroes of renown, and powerful potentates, who obtained absolute power through tyranny that was backed by the evil gifts of their superior size and strength, obtained through their hereditary gene alterations from their procreators. Dark angels previously conspired with Satan to create an abominable race designed to plague creation, a reprobate race that toiled relentlessly against the righteous plans of God and the seed of Adam. The mighty men of renown of the ancient epoch were very accurately named Nephilim, Gibborim, and mighty warriors of the fallen ones; they quickly achieved absolute power over the peoples by the seventh generation.

But do we, in fact, know that the Nephilim were impious potentates? Here is what we can say with certainty, according to The Good News Bible: “they were famous giants, a mighty race skilled in war”;[7] “they were heroes of old, men of renown.”[8] “Nephilim were a proud race of giants,”[9] “the ancient giants rebelled against God,”[10] “they were confident in their own strength.”[11] Deuteronomy additionally claims the Nephilim were wicked nations.[12] These were the seeds for corruption; it was only a matter of time before their scurrilous ways took root.

Once Nephilim began to dominate, they did become corrupt. Sirach records that Nephilim became overconfident in their own strength and rebelled against God,[13] just as giants rebelled against the gods in pantheistic myths. Ezra 4:15–16 notes the rebellious nature in regard to antediluvian Jerusalem: “A search may be made in the archives of your predecessors. In these records you will find that this city is a rebellious city, troublesome to kings and provinces, a place of rebellion from ancient times.” “Wisdom notes” Nephilim were proud of themselves[14]—recklessly hubris.

Nephilim became proud and arrogant because of their size and strength. It is not a large leap of faith to interject that Nephilim were more than likely influenced by their procreators, fallen angels, and consequently were easily led astray into debauchery and rebellion against the God of the universe. In fact, as it turns out, Gilbert notes Azazel and his sorted conspirators were the infamous fallen angels, who taught inequity to the Nephilim, which, in turn, so thoroughly corrupted the antediluvian world.[15] You will recall Azazel; he is the fallen angel chiefly responsible for the creation of Nephilim; he was hung on Orion/Nephila for his crimes against creation and humanity.

Nephilim became a mighty race skilled in war.[16] Once in power, the giants became unjust leaders, evil potentates, and despisers of all that was good. Corruption came about through their pride and misplaced confidence in their abilities and from both their great size and strength. Not surprisingly, Nephilim were tutored in the bloody arts of war by a specific fallen angel, the iniquitous Azazel. Through his dissonant teachings, Nephilim became masters of war, which no doubt further fueled their (misplaced) pride, arrogance,[17] and overreach. Even the Encyclopedia Americana states that Azazel was the "prince of the angels who married human beings and begat of them wicked men."[18]

Nephilim minions coveted one particular impious potentate skilled like no other in war and violence; he was their leader, and his name was Sumayaza, also known as Shemyaza. Through this notoriously nefarious Nephilim the antediluvian world was paraded into destruction; because of the blood and inequity sponsored by the sinister Shemyaza.[19] The blood and violence was so pervasive that Unger's describes the Nephilim race as being exceedingly wicked and violent, that their thoughts were of continuous evil.[20] This, then, explains the puzzling line from Genesis 6:5: "the Lord saw how great man's wickedness on the earth had become and that every inclination of his heart was only evil all the time." When one considers the evil lineage of Cain that corrupted the lineage of Seth and considers the Nephilim contagion, one must conclude that indeed the earth was burgeoning with wickedness.

In addition, Nephilim were taught evil behaviors that fostered exponential growth of evil through the power structure that the Nephilim possessed. Their whole approach to life and worship was in direct contrast to the sons of Seth. But even the sons of Seth were contaminated through the evils and tyrannical powers of the Nephilim. Only Noah was held righteous and pure from Nephilim evil and bloodlines in the eyes of God.

It is not difficult to believe Nephilim overreached in viewing themselves as earthly gods, given the great size and strength that these giants must have possessed, pitted against the average size of a man of that time, in addition to their immortal spirits. Nephilim were easily capable of dominating life at that time, and every form of cultural structure by force. Ergo, they became the leaders of the ancient world, systematically enslaving the peoples and imposing their wills and ways upon them, which would have included the introduction of new gods. These very large and powerful beings became the potentates of old. Their power and influence would so dominate the antediluvian period that as a consequence, the greatest catastrophe ever to strike the earth in that age would be poured out onto the earth. They were, according to the biblical scholar J. R. Porter, the "mighty men of old" that became the embodiment of "absolute power" of the ancient world.[21]

Even though Baruch recorded this race of giants was skilled in the art of war and intimidation, as taught to them by Azazel, their fate was always sealed from the beginning. God did not choose this race for Himself, and therefore, He withheld the true ways of knowledge and wisdom from them.[22] The Nephilim had power deriving from their strength but not from their intelligence. They lacked the required wisdom and insight to avert catastrophe and rule wisely and justly. As a result, they were easily led into open rebellion against God by their procreators. Forbidden knowledge from the corrupted Cainites that collaborated with the Nephilim served only as an accelerator on their journey into destruction. Nephilim plunged headlong into destruction but did not have the wisdom to save themselves. The combined evil of their legacy, along with what Unger's calls the unnatural union violating God's divinely created natural orders of being, was of such shocking abnormality as to necessitate the worldwide divine judgment, remembered as the flood.[23]

God, however, did not simply summarily judge and condemn those evil giants and all humankind. Through the righteousness of Noah, He delivered an olive branch to those demigods. As per the accounts of Josephus, Noah toiled to persuade those brutal potentates to change their ways and honor God as the true God of the universe.[24] The Qur'an records that Noah was sent as a messenger and a prophet of God to warn the antediluvians to worship only God and no other gods, to repent of their evils ways or a face the wrath and destruction of a fearsome day to come.[25] The interrelationship between Noah and the Nephilim is rich in its detail and intriguing in its nature.

Unger's notes that God permitted a respite of 120 years, in which Noah sought to bring the people to repentance.[26] It is not clear to me how Unger's arrives at the 120 years of respite, but Scripture notes that God waited patiently during the construction of the ark.[27] One presumes, then, the ark must have taken close to 120 years to build. We are informed that the antediluvians watched Noah build the ark, both scorning and laughing at his faith.[28]

Hebrews 11:7 does note that Noah was warned about things not yet seen, prompting Noah to build the ark out of fear. One presumes Noah took time from his long and arduous labors in building the ark to warn the world and, in particular, the Nephilim kings. Remember, Noah lived 350 years after the flood and a total of 950 years,[29] suggesting that Noah had 600 years, less his childhood years, to warn the world of the coming catastrophe. The Qur'an further notes that as far as the antediluvians were concerned, Noah's commission argued far too long with them, demanding that Noah stop the condemnations and bring on the punishment.[30]

Noah was most uneasy and distraught with the conduct of Nephilim and the people they held within their sway.[31] Noah's preaching of righteousness[32] against the violence, corruption, and mystical religions would not have played well with the Nephilim potentates. Nephilim were prisoners and slaves to their own wickedness and pleasures, feeding more and more energy into their rebellious, violent, and scurrilous conduct.[33] Now mix into the intrigue of doubting demigods that Noah made it clear he did not possess any hidden knowledge or treasures to entice or persuade the Nephilim with,[34] and conflict was sure to follow.

Nephilim and their human subjects refused to or were unable to yield to Noah, placing Noah in direct conflict with those giants and society in general. The antediluvians denounced Noah as a mere mortal and not an angel, which was what God would send as His messenger to His earthly demigods, not a mundane human.[35] The antediluvians concluded Noah had gone astray, that only the worst and vilest of society believed or followed Noah.[36] In fact, the antediluvians called Noah a madman![37] Noah preached night and day, but it only drove the people further away from his message.[38]

The verbal sparring sessions between Noah and the Nephilim must have been intense, for Noah became afraid that the Nephilim would harm or even kill him and, or his family. This threat became so apparent that Noah and his family were forced to flee from the land to ensure their own safety.[39] Noah was called a madman and a liar; he was rebuked, scorned, and rejected by a violent and disbelieving people.[40] The more Noah preached, the more the antediluvians covered their heads with their garments, covered their ears, persisted in their rejection, and grew more insolent and arrogant.[41] The tension reached the point where the antediluvians threatened to kill Noah by stoning him if he did not stop his preaching.[42] Noah tried to reason with these giants, but eventually, he had to flee from their tyranny.[43]

Sirach testifies that the giants rebelled against God, introducing all kinds of heresies and blasphemies, enforcing their evil ways through the power of tyranny and intimidation, through the great strength, size, legendary status, and absolute power of government that they possessed. The second book of Enoch clarifies this issue somewhat: “Giants were born and marvelous great men and great enmity.”[44] Enmity, of course, implies hostility; these giants were born with great hostility. From the book of Enoch: “… the giants afflict, oppress, destroy, and attack, over the earth. Although they hunger and thirst they do not eat. They offend. These spirits rise up against men and women because they proceed from them. The giants will slaughter unpunished until the day of great judgment.”[45] From the time of God’s indictment against the immortal spirits of the Nephilim until the day of the flood, the Nephilim carried out a bloody rebellion of war and violence against God by terrorizing the seed of Adam.

Baruch stated that the giants were void of enlightened insight or understanding.[46] Therefore, we can conclude that the heretical doctrines they imposed on the antediluvian people did not originate from their own creative abilities. The evil webs spun must have been sourced through their corrupted fathers, the fallen angels. In fact, one may even deduce that Nephilim were not all that intelligent—that their power was not derived by their intellect in any form but only from their fearsome size and strength, guided by their progenitors. But do we know anything about these heretical doctrines the giants forced upon the people of the ancient epoch? In fact, we do. The book of Wisdom provides a surprisingly detailed account of the heresies introduced by the ancient giants. So much so that the book of Wisdom noted that during the time when a proud race of giants was perishing, the world escaped from such overt evil on a boat to start a new generation unscarred from that evil.[47]

Hubris, human pride, discussed in Wisdom 14:14, otherwise known figuratively as Nephilim, introduced idol worship into the world. Pride is the key here; the Nephilim were proud and arrogant. You can substitute “Nephilim” for “pride” in this passage to discover who introduced idolatry into the ancient world. If you don’t think so, then consider this enlightening quote from Wisdom:

> Once there was a father who was so overwhelmed with grief at the untimely death of his child, so he made an image of that child who had been taken suddenly from him. He then honored a dead human being as a god, and handed on secret rituals and ceremonies for those who were under his authority. As time went on, these ungodly customs became stronger. Finally it became law, and idols were worshipped at the command of powerful rulers.[48]

At first reading, one tends to glance over the significance of its meaning, because neither the word Nephilim nor giants is employed, but they are exactly who this passage is describing when the introduction of idolatry came about. Note first that this father (a Nephilim) was the first to create an idol and worship it as a god. More importantly, though, this so-called father introduced secret ceremonies and secret rituals. This is the foundation of all mysticism and of all pantheistic religions of the ancient world that is even inclusive of today. This passage is translating the source of the complicated doctrine of mystic religions. All pantheistic religions are steeped in secret rituals, rites, and ceremonies.

We already know that Nephilim did not possess the intelligence and creativity to be the inventors of mysticism. Therefore, it must have derived from humankind, the descendants of Cain, just as the passage tends to indicate and just as we covered in previous chapters. The answer, of course, is that it was Enoch who introduced mysticism to humankind, in partnership with his unholy sponsors, the fallen angels. The question is which of the two is Wisdom talking about? Enoch likely introduced mysticism and idolatry, but the giants entrenched mysticism and idolatry as the official, state-sponsored, and imposed religion, which all had to comply with or die.

As one continues reading this enlightening passage from Wisdom, the first clue appears. Immediately preceding the introduction of secret ceremonies, we learn that the mystic religion was passed on to all those who were under his authority. Now, as we have already learned, it was the Nephilim who were the kings and leaders of that epoch, but one can still stake the argument that there may still have been normal humankind that held some positions of authority and government. It’s very possible, but we must continue to read to bring forth the final evidence that clearly defines the Nephilim as those who institutionalized mysticism and idolatry into the world.

The last sentence of the passage states that finally this new religion became law, and idols were worshipped at the command of powerful kings. It was only Nephilim in the antediluvian epoch who were powerful potentate kings and heroes of old. And finally, this verse goes on to state, “… so all this became a deadly trap, because people who were grieving, or under royal authority, would take objects of stone or wood, and give them honor reserved for the one God.”[49]

Wisdom 14 underscores everything I have set forth so far about Nephilim being impious potentates, who corrupted the antediluvian world. The Nephilim were indeed the reigning monarchs of the antediluvian epoch, complete with a ruling Council of Nephilim.[50] They were renowned and recorded in primeval Sumerian records as the Anunnaki giants, who not only introduced the notion of kingship but also appointed all such potentates with their blessing and authority.[51] In short, Nephilim kings imposed state-legislated idolatry and mysticism on the people of that day.

The Nephilim intimidated the people through violence and fear, to worshiping new, false gods in ways different than they would have worshipped the true God of the universe. They defiled themselves completely. Even Noah and his family fled for fear of violent reprisals from the Nephilim potentates. This was the schism of Masonry and the Seven Sacred Sciences recorded in Freemasonry legends, in which the spurious persuasion of Enoch the Evil, complete with mysticism, became the law of the land through the tyranny of the Titans.

I must clearly reemphasize this fact: These evil potentates did not have the brain power to create this themselves. Therefore, the rebellious angels drafted their willing offspring to completely violate and corrupt the ancient world in partnership with the progeny of Cain, who possessed the corrupted knowledge of the Seven Sacred Sciences, turning all to rebel from the true God through the various Brotherhoods of the Snake. All this is corroborated in the Qur'an, which states angels destroyed the antediluvians because they denied God's revelations and would not believe in God but preferred to worship the idols of false gods.[52] Dark angels accomplished this dour deed in the generations immediately following Cain, and by the last three generations, they thoroughly corrupted all but Noah through tyranny.

Once the new, state-sponsored religion was imposed upon those people, the pristine paradise became a primordial hell. From the source of fallen angels came even more illicit knowledge, which was given to humankind and designed to corrupt the earth even more. From seven heavenly rulers,[53] likely Azazel also acknowledged as Azaziel and Shemyaza, along with Ammasses, Barqiel, Kokariel, Tamiel, Asderiel, Gadreel, and Pineme, came corrupted heavenly knowledge that held forbidden secrets for mankind,[54] which Freemasonry and it associated organizations now secretly sustain.

The infamous seven include Azazel, the chief of all fallen angels, and Shemyaza, who were one and the same. These were the divine seven sages of ancient Babylonia, of whom the patron was Enki/Satan.[55] These infamous immortals recorded in the Gnostic gospel On the Origin of the World taught humankind “many kinds of errors, and magic, and potions, and worship, and spilling of blood and altars, and temples, and sacrifices, and libations to all spirits of the earth.”[56] The angels did so through the various women they slept with, according to author and Spiritualist Gonsalez-Wipper.[57] It was because of those secrets that author Willis Barnstone has noted that men and women worked much evil on earth.[58] The watchers taught (the shadowy sects of) humankind about meteorology, geodesy, geography, astronomy, writing, ink, and paper,[59] along with other corrupted knowledge banned by God from humankind.

Amasses taught women enchantments;[60] although, another, version says enchantments, root arts, and all the magical arts were taught by Shemyaza.[61] Baraqiel taught women astrology; Kokariel taught women the secrets to the zodiac signs; Tamiel taught women how to follow the course of the stars; Asderiel taught women the Mysteries of the moon and how to deceive men; Gadereel taught women the art of building instruments of war and killing. Although, another account had Azazel providing humankind with the art of war, swords, breastplates, knives, and metalworking.[62] Pineme taught women the secrets to sweet and bitter things (herbs and spices),[63] as well as writing with paper and ink. And Kasadya taught women the depths of evil and spirits, along with abortion.[64] Another version spells his name as Kasdeja, the spurious angel who showed women the wicked smiting of spirits and demons, as well as abortion. Finally, Azazel taught women about jewelry, make-up, and medicine.[65] The illicit knowledge from heaven partnered with the corrupted Seven Sciences and Enoch’s mysticism to completely corrupt the antediluvian epoch under the tyranny of the Nephilim regime.

The book of Wisdom goes on to state that once the people became ignorant of God, they began to live in a state of evil warfare, but that they also were so deluded they thought it was peace. They began to murder their children through abortion[66] or sacrifice in their initiation rituals to their new religion, the bull cult of Poseidon. They began to celebrate secret Mysteries in secret places, while holding wild ceremonial orgies with unnatural practices. Idolatry led to sexual immorality through these rituals and orgies. The people no longer kept their marriages pure; adultery was rampant.

Killing each other was common because of treachery and adultery. Just read how the book of Wisdom describes this evil epoch: “Everything was a complete riot of bloody murder, robbery, deceit, corruption, unfaithfulness, disorder, falsehood, harassment of innocent people, ingratitude, moral decay, sexual perversion, broken marriages, adultery, and immorality. The worship of idols, whose names should never be spoken, is the beginning and the end, the cause and the result of every evil.”[67]

Let us now bring this state of affairs full circle from Genesis 6 and show how this relates to Noah. Genesis states, “The Lord saw how great man’s wickedness on earth had become, and that every inclination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil all the time (6:5), and “now the earth was corrupt in God’s sight and was full of violence. God saw how corrupt the earth had become, for all people on the earth had corrupted their ways. So God said to Noah, ‘I am going to put an end to all people, for the earth is filled with violence because of them” (6:11–13). And from Wisdom: “This is how it was in ancient times, when a proud race of giants was dying away. The hope of the world escaped on such a boat under your guidance and left the world a new generation to carry on the human race. A blessing was on Noah’s boat that allowed righteousness to survive, but a curse is on an idol made by human hands.”[68]

This all came about because of the curse of the idol, the worship of false gods, the fallen angels, and the introduction of Enoch’s mysticism. The only way all the people could have been so totally corrupted was not through choice alone but through the imposed force of will. Only through tyranny could this have been completed so convincingly. Further, the Nephilim must have had absolute power to do so, over every ancient government and people of that time. The people of the antediluvian epoch were so thoroughly terrified through state-sponsored tyranny and intimidation via the Nephilim that they fled from their convictions of the true God because they feared for their lives. Imagine if you lived in a powerful, totalitarian regime like that of Communist Russia or China, Nazi Germany, or the forthcoming world government, universally imposing a ruthlessly evil, state-sponsored religion on all its citizens and responds to opposition with torture and murder. This clearly would have been the scenario in the late antediluvian world. Otherwise, there would have been more than Noah who refused to accept the new religion or were otherwise pure in their ways.

Imagine the entire antediluvian world under the evil dictatorships of cruel and corrupt giants! They were at the pinnacle of their power; they were despotic dictators and disdainful demigods. The violence and the corruption reached such a crescendo that God became grieved.[69] Can you imagine God being driven to the point of grieving because of the great evils of humankind? We do not hear of such a thing in the Bible again. How terrible was it? I doubt that we can imagine how appalling it really was. God was grieved so much that He raised His hand to wipe humankind from the face of the earth, save the family of Noah, who were righteous in their time—and just as important, pure in their Adamite bloodlines, free from Nephilim, Cainite, and day six contamination.

Consider once again the relationship of the Nephilim account to the flood story. Both are recorded in Genesis 6, with the flood narrative extending through chapter 9. Note that the foundation for the deluge follows immediately after the Nephilim narrative. Quite frankly, there is nothing definite denoting the denouement to the Nephilim narrative, distinguishing it from the start of the deluge drama as a divergent narrative. This was no coincidence; this was by divine design, vividly testifying that the cause of the flood was directly related to the Nephilim because of their rebellious ways and state-sponsored mysticism. This is supported by the biblical scholar J. R. Porter, who notes the Nephilim narrative is utilized in this fashion as the reason and or cause of the flood.[70] The Nephilim rebelled against God, just as the giants of mythology rebelled against the pantheon of gods in other cultures. Nephilim did rule the ancient world with unbridled hubris, violence, corruption, and tyranny. There can be no doubt; the giants of old were the cause of the flood in joint accountability with their vile partners, the progeny and dominion of Cain.

Confirmation of this conclusion comes from several sources other than the accepted Canon. According to the Dead Sea Scrolls, the sexual union of angels with humans created a cosmic imbalance that threatened the fabric of the cosmos. For this reason, God sent the deluge to bring balance back to the cosmos. The imbalance occurred when the immortal spirit of the sons of God was passed on to physical human beings in the form of Nephilim, who were both corrupt and violent and who rebelled against God.[71] The fallen angels had de facto created immortal angels, or gods, within the physical realm of the universe, where heavenly spirit was not ordained to dwell. This change of balance in immortal beings was considered a violation against the order of creation. This was, of course, what prompted the omnipotent, true God to limit all newborn physical life to 120 years,[72] ending the immortal, heavenly spirits prospering in the physical realm.

The legends of the pantheon that we will examine in detail later testify unanimously to the same. The giants were the cause of God's divine judgment manifested in the form of the flood. Furthermore, the lost gospels of Enoch evoke the same conclusion. Remember, the giants continued to slaughter without restriction, void of punishment, until the deluge stopped the carnage.[73] Nephilim waged war with humanity, plundered the animal kingdom, and even declared war on each other.[74] The Nephilim babies were said to have grown up to be barbaric beings;[75] they were called "the bastards and the reprobates, the children of fornication," according to Andrew Collins.[76] Again from Enoch:

> … and they [mortal women] became pregnant, and they bore great giants, whose height was three thousand ells: who consumed all the acquisitions of men. And when men could no longer sustain them, the giants turned against them and devoured mankind. And they began to sin against birds, and beasts, and reptiles, and fish, and to devour one another's flesh, and drink the blood. Then the earth laid accusation against the lawless ones.[77]

Note Enoch's accusation of blood consumption in the above passage. Gardner wrote the Nephilim progeny were believed to have consumed large amounts of blood as an aid to longevity.[78] Jewish legends noted Nephilim began the abomination of drinking blood during the generation they turned against humanity, as part of their violent debauchery.[79] The drinking of blood by the Nephilim is likely why the Israelites were later instructed, as part of their holy Law, against the drinking of blood.[80] And God instructed Noah: "But you must not eat the meat that has its lifeblood still in it. And for your lifeblood I will surely demand an accounting."[81]

From the scriptural perspective, blood contains the life of a creature and can only be used ceremonially for atonement;[82] one can only imagine the kind of weight God would place on human blood. The vile nature of blood consumption was completely underscored in the New Testament when James, brother of Jesus and first bishop of the Jerusalem Christian Church, settled the Gentile issue. James then wrote into New Testament Law exactly what portion of the Law Gentiles were to be held accountable to; this new Law, designed to arbitrate Jew and Gentile into the New Jerusalem Church, ensured that blood consumption, sexual immorality, idolatry, the consuming of animals sacrificed to idols, and eating the meat from strangled animals were forbidden.[83] The Qur'an set forth a restriction of food consumption that was more restricted than permitted by the Gentiles, but it was a little more generous than the food laws of Israel (partly because of Israel's disobedience). Islamic law does underscore the edict not to consume strangled meat, food sacrificed to idols, and of course, blood.[84] All these forbidden practices were constitutive evil practices of Nephilim, Enochian mysticism, and Snake Brotherhoods that evolved into the cults of the sun and the bull.

Even after the flood, Jewish legends recorded humanity once more allowed themselves to be defiled at Babel, for they once more took up the Nephilim abomination of drinking blood[85] as a sign of their renaissance rebellion against God. Drinking blood is at the Legomin heart of the vampire tales (demons of evil who sustain immortality from the drinking of blood) and was a Dragon Court ritual of the Sangreal of Cain, renowned as the "Star Fire" or the "Divine Menstruum."[86] Consumption of blood is an evil custom that continues to this day among the powerful few who carry on the Nephilim traditions and The Genesis 6 Conspiracy in secret.

Because of all the enmity the giants created on earth, Enoch recorded that God sent forth His terrible punishment, the flood.[87] As recorded in the Gnostic gospel The Apocalypse of Adam, God sent forth the flood to destroy the flesh of heaven (Nephilim) and the flesh of the earth (humans), for they both had become strangers to Him (they turned from good to doing evil).[88] Enoch goes on to state that the Nephilim offspring were swept away by global catastrophes ending in a great flood induced only by rain. And in another, separate account, angels sent an all-encompassing conflagration in the form of fire, naphtha, and brimstone,[89] which parallels the Atlantean description of an all-encompassing cataclysm of flood, fire, volcano, and earthquake.

The flood event was more than just rain; it was indeed a conflagration of catastrophes. Genesis records the springs of the deep, the floodgates of the heavens, and the rain from the sky caused the flood,[90] ending the cataclysmic events of the antediluvian Apocalypse. The Qur'an, too, records that angels destroyed the earth through both torrential rains and oceans of water, which gushed up and boiled over from the storehouses below the earth.[91] This was an event of such cataclysmic force that limiting this catastrophe to mere rains would be a misstep. So much for the critics searching specifically, and only, for the scars of a global flood.

Enoch's account goes on to state that none would survive the combinations and culmination of those cataclysms, save the pure Adamic seed of Noah, who then became the future of the human race.[92] Enoch continues, "Upon the earth they shall give birth to giants, not of the spirit, but of the flesh. There shall be a great plague and the earth will be washed clean from all corruption."[93] From the scriptural perspective, Nephilim, in partnership with the progeny of Cain, defiled the earth with evil, corruption, violence, tyranny, and rebellion, which then brought upon the flood catastrophes from God.

We should read the monotheist flood narratives, however, with a very open-ended perspective, acknowledging Noah and his family were survivors from the seed of Adam and not the sole survivors for the totality of humankind and Nephilim. Enochian scriptures and the Old Testament were sent to surviving Adamites and not other peoples. We must understand Scripture from this perspective, realizing God sent other prophets and other scriptures to other peoples. We will learn many peoples, including Nephilim, survived the flood.

CHAPTER 12

AZAZEL: LEADER OF THE WATCHERS

> Remember the days of old; generations long past. Ask your father and he will tell you, your elders, and they will explain to you. When the Most High gave the nations their inheritance, when he divided all mankind, he set up boundaries for the peoples according to the number of the sons of Israel (God). For God's portion is his people.
> —Deuteronomy 32:7–9

Why does Deuteronomy describe a cryptic event at the beginning of the world, when the nations of the earth were divided according to the number of the sons of God, with God keeping the land of the future covenant for Himself?[1]

Who were the nations of the world if not the people of day six? In the beginning, angels kept a watchful eye, governing those nations. These angels were the seraphim watchers. Several New Testament passages reference some form of a spiritual, hierarchal government of angels that includes rulers, powers, authorities, and dominions, which eerily included spiritual forces of evil and demons.[2] According to the Encyclopedia

Americana, the hierarchy looks something like this: angels, archangels, principalities, dominations, virtues, powers, thrones, cherubims, and the infamous seraphim angels at the top of the hierarchy.[3]

Enoch identified those high-ranking, overseeing seraphims as "Watchers," just as immortal Nephilim also accepted this appellation later.[4] The book of Enoch leaves the reader with no doubts that Watchers were indeed angels: "… go speak to the Watchers of Heaven…. Tell them, you should intercede for men, and not men for you. Why did you leave lofty heaven, to sleep with women, to defile yourselves with the daughters of men and take them as your wives, and like the children of the earth to beget sons, in your case giants."[5] Enoch, according to Gnostic gospels, was provided with two most accommodating cosmic tours of heaven: "… where much information was given to him concerning the fate of the watchers, the fallen rebellious angels."[6]

The condemned seraphims Enoch witnessed were from a specific order, Grigori.[7] Grigori was simply an angelic name signifying "the watchers," according to Gonzalez-Wipper.[8] Grigori were angels who revolted in heaven, but specifically the impassioned angels who later sinned with daughters of men.[9] Watcher was translated into Greek as Egregoris, or Grigori,[10] just as Grigori was recorded in the Second Book of the Secrets of Enoch.[11] Andrew Collins went on to note that the Greeks were known to have called the sons of God Grigori when they translated the books of Enoch into Greek.[12]

The Hebrew word for watcher defined itself as "those who watch, or those who are awake." These were watchers, the holy rulers and governors of the earth noted by Enoch, who sinned against creation in the sixth generation, in Jared's birth time. A modern group centered in the United States called Sons of Jared claims the watchers described in Scripture were nothing more than super gangsters, a celestial "Mafia" that ruled the earth at that time.[13]

Watchers as you will recall were remembered in alternative sources as liaisons between heaven and earth, which have the appearance like that of vipers or serpents, just as their progeny, the Nephilim, did. Scripturally, only the root "seraphs" appears, and only in Isaiah 6:2 and 6:6. The NIV Red Letter Study Bible equates these powerful six-winged beings with those living creatures in Ezekiel 1:5-14, Revelation 4:6-11, and the cherubim of Ezekiel 10:15 in note m. But what is even more shocking is that the NIV Red Letter Study Bible goes on to annotate in 6:2 that “it [seraphs] refers to venomous snakes in [Isaiah] 14:29; 30;6” where these “darting venomous snakes/ seraphs (somehow) refer back to Israelites slain by venomous snakes during the Exodus (Numbers 21:6; Deuteronomy 8:15; 1 Corinthians 10:9). One concludes then, that Scripture also remembers seraphs as viper like beings. Further the Qur’an noted angels/Jinn were beings created from smokeless fire and indeed messengers possessing two, three, or four pairs of wings[14], just as The NIV Red Letter Study bible cites (note 6:2) “burn” as another underlying meaning to seraph, likely indicating their nature and purity as God’s ministers.

The watchers in Deuteronomy were referred alternatively to as “archons.” Archons were rulers and hostile heavenly forces in the Gnostic gospel The Dialogue of the Savior.[15] “Hostile rulers” is an extraordinarily pertinent, alternative description to rebellious fallen angels, the celestial Mafia. Similarly, Willis Barnstone, assembler of The Other Bible, further defined archon as “one of the world rulers, a governor of an Aeon.”[16] The book Return of Angels promotes archons as great celestial princes, each reigning over a particular region of earth,[17] just as Deuteronomy describes.

Archons were rulers of eternity who delivered mighty judgments,[18] impious powers ruling our world of matter, who sustain Ialdoboth’s dominion over trapped humans.[19] Gnostics believe Ialdoboth, the craftsman of the world, created the planets, stars, and heavenly spheres, later populating his domain with his offspring called rulers, authorities, powers, demons, and angels.[20] Another Gnostic gospel, The Secret Book According to John, recorded the ruler Ialdaboath sending his angels to the daughters of humankind so that they might raise up posterity (Nephilim) for themselves.[21]

The Gnostic gospel The Hypostasis of the Archons proclaimed as its self-testimony the reality of those archonic rulers.[22] Hypostasis translates as “the reality.”[23] It is to this legitimate but unexplained authority of rule that Jude 1:6 refers to when it states: “… and the angels who did not keep their positions of authority but abandoned their own home—these he has kept in darkness, bound with everlasting chains for judgment on the great day.” The home they abandoned was heaven, when they came down to earth to violate the laws of creation through copulating heavenly spirit with earthly flesh.

Their authority was that of a watcher/archon/ruler of a specific region, aeon, or nation in the physical universe.

Archons were referred to in The Hypostasis of the Archons as rulers of unrighteousness, again testifying to those angels as being fallen angels, the celestial Mafia. These unholy rulers called themselves gods, and they impiously lusted to create sons like God. They, of course, are the false gods of polytheism and the false gods the Bible speaks of. In fact, one ruler in particular, Sacla, called himself the god of the forces of Saboith,[24] or Sabaism, the cult of the stars and the planets and the antediluvian religion of Enoch the Evil.

Just as in the varied legends of pantheism, such as the Atrihasis Epic of Mesopotamia, those unrighteous rulers were mythologized as gathering together to plot the destruction of humankind, after humankind began to multiply[25] and just as Genesis recorded, through a cataclysm known all too well as the flood. Enoch cited this gathering of apocalyptic angels as the beckoning of God to do His will.[26] Only Noah, according to the Gnostic gospels, was spared through the heroic efforts of an archon known as the ruler of the forces, likely Sacla,[27] but this warning by an archon was likely delivered to one of his progeny, a Nephilim, or a selected survivor from the people of day six, rather than to Noah. Noah was warned, but he was warned by God and not an archon.[28]

Likely the most infamous of the watchers was/were Azazel and/or Shemyaza, the chief watcher(s).[29] They were the leaders of the 200 and were the original one or two angels to ask permission from God to dwell among the humans, according to Knight and Lomas.[30] It was Azazel who was charged, according to the book of Enoch, with teaching humankind the skills of war, the art of jewelry, and all forms of conceit and arrogance.[31] The exact same charge was recorded in War in Heaven, The Book of Megadriel.[32] Azazel was also charged with teaching the arts of jewelry, make-up, metalwork, and medicine, along with promiscuity and illicit sexual pleasure. [33]

Collins writes that Azazel and Shemyaza are derived from the same linguistic source and were later spirited into two separate fallen angels before their introduction into the book of Enoch, and that they were one and the same. If Azazel and Shemyaza were one and the same, then we must attribute Shemyaza's crimes, which were teaching humankind the arts of root cuttings and the magical arts, to Azazel as well. The suffix to Shemyaza, yaza, was a Zend word for “angel, or divine being.”[34]

Azazel did not repent of his sins, according to Knight and Lomas; he continued to lead humanity astray until the flood catastrophe, while Shemyaza somehow repented from his sins but could not face God; he hung himself between heaven and earth[35] (on Orion). Remember, Nephilim is the root for the Aramaic word Nephila, meaning Orion, suggesting the Nephilim derive from Azazel, the one hung on Orion,[36] and his famous 200 rebellious angels. Azazel then, according to Gilbert, was formally charged with teaching inequity to all humankind, along with secrets from heaven.[37]

Curiously, Azazel translates as “scapegoat,” just as the word Azazel was used in place of “scapegoat” in some Bible translations of Leviticus, such as in The Good News Bible.[38] In fact, the New International Version notes scapegoat (oddly) derives from the Hebrew word azazel, the goat of removal.[39] The Access Bible unaccountably notes this scapegoat, Azazel, was the name of an iniquitous goat-demon thought to inhabit desolate places (hung on Orion); in this case, from Leviticus, Azazel’s goat carries the sins and impurity of the community.[40]

In an ancient Hebrew ritual, two goats were sacrificed on the Day of Atonement (Yom Kippur), one to God for the sins of the Israelites and, without explanation, one set aside to be released (sacrificed) into the desert or wilderness” specifically for Azazel, for the sins committed by angels in the antediluvian epoch (Leviticus 16:9-10, 21-22). The scapegoat was taken and plunged over a steep cliff as a reminder of the perpetual plight of Azazel’s punishment in the wilderness of the universe,[41] being hung on Orion, beneath jagged rocks. The scapegoat is sacrificed, according to Scripture, for all the sins of transgression and rebellion (Lev. 16:21), no doubt referring to the Israelite rebellion and the golden calf as well as the antediluvian rebellion of fallen angels, rebellious Nephilim, rebellious humans, and the rebellion at Babel. These Day of Atonement regulations immediately precede laws forbidding blood consumption of any kind (Lev. 17:10), a most noteworthy and infamous trait of Nephilim. As you will recall, Scripture simply does not work through coincidences.

According to Jewish lore, Azazel persisted in leading humankind from God, and that is why two goats are sacrificed on the Day of Atonement: one for the sins of the Israelites and one for the sins of Azazel.[42] Moses Ben

Nahem, in the twelfth-century C.E., wrote the following on this ancient ritual: “God has commanded us, however, to send a goat on Yom Kippur to the Ruler whose realm is in the places of desolation. From the emanation of his power come destruction and ruin…. His portion among the animals is the goat. The demons [spirits of Nephilim] are part of his realm and are all called in the Bible, Seirem (legendary he-goats fostered by Azazel).”[43] The Goat of Mendes and its pentagram, representing satanic cultures, are both directly associated with Azazel.[44]

It would seem Azazel was singled out as a scapegoat, just as his name implies and just as Migene Gonzales-Wipper notes: “… that all the sins of the earth were written upon Azazel.”[45] He was then judged and cast into darkness, into the abyss of the universe, to be held there until the end time when Azazel will once more be released to work his corruption on the earth, culminating with his final punishment at the last judgment.[46] The book of Enoch cites Azazel being bound and cast into a place called Dudael (Orion), where jagged rocks were placed upon him and where he will remain until he is cast into the lake of fire.[47]

Included in the violations against creation was the leader of the 200 watchers, Semyaza,[48] or Shemyaza, whom we have already identified as Azazel. Shemyaza is known variantly as Sumyaza, according to the book of Enoch. Shemyaza, too, taught sorcery and waged war. Shemyaza, too, slept with women and created giants after his own kind.[49] He produced Nephilim males named Hiwwa and Hiyya.[50] Shemyaza, in variant legends, provided the name of God to Ishtar for sex, and he was therefore tried and hung for eternity in the Abyss.[51] All the evidence clearly points to Azazel and Shemyaza being the same notorious celestial gangster.

In Chapter 3, I noted that God did indeed pass retribution on to the rebellious angels, who corrupted the antediluvian epoch with their immortal spirit. The Bible does provide details that show this is biblically factual and separate from the punishment of Azazel. The charge was clear and simple, just as Unger’s Dictionary noted that the procreation of angels with humankind was “utterly an unnatural union violating God’s created orders of being.”[52]

We further learn from Peter that Jesus, after His crucifixion and while He was still in the grave for three days, visited those condemned angels in prison, clearly reaffirming the charge that those angels were, indeed, imprisoned for their crimes committed in the days before the flood (1 Pet. 3:19–20). It is the supposition of many that Jesus visited those angelic convicts to demonstrate and clearly underscore that through His unanticipated resurrection, their fate had been sealed and their date with the divine judgment confirmed. And even though they will still be released for a short period in the end days of this age (Rev. 9:10–12), their rebellious struggle is almost over. Remember, the Qur’an clearly recorded the rebellious dark angels failed to anticipate the God Most High planning the resurrection of humankind into immortality and eternity through Jesus.

The angels Jesus visited were the same angels that rebelled previously, along with Lucifer, in an epoch before the age of humankind. Those archons were clearly acknowledged to be the rebels cited in Jude, who lost their positions of authority and who abandoned heaven; they were imprisoned, bound in everlasting chains, and now await the great day of judgment.[53] Those curious positions of authority the rebellious angels lost were in the antediluvian rank referred to as rulers, the watchers/Grigori/archons, just as God assigned the nations to the archons before the age of Adam, accurately recorded in Deuteronomy. These were indeed the ruling fallen ones, the celestial Mafia, and the misunderstood gods of Mount Olympus and Mount Zaphon in Greek and Mesopotamian mythology.

LUCIFER'S REVENGE

The Lord said to Satan, "Where have you been?" Satan answered the Lord, "From roaming through the earth and going back and forth in it."

—Job 2:2

Humankind's unexplained plight is analogous to an experimental drama being played out before the angelic realm, where the outcome will condemn or justify the angelic rebellion. Will all humankind rebel, bow to Lucifer, and cause its own extinction? Or will the elect still choose God through free choice, even when the mainstream of humankind ushers in the dominion of Lucifer?

This is a drama designed to prove whether or not the ways of Lucifer should be allowed to dominate the physical universe, a drama predetermined to play out over 6,000 years, beginning with the fall of Adam. Such curious background information is generally understood, but one wonders why scriptural documentation is so stingy on this all-important doctrine. Biblical legends, however, recorded the rebellion began when the stars, rebellious angels, did not come forth at their appointed times to announce themselves.[1] The first book of the Secrets of Enoch instructs the reader about Satan's conspiracy, whereby Satan wished to be the equal of God.[2] The book of Hagadah notes Satan vowed to raise his throne above the stars like the Most High,[3] but God cast Satan out of heaven and down to the earth,[4] the great fallen one.

Satan was created a great seraph, cherub, power, and archangel, who was the most beloved of the Creator, with powers almost equal to God. Satan was created with more knowledge and power than any other angel, other than Michael and likely a select few other angels. Satan, then, with his immense greatness, was able to discern the secrets of how the universe was created; he became delirious with a desire to be like God, with the power to create universes, coveting uncontrollable yearnings to sit on the throne of God.

Gonzales-Wipper writes that Satan did not wish to serve God any longer; he craved honor and respect and wanted to be served as God was served, but he was stripped of his crown and fell into the Abyss.[5] Even Celtic fairy legends recorded how the proud angel formed a rebellion in heaven among the angels, where he had been a leading light; the proud angel wanted to found a new kingdom, and many other angels followed him. These rebellious angels, were then locked out of heaven, whereby they flew into the holes of the earth and now live underground,[6] in the other world.

All this, then, is indispensable context for Isaiah and Ezekiel:

> … how you have fallen from heaven, O morning star, son of the dawn! You have been cast down to the earth, you who once laid low nations! You said in your heart, “I will ascend to heaven; I will raise my throne above the stars of God; I will sit enthroned on the mount of the assembly, on those utmost heights of the sacred mountain. I will ascend above the tops of the clouds; I will make myself like the Most High.” But you were brought down to the grave, to the depths of the pit.
> —Isaiah 14:12–14

> You were the model of perfection, full of wisdom and perfect in beauty. You were in Eden, the garden of God; every precious stone adorned you: ruby, topaz and emerald, chrysolite, onyx and jasper, sapphire, turquoise and beryl. Your settings and mountings were made of gold; on the day that you were created they were prepared. You were anointed as a guardian cherub, for so I ordained you. You were on the holy mount of God; you walked amongst the fiery stones. You were blameless in your ways from the day you were created till wickedness was found in you. Through your widespread trade you were filled with violence, and you sinned. So I drove you in disgrace from the mount of God, and I expelled you, O guardian cherub, from among the fiery stones. Your heart became proud on account of your beauty.
> —Ezekiel 28:12–17

The Popol Vuh, the sacred book of the Quiche Maya, records a similar account of a similar, powerful god like Lucifer. Evidently, Father Ximenez, the Dominican Friar who first translated the Popol Vuh, believed the god

Vucub-Caquix was a kind of Lucifer.[7] Vucub-Caquix was a great and proud god that abused all things created and formed; he thought of himself as the light and the moon. His eyes were like silver, bright like precious stones; his teeth, too, shone like perfect stones, while his nose shone like the moon. Vucub-Caquix sat on a throne of silver that lit the face of the earth when it passed by his throne.[8] This was the Quiche Mayan god that subsequently provided humankind with fire as long as they worshipped him, just as Lucifer did in legends around the world.[9] This was the god who the Quiche Maya, the Olmecs, and the Toltecs worshipped as the Morning Star, The Great Star that rises just before the sun at dawn, the planet Venus. Venus, Vucub-Caquix, was the god/planet that carried the sun on its back; it was the planet/god that the Quiche Maya, the Olmecs, and their ancestors worshipped over everything except the sun.[10]

Vucub-Caquix, the father of two giants (possibly Cain and Emmakha Seth, the founders of a Gnostic race of giants[11]), became vain; his only ambition was to exalt himself over everything and to dominate. Everything that made this god proud and arrogant was then taken away from him by other gods—all the riches, all the emeralds, and all the precious stones, which had been his pride on the earth.[12] Vucub-Caquix was recorded as screaming as he fell to the earth from a large Nantz tree,[13] in an allegory very similar to Lucifer falling from heaven to earth.

The Qur’an further testifies to the validity of the angelic rebellion, when Lucifer fell from both grace and heaven. Lucifer is referred to as Iblis and Satan in the Qur’an.[14] When Satan refused to bow down to Adam, God indicted Lucifer for being arrogant and a rebel, as well as for being proud.[15] Iblis was then expelled from heaven, but he was permitted respite to deceive as many humans as he can until judgment day.[16] Thus, we now recall images of Lucifer as a powerful, horned, cloven-hoofed being, possessing the tail of a goat, and as the Avatar tempter, the master logician, and the Pan (god), who fell from grace because of his intellectual pride.[17]

Satan later learned that God was preparing to ordain Adam to be the Lord of the earth,[18] the domain of Satan. Moreover, biblical legends suggest that angels sought to prevent the creation of Adam.[19] God had decided to create a “new man,” Adam; He then planned to ordain Adam as the new successor on earth, a vice-regent or deputy.[20] Adam was affirmed the new man, separate and distinct from the humans created in day six. The Qur’an notes God taught Adam all the names of the animals on earth,[21] which the angels somehow did not know, which likely infuriated the rebellious angels even further (The Cow 2:31-33).

Now, Genesis 1:26, which articulates the creation of the people of day six that states, “Let us make man in our image, in our likeness,” represents God and the angels, but the angels opposed so fervently that only God, the Word, and the Spirit then partook in the actual creation of the new man, according to other legends.[22] Angels proposed that day six man only held the possibility for evil and lies;[23] the angels further objected, according to the Qur’an, to the authority of the new Adam, asking, “How can you put someone there who will cause damage and bloodshed, when we celebrate your praise and proclaim your holiness?”[24] God then warned the angels of consequences for their opposition. Many of the angels meekly acceded, permitting God to create Adam, while those who continued to openly oppose were destroyed[25] or exiled forever.

In fact, Ginzberg writes that many of the angelic realms later became murderously jealous of Adam because of the incredible blessings God had bestowed on Adam, but Satan was the most jealous of all angels.[26] The insurgency of the angelic rebellion is, according to Ginzberg, intrinsically and intimately connected to the angelic opposition to the creation of Adam. Thus, the opposition to Adam was fed by the angelic rebellion, which then later fed the conspiracy of Satan’s hatred toward Adam and all the misdeeds later launched against Adam by Satan, the fallen angels, and the progeny of Cain. Thus, the rebellious angels cohabitated with daughters of day six and then betrayed the eternal secrets of heaven—that had forever been preserved in heaven alone—to their illegitimate progeny, the intermixed descendants of Cain and Nephilim.[27]

Please consider that Adam was a mortal mammal created from clay and genetically akin to primates or monkeys, while seraphim angels were powerful, immortal beings created from smokeless fire.[28] Seraphims were pre-Eden, snake-like beings, dragons, complete with wings. Seraphim angels were obviously more akin to and comfortable with extinct dinosaur and reptilian-like life forms from ancient epochs past, which I conclude seraphim angels likely partook in creating, and after their own image, being as seraphims reigned over the earth as archons and rulers. Therefore, the impious seraphim angels regarded Adam, a mammal akin to primates, receiving incredible blessings from God as an insult of immense and unprecedented proportions. Seraphim angels would have persistently and persuasively maintained with God that perhaps a serpent-like being like the crocodile or pre-Eden serpent should have received those blessings and inheritance and not the mammal.

The unique and special blessings offered to Adam went much further than merely being Lord of the Earth. Indeed, one can easily understand how and why the angels continued to rebel and oppose humankind once they fully understood the ramifications of the blessings. Remember, after the angelic rebellion, the earth then fell under the shadow, rule, and domain of Satan and his rebellious compatriots. Remember that Adam was the new man, the improved version from the people of day six; thus, Adam would have inherited all the blessings granted in day six as their legal successor and as the progenitor of all those who would follow who would eventually inherit eternity through Jesus.

The incredible blessings bestowed upon Adam are alluded to in Psalm 8:4–8:

> What is man that you are mindful of him? You made him a little lower than the heavenly beings [angels] and crowned him with glory and honor. You made him ruler over the works of your hands; you put everything under his feet: all the flocks and herds, and the beasts of the field, the birds of the air, and the fish of the seas.

Remember, the earth originally fell under the complete authority of Satan and his celestial archons. This is a breathtaking revelation, and it was a direct assault on the authority of the angelic realm by God, in favor of humans!

Psalm 8:4-8 may leave the Adam’s authority and future inheritance through Jesus somewhat open to speculation, but Hebrews does not. Hebrews 1:2 through 2:14 states this specific doctrine. First, Jesus was appointed heir of all things through creating the universe (1:2). Of Jesus, God states, “Let all God’s angels worship him” (1:6). Angelic beings were also scripturally recorded in Hebrews this way: “Are not all angels ministering spirits sent to serve those who will inherit salvation?” (1:14). It is Jesus, His true church of faithful Christian believers, the faithful of Judah and Israel, the faithful of Islam, and any other human faithful that God deems worthy to receive salvation into eternity, which will be blessed and served by angels in the future. “It is not to angels that He has subjected the world to come, about which we are speaking” (2:5).

Hebrews 2:6–8 then recounts Psalm 8:4–8, noting that “in putting everything under him [Jesus],” God left nothing that is not subject to Him: (2:8). “Jesus, who was made in the flesh a little lower than angels, now crowned with glory and honor because he suffered death” (2:9), now is set above the angels because of his perfection through suffering for God and humankind.[29] Now it is the next verse that includes the saints with Jesus in His elevation over angels, even though they, too, were created a little lower than angels. “Both the one who makes men holy and those who are made holy are the same family. So Jesus is not ashamed to call them brothers” (2:11–12). Through Jesus, the saints, too, will be raised over angels in the world to come. “Since the children have flesh and blood, he too shared in their humanity so that by his death he might destroy him who holds the power of death—that is, the devil” (2:14).

Rebellious angels did not foresee God creating the resurrection of humankind into the eternity and the spirit realm of heaven through the Word, Jesus. God, however, knew Adam would eventually choose independence and death and thus did not abandon Adam and Eve. Rather, God then enacted the Jesus/ Word plan, reconciling God, the Word, and the Holy Spirit with creation.[30] Through the sacrifice of the Word/Jesus, Creator of the physical universe (when God spoke/Word all things were created: Genesis 1:1-31), the resurrection checked the angelic insurrection.

Rebellious angels and Satan knew full well that somehow the mammal primates of Adam’s progeny would eventually be raised above the angelic order. This knowledge had to have added to the jealousy and determination of the rebellious angels to destroy humankind’s opportunity to achieve our destiny in any manner they could muster. You see, if humankind did not succeed in producing, through Israel and Judah, the Messiah and thus the atonement sacrifice of the Word/Creator of the physical universe and His Resurrection, all would have been lost for humankind after the fall of Adam and Eve in Eden, leaving angels as our eternal superiors. We would have been doomed to misery under evil, tyrannical rule from the celestial Mafia, or worse, doomed to nothingness and nonexistence.

This, then, elucidates why Jesus visited the imprisoned fallen angels in the Abyss. Jesus went as proof and Judge that humankind, through Jesus, would, indeed, rise to a higher authority than angels. He bore witness to the impassioned fallen angels that the end had now already been written, even though the fallen angels will be released in the last days to reap havoc upon the earth with the Antichrist and False Prophet. All that is left for the fallen angels is to ensure that as few as saints as possible reach salvation.

Continuing, Satan grew very jealous of Adam, causing Michael to order Satan to bow down, but Satan refused.[31] Satan refused to pay homage before a creature made of dust,[32] and a mammal at that. The Qur'an noted Iblis's refusal to bow to Adam in several of its scriptures,[33] noting that Satan, a being of fire, would not worship a mortal made of clay. Satan was then banished from heaven but was provided respite from the fires of hell by God until judgment day so that he could lead as many humans astray as possible.[34] Iblis was noted as one of the disobedient ones,[35] indeed, suggesting others followed Iblis out of heaven to plot their poorly planned revenge against the descendants of Adam.

Satan grew so jealous, according to Gonzales-Wipper, that he plotted Adam's destruction with ferocious cunning, as Satan's first revenge.[36] God accused Satan, in the Qur'an, to be the sworn enemy and the deceiver of humankind, which was further underscored by Satan's refusal to bow down to Adam.[37] Thus, in the literature of author William Young, creation was then broken (by Satan) through humankind's free choice, the choice to seek knowledge through independence, separate and away from God[38]—Satan's first revenge.

Satan, the seraphim, serpent-like cherub, employed a snake to trick Eve and Adam through Eve, through consuming the forbidden fruit of the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil so that they could become like gods.[39] The Qur'an additionally notes Satan fooled Adam and Eve through persuading them that God was deliberately preventing them from becoming immortal,[40] like other beings, such as angels and God Himself.

The capacity for rational and ethical judgment (reason/wisdom) is the first divine attribute held by God, according to biblical scholar J. R. Porter. Immortality, the second divine attribute, was then removed from the seed of Adam, for neither Adam nor Eve could eat from the Tree of Life once they were ostracized and driven from the Garden of Eden.[41] Humans now declare good and evil apart from divine knowledge and are thus poor judges.[42] All this then opened the door to the religion of gnosis, which discards faith while seeking to learn the wisdom to discipline knowledge with reason.

Humankind chose independence from God, venturing down a different path than intended for humankind, damaging humankind meanwhile and until the end of this age. When Adam and Eve chose to eat the forbidden fruit, they unwittingly divorced the Spirit of heaven from the physical flesh of the earth; Adam later died, expelling the breath of free choice.[43] All evil flows through independence; we have been free to define our own good and evil for a time, but evil is the chaos dominating this age, and it was created through human free choice at Eden.[44]

Rebellious seraphim watchers added to the infamy through creating immortals on earth, where God had ordained only mortal seed after the fall of Adam and Eve.[45] Gonzales-Wipper goes on to write that Satan was still consumed with hatred for God, so he tempted the seraphim watchers to sin with the daughters of men; this was Satan's second revenge.[46] He did so by adorning daughters of Cain with beautiful clothes, make-up, and jewelry. Satan then led the beautiful daughters of Cain to Mount Hermon to entice the sons of God.[47]

Enoch recorded that the fallen angels transgressed the Word of God, the law of heaven, when they agreed to have sex with mortal women.[48] Hebraic thought contends that the human and the divine ought not to be confused; otherwise, the entire structure of the physical world is violated.[49] The introduction of the immortal spirit into mortal flesh was the violation against God and his laws of creation that Unger's refers to. Gonzales-Wipper notes this heavenly law this way: "and behold, the concourse between angels and man is forbidden by the Creator."[50] This violation became known in The Secret Book According to John as the "counterfeit spirit" designed to create immortal giants to beguile humanity and lead them both astray and away from God to, in effect, enslave God's creation,[51] which they in fact did and thus caused the deluge.

The interjection into creation of the Nephilim was a clear violation of the rules set out for God's free choice accommodation to humankind, resulting, resulting in God removing this flagrant foulness, imprisoning the impassioned violators. Peter described this prison as gloomy dungeons built to hold angels until the time of judgment (2 Pet. 2:4). Jude concurs, describing a place where sexually deviant angels were imprisoned in darkness (Jude 1:6). Not all the rebel angels were sentenced to prison, however. Only those who violated the creative laws of the natural order received punishment, likely the legendary 200. Watchers, according to Collins, were forced to watch the slaughter of their children via the deluge before being cast into the Abyss of fire.[52]

Therefore, two classes of fallen angels exist: the angels who were unimpassioned and still follow Satan as their leader, creating evil, and those who copulated with human females. Those infamous fallen angels were not identical with demons, for demons are the offspring of fallen angels and human females, and thus demons are the immortal spirits of giants whose bodies died but whose illegally procreated spirits roam the earth even to this day, because they are forbidden to enter heaven. They are causing evil until the day of judgment at the end of this age, when they, too, will be cast into the lake of fire.[53] Because their bodies would start to die, many of the original Nephilim committed suicide rather than remaining in a painful, pathetic, and misery ridden existence of being half alive and have dead.[54] Remember, though, demons are not fallen angels but rather scurrilous spirits, the apostate offspring of angels.

The angels described in Jude did not maintain their original estate but abandoned their proper abode in heaven; they were the watchers[55] that copulated with humans. Many Bible teachers hold that the Abyss only confines watchers who cohabitated with mortal women and were imprisoned in the nether world as a special punishment for their crime of breaking the God-ordained orders of being.[56] Promiscuous angels were bound like burning mountains into a deep Abyss.[57] The angels of destruction (which include Abaddon/Apollyon, the destroyer of the last days[58]) were assigned to the Abyss, a place located at the ends of heaven, so as to be prevented from sinning against humankind again until the last days of this age.[59]

This requires, then, that there are still unimpassioned dark angels working their deceptions and wickedness in our world, even today, albeit within the accepted rules of engagement as permitted by God, whatever those rules of engagement may be. This is a point that ought to be understood by all: that indeed demons and fallen angels were, and are, free for a time to actively deceive humankind, enticing them to rebel against God. The biblical support for demons not being condemned to the prison lies in Luke, where many demons who called themselves “Legion” begged for Jesus not to send them to the Abyss, where many of their coconspirators were already shut in.[60] The New Testament is burgeoning with examples of demons active in their evil pursuits.[61]

The second book of the Secrets of Enoch described a place "prepared for eternal inheritance" that must be the angelic prison, the Abyss. This is a place where rebellious watchers, branded as angelic apostates, are held and tortured. Angels are left hanging in cruel bondage; they are dark looking, weeping incessantly, for they are being tortured, awaiting the great judgment. It is a cruel, dark place of gloom, where no light shines, save the murky glow of fire continually flaring up. Fire is described to be everywhere, with a river of fire flowing through it. The brooding angels both shiver and thirst in this angelic hell, for both ice and fire are all around. This is a place of merciless torture, a place prepared for the sinful.[62] Biblical legends record that these sexually deviant and rebellious angels are to suffer for seventy generations, bound with chains of iron and pinned under jagged mountain rocks.[63] One wonders as to the connection between Lamech's seventy generations and these seventy generations.

The Abyss is a shaft described in Revelation that conceals a fiery furnace designed to torment immortal beings,[64] as a precursor to their eventual, everlasting torment in the lake of fire at the great day of judgment.[65] This is a terrifying place, impossible for fallen angels to escape from, until the key to its entrance is brought forth by the fifth angel in the last days,[66] to unlock those evil beings. Then they will weave their diabolical webs during the climax of the 6,000-year human drama.

According to Nelson's, the Abyss describes the prison for disobedient spirits; it is the bottomless pit or chaotic deep and is Sumerian in origin.[67] Similarly, The New Testament In Today's English defines the Abyss as a very deep hole in the earth, where, according to ancient Jewish tradition, the evil spirits are imprisoned.[68] The Abyss is part of the legendary otherworld of fairy lore. It is the same place where Satan will be condemned to for a thousand years in a future age known as the millennium.[69] Satan will then be kept away from humankind for 1,000 years, providing God and Jesus a limited epoch to clearly offer their righteous alternative to the previous 6,000 years dominated by Satan and his counterparts that delivered only violence, destruction, and despair. The last 1,000 years of the epoch of Adam, through its uncompromising success and through its own self-testimony will be the final indicttment condemning those fallen angels to eternal torment.

All this, then, explicates the enigmatic passage in Corinthians 6:1–3: “Do you not know that we will judge angels?” Perhaps the saints will be permitted to judge all fallen angels for their crimes against humanity, for the angelic rebellion seems to be intimately interconnected with the creation of Adam and all the horrors of our age. Both the future of humankind and all the fallen angels soon have a rendezvous with destiny, the tribulation period, the time of Jacob’s trouble.[70] This will be the time Jesus intercedes, preventing utter annihilation of the earth and the utter extinction of humankind.[71]

The angelic rebellion is a required backdrop, providing context and clarification for the first Apocalypse (flood), Nephilim, bloodlines of the Antichrist, and our destiny. Additional testimony, with indispensable indictments, lie hidden within the divergent legends of polytheism from around the world.

SECTION II: The Golden Age

THE GLOBAL TESTIMONY FOR THE OTHER RACE

CHAPTER 14

THE BLACK HEADS

Male and female he created them. God blessed them and said to them, "Be fruitful and increase in number; fill the earth and subdue it."

—Genesis 1:27–28

Why does Scripture clearly underscore that the flood catastrophe did not resolve the Nephilim abomination? Does this confounding conclusion of paradoxical biblical doctrine suggest a major contradiction in biblical consistency?

The Genesis flood narrative instructs the reader that all life on the planet was eradicated, save Noah, his sons, their family, and all the animals in the ark, which were the only land animals that survive.[1] But the Bible also recorded that the Nephilim lived both before and after the flood,[2] a fact further supported by Israelite encounters with Nephilim more than a thousand years after the flood. How could the Nephilim have survived the deluge? A satisfactory answer, or theory, to account for this ostensible contradiction is demanded; the divinely inspired Word of God recorded by His prophets must be accurate and free from contradictions.

We must first consider some hair-splitting interpretations of Genesis to unsnarl this apparent contradiction. Indeed, Genesis does state that God wiped out all forms of land creatures with the flood (6:12 and 22), but this could be thought of in terms of all of the natural order of land creatures created by God and not the Nephilim created by the fallen angels. One could determine God's actions as eliminating the contaminated natural order of beings from the earth to start anew and all but eradicating much of the unnatural order of beings as merely a side benefit. Perhaps, then, not all Nephilim were destroyed and some managed to survive on their own accord, or perhaps they survived by unauthorized help provided by their corrupt procreators. This is a logical line of reasoning, accounting for free choice of rebellion temporarily trumping God's desire, which pantheistic mythology has dutifully recorded over and over in various cultures around the world.

Another possibility is that not all life was destroyed by the flood. Even though Genesis seems to imply otherwise, it is not too hard to reason then, just as Nephilim survived that it is perhaps possible that some humans, some animals, and some Nephilim miraculously did survive, that the statement was general and not absolute. The notion other humans survived the flood resolves otherwise unaccounted for races encountered by Israelites during the exodus that we will detail later. In this spirit, understand that Scripture's Old Testament reference points were specific to surviving Sethites, not other races and Nephilim. This is the context in which the literal application of Scripture describes Sethian survival. Old Testament Scripture ought to be applied to only Sethians and their narrow reference points and only to their free choice, choosing God and His redemptive plan to reconcile creation through the Messiah, not from the universal perspective, reflecting all other surviving peoples. Even though both alternatives are reasonable responses to the conundrum, I cannot accept these explanations without further examination, simply because it leaves the Bible ambiguous and possibly subject to interpretation.

Thirdly, it is still possible that fallen angels procreated once more, sometime after the flood. Scripture does not inform us of how many times the violation against creation took place, only that those impassioned fallen angels who partook were locked away in the Abyss. Julian Morgenstern, who wrote in The Hebrew Union College Annual of 1939, suggested there were two separate occasions when angels fell from heaven: the first from lust and the second from pride, meaning the second procreation of Nephilim was performed deliberately to spite God,[3] which occurred after the flood. Let us then examine Genesis 6:4 a little more closely, with all this in mind:

"The Nephilim were on the earth in those days—and also afterward—when the sons of God went to the daughters of men and had children by them."

Certainly one can interpret this excerpt to mean that the union of angels and humans before the flood created Nephilim and that somehow some survived the flood, placing the Noah account into conflict with the Nephilim narrative, even though both are, in fact, part of the same narrative. Or one can read the excerpt just as it was recorded: Nephilim roamed the earth both before and after the flood, and the sons of God copulated with the daughters of men both before and after the flood. The verse clearly states that the fallen angels went to women in the antediluvian epoch and then again after. Hence the most logical and biblically acceptable solution to the enigma is that some of the remaining fallen angels repeated the same violation as in pre-flood times and that they did so the second time in an act of revenge and spite against God, as opposed to the first time, which was motivated by lust.

I cannot make the grandiose statement that this is the factual answer to the enigma, because Scripture is void of further information on this topic that specifically details the postdiluvian violation. It is, however, the soundest theory that keeps the integrity of the Bible intact. However the second violation hypothesis opens up a Pandora's Box of possibilities and probabilities. In Sodom and Gomorrah, sexual perversion partnered with Nephilim, producing divine judgment by fire, and producing a likely suspect for a second violation to creation. The only certain conclusion as it pertains to this isolated and limited piece of Scripture is that Nephilim existed both before and after the deluge, possibly via two separate violations to the laws of creation. Regrettably, this explanation does not provide for surviving human refugees from the four races of humankind scattered around the globe. We will investigate later additional races the Bible, in truth, documents as surviving the flood.

A fourth alternative solution to this riddle possibly hides within the legends of other societies of antiquity and relates to the first explanations. This fourth alternative is pertinent with respect to their religious pantheons and, particularly, to their intimate relationship with giants. The Nephilim narrative inexplicably contains a consistent, common history, no matter which reference to prehistory one chooses to study. All are distinct from the Sethian account, perspective, and reference points. These divergent, polytheist legends are elemental pieces filling in the amnesia gaps of prehistory.

Sumerian legends are employed today to discredit biblical accounts. Sumerian legends are overtly utilized because they predate any current biblical records, even though this does not prove they are the source documents for the Bible. Frankly, the Sumerian tablets are merely older surviving records and nothing more.

According to Sumerian traditions derived from the Assyrian tablets, the first humans were known as the "Black Heads."[4] Although most of the antediluvian clay tablets have been lost to history, many survived to the time of Ashurbanipal, circa 668–633 B.C.E. Ashurbanipal noted that he possessed antediluvian tablets in his library, boasting that he was "learned" in the translation of those precious, ancient Sumerian texts.[5] He is the first known king to collect clay tablets into a large library at Nineveh, collecting 30,000 tablets, including the Epic of Gilgamesh.[6]

What was most intriguing about the Black Heads was that they were the antediluvian Sumerians, according to Alford.[7] Cahill notes that, in fact, the Sumerians actually called themselves the "Black-Headed People." One wonders whether the Black Head was both a specifically descriptive and analogous appellation in contrast to the blond- and red-headed Nephilim. Black Heads recorded in their legends that all tools, weapons, and marvelous inventions were provided to them by the gods.[8] Evidently, even the Sumerian language is completely distinct and unrelated to any of the language families of the world,[9] suggesting perhaps that it, too, came from the gods. Sumerian tablets clearly state the Sumerians received all of their knowledge of historical events before civilized man was created, directly from the heavenly Anunnaki gods.[10] This declaration clearly suggests a heretofore biblically unaccounted for period of uncivilized nomadic Black Heads and a specific turning point of history towards civilization.

Again, one further wonders whether the Black Heads were, in fact, part of the race of people created in day six. Consider the case of the iceman mummy discovered in the Alps, dated to circa 3300–4000 B.C.E. The iceman's civilization, and all other antediluvian civilizations stretching around the globe, void of the physical presence of the dark angels, remained stalled at a technological state of the nomadic hunter and gatherer. According to Bauer, no story written or otherwise emerges out of Neolithic man—only a pattern of life.[11] Now compare Neolithic man of the same era to the Sumerians that arrived in Mesopotamia, circa 3500–4500 B.C.E., and established writing, circa 3200 B.C.E.[12] Hence, civilizations such as Sumeria, Egypt, and Atlantis that liberally intermingled with the gods suddenly and inextricably appeared out of thin air as highly advanced, technical civilizations built around an agrarian economy in which the people dwelled in cities.

The Black Heads were created at a Nippur, known in legend as the place where heaven bonds with the earth. The first Black Heads were two interesting individuals named Ulligarra and Zalgarra, from which all Black Heads derived.[13] Black Heads were created in plural: male and female at the same time, with a mandate to multiply in great numbers. Their posterity's purpose was to till the soil, to erect buildings, and to serve the Anunnaki[14] (heavenly Anunnaki), a curious, shadowy group in themselves. Black Heads also thought of themselves as the "tenants of the garden of the gods."[15] If then, Black Heads were indubitably part of the race of day six, then Cain and the fallen angels transformed the Sumerian sect from a nomadic hunter and gatherer society into an agrarian-based society. Cain, Enoch, and fallen angels then transformed the Sumerians into a society of builders and masons, worshipping the Seven Sacred Sciences, along with their false gods, just as Craft legends recorded.

This conclusion is a consistent thesis we have already covered, the hypothesis that Cain and his progeny, guided by dark angles, reigned over the people of day six, providing the Sumerians with Cain's Royal Dragon bloodlines and providing the Sumerians with the spurious Seven Sacred Sciences. All this consistently accounts for the sudden, baffling, and instantaneous rise of the Sumerian civilization; whereas, secular history can neither adequately, nor intelligently account for this.

In addition to this avant-garde Black Head supposition, a Babylonian mural discovered in the palace of Mari city along the Euphrates River in Syria flaunts a painting of the Babylonian Eden that is surprisingly similar in its features to the biblical Eden. The mural has been dated to circa 1750 B.C.E., and it depicts two mythical beings, winged cherubim, just as in Eden, guarding the entrance to the garden. The mural depicts four streams flowing outwards from a jar,[16] likely representing the four streams of Eden: the Pishon, the Gihon, the Tigris, and the Euphrates.[17] The upper scene depicts a king (likely Cain) being invested by the Mesopotamian fertility goddess, Ishtar, to whom Eve has been closely associated in many myths and legends. The Babylonian Eden was known as the “Land of Dilmun” in the Sumerian myth Enki and Ninhursag; it was a place where sickness and old age were unknown concepts, a place where the god, Enki, created rivers from beneath the earth to sustain the garden.[18]

In his recreation of antediluvian history from a variety of sources and from his own conjecture, Zecharia Sitchin wrote that, indeed, there were two distinct creations of humanoids through gene manipulation of primitive hominids.[19] The first creation, day six, produced intelligent beings designed to reproduce rapidly: nomads, hunters, and gatherers.[20] They proliferated beyond all expectations and later were drafted by the gods to toil as a massive workforce in exchange for consistent rations of food.[21]

At some point much later in time, Adapa and Titi were procreated through a selected female from among the Blackheads of day six, as well as the god Enki. They were beings that were regarded as far superior in intelligence and speech, eerily echoing Cain’s alternative creation we will cover later. This higher form of humanoid was thus considered to be a civilized being; whereas, the Black Heads from day six were held in much less regard. Adapa, Titi, and their posterity were erudite agrarians from the beginning.[22]

Does all this ring familiar with that of the Genesis account concerning Adam, Eve, Cain, and the people of day six?[23] Connecting Cain to the people of day six and the Black Heads exponentially increases the likelihood that the Sumerians partook in the second creation of Nephilim.

The first notable concern in the Black Head account, though, is the breath of the gods that was breathed into Ulligara and Zalgarra. It is true that Adam was given the breath of God,[24] but the ultimate meaning of both stories was very different indeed. In the Sumerian tradition, the breath of the gods was designed to transform the Black Head parents into god-like demigods, or even fully evolved gods, a pantheistic concept likely reflecting Lulawa-Lilith and Cain’s infusion of royal bloodlines from their alternative and little understood heavenly creation. Adam and Eve were not considered gods, even though they contained the immortal breath of life.

One wonders whether or not the descendants of Cain and Lulawa-Lilith, such as Enoch, Lamech, Tubal-Cain, and Naamah were in truth Nephilim and if they were, in fact, initially immortal. The Sumerian mythology appears to strongly advocate with Ulligarra and Zalgarra a distinct strain of Nephilim directly connected to Cain and the people of day six, but distinct from the Nephilim created on Mount Hermon by dark angels. One wonders, then, whether or not the Ulligara and Zalgarra legends were the Black Head recollection of Cain and Lulawa-Lilith usurping kingship over the people of day six. And did Cain and Lulawa-Lilith infuse a unique variety of Nephilim bloodlines into the people of day six?

On top of all these questions and facts, also understand that Mesopotamian mythology additionally recorded a parallel flood myth, similar to that of Noah and the ark, just as they recorded a parallel creation myth. It is my supposition that both are nothing more than a Sumerian account recording Nephilim prehistory from a competing perspective designed to discredit Sethian prehistory and bloodlines.

CHAPTER 15

ISIS, ISHTAR, GAEA, AND NINKHURSAG

Adam named his wife Eve, because she would become the mother of all the living.

—Genesis 3:20

Greek mythology suggests the god Uranus, Father Sky, cohabitated with Mother Earth, affectionately remembered as Gaea. Beings known as Titans came from this unnatural sexual union.[1]

Are Greek and Mediterranean mythologies merely a retelling of the Nephilim and antediluvian narrative from a polytheist perspective?

Gaea/Gaia was a giantess[2] from whom her offspring accepted their name. Uranus was both husband and son to Gaea in Greek mythology.[3] Gaea conceived the original twelve Titans, three cyclopes, and 300 giants from her sexual encounters with gods. Six of the Titans were male, while six were female, known as Titanides. They were regarded to be a new race of gods. The males were recorded as Coeus/Koios, Crius/Kreios/Creius, Kronos/Cronus, Hyperion, Japetus/Iapetus, and Okeanus/Oceanus. The Titanides were named Mnemosyne, Phoebe/Phiobe, Rhea/Rheia, Tethys, Theia, and Themis; their names and number vary in legends including: Euriba/Euribe, Clymene/Klymene, and Dion.[4]

One giant, Gyges, meaning “giant,” is the source word for “giant” and “gigantic.” Gyges was one of three Hekatoncheires that were created by a union between Uranus and Gaea.[5] Boccacio, circa 1313–1375 C.E., listed other classes of giants that included Briareus, Typhon, Typheus, Enceladus, Egon, Atlas, Astreus, and Alous, who in some schools of thought were the siblings of the Furies, cyclopes, and the hundred-handed giants.[6]

Josephus first recognized at the turn of the first millennium C.E. that misdeeds of fallen angels closely paralleled the legends of the Greek gods and Titans[7] recorded in epics like Theogany. Just as in its parallel Genesis 6 account, Theogany focused on the rise and fall of the antediluvian Golden Age, the coming of the giant races, and the universal flood.[8] The word Gigantes, also known as Gegenius, translates as "earth born," just as Gaea was "Mother Earth."[9] All Titans of old had the same origin; they were earth born (from Gaea) in Greek mythology[10] and from the seed of the gods; they were beings from heaven (the spirit) and beings from the earth (the flesh), just as Nephilim were. This is the most important and most influential doctrine of antiquity to remember.

The Egyptian pantheon, too, included a similar legend with respect to antediluvian mythology and should be considered under the same light. Isis was considered the Mother Womb of the Earth. Isis was impregnated by the god Osiris/Re,[11] producing the god Horus and the demigod dynasty of Egyptian prehistory, which ruled over the kingdoms of Egypt for millennia. Isis, too, according to Gardner, was known as The Great Mother.[12]

Ninharsag/Ninkhursag (also known as Nintu and Ninmah) was a person whose name translated as "Lady of the Mountain," thereby suggesting that a god impregnated a lady of the mountain, producing demigods.[13] Nintu was nothing more than an epithet for "Mother Goddess" that Ninkhursag was also known as.[14] Ninkhursag merged with the earth goddess to become "Lady of the Mountain."[15] She was also the midwife to the gods, the Mother Womb.[16] According to David Rohl, Ninkhursag was not only the midwife of the gods but also she was known as the Womb Goddess, just as her name, Ninkhursag, is Sumerian for "Mother Earth."[17] Therefore, Greek, Egyptian, and Sumerian mythology recorded various copulations of gods with Mother Earth, women of the earth. Just as they did in Genesis, these illicit sexual unions produced giants as their progeny.

Another name for "Ninharsag/Ninkhursag" was Nin-Ki, meaning "Lady Earth," whose sons were the mighty men anointed into kingship, the (earthly) Anunnaki. Ki was the Earth Mother, the mother of Enki and consort to Anu,[18] just as Uranus was both husband and son of Gaea. Ki, according to Sitchin, translates as “the earth.” Ninki/Ninmah was likely the earth goddess Ninkhursag merged with; thus, Ninkhursag was an epithet for Nin-Ki/ Ninmah.[19] Ninkhursag was alternatively known as well as the Lady of Life, symbolic of the womb, and Lady of the Embryo, while a text called Enki and the World Order named Ninkhursag the Midwife of the Country.[20]

Ninkhursag was celebrated as the Serpent Lady in Sumerian literature, denoting her as the prevailing Grail/Dragon queen of the Ring Lords. Ninkhursag’s womb became famous within Grail, Dragon, Fairy, and Ring culture and with Legomin literature as the Messianic succession of the uterine womb, the Chalice of the Grail Queen, which marked the perpetual dragon succession and the maternal blood.[21] Ninkhursag’s matrilineal blood, the Rosi Crucis, also known alternatively as the “Nectar of Supreme Excellence” and “Star Fire,”[22] are additional important allegories that I will cover later.

The rings were the primary devices of the Anunnaki gods, who established earthly kingship from 4000 B.C.E.[23] What is important to note here is that Ninkhursag/Mother Earth copulated with the god Anu or Enki, both gods at the apex of the Sumerian pantheon, producing mighty men of renown for kingships, which became in lore the earth born Anunnaki, very much like the Nephilim of Genesis. The Grand Assembly of the Anunnaki held the ring(s) of kingship at Nippur to bind the Anunnaki kings in unity.[24] The earthly Anunnaki were the illegal, evil potentates and kings of the antediluvian epoch. The infamous rings of kingship were the basis for Tolkien’s Lord of the Rings trilogy, as well as a plethora of alternative literature and tales, including the Gau’old’s transport rings allegorized into the Star Gate television series.

The Canaanites also held that Astarte was the wife of the god Bel/Baal. Astarte held appellations, including the Great Mother of Fertility, the Queen of Heaven, and the Great Mother,[25] just as her other counterparts in the Greek, Egyptian, and Mesopotamian pantheons did. Astarte was also known in other Middle Eastern pantheons as Astoreth and Asherah,[26] as well as Athtart, Ashtoreth, Ashtaroth, and most notably, Ishtar in Akkad,[27] Assyria, and Babylon.[28] Ishtar was further known in antediluvian Sumeria as Innana.[29] Ishtar, not surprisingly, was the female human who slept with the fallen angel Azazel/Shemyaza, from whom she learned the true name of God.[30] One then wonders whether Baal, the Canaanite storm god, or Uranus was Azazel.

The term "Mother Earth" represented in ancient mythology throughout the world was the female womb that produced a race of giants through a union with a (god-like) male force.[31] Mother Earth is additionally affirmed in other cultures as the Spider Woman, Hard Beings Woman, and Earth Mother.[32] All these legends and myths appear to be the same as the Genesis 6 account, and all appear to be Genesis-based. The same allegorical concept was underscored in the little known Sumerian epic Erra and Ishum: "When Anu, the king of the gods, impregnated Earth, she bore the seven gods for him, and he named them Sebetti,"[33] the famous, divine (angelic) seven sages of mythology.

The Anunnaki were the unnamed sons of Anu, commonly known to be the Anunnaki gods, sons of God; they then fathered additional Titans on the mysterious Mountain of Heaven and Earth,[34] again echoing the sexual violations that occurred at Genesis's Mount Hermon. Anunnaki were thought to be of both heaven and earth,[35] in the same manner that Nephilim were beings of the heavenly spirit and beings of earthly flesh. A full understanding of the Anunnaki appellation brings this to bear: An was Sumerian for "heaven," just as Anu was the god of heaven, and ki was Sumerian for "earth."[36] All this Anunnaki etymological allegory coalesces with Ninkhursag's various etymological metaphors to transliterate the creation of Sumerian giant demigods as being created from the gods of heaven and the women of the earth.

According to Gardner, 300 Anunnaki gods of heaven spawned 300 Igigi gods. The Igigi god remained on the earth (as the earthly Anunnaki), and the heavenly 300 Anunnaki resided in heaven,[37] a legend very similar to the 200 watchers from heaven descending to Mt. Hermon to engage in sex with the daughters of Cain, producing the Nephilim. Rohl concluded the newly created Anunnaki/Igigi were indeed the earth-bound gods (Nephilim) that were of flesh and blood; they did not dwell with the heavenly Igigi/Anunnaki gods.[38] Sitchin believes the heavenly Anunnaki contained two sects: the Anunnaki, who dwelled on earth, and 300 Igigi that dwelled on Mars. It was these 300 Igigi gods from Mars in Sitchin's version who swore a solemn oath to kidnap human females to procreate another higher form of humanoid in the Cedar Mountains.[39]

The earthly Anunnaki were the mountain gods that Rohl said later descended to the plains to intermarry and dwell among the Cainites, becoming one people.[40] In Sitchin's version, the Children of the Rocketship were expelled to go live among the interbred Black Heads (of day six) led by the progeny of Cain.[41] In Alford's version, Anu gave birth to the Anunnaki/ Igigi gods in the Mountain of Heaven and Earth and then cast them down from the "Mountain of Heaven,"[42] in a similar fashion that Rohl describes Enoch (the Evil) leading the giants down to the people of the plain. This, then, connects Enoch the Evil as a likely part of the first race of Nephilim and, distinct from the Nephilim of Genesis 6, as the nefarious individual who persuaded the Black Heads of day six to accept into their civilization the newly formed second race of Nephilim.

Anunnaki is further broken down to anu, or "father," and nnaki, or "sons of Anu," which would be the same as sons of God,[43] for Anu was the head god of the Sumerian pantheon. Another variation to the meaning of Anunnaki was "those lofty ones" (angels), the heavenly Anunnaki, who came from heaven to earth[44] again, just as Genesis recorded the watchers.

Sumerian legends insist upon the existence of the heavenly Anunnaki, crediting them with being patrons, founders, teachers, justices, technologists, and king makers,[45] paralleling fallen angels of biblical legends. The title "Anunnaki" was applied to both the gods of heaven and their Igigi progeny. Baffling and unexplainable events from prehistory make it clear that dark angels and the Seven Sacred Sciences were clearly responsible for the rapid advancements that occurred in antediluvian Sumeria, Greece, and Egypt, as well as other mythical civilizations like as Atlantis and Mu.

According to Rohl, it was decided that in this new antediluvian society, the newcomers, the earthly Anunnaki, were to be the rulers or kings, while the Cainite progeny intermingled with the people of day six were to be the priests and sages, just as Enoch/Oannes was remembered as the high priest of Enki in Sumerian lore. The earthly Anunnaki were the Ring Lords of Nippur. The obligation of the luga/king, meaning "big man" (giant), was to govern and provide security for the land, while the Cainites/Enochians/Sumerians/ Black Heads (of a specific clan or Snake Order) were to be the spiritual leaders, communicating with the gods.[46] Earthborn Anunnaki were regarded as archons and rulers, but not full-fledged gods,[47] i.e. immortal Nephilim. Even though they were initially regarded as leaders, the Anunnaki eventually assumed the role of (earthly) gods.[48] The earthly Anunnaki were the despotic potentates of Genesis, who imposed Enochian mysticism upon humankind through tyranny.

One wonders about the similarities recorded across the ocean by the Quiche Maya in the Popol Vuh. The father god, Qahol, and the mother god, Alom, produced a race, known as the Lords of Xibalba, who were the blood enemies of humankind and who incited all forms of evil and violence.[49] Xibalba were a great race, holding great authority in the ancient days; the Lords of Xibalba were not gods, but they viewed themselves as gods.[50] They possessed horrible countenances, resembling owls' faces that frightened people; they were considered forms of vampires and demons living in a home for ghosts and phantoms.[51]

The Grand Assembly of the Anunnaki met at the temple of Nippur, where Ulligara and Zalgarra were created, and where their primary function was to appoint kings of the Ring Lord tradition. In fact, in the epoch before the flood, Gardner noted that operative kings of Sumer were all Nephilim (Igigi/Anunnaki), appointed by the heavenly Anunnaki (watchers from heaven). The mighty men of Sumer, just as Genesis 6 recorded Nephilim as mighty men and heroes of old, were all known as the sons of Lady Earth (Ninkhursag); they were all anointed into kingship[52] at Nippur. Jim Marr writes that the Anunnaki of heaven created the concept of kingship to control the inferior humans;[53] whereas, the Sethites had no kings. Enochian mysticism was invented for the purpose of controlling the mundane mortals in partnership with the Nephilim kings.

All legendary Sumerian city-states (that the Nephilim potentates reigned over) were created by the gods in time immemorial, according to Cahill.[54] Thus, the Sumerians may have only inherited the cities, and if so, the antediluvian cities may have been much older than the epoch of Adam, which archaeology has relentlessly set forth. Jericho, for example, has been dated as far back as 10,000 B.C.E. This notion of an epoch of builder gods before the creation of humankind was recorded on Sumerian tablets:

> After the lofty crown and the throne of kingship had been lowered from heaven, he perfected the rites and the exalted divine laws…. Founded the five cities…. In pure places, called their names, apportioned them as cult centers. The first of these cities was Eridu, the second Badtibira, the third Larak, the fourth Sippar, the fifth Shurrupak.[55]

We should not forget the city of Ur/Uruk in this august list of antediluvian city-states of Sumeria. Ur/Uruk was the home to the Temple of the Moon and the Sumerian moon cult.[56]

Now let us turn to the mysterious Myth of Zu for additional connections. Zu was an Anunnaki born of the earth; he brought chaos to heaven and earth by seizing the Tablets of Destiny from Nippur, taking away the Enlilship and suspending the norms. We are introduced in this legend to the god, Enlil, the legendary adversary to Enki, and the Sumerian god most instrumental in bringing about the flood. Pantheists disingenuously associate Enlil with Adonai, God of the Israelites and Christians.

The ancient city of E-Kur, meaning "mountain house," contained the temple of Enlil. The E-Kur temple stood right beside the Dur-An-Ki, a ziggurat known as the "Bond of Heaven and Earth."[57] The place where heaven bonded with the earth was the center of the earth, known also as Nippur.[58] The ancient Akkadians believed that Kharsag was a sacred mountain, and their myths connected it with the "Silver Mountain." Kharsag was described in the Epic of Gilgamesh as a place where heaven and earth met.[59] This then pulls all the Sumerian allegories neatly together, thus connecting all Sumerian mythologies with the balance of the Mediterranean and worldwide mythologies, where gods recognized as Father Sky, or mountains, spawned with human females known as Mother Earth.

Three closely related themes from all ancient allegories ring clear: first, that giants were all born of Mother Earth, and second, they were born of the Heavenly Mountain, a very sacred mountain located at the center of the earth, where heaven meets the earth. The compound term "the Mountain of Heaven and Earth" is merely the allegorical sexual union of the Mountain of Heaven and Mother Earth. Gods of the eastern sacred mountain were honored as the kings of The Heavenly Navel, in the Dao tradition, representing the center of the earth,[60] in an identical manner to Nippur and Atlantis.

Gods of mythology were always symbolized to be planets (or stars) and closely associated with mountains, just as Zeus was equated with Jupiter and dwelled in Olympus. In a similar manner, Daoism recorded five Element Emperors that were five primordial gods; when the universe split into heaven and earth, they were transformed into five elements that represent the five planets of the sky and five sacred mountains of the earth.[61] One wonders: could these five mountains have been the Mount Hermons scattered among the five continents?

Mountains associated with gods explains why ziggurats and pyramids were built in honor of their gods, after the image of mountains, where they could rejoin the heavens (the planets and or stars) with their earthly, allegorical counterpart, and also creating a gateway to the gods, just as Babel was built for the same purpose. Thus, ziggurats and pyramids were believed built to memorialize the famous giants and their fathers, the dark angels. Ziggurat is literally translated as “towers rising into the sky”; they were regarded and designated as sacred mountains, and/or hills of heaven.[62]

The fascinating translation to all this global allegory is that ostensibly in almost all pantheistic legends, angels acknowledged as gods, planets, stars, and mountains of heaven cohabitated with human women, known metaphorically in various manners as Mother Earth, which produced giant demigods as offspring of this unholy union. The offspring became antediluvian heroes, men of renown, just as Genesis testifies to, and all took place on holy mountains.

CHAPTER 16

THE GREAT WORLD MYTH

> Only Noah was left, and those with him in the ark. The waters flooded the earth for a hundred and fifty days.
> —Genesis 7:23–24

Why are Mediterranean deluge and giant myths not restricted to Mediterranean cultures?

Frank Joseph notes the deluge cataclysm was a common heritage throughout the world and throughout humanity—that it is the one great world myth[1], which without explanation, bizarrely binds us all to one birthright. The Old Testament version is but one of over 500 different and distinct recollections of the same set of events.[2] It is from this line of thought, then, that one is required to understand the word “cataclysm” stems from the Greek word kataklysmos; it was always specifically assigned to the deluge event.[3]

Seemingly, deluge and Nephilim memories were safeguarded among the diverse peoples of the world dispersed from Babel and/or the far-flung peoples documented to have survived the flood in other traditions. It is my contention that the deluge is the most prominent historical fact binding all nations, all cultures, and all peoples of this world together to one common heritage. The uncanny and unaccountable consistency of memories echoing the deluge conflagration of cataclysmic events, the Nephilim, the rebellion of the Nephilim, and the early postdiluvian resettlement of the globe held within the diverse mythologies around the world is not a mere coincidence.

Historian Wise Bauer noted that even though science has documented many global catastrophes, only the deluge resonates down the ages in all cultures; at some point water threatened man's fragile existence. She further noted historians cannot ignore the flood, as it is the closest universal story the human race has.[4] These consistent global themes must have derived from the epicenter of Babel and with the disbursement of the people from Babel, along with the surviving and divergent Cainite-led peoples of day six and the surviving Nephilim.

Certainly, Josephus documented the flood (and the reality of giants) as history kept alive as common knowledge in all cultures: "… Now all the writers of barbarian histories make mention of the flood, and of this ark, among whom is Berosus the Chaldean, writer of Chaldean Monuments, Mochus, and Hestiaeus." Josephus further acknowledged that Hieronymus, the Egyptian writer of Phoenician Antiquities and Mnaseas, as well as many more historians of the ancient world, wrote with authority regarding the great world flood. Josephus further enlisted Manetho Hesiod, Hecataeus, Hellamicus, and Acusilaus as historical authors, who also steadfastly recorded the flood as fact.[5]

In addition, legends from the subcontinent of India reveal that a phallus of heaven inexplicably reached out to a young girl, his earth daughter. An act of union was completed between heaven (father) and earth (mother) that produced the giants, the Angirases, as their offspring. The semi-divine offspring then acted as mediators between humans and the gods.[6] The Angiras were described in the Cata-Paths Brahmana as "decrepit and ghost like."[7] Hindu legends further recorded an ancient race of giants, known as the Daitya; they were the offspring of the goddess Diti and the god Asyapa/ Hasyapa; the Daitya defiantly resisted the heavenly gods, refusing to honor and worship them, and eventually, they made war against the gods. The Daitya were then destroyed by the gods.

Frank Joseph writes that the Daitya/Asuras were identical with the Greek Titans, who were at first a virtuous race that later became depraved and violent, venting their fury on the inferior humans whom they had enslaved.[8] The Asuras are remembered in the Vedas as demigods.[9] Asuras were analogous with the Danaua from another Hindu myth, which recorded that these, too, were giants, and like the Daitya, the Danaua made war with the gods and were defeated.[10] These legends are exactly the same as Mediterranean legends, and they all based their mythology on the biblically recorded events.

The Rig-Veda further recorded the Maruts, violent storm gods. The Maruts were the strong ones, brilliant and of a terrible design, a dreadful group that devoured their foes.[11] They were heroes, born together, self-luminous, with such strength as to cause men to tremble.[12] Maruts were born as the Bulls of Dyu, manly youths of Rudra, full of terrible signs; they were appalling giants who decorated themselves with glittering ornaments.[13] Maruts were mighty, powerful, and beautiful in their splendor and strong like mountains; they roared like lions and had strength like the ire of serpents.[14] The Maruts, too, occasionally fell into disrepute with the god Indra.[15]

The Yoruba tribe of West Africa recants a legend in which the supreme being, the god Olorum, ordered the god Orishna Nla to form beings from the earth. Similarly, from Madagascar, the creator god aided his daughter, Mother Earth, in breathing life into her clay dolls. Coincidently enough, the Polynesian legend remembers Kane as being born to his mother, Mother Earth, by his father, Ku, also known as Father Sky.[16] In New Zealand, two gods formed a union between Rangi, Father Sky, and Papatuanka, Mother Earth, to produce seventy offspring gods.[17] According to Margaret and David Leeming, similar legends can also be found in the traditions of the Acoma, the Arihara, the Hopi, the Apache, and other aboriginal Indians, and in Japanese and Celtic traditions, as well as in the Dhammai of India.[18]

Similarly, J. F. Bierlein, who penned Parallel Myths, notes other creation myths of giants from such cultures as the Norse, the Sioux and Algonquin tribes of North America, and the Persians. He states that all of these variants utilize trees in their mythology, but in the end, the allegory is still the same.[19] Similar tree myths are also found in Japan, the Arandan of Australia, the Gilbert Islands, and in Icelandic and Norse cultures.[20] Trees were employed in the same manner that mountains were employed, as facilitators, or places of meeting/joining of the gods of heaven with Mother Earth. Bierlein went on to write that the roots of the trees reach into Mother Earth, while their branches reach out to Father Sky, or the gods of heaven.[21] Author Flemming Fergus notes Celtic mythology holds that trees form a bridge between heaven and earth and are a symbol of regrowth[22] (reincarnation); trees are a substitute for Mount Hermon in alternative legends recanting the same myth.

David and Margaret Leeming write that the World Tree is both the unifier and the separator of the World Parents, Father Sky and Mother Earth. Because trees can live for hundreds and hundreds of years, their extraordinary life span represents the immortality[23] of the gods and the immortal spirit given to the original Nephilim. The World Tree is also the Tree of the Knowledge of Both Good and Evil, for knowledge in pantheistic cultures holds the keys to immortality and reincarnation. Dragons are said to protect the World Tree[24] in a similar way that Cherubs/angels protected Eden; this is not a coincidence. Similarly, Atlanteans honored the Tree of Life, under which sacred and secret rituals were performed. Atlanteans named this tree the Dragon Tree, they tapped it for its healing qualities[25] and likely immortality.

In this same line of pantheistic theology, the Druidic variant of the creation myth ties in. In this shadowy Tuatha Denaan tradition, Tuatha were the Celtic pantheon of earth-born gods that were created from the mother goddess Danu and Dis-Pater (sky god). Danu is the divine water that came from heaven to the primeval chaos of earth, creating the holy river, the Danube. She fertilized the holy oak tree that produced the Tuatha Denaan (Nephilim),[26] which is why the oak is revered in Druidic religions.

Even more important to this point, the evergreen tree is always seen as a symbol of immortality because it is always green,[27] just as non-evergreens represent reincarnation because they come back to life every year. A Judeo-Christian should, then, be wary of the Christmas tree, for the immortal evergreen represents the meeting place for the gods and Mother Earth and the creation of Nephilim. Ornamental tree bulbs represent fertility (eggs) and the fertility goddesses Ishtar, Isis, Gaea, Astarte, Ashteroth, and Ninkhursag, just as Easter is a variant of Ishtar, Astarte, and Ashteroth, and the eggs of Easter represent her and fertility. As we will detail later in this book, the early Roman Church, under the patronage and direct influence of Emperor Constantine, permitted pagan rituals, symbolism, and traditions to intermingle and blend into Christianity so that the new state religion would more easily integrate its citizens and thus provide stability within the empire. These pagan corruptions remain to this very day.

Other creation-of-giant myths around the world either use parts of the Father Sky, Mother Earth, and World Tree allegories or tend to fall into a whole other category. The balance of the creation myths that are not echoing the creation of giants tend to echo the biblical recollection of mortal humankind being created out of clay and receiving the breath of God to bring them to life.

Now let us consider the Enochic Book of Giants, from which we have already noted that 200 angels descended on Mount Hermon, where they cohabitated with the daughters of men, producing giants as their offspring. Does this begin to ring familiar with the legends of pantheism? Again we have angels/gods procreating with mortal women on a mountain. In The Second Book of the Secrets of Enoch, a curious narrative described an Order of Grigori ventured down from heaven to earth, to a place called Ermon. This hill of Ermon is another name for Mount Hermon in the upper Galilee.[28] It is located in the land of King Og and Sihon, in the Arnon Gorge.[29] Mount Hermon was known to the Sidonians as Sirion and to the Amorites as Senir.[30] Mount Hermon was located in the lands inherited by Manasseh, from Bashan to Baal Hermon and Gilead.[31] Senir/Hermon/Sirion are referred to in the Psalms and the Songs of Solomon, as well as remembered as a place where pine trees grew in abundance by Ezekiel.[32]

We read the following in yet another tradition, according to the spirit guide/fallen angel or demon Megadriel from The Book of Megadriel, War In Heaven:

> … And behold, the Watchers descended to earth in the place called Ardos, which is in the summit of Mount Hermon. And they transformed their Angelic essence into the forms of men. And the Watchers who descended unto Ardos numbered 200. And they were known henceforth as Grigori. And immediately upon their descent to earth they took women unto themselves as wives, and sinned with them … And Watcher's wives conceived and gave birth to abominable creatures called Nefillim.[33]

Mount Hermon is defined by Unger's as "sacred mountain."[34] According to Andrew Collins, upon Mount Hermon watchers swore an oath, binding themselves by mutual imprecations, apparently knowing full well the consequences their intended sins would have for both them and humanity. It was a pact commemorated in the name given to the place of their so-called fall. This name was harem in Hebrew, also known as "Hermon," and its translation means "curse."[35]

Another account from the book of Enoch recounts that it was Shemyaza (Azazel) that forced the fallen angels in the generation of Jared to swear an oath not to abandon their plan to violate the laws of creation on Mount Hermon.[36] Therefore, Mount Hermon was dedicated to the violation against the laws of creation by the fallen angels, the unknown dedication the Unger's Dictionary refers to. Jewish legends recorded it was Shemyaza that bound the 200 to the evil oath to mate with humans under the penalty of harem-anathema, to carry it through to the end,[37] the cursed oath of Harem, or Hermon. Anathema is defined as "a solemn ecclesiastical curse of denunciation" that they would be pronounced accursed if they did not carry out the plan.[38]

Now, as you will recall, Kharsag was described in the Epic of Gilgamesh as the place where heaven and earth met. Interestingly enough, Kharsag was believed in antiquity to have been synonymous with Mount Hermon, or at least within its immediate vicinity in the Ante-Lebanon range of mountains.[39] Once again, all this further connects the pantheon myths back to the source generated in Genesis, with Azazel being the godfather of the celestial Mafia, only allowing for the pantheistic corruptions to the accurate biblical account.

Secular historical records unaccountably and seemingly disingenuously promote the numinous legends of prehistory whereby vile acts committed fallen angels were the righteous, benevolent acts of kind gods. This role reversing theme whereby gods (fallen angels) were benevolent gods providing knowledge and civilization to humankind was a constant in all mythologies from prehistory.Witness Atlantis and Egypt; they both contain perverted mythologies in the same spirit. Atlantis and Egypt were both considered source mythology for so much of the ancient world that a closer look is required.

Indeed, it is through the Atlantean legends that we can best understand and connect subsequent mythologies with the deluge catastrophe.

CHAPTER 17

ATLANTIS

Be silent, you people of the island, and your merchants of Sidon, whom the seafarers have enriched…. Be ashamed O Sidon, and you, O fortress of the sea, for the sea has spoken…. Cross over to Tarshish; wail, you people of the island. Is this your city of revelry, the old, old city, whose feet have taken her to settle in far-off lands? Who planned this against Tyre, the bestower of crowns, whose merchants are princes, whose traders are renowned in the earth? The Lord Almighty planned it, to bring low the pride of all glory and to humble all who are renowned on earth…. The Lord has stretched out his hand over the sea and made its kingdoms tremble. He has given an order concerning Phoenicia [or Canaan] that her fortresses be destroyed.

—Isaiah 23:2–9,11

Why does modern intelligentsia dismiss the idea of a historical, global deluge? This elitist intelligentsia fanatically flaunts an undisclosed and clandestine faith through their dogged denunciation of a global deluge.

In his book Underworld: The Mysterious Origins to Civilization, Graham Hancock has noted that almost any explanation, however harebrained, is more acceptable than the literal interpretation that there was a global flood[1] As an example, Alan Dundes, professor of antiquity and folklore at the University of California Berkeley, underscored this scholarly doctrine of denial, (unbelievably) stating that myth is a metaphor, whereby cosmogenic projection of details in human birth, where every child is born in a flood of amniotic fluid, is somehow expressed by flood mythology.[2] Conversely, Hancock argues that investigations should be mounted into why archaeologists, ethnologists, and anthropologists continue to describe similarities among these myths of earth-destroying floods as coincidental, entrenched in exaggeration, and irrelevant as historical testimony.[3]

Surprisingly, historian Susan Bauer contends that historians ought not to dismiss the flood because there are too many common coincidences and details to ignore. She further notes that too many scientists and historians manipulate and invent findings and data to further their own careers and agendas, while others permit their prejudices to bias their judgments, to the point where only the foolish and (of course) those with agendas accept these contrived claims of authority and accuracy.[4]

In Plato’s Timaeus, Plato says this, when recanting Solon’s conversation with the Egyptian priest regarding Atlantis: “You remember only one Deluge though there have been many.”[5] In truth, the Egyptian priest stated there have been many global catastrophes over the ages caused by water and fire.[6] However, it is the last deluge this work is focused upon, the flood of the Bible, Atlantis, Mu, Dwarka, and the countless other legends and myths that have dutifully preserved this most recent of deluge catastrophes for future generations.

The prophetic passage from Isaiah 23 that introduced this chapter vividly describes the destruction of the famous, ancient postdiluvian city of Tyre by the Assyrians. However, the means for Tyre’s destruction is baffling, for the catastrophe comes from the forces of nature and not at the hands of Assyrians. Additionally, Tyre was not an island but a coastal city.

Thus, Isaiah 23 is an encrypted prophecy I will return to in the last half of this book. This passage holds three important cataclysmic events within its cryptic allegories. The destruction of Tyre is the first event. The second event is prophetically relevant to the future city of Babylon. The third event is shown in a description of the destruction of that famous city and island of antiquity and mythology, Atlantis. Within Isaiah's cryptic passage are significant, enigmatic Atlantean and antediluvian markers that one should not dismiss, particularly when considering other cryptic passages from Genesis, Leviticus, Deuteronomy, and the Psalms, which we will cover.

First of all, consider that Tyre is cited as the bestower of crowns, which stirs up curious echoes of Nippur, the place where heaven met earth, the home of the Ring Lords, where antediluvian Nephilim kings were anointed and granted authority to rule. Note that as well Isaiah presses on to declare that God brought low the pride and glory of all the renowned of the earth through a watery, global catastrophe. As we learned previously, the book of Wisdom clearly applied pride figuratively to the reprobate Nephilim kings, just as Genesis clearly described the evil Nephilim potentates as heroes of old and men of renown.

Isaiah then forthrightly notes that this island city was destroyed by the sea and trembling, once more echoing the conflagration of deluge disasters that included earthquakes, volcanoes, and floods. Moreover, this passage notes mysteriously that survivors escaped the island city and disasters to settle in far-off lands, once more echoing the Seven Atlantean Sages that began anew to tutor the uncivilized and illiterate survivors of the human race after the flood. Finally, "old, old city" is yet another primeval marker. This phrase, and others, is a clear marker utilized in Scripture to denote the epoch before the flood.[7]

Belasur, recognized by the Greeks as Berosus, the historian who translated the three-volume composition of Babylonian history Bablonica, held interesting and relevant thoughts regarding the city of Babylon. Berosus was a Chaldean priest from the temple of Belus and,[8] according to Sitchin, a priest of Marduk.[9] Berosus was a contemporary with Alexander, celebrated as both a great astronomer and a historian that penned three books in Greek, all of which professed to have been founded upon the ancient archives from the temple of Belus.[10] The succeeding Greek rulers commissioned Berosus to compose a book envisioned to be a living history to the wisdom of Berosus's ancestors, but unfortunately, his works were lost after the fall of the Roman Empire.[11]

Berosus was believed to have had access to the ancient clay tablets from the temple, tablets crafted before the flood and originating from the antediluvian city of Sippar.[12] He was thought to be one of the last inheritors of ancient Sumerian astrology, astronomy,[13] and other ancient knowledge. Berosus recorded the first ten generations to the epoch of the gods, noting the first god, Oannes, was a fish-like being, wading to shore from the sea.[14] Only extracts from Berosus's works survive in fragments preserved within the writings of Josephus, Syncellus, Eusebius, and others.[15]

Berosus wrote that Babylon was utilized allegorically by the Chaldean priests for an antediluvian city, the "first city" of cities, which could only have been Atlantis. In fact, Frank Joseph believes that when the Bible describes Tyre and Babylon in these passages, it is really describing the prosperity and destruction of Atlantis, the sea-born, antediluvian empire.[16]

In the Atlantean tradition, modern Atlantean authors claim Poseidon was the angel/son of God, a watcher/ruler/archon, to whom the continent Atlantis was portioned out, while the balance of the earth was allotted to the other gods, to varying extents.[17] Just as I already noted, Deuteronomy 32:8 describes the earth was divided among the sons of Israel, sons of God, and/or gods, depending on which biblical translation from the Masoretic Text you choose to examine. In fact, Plato's work Critias actually states that the gods divided up the earth, with Atlantis being Poseidon's portion.[18] Poseidon was the chief god and founder of the Atlantean civilization.[19] The inheriting gods/watchers then constructed temples in their lands for worship and ritual sacrifices[20] as cult centers. In Atlantis, Poseidon constructed his great temple (for his bull cult) in his capital city, at the southern end of the continent.[21] The gods in the Atlantean heritage were all known as intermediaries between man and Chaos,[22] otherwise identified as watchers, archons, and seraphim angels.

Poseidon then proceeded to fall in love with a female of the human race named Cleito. Poseidon was also believed in legend to have lain with many other "daughters of men," producing offspring through the illicit violations against the laws of creation. Cleito was the daughter of Evenor and Leucippe, who were both earth-born but, not coincidently, lived inside a mountain,[23] while other traditions cite Cleito as a simple human orphan.[24]

The children of Poseidon and the daughters of men all grew up to be giants and demigods that we have come to know as Nephilim. The female progeny of Poseidon were also recorded as marrying and producing more Nephilim offspring through relationships with renowned heroes and gods of old; they became the first ancestors of the largest portion of the antediluvian human race.[25] Again, does any of this ring familiar?

Poseidon conceived five famous sets of twins, of which Atlas was the eldest and the leader.[26] Atlas was the first appointed king by Poseidon.[27] Other legends name Clieto as Clymene/Klymene and Poseidon as Japetus/Iapetus, the Titan parents to the giant Atlas.[28] Atlas, as you might have guessed, was described in Greek mythology as an enormous giant, who founded Atlantis[29] and then reigned over it.[30] He, too, was the famous father of the infamous seven sisters, the Pleiades,[31] to whom the deluge is inextricably linked in worldwide legends.

Most legends agree that the progeny of Cleito and Poseidon did evidently produce the royal dynasty and lineage of Atlantis,[32] the infamous giant twins. Poseidon's five pairs of Nephilim twins were the famous ten kings of Atlantis, who were known as Atlas and Gadeirus, Ampheres and Evaemon, Mneseus and Autochhthon, Elassippus and Mesior, and Azaes and Diaprepes.[33] They reigned absolutely over the Atlantean empire. As per Atlantis writer Charles Berlitz, Atlantis was subdivided into ten distinct regions that became known as the helm of antediluvian world government. Each king sported a crown of male rams as a sign of his power, and their wives showed off similar headbands.[34] Ram horns were considered objects of kingly and warrior adornment. They were generally attached to helmets and headgear in a similar fashion as the Vikings' helmets. The Merovingian King Clovis wore similar headdresses.[35]

The Poseidon cult (Enochian mysticism) celebrated the sacrifice of bulls in their holy temple, spilling the blood over the inscription of their oath that was engraved on a pillar.[36] This was the original antediluvian bull cult of giants that would later cross over the deluge catastrophe and flourish for millennia in the postdiluvian epoch. The Atlantean rulers repledged their collective oaths to remain true and loyal to their law during this ritual, by sealing the covenant through the consumption of a bull's blood and wine mixture from a cup.[37] The bull was the sacred animal of Poseidon,[38] and it was used in all of the sacred rituals. Further, the epoch of Atlantis fell into the astrological age of Taurus, 4500 B.C.E. to 2300 B.C.E., which held significant mystical meanings, being that Atlas was considered the founder of Atlantean astrology[39] and that Atlantis was steeped in mysticism.

Blood drinking was a Nephilim abomination, which we have already covered. The blood-drinking rituals were wrapped within the mythology of their Nephilim creation myth: Atlanteans tapped the Holy Dragon for blood, utilizing it for healing and immortalizing purposes under the famous Tree of Life.[40]

Native human Atlanteans (likely Cainites) are reticently remembered as longhaired, bearded, wise astrologers and philosophers, bringing to mind wizards such as Merlin of the Arthur legends and the wizards from The Lord of the Rings. Atlantis was completely steeped in all forms of mysticism; its whole orientation was empowerment through the mystical arts. Even the mythical Atlantean Nereids (little fairies), the golden boys who rode dolphins, were aeolytes of the Mystery School that was sacred to Poseidon. The Atlantean holy temple was acknowledged in antiquity as the “Navel of the World,” the Omphalus, the center for the first and oldest mystery religion.[41] It would seem that Atlantis was the first civilization to embrace, cultivate, and export the religion of Enoch the Evil.

The Atlantean royal family and their descendants were demigods. They were god-like giants with golden hair; bold, strong heads; bright blue eyes; and voices that bellowed like Atlas from the depths of his mountain. Greeks referred to the Atlanteans as Titans. These are uncanny parallel descriptions to that of biblical Nephilim and must be one and the same. In fact, Egyptians described Atlanteans as having fair skin, being very tall—and certainly much taller than Egyptians—being blond- and red-haired with beards, having sharp aquiline features, and having slanted eyes and oval heads. The Aztecs and Maya, too, remember the Atlanteans as very tall, fair-skinned, and blond- or red-haired with beards and ruddy or rough-skin, just as other accounts remember Atlanteans as tall, robust, fair-skinned, and with oval heads and bright blue eyes.[42]

The chief sources for Atlantean details stem from Plato’s unfinished Critias and from Timaeus,[43] which were his last two works.[44] Timaeus sets the story by explaining how Solon traveled to Sais in Egypt, where he spoke with Egyptian priests. The character Critias described Atlantis, while other characters affirmed his testimony; Critias claimed he received the information from his grandfather, also named Critias. Critias was a grandfather of Plato, who received the story from Solon, who was an Athenian statesman and lawgiver.[45]

The characters from both these compositions testified to the authenticity of Atlantis as historical fact and not a legend.[46] Timaeus, who also is a character from Locris, further stated the Atlantean account was true and not legend. Certainly, ancient historians all agreed that Solon indeed did travel to the city of Sais, and Critias was also recorded as an actual person, a gifted historian, poet, and Athenian politician.[47] All this, then, provides historical credibility to the Atlantean literature penned by Plato.

Plato's student Crantor embraced the Atlantean narratives as factual history and composed many commentaries testifying such. To this end, the historian Proclus recorded that Crantor traveled to Sais 300 years after Solon, confirming Plato's account through interviewing Egyptian priests and reading from the actual ancient Egyptian hieroglyphs, recorded on columns, that testified to the Atlantean narrative.[48] Pseudo-Aristotle additionally wrote about Atlantis in his work Marvelous Things Heard, while Greek historian Marcellus relied on unnamed, ancient sources when he penned a description of the seven islands (of Atlantis) located in the Atlantic Ocean, with one specifically dedicated to Poseidon. Other ancient historians made references to Atlantis in their recordings: Diodorus, Pliny, Plutarch, Posidinus, and Strabo.[49] The Atlantean narratives were later handed down to medieval scholars through Arabian geographers.[50]

Plato, 427–347 B.C.E., was born Aristocles, son of Ariston, in Athens, the last of the kings of Athens, while his mother descended from the line of Solon. [51] Socrates mentored Plato until Socrates's execution. Plato then fled to Megara to study with his friend Euclid (infamous from Craft legends). Later, Plato sojourned to Italy, Sicily, Africa, and Egypt, where he forged close ties with Orphic and Pythagorean mystical circles and schools, which drew heavily from Egyptian mysticism.[52] Plato's system split philosophy into a tripartite system of dialectics (metaphysics), physics, and ethics.[53] Neo-Platonists carried on Plato's form of philosophy through Mystery Schools well into the middle ages.[54] Neo-Platonism was primarily a metaphysical philosophy with a theological emphasis towards mysticism; it was a synthesis of Pythagorism, Platonism, Aristotleism, and Stoicism, which later adopted Jewish and Orientalist religious elements.[55]

Let’s return to our discussion of Atlantis. The Atlantean empire spread itself all over the world; it was made up of ten separate but allied kings and kingdoms[56] that were ruled by the ten Titan offspring of Poseidon and Cleito. Plato described Atlantis in Kritas as a mighty warring and conquering empire that was made up of a system of alliances with other kingdoms.[57] At its peak, Atlantis reigned over northwest Africa, including modern Libya and Egypt, and southwest Europe as far as Italy, according to the Encyclopedia Americana[58] and as cited in Timaeus.[59] According to Frank Joseph, the mighty empire was made up of Azaes: the Yucatan; Musaeus: on the northern part of South America; Ampheres: islands just to the north and west of Portugal; Diaprepes: islands just off the northwest Coast of Africa; Autochthon: north Africa just to the west of Egypt in modern Morocco; Elasoppos and Gadsirus: both on the Portuguese west coast; Euemon: Ireland and the land of Tuatha Denaan; Mestor in England; and of course, Atlas, where Plato described Atlantis as the chief city of this far-flung empire.[60]

Wisdom and moderation held sway for many centuries under their rule.[61] In Critias, Plato described Atlanteans as great engineers and architects.[62] The ten Atlantean potentates reigned judiciously as long as the divine spirit remained within them, but as the divine spirit (immortal spirit) began to fade, so did their judicious reign.[63] To this conclusion, Hercules and Theseus, according to Plutarch, were archetypes of Titanic wisdom and judicious rule, for Hercules strove for divine excellence through his perpetual perseverance that was crowned with victories, which demonstrated the triumph of his divine nature over his earthly nature. Theseus was described as not only displaying “great strength of body, but equal bravery, and quickness alike, and a force of understanding.”[64] But according to Plato, the Atlanteans fell from their god-like status because of further interbreeding with humans.[65]

This account echoes Genesis 6, where God removed the illegal, immortal spirit from Nephilim posterity that had been gained through sexual reproduction with fallen angels. It is also reminiscent of the book of Enoch, where the giants became butchers of war because they knew their physical bodies were dying, even though their immortal spirit was not; they knew their fate would be to roam the earth without a physical form after their deaths, as demons. Therefore, the demigods of Atlantis decided to vent their rage on the apples of God’s orchard, the fruit of Adam. Titans rebelled against the order of creation, making war against the gods and humankind. The fading away of the divine nature was attributed to the diluting of the demigod bloodlines through the intermarrying of mortals, thus causing the human nature to gain the upper hand over the divine nature. Ignatius Donnelly describes this deterioration of the spirit in this way: “Though they still appeared divine; their nature had become filled with unrighteousness and avarice.”[66]

Plutarch described the evolution into evil:

> … that age produced a sort of men in force of hand, and swiftness of foot, and strength of body, excelling the ordinary rate and wholly incapable of fatigue; making use, however, of the gifts of nature to no good or profitable purpose for mankind, but rejoicing and priding themselves in insolence, and taking the benefit of their superior strength in the exercises of inhumanity and cruelty, and in seizing, forcing, and committing all manner of outrages upon everything that fell into their hands; all respect for others, all justice they sought, all equity and humanity, though naturally lauded by common people, either out of want of courage to commit injuries or fear to receive them, yet no way concerned those who were strong enough to win for themselves. Some of these Hercules destroyed and cut off in his passage through these countries.[67]

Does this description ring familiar? It sounds similar to the account of the reign of terror recorded in the book of Wisdom. Thus, Hercules was drafted by Zeus to lead his war against the evil giants. Hercules killed many rebellious giants, including two The Encyclopedia Americana describes as the most formidable: Alcyoneus and Porphyrcon.[68] The Encyclopedia Americana appears to be referencing Plutarch’s recollection of Theseus’s and Hercules’s violent romps through the ancient world.

Theseus killed many evil giants, just as Hercules did, by the very same methods employed by the evildoers: Corymetes the Club Bearer; Sunnis the Bender of Pines; Sciram; Cercyon the Arcadian; Busiris; Antaeus; and, of course, Termanium, who murdered his victims by running them through with his head. Theseus further led armies against other armies led by giants.[69] One wonders if Theseus fought with Zeus and Hercules against the Atlanteans. Certainly, Theseus, Hercules, and Pirithous all fought together in the war against the race of centaurs.[70]

The ten corrupted demigods then ruled with a heavy hand, for they held absolute power over their kingdoms and citizens.[71] Atlantis backslid into corruption and violence. Atlantean kings succumbed to the enticements of power, wealth, and pride, which overran their spirits.[72] Michael Baigent writes that the acquisition of wealth and power also lost the demigods their favor with the gods and brought them to their ruin.[73] In her book Isis Unveiled, Helen Blavatsky notes the Atlanteans were a nation of natural mediums but were led astray into a nation of black magicians that led them into war.[74]

The war-like ambitions of the Atlantean demigods displeased the gods, causing the Atlantean gods' destruction shortly thereafter,[75] once more echoing Genesis. Zeus, therefore, employed Hercules (and other noble Titans) to fight for him alongside the Greeks and against the Atlantean giants.[76] The Atlantean giants gathered their armies and sought to gain a world empire, but they were checked by the Athenians.[77] Timaeus recorded antediluvian Athens was a skilled and preeminent military city-state; she was the leader of the Hellenes/Greeks.[78]

Zeus was decidedly distraught to see that an honorable race had backslidden into a most wretched state.[79] Just as in the Mesopotamian legends and just as the archons did in the Hypostasis of the Archons, the gods gathered to plot the deluge against humankind.[80] Zeus collected the pantheon of gods in a meeting place known as the "Center of the World" to inflict punishment upon the Atlanteans,[81] again echoing Enoch's version of the deluge, where angels gathered at the beckoning of God's will to bring about His divine Judgment in the form of flood, earthquake, and volcano.[82] This mythological center of the world was likely Nippur in the Sumerian legends.

After the Atlanteans had lost a war to the Athenian alliance, Zeus and the other gods moved to destroy Atlantis with earthquakes and floods.[83] The balance of the Plato legend from Critias was lost or unfinished, so we do not know what the punishment was to be; it ended with Zeus gathering the gods to punish the Atlanteans,[84] but other legends do fill in the gaps. Legends abound that recount the infamous last years of war and tyranny that marred Atlantis, when its corrupted kings were bent on world conquest, warring with the other great antediluvian civilizations. It was generally concluded by authors like Charles Berlitz that the worldwide phenomena of the flood legends refers to the catastrophic sinking of Atlantis.[85] The likely truth, though, is different from Berlitz's conclusion; Atlantis is merely a recantation as part of the worldwide deluge cataclysm recorded in the Old Testament.

Other legends and Plato suggest the Atlantis cataclysm was imparted not by many gods but by two: Zeus and Poseidon. Roman legends, too, recorded that Jupiter and Neptune partnered in the cataclysm that destroyed Atlantis. West African legends also support the same conclusion, naming Poseidon as Okulum, the sea god.[86] Biblical, Gnostic, and Mesopotamian legends, as you will recall, recant God/Ialdaboth/Enlil gathering the angels/gods together to work jointly in bringing about the cataclysm. Zeus sent the flood rains from the skies while Poseidon released the waters from the rivers hidden beneath the earth, eerily echoing biblical and Qur'an testimonies.[87]

To this conclusion, Hancock notes that myths clearly hint the flood swept away an advanced civilization that had infuriated the gods, sparing none but the unlettered and the uncultured, causing survivors to begin over like children, in complete ignorance of what transpired in earlier times.[88] Hancock's conclusion likely originated from Plato, for Timaeus noted: "After the usual interval, the stream from heaven, like a pestilence, comes pouring down and leaves only those of you who are destitute of letters and education, and so you have to begin again like children, and know nothing of what happened in ancient times."[89] The notion that the survivors were illiterate and ignorant of the antediluvian epoch reflects the second chance notion of humankind that is underlying the Noah narrative, in which people are free from the seven spurious sciences.

Such stories turn up in Vedic India, in the pre-Columbian Americas, and in ancient Egypt. These legends were preserved by the Sumerians, Babylonians, Greeks, Arabs, and Jews. Similar stories were repeated in China and Southeast Asia, in prehistoric northern Europe, and across the Pacific. Almost universally, where truly ancient traditions have been preserved, even among mountain peoples and desert nomads, vivid descriptions have been passed down of global floods, in which the majority of mankind perished.[90] From all these various accounts, it would appear that God and another very powerful angel were the epicenter of the cataclysm.

Similarly, Gnostic, Mesopotamian, and Jewish legends concur with Atlantean legends that this antediluvian worldwide cataclysm was more than the flood recorded in Genesis, that it was inclusive of earthquakes, volcano eruptions, tornados, and hurricanes—again reminiscent of Isaiah 23. In support of this, the mythical Greek hero Phaethon, the illegitimate son of the sun god Helios, the god who drove his chariot of the sun across the heavens, is intricately interwoven into the fabric of the Atlantean legends of destruction. Phaethon was the son of the sun god Apollo, recorded in Timaeus, who apparently drove his chariot of fire into the ocean, which sparked the deluge cataclysm.[91] Phaethon lost control of his chariot and thus flew too close to the earth; Zeus then killed him with a thunderbolt for his actions.[92] The Egyptian priest in Timaeus noted the Phaethon legend reflected catastrophes occurring at long predetermined intervals and caused by heavenly bodies. Phaethon was written about by Ovid in his stories about Greek and Roman mythology.[93]

Numerous legends universally shout that the spark to the deluge cataclysm came from the sky in the form of a meteorite, asteroid, or another powerful, outside influence. Remember, cataclysm is rooted in a Greek word stemming from "deluge," while the word disaster is rooted in the Greek word meaning "evil star,"[94] suggesting that the deluge was sparked by an evil star/god, asteroid, or meteorite, which crashed into the ocean. The Epic of Gilgamesh documented the dams below releasing, while the Seven Judges of hell lit the land with their torches; day became night; and the land was smashed like a cup, while water poured over people like tides in a battle.[95]

The fifth-century C.E. Greek poet Nonnos wrote that Zeus hurled a world conflagration at the Titan kings,[96] again suggesting some kind of asteroid. In a similar fashion, the Norse god Edda hurled stars from heaven into the ocean, causing the worldwide cataclysm.[97] The Mayan legend Chilam Balam recorded the deluge as being sparked by great pieces of smoke that fell from the sky and into the oceans. Legends from India recorded Brahma casting celestial projectiles into the oceans to destroy the giant Asuras/Daitya, just as the Zoroastrian Zend-Avesta recorded the three-headed star that fell from the heavens and into the oceans that caused the oceans to boil.[98]

Other legends, too, bear witness to the legends about the evil star that crashed into the ocean, and they are even more specific in detail. These legends all seem to wrap themselves around allegories concerning the constellation of the seven sisters, the Pleiades. In legend, these seven sisters were known as Atlantises, daughters of Atlas, before being raised to the sky and into immortality.[99] Mayan legends oddly remember survivors of the flood ascending to heaven as the Pleiades.[100]

As the Greek legends go, two of the Pleiades stars were removed and sent to earth to destroy the world. The Hopi Indians regard the Pleiades as sisters and associate them with the deluge, just as the Cherokee, Iroquois, and other Native American nations of the Lake States, Tennessee, and Carolinas have preserved stories regarding Unadatsug, describing stars from the Pleiades that crashed into the oceans with a fiery tail. The Aztecs, too, mark the Pleiades as the cause and start to the Fourth Age, our epoch. Hawaiian legends recorded the earth became hot, the heavens turned about, and the earth was darkened by the rise of the Pleiades, just as the Aztec allies, the Choula, enshrined a temple dedicated to the meteorite that came from heaven and caused the deluge. Japanese legends recant the Sky Dragon devouring the Pleiades at this time, and West African legends describe the seven chains of the flood, which are, in fact, the Pleiades.[101] Finally, Greek legends connect Orion/ Azazel, the chief angel held accountable for bringing about the deluge, as being connected to the Pleiades. Orion was imagined as the great hunter put to death by Artemis after his pursuit of the Pleiades.[102] Orion, the unknown great hunter, was also known in other Greek and Roman legends as the giant born from Poseidon and Gaea, the Great Mother.[103]

Even the Bible seems to connect the destruction of Atlantis with the Pleiades, Orion, and the flood, when it says, “Can you bind the beautiful Pleiades? Can you loose the cords from Orion?” (Job 38:31). And also: “He who made the Pleiades and Orion, who turns the blackness into dawn and darkens day into night, who calls for the water of the sea and pours them out over the face of the land—the Lord is his name—he flashes destruction on the stronghold and brings the fortified city to ruin” (Amos 5:8–9). Again: “Who has resisted him and come out unscathed? He moves mountains without their knowing it and overturns them in his anger. He shakes the earth from its place and makes its pillars tremble. He speaks to the sun and it does not shine; he seals off the light of the stars. He alone stretches out the heavens and treads on the waves of the sea. He is the maker of the Bear and Orion, the Pleiades and the constellations of the south” (Job 9:9). These biblical passages appear to refer to the conflagration of flood catastrophes recorded in other legends, as well as to the destruction of Atlantis, connecting both somehow with the Pleiades and Orion constellations.

To this end, some suggest that a passage in the Psalms was specifically written testifying to the star that crashed into the ocean, which sparked the deluge.

> The earth trembled and quaked, > and the foundations of the mountains shook;
> they trembled because he was angry.
> Smoke rose from his nostrils;
> consuming fire came from his mouth,
> burning coals blazed out of it.
> He parted the heavens and came down;
> dark clouds were under his feet.
> He mounted the cherubim and flew;
> he soared on the wings of the wind.
> He made darkness his covering, his canopy around him—
> the dark rain clouds of the sky.
> Out of the brightness of his presence clouds advanced,
> with hailstones and bolts of lightning.
> The Lord thundered from heaven;
> the voice of the Most High resounded.
> He shot his arrows and scattered the enemies,
> great bolts of lightning and routed them.
> The valleys of the sea were exposed > and the foundations of the earth laid bare > at your rebuke, O Lord,
> at the blast of breath from your nostrils.
> He reached down from on high and took hold of me;
> he drew me out of deep waters.
> —Psalm 18:7–16

Even though Atlantis slid into corruption and violence before it was destroyed, it is still fondly remembered as a mythological civilization advanced in knowledge and technology.[104] Atlantis was so advanced that the essential arts of civilization (the seven spurious sciences) were attributed to originating back to Atlantis through Egypt. One should note that the words arts and technologies were interchangeable in old Greek. All this once more echoes the legends regarding the Seven Liberal Arts inherited by Cain and his descendants. Certainly, perverted astronomy, astrology, was one of the Seven Sacred Sciences of Cain, inherited by the evil Enoch, which Atlas was credited with perfecting to an art form.[105]

Atlanteans were revered as being the first civilizers, the first navigators, the first merchants, and the first colonizers.[106] Not coincidentally, the Giza monuments, inclusive of the Great Pyramid and the Sphinx, are believed by cutting-edge authors, such as Hancock, to be memorials to a highly advanced civilization destroyed by the flood.[107] The esoteric thinker George Ivanovich Gurdjieff believed they were built by Atlanteans.[108] Again, all this underscores biblical and Freemasonry records testifying to a similar advanced civilization that became mad from knowledge and power.

The age of Atlantis was referred to in Egyptian mythology as the “First Time.” The First Time in Egyptian mythology was the antediluvian epoch, when the gods came down to the earth, and the age when the gods first established their kingdoms, again reminiscent of Deuteronomy. This was the epoch of the gods, Zep Tepi, which includes famous gods from the Egyptian pantheon—gods like Thoth/Hermes, Osiris, Isis, and Horus.[109]

Greeks, too, recorded the Golden Age, the First Time, as an age when humans conversed with the gods directly, mortal women had children by the gods, and there was no sadness, was no requirement for work, and the food was abundant.[110] In truth, many Greek legends assert that the Greek ancestors derived from the Ophites, the serpent people from the Western Sea, the Atlanteans. To this end, Greeks recorded that Ethiopia of antiquity was originally recorded as the coasts of North Africa, a part of the original Atlantean Empire as you will recall, and that Ethiopia only moved its literal location after the rise of the Moroccan Mauretania Empire.[111]

Ethiopia was originally translated from Greek as “At-i-ops,” the mountain of serpents. Guenon in his work An Ethiopic History notes Ethiopia was the post-deluge appellation for Atlantis, stemming from the root Aithi-ops of North Africa. Greeks, too, believe Atlantis derived from their first king, Atlas, and the mountain of Atlas. Hence, Plato recorded Atlantis as Atlantykos Nesos, the Atlantic Island.[112] All this testifies to the validity of the Atlantis Empire being located to the north and west of North Africa.

CHAPTER 18

ZEP TEPI: THE FIRST TIME

I give you every seed bearing plant on the face of the whole earth and every tree that has a fruit with seed in it. They will be yours for food. And to all the beasts of the earth and all the birds of the air and all the creatures that move on the ground—everything that has the breath of life in it—I give every green plant for food.

—Genesis 1:29–30

All that was good was established in the First Time, the Golden Age of Perfection, free from disease and death.[1]

Many believe the Great Pyramids and the Sphinx are markers of time that memorialize the epoch of Osiris, the First Time.

The Egyptian Golden Age began at the point of First Creation and was ruled over by gods called Ntr-gods, gods we remember as Osiris and Horus.[2] So, too, was the Golden Age the time before the flood, a time known in biblical lore as carefree, a time when the people wanted for nothing. It was an age when one harvest bore the needs for forty years, an age when pregnancy lasted only a couple days, and the children were born walking.[3] It was a time when people neither knew toil nor care; it was a time when the Magic arts and sorcery flourished.[4]

So, too, was the Golden Age recorded in Indian myth as the Age of Statva, or goodness, when humanity enjoyed life free of care, with no work, plenty of food, the perfect climate, and no sadness.[5]

Sumerians remembered a Golden Age when five great city-states reigned and when a ferocious flood ended this epoch, threatening humankind's very existence.[6]

Roman mythology recalls a Golden Age where everything was perfect and food was abundant. As time went on, this age deteriorated into the Silver Age and, then the Bronze Age and, finally, the Iron Age, when people were greedy, disloyal, untrustworthy, and full of war; it was a time of hardship, when love died. It was a time when hubris-driven giants rebelled against the gods, and the gods destroyed both giants and humans with a great flood, save Deucalion and Pyrrha.[7]

The First Time was believed to be an age when true wisdom (once) prevailed.[8] Egyptians, like other cultures, believed all wisdom and knowledge was gifted to them at the genesis of their civilization, from the gods.[9] These legends note that those times in Zep Tepi were ideal conditions for arrogance to form, causing their rebellion against God,[10] just as this occurred in biblical, Gnostic, Greek, Sumerian, Indian, and Atlantean traditions.

Mythology recorded First Time Egypt was allotted to a set of gods.[11] The gods, as in so many other antediluvian societies, like Atlantis, Mu, and Sumer, unaccountably procreated Nephilim, producing immortal, human gods and demigods such as Osiris and Isis. Thus, Manetho listed Osiris as the fifth king of the demigods. The four preceding demigods were Hephoestus, Helios, Agathodomon, and Kronos.[12] Kronos was the same name as one of the three most famous twins of Atlantis: Uranos, Atlas, and Kronos.[13] One begins to wonder whether or not this was merely coincidence, for the ten kings of Atlantis held the helm of world government.

In the end, Egyptian mythology was simply just another corrupted, spurious satire on Genesis. This is further underscored when one considers Egyptian mythology remembers at the end of the First Time, Ra was warned that humankind had grown too wicked and was on the verge of rebellion against the gods. Hathor was sent to quash the rebellion, slaying thousands, and she savagely drank sacrificed blood blended with a concoction of fruit and barley, which made a blood beer/wine[14] similar to the blood wine consumed in Atlantis. This is yet another alarming recollection, echoing the consumption of Star Fire that was a notable crime committed by Nephilim.

One concludes from various mythologies and Egyptian mythology in particular that antediluvian Atlantis and Egypt were very advanced civilizations, owing their knowledge to the spurious knowledge of Cain and the illicit knowledge of heaven. Further to this point, Graham Hancock, Robert Bauval, and others believe the Giza monuments and the Sphinx were constructed as memorials to the flood and/or to a highly advanced civilization destroyed by the flood,[15] just as biblical legends avow that Cain and his posterity erected magnificent monuments to immortalize their names.[16]

Contrary to Egyptologists' perplexing propaganda, there is disquieting evidence suggesting the Sphinx and Great Pyramids were built well before Khufu and 2400 B.C.E. The Great Pyramid was unexplainably depicted in hieroglyphs long before the birth of Khufu or Zoser. The Victory Tablet of King Menes, king of the first human Egyptian dynasty after the flood (circa 2950–3100 B.C.E.), clearly depicts the Great Pyramid with its steep, fiftytwo-degree slope. The Inventory Stella clearly credits Khufu/Cheops with restoring the Great Pyramid located beside the already completed Sphinx and notes that Khufu did not construct either the Great Pyramid or the Sphinx.[17]

Oddly, though, misguided Egyptologists inexplicably claim the Sphinx was constructed under the philanthropy of Pharaoh Chefra, who ascended to the throne of Egypt after Khufu. And further undermining Egyptologists' credibility, the writings of Sir V. M. Flinders from 1901 C.E. clearly noted the depictions of the Sphinx were discovered generously etched onto many tablets belonging to the reigns of Menes-Narmer and Zer. Sitchin concludes the antediluvian Sumerians, too, were well aware of the pyramids, scribing generous depictions of them into their cuneiform texts and cylinder seals as certifiable witnesses to the age of those majestic monuments.[18]

The Association for Research and Enlightenment (A.R.E.), the organization dedicated to the research and preservation of the teachings of Edgar Cayce, collected samples from organic material stuck to the stone blocks on the outside of the Great Pyramid, but no samples were obtained from inside the structure. A.R.E. published the results from the testing in the November/ December, 1986 C.E. edition of its journal Venture Inward, dating the various samples from 2900 B.C.E. to 3800 B.C.E. One wonders whether or not these samples were remnants from additional restorations, resulting in the pyramids being much older than these dates. Or were the remnants part of the original construction? And would fragments from the interior date the pyramids even further back into prehistory? Perhaps even back to 10,500 B.C.E.? Certainly, Cayce spoke often regarding an ancient civilization dating back to 10,500 B.C.E. that built the Sphinx and Great Pyramids. Sitchin, too, concludes the pyramids were constructed by the heavenly Anunnaki (angels) around 10,500 B.C.E.[19] Gilbert and Bauval, in their book Th*e Message of the Sphinx*, dated the Sphinx alignment to the Orion constellation back to 10,490 B.C.E., back to the shadowy epoch of the gods.[20]

To this comparable conclusion, Dr. M. Schoch, a respected geologist from Boston University, discovered, and then was joined by Dr. Thomas Dobecki, a Houston based geophysicist, in 1991 for a presentation to the Geological Society of America, where they reported their onsite research data confirmed the scarring of the Sphinx was etched by water sometime before 7000 B.C.E. The water erosion theory of the Sphinx was first postulated by John Anthony West in the 1980s, in his book Serpent in the Sky, along with numerous articles, all dating the water erosion beyond 10,000 B.C.E.[21] The evidence seems clear that the Great Pyramid and the Sphinx date far beyond 3000 B.C.E., back into the murky mists of prehistory.

Now, the knowledge of this great antediluvian civilization was copied down in hieroglyphics, which hold many additional clues to the First Time. The hieroglyph for Tepi-Aui was a large, slouched lion that has its head down. Tepi means “first” in ancient Egyptian, but it can also be translated as “ancestors,” while Tepi-Aui was also applied as a title for ancestral deities.[22] The lion hieroglyph, not coincidently, is unambiguously reminiscent of the great Sphinx. Hancock believes the Sphinx actually is a lion, because it was built in the age of Leo, 10,970 B.C.E. to 8810 B.C.E.[23] Interestingly enough, the slouching lion was the same, hieroglyph employed to describe a group of shadowy gods, the ancestors of Re (Ra), the Akeru.

What I do not believe was coincidental was that the lion/Sphinx was called Aker.[23] Therefore, lion characteristics were an accepted ancient Egyptian form that depicted founding watchers of Egypt. What is so amazing about the lion/ Sphinx hieroglyph connection is that these were very similar characteristics employed to describe biblical Cherubim—each had four faces: the face of a man, the face of a lion, the face of an ox, and the face of an eagle.[24]

"Cherub" derives from ancient Assyrian karibu, meaning "he who prays or he who intercedes,"[25] just as angels were liaisons between God and humankind. The Catholic Encyclopedia notes Cherub derived from an old Semitic word kerub that means "to ride,"[26] recalling that God was seen riding on cherubim in Ezekiel and Revelation.[27] In antiquity, cherubim were portrayed with a lion's body, a human face, and conspicuous wings. Semitic peoples employed winged creatures to guard temples and palaces.[28] According to Unger's, griffins were winged sphinxes and were undoubtedly familiar to the Hittites, appearing hundreds of times in the icons of western Asia.[29] Nelson's states cherubim are winged, angelic beings similar in appearance to statues of winged sphinxes that often flanked entrances to palaces and temples in ancient Babylonia and Assyria.[30]

Ancient Assyrians portrayed the karibu as winged creatures, with the face of a man or a lion, while the body was that of a sphinx. [31] These griffins, according David E. Jones, were commonly known in antiquity as dragons. The four faces of the cherub symbolize the four cardinal points and the four astrological signs of Aquarius, Leo, Scorpio, and Taurus. The sphinx incorporated all four of these beings, for it had the face of a man, the feet of a lion, the body of a bull or ox, and the wings of an eagle. Ezekiel and John describe cherubim with the very same symbols as the sphinx and Assyrian karibu.[32] Howard Reid wrote that to the people of antiquity, centaurs, griffins, sphinxes, and dragons were essentially all the same form of being.[33] Thus, griffins were a combination of a lion and a falcon.[34]

However, the centaurs, although similar to griffins, sphinxes, and dragons, were entirely different beings altogether. In fact, centaurs were a fabulous race of beings, half man and half horse, that dwelled in antediluvian Thessaly and Peloponnesus.[35] The centaur race sprang from a mystical form of union between a figure known as Ixion and a cloud.[36] Ixion was an antediluvian, semidivine king of Thessaly that married Dia, the daughter of Deioneus. Zeus evidently created a cloud in the exacting form of Hera that Ixion then copulated with, producing the new race of centaurs.[37] Hera was the violent and jealous goddess thought to be a sister/wife to Zeus—the daughter of Kronos by Rhea/Cybele.[38] After this, Ixion was banished from heaven[39] for his vile crime against creation.

Centaurs degraded into a violent race. At a feast held by Lapithae, centaurs became so intoxicated and vicious that Theseus and Lapithae slaughtered many centaurs, thus causing a war, and most of the centaur race was driven from Thessaly.[40] Hercules and Pirithous joined Lapithae and Theseus in this war.[41] Centaurs were another outlawed race bred by rebellious gods similar to Nephilim, but centaurs were not cherubim.

Sphinxes were constructed after the image of cherubs or angels of a particular and powerful order. Speaking of Satan's downfall, the book Ezekiel states, "You were anointed as a guardian cherub, so I ordained you. You were on the holy mount of God" (Ezek. 28:13–14). Sphinxes of antiquity were sculpted in the true likeness of the heavenly angels, similar to the winged serpents, the infamous dark seraphim angels. Sphinx derives from the Egyptian shesep ankha, meaning living image.[42] One wonders: was the sphinx a monument to Satan and/or his fallen allies? Certainly Atum/ Re/Ra was celebrated as the father of the gods,[43] possessing lion/sphinx/ cherubim characteristics. Hence, Atum was always depicted as a sphinx, while Egyptians knew the Sphinx monument as "Sheshop-Ankh," the living image of Atum.[44]

Most pagan pantheons are arranged in similar hierarchies, with the supreme god, or universal life force, heading the pantheon. In the Egyptian pantheon, Ptah represents this supreme force. Below Ptah is the creator god, represented by Ra and Atum, while Anu would likely be the Sumerian rival. Ptah's hieroglyph was depicted as two coiled serpents, much like the double-headed helix of DNA and identical to the current medical motifs used by doctors today.[45] The male creator generally has a female counterpart, like Sophia and Lilith, to create other lower gods. The female and male creator aspects generally also turn up in one of the lower gods. Other pantheons would have included Enlil, Ialdaboth, El, and Adonai/Adonis as the male deity.

Atlantean markers and parallels clearly permeate Egyptian recollections of prehistory. These magnificent markers are merely the tip of the iceberg. Atlantean markers permeate most pagan mythologies around the planet.

CHAPTER 19

ECHOES FROM ATLANTIS, SUMER, AND MU

The Lord then said to Noah, "Go into the ark, you and your whole family, because I have found you righteous in this generation."

—Genesis 7:1

Why do deluge legends from around the globe echo an unexplained ancestral inheritance back to Atlantean mythology?

Why do the Quiche Maya and diffused polytheist cultures of prehistory remember creepy gods and demigods as serpents?[1]

Certainly, the Quiche Maya recollect that snakes, vipers, and/or serpents represented the minor gods of their pantheon.[2] Historian Don Carlos De Siguenza curiously concluded from ancient Central American manuscripts that the Aztecs descended from the Toltecs, who descended from the mysterious Olmecs, which Don Carlos believed came from Atlantis.[3] Unaccountably, the Aztecs preserved similar flood accounts to that of the Mediterranean cultures, regarding giants who were destroyed by water.[4] Generally, the Aztecs recorded the people of the antediluvian age refused to worship the gods, so the gods destroyed humanity with a flood, saving only Tata and his wife, Nena, who were warned by the god Tlaloc, who also provided them with a great log (ark).[5] The Popol Vuh recorded humankind did not remember or honor their gods, so the gods brought the deluge by darkening the earth and sending a black rain. The Quiche Maya also believed that not all antediluvians were destroyed—some were spared so they could survive to repopulate the earth afterwards.[6]

Similarly, Charles Etienne Brasseur, the French abbot who discovered and translated the Popol Vuh into French in 1864 C.E., met natives who held long-time beliefs concerning the destruction of a continent he believed was Atlantis, just as he concluded the Aztec creator god, Quetzalcoatl, came from Atlantis.[7] Quetzalcoatl was the god of the east, the king of Tulan, and a serpent;[8] thus, Quetzalcoatl ultimately translates, according to Jonathan Evans, as "bird serpent."[9] Brasseur further noted the Popol Vuh was written in part from memory and copied in part from the sacred books of the Quiche Mayan, the Book of Princes, written in characters that only the priests and the princes understood.[10]

In fact, the Aztecs declared to Cortez that their capitol city, Tenochtitlan, was designed after the lost Aztec homeland, which was originally located in the middle of a lake and surrounded by canals,[11] just as the capitol of Atlantis was. In this same line of thinking, the ancestral home of the Aztecs was an island in the east (Atlantic) called Aztlan. Moreover, the Maya, too, trace their heritage back to a great island in the Atlantic. Both the Maya and the Aztec recant the surviving Atlanteans as tall, white, fair-skinned, and fair-haired beings,[12] just as the Atlanteans are remembered in other cultures.

Central and South American religions contain many creator gods from the diverse cultures and nations, who are all considered to be the same god by many: Quetzalcoatl, Kontiki, Votan, Thunupa, and Viracocha.[13] The creation epic of the Incas concerning Veracocha contains records of Veracocha creating giants from stone. These giants were benevolent and judicious at first, but later they became corrupted and violent and began to make war, just as in the Egyptian and Atlantean legends. Humanity became cruel, vitriolic, barbaric, murderers; they were so enthralled with stealing and making war that they began to ignore the gods.[14] Finally, though, because of the violence and wars, a great flood destroyed humanity. Viracocha decided humankind was no longer good enough; he destroyed all[15] but two brothers and their families, whom he forewarned so that they could take refuge atop a great mountain.[16] In fact, Ignatius Donnelly believed a great part of Central American antediluvian history pertains to the activities of a race of giants known as Quinames.[17] The evidence just seems to go on and on.

Chinese farming cultures contemporaneous with the Sumerians, the Yang Shao and Longshan, recorded a terrible warlord ripped holes in the sky canopy, drowning the people of the earth, except for one noble queen and a small band of warriors, who took refuge upon a mountain top.[18] Other Chinese legends recorded Euhhi escaping the flood with his wife, three sons, and three daughters.[19] Chinese legends also record Yu as the tamer of the flood and the founder of the Xia Dynasty over 4,200 years ago. What makes the Yu legend so interesting is that he made the world safe once more with the aid of dragons.[20] No archaeological evidence exists for the Yu and the Xia dynasty, but legends have been passed down about a Golden Age of peace overwhelmed by flood. These were the sage kings, sons of gods, just as the inheriting Shang dynasty believed they were.[21] Many of the older characters from the Chinese written language burgeon with enigmatic features reflecting prehistory and, in particular, the Noah account.[22]

Japanese scholars recorded the Taiwanese accounts in the early twentieth century C.E., which tell a story that includes warnings from the gods, the sound of terrible thunder emanating from the sky, earthquakes, torrential rain causing a great flood that engulfed all of humankind and a surviving remnant that fled to mountaintops or escaped on a boat. The Taiwanese account of the Ami tribe recalls four gods of the sea and two gods of the land who conspired to destroy humankind and two survivors, Sura and Nakao, who survived on a boat provided for them by the gods that came to land on the Ragasm Mountain top.[23]

Again, in Australian mythology, spirit people called Nurrumbunguttias came from the sky; they lived on earth with humanity. They were a very advanced race of people that ruled over the earth, until the sea rose up one day, creating a great flood and drowning most of the spirit people; although, some escaped backed to heaven.[24] Once more, the Australian myth is eerily close to biblical, Atlantean, Greek, Mesopotamian, Indian, Chinese, and American mythology. This is particularly so when you consider that many Australian legends contain the Rainbow Covenant as part of the mythology, as do Mayan and Hawaiian legends.[25]

The North American tribe of the Arikara, too, remembers a similar legend. In the beginning, the Great Sky Chief, Nishano, created giants, but after time, the giants had no respect for their maker.[26] In variant versions, the Great Sky Spirit, Nesaru, destroyed that scurrilous race of giants with a great flood, but of course, he saved some humans from this destruction to repopulate the earth.[27] Surprisingly enough, the surviving beings from this flood were only the few good giants![28] All these similar deluge legends that contain the destruction of the giants at the heart of the flood legend cannot simply be coincidences.

In a similar fashion, the Hopi remember the same tradition, but with more direct connections to the Atlantean account. The Hopi claim their ancestors were reared by the great Snake Clan, who escaped the destruction of their island homeland in the eastern ocean (Atlantic). The clan's migration was made possible through the enlightened leadership of Pahana, the White Brother.[29]

Even though giants are not mentioned in all flood legends, most are very consistent; giant narratives are more numerous in more cultures than people tend to realize. Most contain a memory of humankind becoming wicked, violent, and rebelling against the gods. Again, most remember a limited few escaping, with foreknowledge of the catastrophe, on some boat and landing atop a mountain or escaping to a great mountain for safety. These memories kept alive in myth and legend are maintained in more than 500 tribes in Australia; in North American aborigine tribes, such as the Ute American, the Chiglet, the Yakima and Olympic peninsula tribes, Californian tribes, the Cree, the Algonquins, the Creek Natchez, the Knisteneaux, the Mojave, the Cheyenne, the Pomo, the Navajo, and the Apache; in Central and South American tribes that include the Mayan, the Choctan, the Jevaro, the Mutaro, the Canari, the Yaraulo, the Tupinamba, and the Atempe; and in Asian Indian mythology.[30] Similar legends also have been recorded in the South Pacific, from Hawaii, Tahiti, Fiji, and the Polynesian Islands.[31]

As the Mediterranean legends go, the Atlanteans controlled parts of Egypt, Libya, Europe, Central America, and South America, while the people of the Mediterranean united to repel the Atlantean invaders. The antediluvian world appears to have been populated by three great civilizations, all led by giants. The day six Atlanteans were a race that was red-skinned, while the Aryans (Sumerians) were white, and the third race of people was black-skinned (Mu) from the Nile Valley[32] and a Pacific Ocean subcontinent; other legends recant Atlanteans with white skin. The Egyptians regarded themselves as red.[33]

Even so, ancient Aryans and Egyptians recognized four human races, according to Ignatius Donnelly: white, red, black, and yellow.[34] On a similar note, the Popol Vuh appears to back the four-race notion of the antediluvian epoch. In the Popol Vuh account, four peoples (day six) were created that multiplied around the earth, creating many tribes from black to white, who spoke many tongues, which was understood to mean four distinct races.[35] Likely then, the black race resided in Africa south of Egypt, while the yellow race dwelled in Mu or Sunderland.

Mu's occultist acceptance as an antediluvian civilization dates back to a Spanish monk, Diego de Landa, who copied notes from original Mayan writings. Charles Ettienne Brasseur de Bourg then studied Landa's notes, discovering the destruction of an antediluvian civilization that he believed was Atlantis but thought was located in the western Indian Ocean. Thus, Mu became the Mayan Atlantis. Over time, occultism has meshed Mu with Lemuria; the lost continent; a parallel civilization dreamed up by Helen Blavatsky in her book Isis Unveiled; and with Sunderland, an ancient civilization discovered in 1964 C.E. east and south of Asia.[36]

In other legends, Mu's home world was believed to have been a large continent located in the Pacific Ocean. It was a civilization that exploited technology, inclusive of the mythological antigravity; Mu fell to a similar destruction as Atlantis. The ancient Indian holy books, the Vedas, were believed to have originated in Mu. Mu was further believed to have founded Lower Egypt, while Atlantis founded Upper Egypt.[37] An Englishman, James Churchward, copied from Brahman tablets information that contained Mayan inscriptions concerning the continent of Mu, which was located somewhere in the Pacific Ocean. Similarly, le Plongeon, a South American archaeologist of the nineteenth century, discovered references to Mu in the Troano Codex.[38]

One wonders whether or not accounts documented within the Vedas recant the destruction of Atlantis or a most similar end to the empire and subcontinent of Mu. Veda hymns convey a great city swallowed up by the sea, celebrated as “Dwarka” and “Dvaraka” in various accounts. These accounts were recorded in the Indian epic Mahahbarata, which was composed a few hundred years after the Rig Veda, and were recorded in the Bhagvata and the Vishnu Purana.[39]

Dwarka's ruins are located underwater, just off the northwest coast of India; it was the sacred city, of Krishna, according to the Vishnu Purana.[40] Dwarka was a fabulous city, flaunting luscious gardens with soaring walls, rituals, and splendor; it was an antediluvian city;[41] dated well beyond 1500 B.C.E.[42] Dwarka was ruled by Krishna, a human sponsored king of the god Vishnu; when Krishna was killed, a new and Dark Age, the Kali Age, descended in which the oceans rose to submerge Dwarka.[43] The Kali Luga was the worst age in Hindu tradition.[44] What is most curious, and not likely coincidental, Hindu Sages utilizing the calendar of India have dated this catastrophe back to 3102 b.c.e,[45] a date corresponding very closely with biblical deluge accounts.

The Southeast Indian version of the Brahmins, the Vishnu Purana Veda, cites a city named Mahabalipuram, which translates as "the city of the giant, Bali." Bali's dynasty was succeeded by his son, Banasura, who was also portrayed as a giant. During the reign of Banasura, a war began, which resulted in Krishna of Dwarka laying siege to Mahabalipuram city. Even though the god Siva fought on the side of Banasura, Krishna prevailed, toppling Siva, and exiling Banasura from Mahabalipuram. Malecheren, a Raja, then succeeded as king of Mahabalipuram. He was rewarded by a heavenly being with the never-beforedone-to-a-human favor of being transported to the "Divine Court of Indra."[46]

Could this be the same court as Nippur and the grand Council of the Heavenly Anunnaki, and could Malecheren be Enoch? Malecheren was then rewarded with heavenly knowledge and returned to Mahabalipuram City with new ideas of splendor and magnificence, transforming his city in splendor; it was then celebrated beyond all the cities of the earth. The angry gods then assembled at the Court of Indra, where they commissioned the god of the sea to destroy Mahabalipuram City, which pretended to vie with the splendor of the celestial mansions, by overflowing the city with the waters of the ocean, never to rise again.[47]

To this end, Hancock concludes that Mahabalipuram, Dwarka, Atlantis, and the five antediluvian city-states of Sumer all suffered an identical fate at the hands of the gods.[48] Depending upon which myth one references, the age of Atlantis contained either three or four great civilizations and races.

The Golden Age in Greek, Atlantean, Indian, and Egyptian mythology was a common theme that spoke to an age reigned over by divine kings. It seems clear that these far-flung legends bear witness that refugees from four human races, along with Nephilim, indeed survived the deluge; whereas, Scripture bears witness specifically to Sethian survival, along with Nephilim survival. Although, the Bible did document other day 6 humans surviving that we will cover in the next section.

So, too, did ancient Iranian legends tell about a Golden Age where divine kings reigned.[49] The Shahnameh listed ten Pishdadian, or Peisdadien (possibly Poseidon), kings, who reigned before the flood,[50] just as they did in Atlantis. The Larsa list of Sumerian kings boasted the same number of kings. It listed Ziusudra, another name for Utnapishtim, as the last of those kings that reigned before the flood.[51]

Similarly, ten Patriarchs were listed in the Genesis chronology from Adam to Noah, as well as ten Cainite Patriarchs. Ten kings is an antediluvian mythology constant: the Chaldean record of Berosus, from the Sumerian King's List, contained ten antediluvian kings that all lived long life spans, just as Noah did.[52] In the same manner, India held to nine Brahmadikas, along with Brahma, the leader, making ten; and the Chinese had ten divine antediluvian emperors (giants called Miaotse) and/or ten Immortal emperors called the Sons of Heaven, who ruled the mundane world on behalf of the heavenly gods,[53] just as there were ten ancestors of Odin and ten kings of the Arabian Adites.[54]

Giants figure largely in Celtic and Scandinavian mythology.[55] Viking mythology placed antediluvian giants in opposition and as enemies to gods. The first two beings created were giants, Ymir and Audumla, who created Buri, the first of the gods, who married the giantess, Bestia. This marriage produced the famous three sons Odin, Hoenir, and Loki,[56] just as the hero Sigurd of Hunaland, the son of Sigmund, son of Volsung, was a direct descendant of Odin. Thor retrieved the Cauldron from the giant Hymir, and his clan of giants, in the land of the giants, Jotunheim.[57]

Norse legends depict builder giants that assisted with great feats in the antediluvian world,[58] eerily echoing Cain and his descendants, Sumerian gods and giants, and the Atlantean companions/followers of Horus. These were the builder giants, the Asgaard, and the abode of the Asgaard/gods was on an island paradise (Atlantis).[59] In Norse legends, the giants were also overthrown by the gods.[60] The Titan survivors from this deluge cataclysm were Lif and his wife, Lifthraser.[61]

Similarly, ancient Irish and Welsh legends articulate a remarkable history of giants (descending from Tuatha Denaan), which included Fingall and his son Ossian, as well as the famous Jack the Giant Killer.[62] The Tuatha Denaan were fairy folk that settled Ireland sometime after 3000 B.C.E.[63] Ireland, as you will recall, was part of the Atlantean empire ruled by Euemon. Tuatha Denaan were the divine children of the matriarchal goddess,[64] thus making them also a Nephilim race. They were a magical race of gods with human personalities; they argued, killed, got drunk, committed adultery, and acted jealous. Tuatha Denaan reigned until they were driven to the otherworld by the Millesians.[65]

Irish legends speak of the Tuatha Denaan descendants driving out the Formorians, who were also giants.[66] The Formorians allegedly were a race of monsters descended from Noah, through his cursed son Ham; it would appear that Ham's curse is the root cause for the mutation into monsters. Formorians were hairy (a Nephilim trait), had one eye, sometimes one leg,[67] and were similar to the Greek Cyclops.

The faint echoes of Atlantis are too far flung, too persistent, and too familiar among the diverse cultures of the world to be ignored. Quite frankly, Atlantean echoes cannot intelligently be shoved aside when considered as a whole. In truth, Atlantean echoes tend to coalesce into a choir shouting to future generations about the validity and hypostasis of the antediluvian epoch, their people, and their achievements, both good and evil.

CHAPTER 20

THE SEVEN SAGES OF ATLANTIS

Disaster will come upon you, and you will not know how to conjure it away. A calamity will fall upon you that you cannot ward off with a ransom; a catastrophe you cannot foresee will suddenly come upon you. "Keep on, then, with your magic spells and with your many sorceries, which you have labored at since childhood. Perhaps you will succeed, perhaps you will cause terror. All the counsel you have received has only worn you out! Let your astrologers come forward, those stargazers who make predictions month by month, let them save you from what is coming upon you."

—Isaiah 47:11–13

William Petrie, the famous Egyptologist, was the first to father the Dynastic Race Theory of the First Time as a solution to the enigma to the origins of Egyptian civilization.[1] Petrie's theory discusses the Shebtiu family of divine beings, famed for their great building expertise.[2]

Were the Shebtiu related to nebulous beings recorded in other cultures?

Descendants of the inexplicable Shebtiu are believed, in the Dynastic Theory, to have spawned the original pharaohs. The Shebtiu, in my opinion, are the same divine seven sages of ancient Babylon, the Sebetti, whose patron was Enki/Satan and who, like the Shebtiu, taught humankind the illicit knowledge from heaven. The Shebtiu consisted of eight divine beings (seven fallen angels and Satan), including Kema Sa Ta, the serpent-creator of the earth.[3]

All this is very similar to R. A. Schwaller de Lubicz's King of Pharonic Theocracy theory, which proposes that mankind devolved from a superior race of giants, in whom the perfect knowledge of science and theology originated. Schwaller de Lubicz named this religious blend of science and theology the Absolute. He believed the pharaoh or god-king was a symbol of this Absolute.[4] Schwaller de Lubicz was a French theosophist, an occultist, and a member of secret societies that promote a mystical belief system important to bringing about the end times. He studied ancient Egyptian art and architecture that somehow revealed to him a complex esoteric philosophy based on sacred geometry. He claimed he solved the alchemical symbols encoded onto French Gothic cathedrals and he wrote several well-read books on his teachings.[5]

During the First Time, another curious group in Egypt was founded; their legacy continued even after the deluge. This fascinating group was identified as the Followers of Horus (the seven fallen angels, the Shebtiu, the Sebetti, the seven sages, who provided illicit heavenly knowledge), who were mythological beings remembered both as the bearers and the preservers of knowledge.[6] They founded a cult of astronomer-priests that guarded the Atlantean knowledge, religion, and technology for millennia after the deluge,[7] and that cult spawned Brotherhood Orders of the Snake that continue even to this day. These curious antediluvian gods, the Sebetti/Shebtiu, not coincidentally, were recorded and described as beings with the characteristic long-headed serpentine distinction. They were known also as Urshu or watchers; they were divine beings that acted as intermediaries between humans and the high-ranking Ntr-gods.[8] Their illustrious Snake Order of priests appears to be akin to the semidivine Order of Enoch/Oannes, who led the Anunnaki down from Mount Hermon. The designation Urshu actually translates from ancient Egyptian as watcher[9]—divine beings comparable to the Shemsu-Hor, also known as the companions of Horus.[10]

Similarly, Schwaller de Lubicz believed that demigods or priests were the original mentors of pharonic civilization, teaching them ancient knowledge.[11] In the same line of thought, Osiris was known as the serpent king/god, who voyaged around the world as the bringer of civilization and the founder of his mystery cult of knowledge,[12] just as Quetzalcoatl was a serpent god, the civilizer and teacher of the arts, sciences, and crafts to the Central Americans.[13] All sources from antiquity seem to speak to the same source for antediluvian civilization, which derived from the illicit knowledge of heaven and the Seven Sacred Sciences received from the infamous seven fallen angels, Azazel/ Shemyaza, Amasses, Gadereel, Baraqiel, Kokariel, Tamiel, and Asderiel, for the benefit of giants and rebellious humans.

Manetho recorded circa 250–300 B.C.E. that ancient Egypt was divided into three great eras: the reign of the gods; the followers of Horus, who migrated to Egypt from somewhere; and the dynastic reign of the pharaoh kings, which began sometime around 2950 B.C.E., with Menes.[14] Narmer was likely another name for Menes, according to Bauer, and he was the first human king of Egypt, according to Berosus and Manetho.[15] Manetho wrote three books describing the history to Egypt, with the first book recording the mythic reign of the gods and kings and ending with the eleventh dynasty of the mortals.[16] Manetho was commissioned by the first Greek rulers of Egypt after Alexander, Ptolemy I, and Ptolemy II to record in Greek a comprehensive survey to the history of Egypt.[17] As with Berosus's works, only extracts of Manetho's work have survived through historians such as Josephus, Eusebius, and ecclesiastical writers.[18] He compiled an illustrious history reigned over by the gods, dating back to 10,000 years before the flood,[19] circa 13,000–14,000

B.C.E. and immediately following the last ice age. This prehistorical accounting began after the reign of Ptah, who reigned for 12,300 years;[20] the gods reigned for a total of 24,300 years.[21]

Manetho was a priest from the Order of Heliopolis, or Alexandria. Manetho's literature became famous because he wrote in the Greek language, accurately translating a complete account that other Greek writers could not.[22] Etchings upon the walls in the temple of Seti in Abydos, dating back to the fourteenth century B.C.E., and the Palermo Stone, dating the information back to 2400 B.C.E. and located today in Sicily, testify to the accuracy of Manetho's account. Additionally, The Turin Papyrus begins with Ptah at 12,500 b.c.e; its list of subsequent rulers is identical to Manetho's account and is also dated as far back as 1250 B.C.E.[23]

Egyptian mythology holds that the surviving postdiluvian companions of Horus salvaged and transported with them from the First Time great knowledge from across the sea to Egypt, India, and China.[24] This mysterious Order of Sages survived the great flood and arrived from a distant island or continent; they were known precariously as "builder gods," "senior ones," and "the followers of Horus." According to Professor Raymond of Manchester University, the mortal builder gods, acknowledged also as the "lords of light," emigrated from an island (Atlantis) celebrated as the "homeland of the primeval ones," whose home was threatened with destruction.[25] The seven postdiluvian sages were credited with rebuilding the postdiluvian world and recreating a new age of the gods. The seven sages are also attributed with designing and building the Egyptian monuments, this according to the Building Texts,[26] and are likely the same cryptic group Osiris belonged to.

The original divine and immortal Shebtiu, according to Rohl, were indeed great gods, the builder gods, the senior ones, while the order of priests they created were renowned as the Brethren of the Seven Sages and likely led originally by Enoch/Oannes. The brethren were generally identified as the offspring or kin of the seven (angelic) sages. Remember, Rohl notes that the ancient Egyptians knew the original Shebtiu as (heavenly) Anunnaki.[27]

In his work History Begins at Sumer, Samuel Noah Kramer notes that Sumer was visited by semidivine beings from the sea, who were one half fish and one half human; they were commissioned by the gods to teach the arts of civilization to the Sumerians, which included the sciences, mathematics, writing, building, and requisite laws. One wonders if the fish-god father was Poseidon. Certainly, first known depictions of Poseidon's brother Zeus reflected a human form with a fishtail, and the Avatar of Vishnu was also a fish-god.[28]

One also wonders after the Atlantis connections, particularly when one recalls the ancient Babylonian king list that cited the ten Atlantean-like kings known as the Peisiadian/Poseidon kings. It's also curious to consider that Enki, like Poseidon, was god of the waters,[29] while Enlil, like Zeus, was the god of the air/sky, and in both pantheons both gods shared in the governing of earth.[30] On top of all this, the anthropologist Germaine Dieterlen notes the ancient Babylonians believed that Babylon was indeed founded by mythological fish-gods. Mesopotamian mythology holds that life was brought to our world by creatures from the sea known as the oannes, which coincidently is Mayan for "he who lives in water."[31]

Consider, too, the alternative appellation for Enoch the Evil was Uanna-Adappa, and for Berosus, it was Oannes, according to David Rohl.[32] Enoch, as you will recall, was the founder of the mortal order of the Nephilim seven sages (the Atlantean Companions of Horus) spoken of by Berosus and a high priest of Enki, the god of the sea. The leader of the brotherhood of fish-gods, according to Kramer, was Oannes. This was likely the angelic Oannes with whom Enoch also became directly associated as the high priest of this fish/bull/snake cult of Poseidon. These divine and semidivine fish-gods were renown in Sumerian lore for their great wisdom, knowledge, and skills in matters of state affairs, architecture, engineering, and building.[33] They were the same mythological builder gods known in India, Egypt, and around the antediluvian world.

It was this Enoch/Oannes who brought the giants/Nephilim/Anunnaki down from the mountain (Mt. Hermon) to intermix with the day six-led Cainites, and it was this Enoch/Oannes who originally established the antediluvian kingship,[34] in partnership with the dark angels. Each of these Nephilim kings was originally paired with one of the Seven Seraphim Sages, one of the fish-gods,[35] and perhaps later with one of the earthly sages led by Enoch. The king and priest partnership of dragon dynasties was accurately depicted in the allegories of Grail legends that included King Arthur, the great wizard, Merlin, and the Merovingians, who became famous as the Fisher king.

Remember, figures such as Enoch, Hermes, Thoth, and Mercury were considered to be both counselors to the antediluvian king possessing the secrets to the heavenly knowledge and intermediaries between humankind and the gods. Remember, Rohl noted the earthly sages led by Oannes/Enoch were believed to have been either offspring of or kin (brethren) to the original Seven Seraphim Sages. No doubt this was the same Snake Brotherhood as the followers of Horus, the Shebtiu, known in Egypt by the Sumerian idiom Anunnaki, were part of.[36]

So, too, are these Sumerian sages the same brotherhood of ascetic Snake sages recorded in the Vedas of India. Hancock noted that both groups of antediluvian sages somehow survived into the postdiluvian epoch. Hancock also noted that both sets of sages were directly associated with fish and sea symbolisms; both were commissioned to preserve the gifts of civilization for humankind, both before and after the flood; and both were distinctive kingmakers. Adding further to these parallels, Hancock noted that all were ascetic brotherhoods that taught spiritual and religious doctrines to the people, as well as being royal advisers to the kings.[37] The seven sages of India, Egypt, and Sumer were the same Snake Brotherhood.

Also note that in his book Astrology: A History, Peter Whitfield writes that Sumerian conceptions concerning astral kingship, divine knowledge, and science, as well as the study of omens, were originally imported by a group of divine teachers (seven sages) that lived in ancient times and then taught to man.[38] These, of course, were the main protagonists that created the famous ten Nephilim, antediluvian Ring Lords listed by Berosus in the king list that we spoke of previously. This roundtable of heroes from prehistory included Gilgamesh, Utnapishtim, and or Ziusudra.

It would also seem clear that the seven mortal sages who survived the flood later partnered with Hermes and Nimrod at Babel. This then would make perfect sense with an enigmatic reference in Qur’an that named two dark angels, Harut and Marut, that taught witchcraft to the people of Babylon,[39] the city that was the womb for postdiluvian mysticism. One wonders as to the relationship between Marut of the Qur’an and the violent storm gods, the Maruts, of the Rig Veda.[40] The Zoroastrian Zend-Avesta recorded one of the Sages as Yima, the one who taught the postdiluvian survivors civilization and laws, where one law enforced the banishment of giants.[41]

The words of these great, antediluvian, angelic sages were copied down by Thoth/Hermes/Enoch into various books and secured away for safety in temples that stretched along the Nile River.[42] Hermes, as it was generally concluded, later hid his antediluvian secrets somewhere in ancient Egypt.[43]

Ancient Egyptian papyrus makes several references to the ancient, hidden chambers, known as the Chambers of Archives and the Hall of Records that contain all antediluvian knowledge.[44] These mysterious chambers were stated to be buried close to the Sphinx.

Hancock and Bauval suggest the Rosicrucians, the Theosophist Society, and Freemasonry all keep these teachings very much alive and well today[45] within their organizations and writings. So, too, did Edward Cayce conclude the same, for many of his Atlantean prophecies predicted the great antediluvian knowledge would be discovered in great vaults at the foot of the Great Pyramid and the Sphinx around the start of the new millennium. This line of thought is consistent with the Legends of the Craft and, in particular, with the Legend of Enoch, where Enoch built nine great vaults and buried them in the earth to save the great antediluvian knowledge from the coming deluge.[46] Remember, Enoch the Evil was the first Master Mason; he was believed in lore to have built the Great Pyramids and the Sphinx as monuments to the great antediluvian society.

The First Time was the age of the Neteru, Egyptian for “gods,”[47] known variantly as the Shebtiu. Neteru were another interesting group of gods who ruled antediluvian Egypt. In the First Time, gods, demigods, and mortals reigned in exactly this order of chronology. The Greek historian Diordus Siculus noted Egypt had been ruled by both gods and heroes before the mortals ascended to power in First Time Egypt. We are also informed that demigods (Nephilim) reigned before the mortals. The originating line of dynastic kings was an elite group, both divine and semidivine.[48] Put in biblical terms, watchers reigned first at the distribution of the earth, just as Deuteronomy recorded. These were the gods that built the ancient cities of Sumeria that humans later inherited, cities such as Uruk and Jericho. Note, Ntr-gods (Neteru) also translated as “one who watches”;[49] Ntr-gods were watchers.

Fallen angels then procreated with daughters of men, producing the demigods, Nephilim, who reigned over ancient Egypt after the age of the gods. As the immortal spirit faded in the Nephilim/semidivine, resulting from the edict of God that removed their illegal, immortal spirits, the Nephilim became the evil giant potentates described in both the Bible and Atlantis. Mortal human hybrids, as descendants of these Nephilim kings, later inherited the throne around 2950 B.C.E., in the postdiluvian epoch that began with Nimrod and Menes, which we will explore later.

Central American legends reflecting the seven sages date back to the Olmecs, circa 3000 B.C.E. They were credited with providing Central Americans with all their important cultural developments.[50] The Olmeca or Oloman, as they were called in the Popol Vuh, were part of the original race of the East Yucatan.[51]

No one knows from what source the Olmecs received their knowledge, but some such as Gilbert and Cotterrell believe Olmecs were in direct contact with the Atlanteans,[52] or even another possible antediluvian society dominated by giants. The Quiche Maya saw their first fathers as all sorcerers and wizards.[53] The Historia Chichimeca of Ixtlilxochitl recorded Quetzalcoatl preaching to the Olmeca, teaching arts and crafts of civilization.[54] Remember, Abbot Brasseur de Borbourg believed Quetzalcoatl actually came from Atlantis.

Edgar Cayce suggested that survivors from Atlantis escaped to both Egypt and Central America.[55] Cayce suggested Atlantean survivors formed the Central American Royal House of Atlan that was led by Iltar. Cayce also suggested Atlantean refugees not only brought a set of antediluvian knowledge to Egypt but also to Central America, burying the knowledge somewhere in the Yucatan, while a third set was left at Atlantis.[56] Cayce further suggested the Hall of Records was buried in a chamber under the Sphinx.[57] Cayce additionally, and inexplicably, named the three islands that were left in the wake of Atlantis's destruction as Poseidia, Aryan, and Og.[58]

The Vatico-Latin Codex additionally describes survivors believed to have hailed from Atlantis. They protected large amounts of knowledge in astronomy, geometry, agriculture, and medicine,[59] likely the seven spurious sciences, carried to far-off lands after the deluge by the Atlantean seven sages, the followers of Horus. Carlos de Siguenzay Gongora, a former Jesuit priest who has worked extensively on the chronology of ancient Mexico, believes Olmecs originated from Atlantis, or at least their culture did.[60] Supporting all this are the Mistecs, who are likely the direct descendants of the Olmecs; to this day, the Mistecs still revere and worship the Atlantean rain god Tlaloc.[61]

The Aztecs, as you will recall, descended from the Toltecs, who descended from the Olmecs. The Toltecs were an aboriginal people who emigrated with the Quiche Maya, and then united with the Olmecs.[62] The Tolteca, also known as the Yaqui and the Olmeca in the Popol Vuh, were remembered as the people of the sacrificers and the priests, who later became the Mexican nation.[63] The Toltecs were recorded as very skilled silversmiths, a skill taught to them by Quetzalcoatl,[64] for Quetzalcoatl was remembered as the Toltec civilizer.[65] He was the founder of Chichen Izta and the great teacher who taught the arts and sciences to the Quiche Maya.[66]

According to the Brahmins, envoys from Mu after the flood were dispatched to India and Central America to disseminate secret knowledge similar to that of the companions of Horus, who carried their knowledge to Egypt, India, and China from Atlantis. The Hindu epic Ramayana by Valmiki declared postdiluvian India was founded by sea-going conquerors from antiquity, the Nagas,[67] referred to by mythologist Joseph Fontenrose as "Snake-demons," who in Buddhism mythology traveled to China from India.[68] Nagas were similar to Mayan Naacals, priests, and Adepts that traveled the world as teachers of wisdom,[69] just as Osiris, Quetzalcoatl, the companions/followers of Horus, and the seven sages did. Hancock identified these Indian priests as the Ascetic Brotherhood, the seven (snake) sages; they were documented by the Vedas as surviving the deluge upon an ark with India's variant of Noah.[70]

A Rig Veda hymn identified the divine physicians, the Asvins.[71] These mysterious Asvins/Aswins were variantly recorded as divine intermediaries and guardian angels; they are frequently referred to throughout the Veda,[72] wandering about performing cures.[73] They were sons of the sun, warlike heroes, and healing gods.[74]

The Rig Veda recorded yet another shadowy group, Aryas, meaning "noble, pure, good, and enlightened folk."[75] Aryans were a loose knit set of tribes from southern Russia (Black Sea region of Scythia), whose common language formed the basis of Asiatic and European languages, the Indo-European language.[76] Aryan traditions were elemental for Hinduism, establishing powerful priests from among the royal bloodlines of the aristocracy; priests were only born into their own clan, an order renowned as Brahman.[77]

There are four major collections of the Vedic Hymns, with the Rig Veda being the oldest, dating back to 2000 B.C.E.;[78] although, many believe the Vedas date back to 5000 B.C.E.[79] Hindu tradition, however, represents the Vedas as being as old as creation, dating back to 8,000–10,500 B.C.E.,[80] and it describes an underlining force of creation that exploded into something out of nothing, the Brahman, in whom all existing things abide.[81] According to Vedic scholar David Frawley, these hymns speak to ancient Indian ancestors, who traveled across the sea after surviving a great flood.[82]

The oldest Veda elements are oral traditions consisting of four Vedas: Samhita, compilations of hymns commonly known as the Rig Veda, the Sama Veda, the Yajur Veda, and the Atharva Veda. Ancient Sanskrit translated Veda as "knowledge, gnosis, and/or insight, deriving from vid: to know, with rig deriving from rik: meaning verses or hymn; thus hymns of knowledge."

The seven Indian sages were commissioned to preserve, reproduce, and repromulgate the antediluvian Vedas, both before and after the flood.[83] Vedas recorded the mortal seven sages learning the antediluvian Vedas from seven fallen angels, who commissioned the repromulgation as a sacred trust, with a specific emphasis on recivilizing the earth.[84] Indian Sages followed the same spirit as the Egyptian followers of Horus, the Shebtiu, and Enoch the Evil. In the same spirit, the seven Indian sages were given astral manifestations, such as the Big Dipper, the same constellation Egyptian Pharaohs prayed of ascending to.[85] And in the same manner, Osiris, Isis, and Quetzalcoatl ascended to Orion,[86] alongside Azazel.

CHAPTER 21

THE EPIC OF GILGAMESH

> Noah was six hundred years old when the floodwaters came on the earth. And Noah and his sons and his wife and his son’s wives entered the ark to escape the waters of the flood.
> —Genesis 7:6–7

Major antediluvian events recorded in mythologies, legends, and religious documents from around the globe seemingly rely on the Bible for their source, yet endeavor to discredit biblical accounts at the same time. Can this supposition be applied specifically to the flood narrative chronicling Nephilim survival into the postdiluvian epoch? I believe it can.

The Sumerian flood narrative has become very famous through the Epic of Gilgamesh and its parallel Sumerian legend of Ziusudra and the Babylonian Atra-Hasis legend, offering a broader perspective for the flood narrative. Ziusudra was just another name for Utnapishtim of the Gilgamesh Epic. Utnapishtim was the Babylonian version copied from the original Sumerian version, where Ziusudra was the hero.[1]

These prehistoric Sumerian legends are the now famous, dissonant deluge accounts that our so-called academic scholars base their slanted, secular opinions upon, concluding biblical writers borrowed these legends as sources for the biblical Noah and flood narratives. However, historian and author Susan Wise Bauer notes that historians assume Genesis is based upon the Sumerian accounts, but in truth, the significant differences in detail between the stories robustly suggest they arose independently from the same cataclysm.[2]

The Epic of Gilgamesh is the tale of a traditional antediluvian hero discovered in the ancient library of King Ashurbanipal of Assyria,[3] dating from 626 B.C.E.[4] The discovery originally included twelve tablets and 3,000 lines, of which roughly half are now available;[5] the epic originally included six linked tales: “Tale of Enkidu,” “Journey to the Cedar Forest,” “The Bull of Heaven,” “Gilgamesh’s Journey,” “The Stars of the Flood,” and “Gilgamesh’s Quest.”[6] The exploits of Gilgamesh contain several points in common with those of Hercules. The scene of the story was centered in the city of Uruk/Erech that blended the philosophy, history, mythology, and religion for ancient Babylonia.[7]

The Epic of Gilgamesh is commonly regarded among the secular academia to be the world’s first epic tale.[8] Utnapishtim is the hero of the legend. The gods warned Utnapishtim,[9] likely Saclas/Prometheus/Ialdoboth/Enki, of the impending deluge seven days before the catastrophe. Utnapishtim was instructed to build a boat and to transport with him a representative pair of the entire animal kingdom. Utnapishtim was permitted to save his immediate family as well as all his kin; although, we are not informed of whom they were and how many of them there might have been. The boat, by the dimensions provided, would have been larger than an ancient ziggurat. The flood lasted seven days, and all life was washed from the face of the earth, leaving Utnapishtim and all his kin as the lone survivors of the intermixed Black Heads, saved to repopulate the earth. It truly is an amazing parallel with the Genesis account at the macro level, but as is the norm, the devil/Satan is in the details.

Gilgamesh, who recants this amazing legend of prehistory to Enikiden, was an extraordinary and fascinating individual. He was the first postdiluvian king of the ancient antediluvian city of Uruk.[10] Gilgamesh is described by George Smith as Gilgamesh “The Strong.”[11] In the opinion of Alford, Gilgamesh was a king of a city/state and was an evil potentate; he terrorized his citizens.[12] Thomas Cahill further confirms Gilgamesh to be the tyrannical king of Uruk and son of king Lugalbanda, who had ruled

Uruk before Gilgamesh.[13] The Epic of Gilgamesh described Gilgamesh ruling like a wild bull, who took any woman he chose when he chose.[14]

This tyrannical king of Uruk held the mysterious title "Atrakhasis," meaning he was unsurpassed in wisdom and was deified for surviving the deluge.[15] To this end, then, Gilgamesh must have been a surviving kin to Utnapishtim or a surviving Aryan. The epic portrays Gilgamesh as superior to other kings and a warrior lord of great stature; a hero born of Uruk; a goring wild bull; son of Lugalbanda; perfect in strength; the son of the lofty cow, the wild cow Ninsun; and the one who crossed the broad seas as far as the sunrise. He is also described as powerful, superb, knowledgeable, and an expert.[16] Gilgamesh, then, personified a bull hero in the epoch of Taurus, surreptitiously reflecting the bull cults of Osiris, Crete, Melchizedek, and Poseidon.

In addition to all this, Gilgamesh was one-third man and two-thirds god. He was described as part human and part divine, because his mother was the wild cow goddess Ninsun.[17] Gilgamesh was created by the gods and was considered a vitriolic demigod,[18] and he was eleven cubits tall, or sixteen-andone-half feet tall, if you calculate one cubit as eighteen inches.[19] Gilgamesh was a giant who would have dwarfed Goliath. Gilgamesh was recorded in the king lists as Lillu, implying that he held demonic powers.[20]

In The Journal of Cuneiform Studies, W. Hallo states Gilgamesh and Enkidu were giants in Babylonia, (unexplained) demigods that were half man and half fish and known as "sons of a fish"[21] (god). So, then, now we have a hero of the parallel Sumerian flood narrative, Gilgamesh, who was a giant, a demigod, and an evil potentate of a city/state in early postdiluvian society. Gilgamesh was an antediluvian Nephilim Aryan king, who somehow survived the flood. Gilgamesh must have been a Peisiadian fish-king, an antediluvian Anunnaki king crowned at Nippur.

According to legend, Gilgamesh was considered a Titan king, equivalent in status to that of Horus, Zu, and Marduk.[22] Gilgamesh was a giant/Titan/ demigod king, a Nephilim pure and simple, and a tyrannical ruler in the spirit of his forefathers. The Epic of Gilgamesh and all the other Sumerian, Akkadian, Assyrian, and Babylonian traditions were nothing more than hubris-filled Nephilim propaganda, chronicling the biased rewriting of history after their own self-glory and slanted in the flavor of the pantheon in which Nephilim derived. Alford states that Gilgamesh was an archetypal Titan king, who was born in Mother Earth[23], just as all Nephilim were.

If Gilgamesh was a Nephilim, then can we identify any other unexplained Nephilim involved in the Mesopotamian flood narratives? The answer is emphatically “yes,” of course. The Sumerian legends were teeming with arcane, giant demigods.

The individual Gilgamesh told the legend to was Enikiden, who also was a Nephilim; he was recorded as a giant like that of Gilgamesh. Enikiden was curiously referred to as a falling star, likely a reference to his Nephilim identity and origins, with Nephilim translated as “fallen ones.” This reference, when fused with angels being known allegorically as stars, dark angels, and fallen stars, makes the connection undeniable.

If, then, Enikiden was like Gilgamesh, he, too, would have had gigantic proportions similar to Gilgamesh, just as Enikiden was also described as being one-third man and two-thirds god.[24] Enikiden/Enkidu was created in the womb of the god Aruru as the Word of Anu. Enikiden was created as a match and a rival to hold Gilgamesh in check; he was born with shaggy hair and was a murderous youth.[25] But Gilgamesh and Enikiden soon became the best of friends, vowing to defend each other even unto death.[26] And consider this: all we have just said regarding Gilgamesh and Enikiden was contained within the Preamble to the Utnapishtim flood narrative. Enikiden, then, could have been one of many postdiluvian Nephilim created by the second violation of creation, by other impassioned fallen angels out of spite, after the flood, just as was set forth earlier.

Utnapishtim, the Babylonian Noah, was as Nephilim as well, but by this time, this information should come as no real surprise. There can be no doubt of this conclusion. In truth, Utnapishtim was an archetypal Nephilim, which was why he was undoubtedly selected by fallen angels, along with Gilgamesh, for the mission of surviving the flood. This, then, continued the Nephilim race in postdiluvian times, conflicting with God’s desire for the contrary, thereby ensuring violence and corruption from the antediluvian world would survive into the postdiluvian world.

The Sumerian version, on which the Babylonian version was based on, also introduced Ziusudra as a (Nephilim) Noah archetype, who was a pious, god-fearing king.[27] He was the son of the god Enki by a female earthling in other versions of this myth.[28] Remember, the antediluvian posterity of Adam and Seth were peaceful agrarians, who lived in harmony with nature and humankind, without kings.

All this is not a fanciful conclusion designed to manipulate and compensate for the so-called biblical contradiction, where all other living creatures, except for those humans and animals with Noah on the ark, were washed from the face of the earth. Nor is this conclusion applied to compensate for the so-called revisionist rationalization of Nephilim surviving the flood by rewriting Genesis 6:4 to read: “The Nephilim were on earth in those days— and also afterward.” No, this conclusion is simple, undeniable reality and not a paradox, for the Epic of Gilgamesh, the counterpart to the biblical Noah, concedes this conclusion.

Utnapishtim was no ordinary human. He, too, was considered a Titan in the order of Gilgamesh, which would equate Utnapishtim with Horus and Marduk. Utnapishtim was one-third man and two-thirds god. However, this so-called Sumerian Noah was no ordinary Nephilim. He was considered by the epic as perfect for doing battle. He was described in unison as an ideal military warrior, a Titan king, and a demigod. He was an amazing Nephilim, who lived in pre-flood times, and terrorized the antediluvian epoch along with his evil cohorts. Then he was selected as the ideal master of corruption and violence to poison postdiluvian society.[29]

Ziusudra (Utnapishtim) was listed as the tenth king in the antediluvian Larsa List of kings from the antediluvian city of Larsa, which is commonly known by historians as the record of Sumerian kings.[30] Another of the antediluvian Sumerian king lists shows those ten kings to have been actually and literally Nephilim kings that were lowered from heaven; the list also shows Ubartutu’s son was Ziusudra, and his reign was interrupted by the flood.[31]

Utnapishtim was not the archetypal patriarch of peace as Noah was, selected and entrusted to repopulate the earth in righteousness with his pure Sethite progeny, as the so-called secular scholars would have us believe. Utnapishtim was the antithesis of this doctrine and of Noah; Utnapishtim was the quintessential Nephilim. He was a tyrannical, evil potentate, just like Gilgamesh. Once more, the Mesopotamian flood narratives were not the source documents for the biblical flood. They were merely parallel legends, recanting and detailing in mythology for the future generations the survival story from the deluge concerning the Nephilim.

According to the Sumerian Lamentation Texts concerning the deluge, the peculiar statement, "… the flood storm which overwhelmed the living creatures of heaven and earth—the Black Head Ones,"[32] leaves a puzzling enigma if it is not properly analyzed and deciphered. This statement confirms that Nephilim lived with mortal humans in antediluvian times, noting that the deluge overwhelmed both the humans and the beings fathered by the heavenly realm. Just as important, we can deduce that the Black Heads were the intermingled race of the antediluvian Sumerians corrupted by the Nephilim and part of the originating race of day six governed by Cainites.

Let us now bring the book of Enoch back into context to connect the Babylonian flood to Genesis as the source document. Mahway, Nephilim son of the fallen angel Barakel, received nightmares about the coming deluge and asked Enoch to interpret his dreams, from which Mahway learned there was nothing the giants could do to prevent the deluge or their own destruction. The narrative then moves on, naming one of the giants present at this gathering as Gilgamesh.[33] Gilgamesh was also listed as a giant in the Enoch Book of Giants recovered among the Dead Sea Scrolls on fragment 4Q531.[34]

My point is this: if Gilgamesh, the Anunnaki/Nephilim, was recorded in the biblical source documents as one of the giants intimately involved with the knowledge of the coming deluge, then he was likely the one and the same as the Gilgamesh that recanted the Utnapishtim flood narrative renowned as the Epic of Gilgamesh. Gilgamesh was obviously one of the surviving Nephilim from the antediluvian epoch, just as he stated he was. Gilgamesh must have been one of the unnamed kin of Utnapishtim, for both were kings. All this, then, suggests that, indeed, biblical records are the source documents for the Sumerian legends, even though we do not have biblical documents predating the Babylonian and Sumerian tablets.

This, then, accounts for biblical assertions that the giants of the Middle East and of the early postdiluvian world dwelled in Mesopotamia, Scythia, and the covenant lands, and then their diluted, royal, human bloodlines migrated to Egypt with Ham and Hermes post-Babel. To this conclusion, other legends recorded that all but a few select archetype giants were eradicated in the flood, with the surviving giants being known in legend as the sons of Anak, who inhabited the hill country of Palestine before Israel,[35] just as the Bible recorded.

CHAPTER 22

DEUCALION, MANU, AND SETH

At the end of the hundred and fifty days the water had gone down, and on the seventeenth day of the seventh month the ark came to rest on the mountains of Ararat.

—Genesis 8:4

Considering the Epic of Gilgamesh leads us to ask: Were Greek and other diffused flood legends a recollection of Nephilim's survival? And why was Noah oddly recorded by Gnostic gospels as being called "Deucalion" by the other races?[1]

From the Gnostic book of Noria, we learn that Noah's wife was named Noria, whom the Greeks knew as Pyrrha, wife of Deucalion, and that the Greeks called Noah "Deucalion."[2] However, just as in Sumerian legends, the Greek hero Deucalion (a Nephilim) was forewarned of the inevitable catastrophe by his father, who was a demigod (Nephilim or fallen angel). Greek legend records that Deucalion's father was the Titan (god/Nephilim) Prometheus, who warned both Deucalion and Pyrrha of the deluge and provided them with the ark.[3]

Whether or not Prometheus was a Titan or a god matters not, but legend has recorded Prometheus as the Titan creator god, brother to Zeus.[4] In a similar manner to Sumeria, Titans were regarded both as gods of heaven and semidivine, mortal gods of the earth. Prometheus was the god in Greek mythology that provided fire to humankind, an allegory for light, gnosis, and knowledge, to free humankind from the bonds of ignorance and from the God Jehovah, just as Lucifer articulated in Gnostic accounts of Adam and Eve eating from the Tree of Gnosis, which was "desirable for gaining wisdom."[5]

Either way, legend recorded Deucalion as Prometheus's son, making Deucalion a Titan/Nephilim, thus suggesting the Greek account is the Nephilim version in biblical clothing, just as the Gilgamesh version was. In fact, Greek legend recorded Deucalion and Mother Earth (likely Pyrrha/Noria) allegorically combined to repopulate the earth once more with giants after the flood,[6] just as Gaea and Uranus did before the flood. This account echoes a possible second impassioned encounter of dark angels and human females after the flood. Deucalion's son Hellenes was regarded as the ancestor to all Hellenes, and/or Greeks,[7] just as Japheth, son of Noah, was in the Hebrew tradition. And as you might recall, Hellenes was the shadowy Titan ancestor and hero from antediluvian Athens, who led the Greeks against the Atlanteans.

As for the Gnostic Noria, she also has a Nephilim legacy not generally discussed. In Gnosticism, Noria possessed many variant nomatives such as Norea, Orea, Noraia, Oraia, Horaia, Nora, Nuraita, and Nhuraita.[8] Norea was represented in Gnostic scripture as a descendant of Adam and Eve and was sometimes portrayed as an intended victim of rape by the apostate archons.[9] One wonders, did the indiscriminate rapes occur before or after the flood?

James Robinson further comments that the comparative analysis of Gnostic texts with Jewish Aggadah traditions shows the nomative Norea was a derivative of the infamous Namaah of the Cainite and Lamech lineage[10] and a known Dragon queen of Nephilim bloodlines. Finally, the originating Greek spelling for Namaah, according to Robinson, was Horaia, the naughty girl of Jewish legend that openly cavorted with the sons of God.[11] Noria/Pyrrha was a Nephilim, along with Deucalion; she was likely the Namaah recorded in Genesis for her infamy and posthumously remembered for surviving the flood.

Deucalion rode out the storm in an ark with his wife, landing atop a mountain named Mount Parnassus when the floodwaters receded. Then Deucalion and his posterity rebuilt civilization. According to Robert Temple, a Sanskrit scholar, Mount Parnassus is the same latitude as that of Mount Ararat, where Noah landed.[12]

The legends from the Indian subcontinent recorded in the Vedas articulate a similar story to that of the Hebrews, Greeks, and Sumerians. Oral traditions were set down in Sanskrit writing much later in history. Historians concede that these native Hindu and Brahmanical flood traditions have been imported to the Indus valley by wandering Aryans.[13] The Vedas are concluded to be very old because they were preserved in the Aryan language, which is archaic. Shortly after Aryans arrived in the Punjab, an elite, erudite order compiled the Vedas, developing in the late Vedic period the Brahman concept that a power like the universal life force holds the universe together. Sages concluded there was an immortal spark at the core of humans that was connected to the Brahman sustaining the universe.[14] By the ninth century B.C.E. (or before), ritualists had established the Brahman Priestly Clan.[15]

The Rig Veda, composed circa 600 B.C.E., was penned in an obscure Aryan tongue. Early Aryan clans named themselves Jana, which is Sanskrit for “tribe.”[16] Aryans drifted into two distinct languages, the Avestan dialect and the early form of Sanskrit. The Aryan pantheon seems to have spilled over into both Indian and Mediterranean cultures. Avestan Aryans named their gods Daevas, meaning “Shining Ones,” while in Sanskrit they were Devas and Amrita.[17]

The Sapatha Brahmana is the earliest surviving account of an antediluvian character king, a leader of men known as Manu. Manu is remembered as the father of humankind and a member of the surviving brotherhood of the seven sages.[18] Manu was a title held by six previous kings who reigned for long periods of time before the flood.[19] Manu permitted the seven sages to accompany him on the ark when the floodwaters deluged the antediluvian world.[20] The god Vishna warned Manu of the impending catastrophe that would overtake the three antediluvian worlds but also said not to fear, for Vishna would provide Manu with an ark to escape upon.[21] The question arises as to whether or not the Satpatha Brahmana has accurately testified to the three great antediluvian empires of Sumer, Atlantis, and Mu. One further speculates as to whether or not giants and humans were provided escape upon arks in all the disparate antediluvian civilizations of the earth.

Manu's commission after the flood was to reestablish agriculture, utilizing his cache of every kind of seed that he had stowed away on the escaping ark,[22] again most similar to the agrarian and vegetarian Noah. Manu, however, was both a king of the antediluvian epoch and the patriarchal founder of a dynasty of kings in the postdiluvian epoch.[23] Manu's ark made landfall not coincidently on the slope of a northern mountain in Himavat, located in the Himalaya mountain range. The deluge refugees then descended down the mountain very slowly, only when they were safe from being washed away,[24] again very similar to the biblical account of Noah. Manu's reward for saving humankind, all the animals, and all the plant life was mastery over all knowledge, insights into the mystery of the soul, and a form of immortality,[25] which echoes the Sumerian account of Utnapishtim.

Manu was likely Nephilim. Manu was recorded in the Mahabharata Veda as a very powerful Rishi or Sage, and not as a king.[26] In the southwest of India, another Veda, the Satyaravrata, Manu bears the name and title the Lord of Dravida.[27] In this account, Manu is believed, according to Hancock, to be the king of the Dravidian people.[28]

Finally, there is yet another important Gnostic tradition that provides for the survival of the Nephilim into the postdiluvian world. In this account, Seth was saved from the deluge to keep his race from extinction.[29] Seth, in this tradition, was the parent or founder to the Immoveable and/or Incorruptible Race.[30] They are also known as "the Posterity of Seth," "the Perfect Ones," and "Those Ones."[31] Gnostic tradition professes that history has been subdivided into four epochs, with three being antediluvian. This great Incorruptible Race was the race that was later transplanted to Sodom and Gomorrah after the flood, but which also descended from the previous ages, all antediluvian.[32] This was not the race descended from Seth the son of Adam.

This was the second of two races that were created by angels before the deluge, and in this tradition, Seth is an archetype of Seth, Emmakha (and or eternal) Seth, and not from the posterity of Adam but the posterity of angels and Nephilim, and the founder of the Gnostic race.[33] The Incorruptible

Race of giants is the mysterious race that Cain, Enoch the Evil, Lamech, Naamah, and Tubal-Cain have all allegedly and eagerly connected themselves to in legend. Cain and his posterity claimed a more royal and divine legacy, void of Adamite impurity, which the posterity of Cain, in turn, pollinated into the people of day six.

The Gnostic gospels record that not only Noah survived the deluge but also many people from the Immoveable Race did and that they were guided to a certain place within a luminous cloud to ensure they survived the flood.[34] The luminous cloud seems to be a direct connection to the place, or the angel, which created this mysterious race, for this surreptitious Seth was created in a luminous cloud in the likeness of the angel Adamas,[35] in a similar manner to the centaurs.

The recollection of the survival of the Immoveable Race by the hands of their fallen patriarchs has been diligently recorded into Gnostic scripture, literature, and legends from around the globe, but the polytheist scripture and legends of Nephilim survival” are not the legends and memories of Noah. This clandestine literature is not the biblical recollection; this must be plainly understood. The Nephilim and the Immoveable Race survived because of the intercession of fallen angels saving them and their illicit legacy from utter destruction, all to poison the postdiluvian world, just as they had poisoned the antediluvian epoch. Now after the flood, the descendants of the biblical Japheth and Ham, in a similar account to pantheistic and Gnostic legends, went to live among Those Ones (Nephilim) and rebelled against God once more at Sodom,[36] once again intermixing Nephilim bloodlines with the pure Adamite bloodlines that descended down through Noah and his sons.

This, then, accounts for deluge narratives being spawned by two to six separate surviving races—four human and two Nephilim—upon several possible arks: possibly at least four human recollections and two or more Nephilim recollections. We now have several suitable solutions explaining the doctrine of surviving Nephilim and the four human races (colors) of day six. The first derives from two separate violations against the laws of creation, one before the deluge and one after by fallen angels at Sodom; the second, from a possible skirting of God’s plans by small bands of Nephilim and humans in all antediluvian civilizations, who were warned of and protected by fallen angels from the pending deluge and who then modeled their accounts into legend after the Noah narrative. The third possibility derives from the perfect and Immoveable Race descending from the ancient Gnostic patriarch Seth and many of his descendants, who were protected in a luminous cloud from the flood catastrophe. And the fourth says that God may have provided for a human in each of the four antediluvian civilizations and races, a Noah equivalent, who then spawned the four races in the postdiluvian epoch. The reprobate race of Nephilim survived through other surreptitious schemes offered by dark angels.

Whichever the case may be, all four scenarios are compatible with Genesis 6, for none would have taken place unless God had ordained it to take place just as Genesis recorded it. Additionally, the Bible does, in fact, record several unexplained races surviving the flood, even though modern orthodoxy dismisses these dissonant accounts. The previous chapters of this book bear witness to a considerable volume of testimony from pagan cultures, other religions, and a variety of secular sources, which underlines that their histories and their legends were all anchored in the true historic source, Genesis.

It is now time to learn about the surviving giant races and day six humans documented during the time of Abraham and the Exodus, before moving onto Nimrod and Babel. Israelite history is yet another requisite foundation stone to unraveling the contemporary conspiracy, the renaissance of The Genesis 6 Conspiracy. The modern incantation has been preordained to climax, complete with its denouement, in our generation, the Terminal Generation, known biblically in prophecy as the generation of the end times and the last days.

SECTION III: The Descendants of Anak

BLOODLINES AND COVENANTS

CHAPTER 23

THE RAPHAITES AND THE AMORITES

> And they spread among the Israelites a bad report about the land they had explored. They said, “The land we explored devours those living in it. All the people we saw there are of great size. We saw Nephilim there (the descendants of Anak come from Nephilim).”
> —Numbers 13:32-33

After Israel escaped the land of Egypt, they wandered the desert for forty years before crossing into the Land of the Covenant. This was the time when the Israelites were formed into a nation through trial and obedience. It was a time when the Israelites were incumbent to forge their nationhood in preparation for the tribulation that was to come.

Even though the Promised Land was their divine inheritance, why did it not come easily? Why did nations occupying the Promised Land stand steadfastly against this newborn nation in what seems to have been a suicide pact? Why did nations like the Amalekites and the Amorites whip surrounding nations into a frenzy to oppose Israel, forcing Israel to take the Land of the Covenant by force?

The Israelites quickly learned the nations who stood between them and the Covenanted Land kept a terrible surprise. Nephilim were living among those Gentile nations, practicing the same kind of vile corruption their ancestors had invoked on the antediluvian world. The Israelites identified the postdiluvian giants as Anakites and Rephaites, even though they universally understood the giants were descendants of the antediluvian Nephilim.

It is pertinent and perplexing to note that Anak translates as "a giant, or a long necked giant," while Rephaim translates as "spirits of the deceased or giant aborigines."[1] Both were races unaccounted for in Scripture, populating the Trans-Jordan region,[2] a region which still maintains their names in many locations, such as the Valley of Rephaim. Archaeological discoveries resolutely support the claim of giants in the biblical lands being tall and fair skinned,[3] even though secular science unaccountably disregards these claims.

The Nephilim dominated the governments of the Amalekites, the Amorites, the people of Negev, the Hittites, the Perizzites, the Ammonites, the Moabites, the Edomites, the Philistines, and the Jebusites. I do not believe it was a mere coincidence that the posterity of Nephilim lived with and dominated the peoples who occupied the Land of the Covenant. It is my contention that Nephilim deliberately set out in the postdiluvian world to settle in and violate the Land of the Covenant in resistance to and rebellion against God, who had destroyed their rebellious ancestors. Nephilim both aligned and positioned their homes geographically against the not yet formed nation of Israel, laying in patient, clandestine endurance to ambush the future nation of destiny. The Nephilim then ambushed Israel once they came into being, endeavoring to impede Israel's divine rendezvous with destiny.

As you will recall in Deuteronomy 32:8, God divided the nations in the beginning according to the number of the sons of God. One concludes from Scripture that God kept the Promised Land for Himself, for and His specific intentions, because God clearly bequeathed the land to the descendants of Abraham, the future nation of Israel (Genesis 12:7, 13:14-15, 17:8-9, 18:17:21, 48:5-6, Acts 7:5-6), and clearly stated the land was His (Leviticus 25:23). God then gave the land to Israel (Joshua 24:11-13, Deuteronomy 1:21, 3:27, 32:38, Numbers 27:12, 34:1-29) as their inheritance. The posterity of the Nephilim surely would have remembered this. The remnant of the Nephilim then settled knowingly in the Land of the Covenant after the deluge, in full support of their ancestors and progenitors. It was in the Promised Land that the postdiluvian Nephilim nation chose to make its stand against God and the future, infant nation of hope, endeavoring to thwart God's plan of salvation for humankind when Israel was at her weakest point.

Let us first work our way back to the beginning of the postdiluvian world and then forward again to the time of the Exodus and the conquest of the Promised Land in order further illuminate the Nephilim's goal. Of the many nations the Nephilim lived among, the Amalekites and the Amorites stand out in their determined opposition to the Israelites. We know they were nations that contained the descendants of Anak from Numbers: "But the people who lived there are powerful, and the cities are fortified and very large. We even saw the descendants of Anak there. The Amalekites live in Negev, the Hittites, Jebusites, and the Amorites live in the hill country" (Num. 13:28–29). What is not clear regarding these overlooked and misconstrued accounts is whether or not the Amorites and the Amalekites were pure Nephilim nations or if the Nephilim just lived among them, dominating their kingships.

Both nations were shrouded in mystery and inexplicably interwoven with Anakites and Rephaites. Both nations were distinctly described separately from other nations as giants, along with Anakites and Rephaites. Both can be found in the Table of Nations listed in Genesis 10 and in 1 Chronicles, with the Amorites listed as the sons of Sidon, firstborn of Canaan, son of Ham. Most of the nations that occupied the Land of the Covenant were Canaanites, with the Philistines and the Amalekites being the exceptions. Amorite meant westerners, or western highlanders.[4] They were recorded historically as wild, nomadic immigrants from the north, who intermarried with Canaanites, adopting their Semitic language.[5]

The Akkadians and Sumerians knew the Amorites as the Martu and/or Ameru, while all the land of Palestine and Syria was remembered as the land of the Amorites in the third millennium B.C.E.[6] Amorites were recorded in the historical annals of Accad and Sumer as barbarians, an uncivilized people.[7] Amorites survived as sojourners of the mountains just beyond Sumer, in direct opposition to the city-dwelling and agrarian Mesopotamians.[8] Mesopotamians viewed the Amorites as tent-dwelling, nomadic barbarians who marauded over their mountain habitat well equipped with weapons of war and as a people who consumed uncooked meat.[9] Cahill concludes that the Mesopotamians regarded the Amorites as almost animals.[10]

The people of Amalek were listed under the sons of Eliphaz, son of Esau, son of Isaac, son of Abraham.[11] The mysterious Amalekites do not possess any archaeological traces whatsoever. It is as though they never existed; many scholars believe that Amalek and his tribe merged with the original, unknown Amalekites to form the Great Amalekite Race, or perhaps Amalek took his name, a new name, from the supposed unknown people he merged with.[12] What can be said with certainty is that the Amalekites were a murky nation in both their founding and in the way they unaccountably vanished from recorded secular history.

If only we could leave the genealogies of the Amorites and the Amalekites, the beginnings of the postdiluvian Nephilim would be quite simple, but tracing the genealogy of the Nephilim proves to be more disquieting. Considering the numerous vernacular names for the Nephilim, as recorded previously, demonstrates there is much more to the postdiluvian Nephilim puzzle than just the Amalekites and the Amorites, that postdiluvian Nephilim impacted more of the founding nations listed in the Table of Nations than just the Amorites and the Amalekites. For now, we will first focus on these two nations, simply because they were the most predominate Anakite nations at the time of the Exodus.

What is certain about the Amorites and the Amalekites is that they lived with and among Anakites, thereby producing a mixed race of giants. Just as in the days of Noah, those giants usurped the kingships and governments of their time, seizing absolute control over those nations, as witnessed by Old Testament accounts.[13] Knight and Lomas suggest that the descendants of Anak became postdiluvian kings because of their physical superiority.[14]

After the flood, Gardner notes kingship was originally established in Kish, but kingship by humans failed or was destroyed; kingship then reverted back to Nephilim, just as it had in the antediluvian epoch.[15] For whatever reasons, the Sumerian King's List articulates that after the deluge, a new group of rulers had to be found and that kingship once again descended to earth from on high.[16] Similarly, Amorite and Amalekite kings were described as either Anakites or Rephaites; they were Anunnaki kings anointed from heaven by the fallen angels in the same manner that transpired before the deluge. Interestingly enough, and certainly not by chance or coincidence, in my opinion, the ancient Sumerian word for king literally translated as "big man"[17] or "giants."

Deuteronomy, Numbers, and Joshua record that postdiluvian Nephilim known as Rephaites and Anakites were taller and stronger than the Israelites.[18] These passages confirm the Nephilim lived among and ruled the peoples of the Amalekites and the Amorites. This certainly accounts for the stinging punishment through annihilation that was prophesied for each of those nations by God.[19] Both nations were sentenced to utter annihilation at the hands of the Israelites by the edict of God, who equated their corruption and violence with that of the Nephilim at the time of the deluge. The Amalekites and the Amorites were sentenced to be hunted down over many years and generations by the Israelites, until they were utterly destroyed in the times of David.

We will investigate the Amorites first, before returning to the inexplicable Amalekites. The Amorite narrative is straightforward compared to the tangled Amalekite genealogy. The Old Testament documents that the Amorites were summarily subjugated by Anakite kings.[20] The two prominent Anakite kings of the Amorites during the time of Joshua and the conquest of the Land of the Covenant were Sihon and Og.[21] In truth, the Psalms recorded not only that Sihon and Og were mighty Anakite kings but also that all the kings of Canaan were.[22]

Simple deduction proposes that if Anakite kings reigned over the Amorites of that time, they also did so for many, many generations before Sihon and Og. Nelson's describes Og as the last survivor of a race of giants,[23] our first confirmed giant to survive the flood. We are not informed at this juncture as to how long those Anakites reigned, but later we will discover their reign of terror originated back to a time very close to the time of the flood, establishing the Nephilim reign of terror at about 1,500 years in Canaan, and 2,000 years in Philistia. Postdiluvian Nephilim imprinted a significant impression upon the major events of postdiluvian history that has been conveniently swept aside and ignored by modern theologians and secular historians alike.

At the beginning of the conquest of the Promised Land, Moses asked for permission from the Anakite king Sihon to grant his army and people safe passage through the land of Sihon. Sihon had such great size that no one could stand against him. Moreover, he was extraordinarily fleet of foot for his enormous size, just as the antediluvian Greek Titans, such as Hercules and Theseus, were. Ginzberg noted Sihon's original name was Arad, a name describing Sihon's amazing dexterity and quickness.[24] Even so, one wonders whether or not Arad conceals that Sihon was a fugitive from Arad, which was located just outside Hebron.[25] Or does Arad contain a hidden antediluvian meaning, since Sihon was brother to Og and thus also survived the flood? Sihon then displayed his naturally inherited hubris and an ancestral clandestine covenant against good and God for all future generations to ponder by refusing Moses and the Israelites safe passage.[26] The Amorites were well aware of just who the Israelites were from the Amalekites and bound themselves in a blood covenant against the Israelites.

Because of Sihon's hubris, Moses was mortally afraid to wage war against the Amorites, until God heartened Moses by chaining Og's and Sihon's guardian fallen angels during the battles. Sihon's vile act of inhospitable barbarism begat an inevitable battle fought between the Amorites and the Israelites, where Moses and the Israelites easily destroyed Sihon and his army. This then brought Og, Sihon's ally and brother, into the clash. Og was in no hurry at first to rush in and support his brother, until he heard of his brother's crushing defeat at the hands of the Israelites, for he thought Sihon and his army would easily overwhelm the inexperienced Israelites.[27]

Og was king of Gilead and Gaulantis, according to Josephus,[28] and the king of Gilead to Bashan in Scripture, recorded as the land of Rephaites.[29] Og was a gigantic man, known for his great strength and power. He was legendary for his great beauty. Og was a king without equal in his time.[30] Josephus went on to articulate Og's remarkable strength and beauty was complimented by the extraordinary adeptness and skill of his hands. Josephus did not provide any more detail than this, but we may conclude that Og was a superior king, with godlike size, beauty, strength, and skill; he was a true demigod living to an extraordinary age. Remember, Og somehow survived the flood as the last of the race of giants (likely Rephaim),[31] which likely occurred circa 2950 to 3050 B.C.E., while the Exodus took place circa 1450 B.C.E.

Og was recorded by Jewish legends as being extraordinarily wide as well as being tall.[32] Both Josephus and Deuteronomy described Og's bed as more than thirteen feet long and eight feet wide.[33] His bed was made of iron and not wood, for Og's weight would have crushed any furniture made of wood;[34] the Israelites retained this bed as a memorial in Rabbah.[35] Migene Gonzalez-Wipper records Og as descending from Shemyaza/Azaziel, the chief of the Grigori, who spawned the Nephilim,[36] concurring with the conclusion that Og was a surviving antediluvian ancestor of the Nephilim.[37] All this was confirmed in the Babylonian Talmud, where it unpredictably cited Og as a progeny of Hiya, son of Shemyaza/Azazel.[38] Other Jewish legends recorded Og and Sihon were sons of Aniah, who also connected his ancestry back to Shemazai/Azazel. Sihon and Og, according to these Jewish legends, were believed to be the last of the original antediluvian giants that somehow survived the deluge.[39]

In Hebrew Myths: The Book of Genesis, Graves and Patai state that Og escaped the flood by clinging to a rope ladder attached to Noah's Ark. Noah apparently took pity on the giant and fed Og daily through a porthole. According to this and other Jewish legends, Og swore an oath to Noah that he and his descendants would serve Noah and his descendants in perpetuity, providing Noah fed him and his kin that were with him, clinging on to the sides of the ark.[40] Og repented of his evil ways as the legend goes and became the slave of Noah. But at some point after the floodwaters had receded, Og returned to his wicked, antediluvian ways.[41] This took place after Abraham relinquished Og of his servitude.[42]

The last nail in the coffin confirming Og's ancestral heritage was that his chosen reign included the area of Bashan. Bashan included the infamous Mount Hermon, the place where the fallen angels descended to copulate with the daughters of Cain.[43] Og was a true giant ruling potentate, a Gibborim and a Nephilim, from the antediluvian epoch.

Josephus informs us that Og and Sihon were the best of friends,[44] not to mention brothers. When Og heard Sihon had marched against Israel, Og entered the war in support of his old friend Sihon. Unfortunately for Og, though, by the time he and his army reached the great battle, Sihon had already been slain by the Israelites, along with his army of Amorites. When Og arrived on the battlefield, he suffered the same fate as Sihon, going down in utter defeat[45] in battle at the hands of Israelites, even though Og seems to have mysteriously survived this defeat, according to Scripture, as the last remnant of the original Rephaites east of the Jordan (Deut. 3:11). After that battle, Og does not appear again in Scripture.

From this biblical account regarding the Amorites and the Israelites, what becomes clear is that the Anakites were well entrenched in the Promised Land by the time of the Exodus. Deuteronomy 1:26–28 and 2:10–23 name the giant nations, who lived among the Amorites, as Anakites, just as Numbers 13:28–29 testifies to the same. However, Joshua 12:4 and Deuteronomy 3:11 name Og, king of Bashan, as one of the last of the Rephaites,[46] supporting Unger's conclusion that Og was one of the last distinguished survivors of the race of Rephaim.

We ascertain from these misunderstood Exodus accounts that the two most prominent races of giants during the early postdiluvian epoch were the Anakites and Rephaites; although, many other appellations were applied to Nephilim. What is difficult to determine is why there appear to be two distinct but separate races of giants that came to the forefront; the Israelites did distinguish the difference, even through we are not informed why. Perhaps one race was from the line of Og and his kin, while the other might have been from the line of Utnapishtim and his kin. Or perhaps one was from the race of Seth, the Immoveable Race, and perhaps the other was from Mount Hermon.

We do not find out who Rapha might be, but we are introduced in the Bible to Arba.[47] Arba was described in Joshua as “the greatest man amongst the Anakites” (Josh. 14:15). Arba was the Anakites’ legendary king of mythology. He was credited with being the forefather of the Anak and the Anakite nation,[48] the most ancient of the named postdiluvian Anakites, as well as being the actual father to Anak.[49] Additionally, Anak begat three sons who were also giants.[50] The region known in the Bible as Kiriath Arba, more commonly known as Hebron, was named after Arba, as he was regarded as its founder.[51] Anak was considered the progenitor of the race of giants named after him, the Anakim, or Anakites. Past these limited details, the Bible does not speak to Arba any further; but again, Arba must have had quite an infamous life to gain notoriety by his notation in the Bible.

Arba, Anak, and Rapha were not listed in the Table of Nations because they were Nephilim, and we are not able to trace back this lineage any further, leaving us at an apparent dead end. But we can try a different avenue, linking the Anakites back to Rapha and then Rapha back to the Nephilim through careful consideration and study of the Old Testament. In this spirit, let us consider the translations of their vernacular appellations, alongside the following passages:

> I have given Ar to the descendants of Lot as a possession. (The Emites used to live there—a people strong and numerous, and as tall as the Anakites. Like the Anakites, they too are considered Rephaites, but the Moabites called them Emites …
> —Deuteronomy 2:10–11 NIV

> I will not give possession of any land belonging to the Ammonites. I have given it as a possession to the descendants of Lot. (That too was considered a land of the Rephaites, who used to live there; but the Ammonites called them Zamzummites. They were people strong and numerous, and as tall as the Anakites.) The Lord destroyed them before the Ammonites who drove them out and settled in their place. The Lord had done the same for the descendants of Esau, who lived in Seir, when he destroyed the Horites from before them. They drove them out and have lived in their place to this day. And as for the Avvites who lived in the villages as far as Gaza, the Caphtorites coming out of Caphtor destroyed them and settled in their place.

Unger's defines the Emites or Emin as "giant aborigines who occupied the land east of the Jordan River and who were dispossessed by the Moabites."[52] The name Emin was derived from the fear they inspired because of their sinfulness and size.[53] The Zamzummites were defined as "noisemakers," likely from the thunderous bellows of their voices that Atlanteans and Titans were well-known for and/or those that mumbled and/or those who murmured. The Ammonites destroyed them.[54] The word zamzummin further describes the talent that these giants had in war, for in other accounts they were considered masters of war.[55] Avvites or Avim described iniquitous giants who dwelled among the Philistines in Gaza and identified with the Hivites.[56] The Auzim dwelled in Ham and were translated as "Shining People."[57] In a similar manner, Iuvim, the name provided by Egyptians, describes their Snake-like qualities and their ability to easily judge the quality of the soil.[58]

Rephaites were additionally understood to be giant aborigines from much older races.[59] The alternative translation to rephaite reflects that, at a glance, a person's heart would grow weak from the terribleness of the giant's appearance.[60] Remember, Nephilim possessed heads like snakes, rough and hairy skin, and eyes of honey and gold, all the while exuding a glow about them. Nephilim became known in legend and mythology as "the Shining Ones." Webster's New Compact Format Dictionary defines aboriginal as "original nation," an indigenous inhabitant of a country from the beginning.[61] All this suggests that Rephaites were the true postdiluvian indigenous people of the Land of the Covenant, and perhaps from even before.

The two passages mentioned in Numbers and Deuteronomy link the Anakites, Zamzummites, Horites, Emites, Avvites, and for that matter, any giant of that time back to Rapha[62]—or more accurately label them all Rephaites; this linkage includes both the Amorites and the Amalekites. The books of Deuteronomy and Numbers clearly underline that all these giants, including Anakites, were considered Rephaites (Deut. 2:10–11; Num. 2:20–22). Therefore, Rephaim must have been the root nation, or one of the root nations, for the postdiluvian Nephilim. But once again, we are not permitted to trace Rapha through the Table of Nations because Rapha was not listed in either of the accounts. Therefore, we must explore the earliest known references made to Rapha.

CHAPTER 24

SODOM AND GOMORRAH

> Then the Lord said, "The outcry against Sodom and Gomorrah is so great and so grievous that I will go down and see if what they have done is as bad as the outcry that has reached me."
> —Genesis 18:20–21

I find it intriguing that the first reference to Nephilim after the flood begins in the time of Abraham.[1] This is not an anecdotal coincidence, so how are Nephilim related to Abraham and Sodom?

Abraham arrived in the Land of the Covenant from Ur in Chaldea, also known as Babylonia, the ancient home of the Sumerians. This is very odd. The very time God binds Abraham into an everlasting Covenant to save humankind, the Nephilim show up. The resurfacing of Nephilim seemingly foreshadowed the great conflict that would follow 400 to 500 years later, when the newly formed nation of Israel retook the Promised Land.

God guided Abraham away from Ur to the land that would be provided for his descendants,[2] the allotment from Deuteronomy. God bound it into a Covenant, all the time knowing it was infested with Nephilim. This certainly gives one pause for thought. God must have intended all along to utilize Israel in the same manner that He brought forth the flood, to eradicate the Nephilim corruption from His land and creation, saving humankind from their curse. God led Abraham to the Promised Land, a place where Abraham could prosper, for the language in Canaan was western Semitic and similar to Abraham's eastern Semitic dialect.[3]

Ur was home to the moon cult and the moon god Sin and his daughter Innana. Bauer notes that Terah's name (Abraham's father) expresses kinship with the moon god Sin, just as Sarai is the Akkadian form for "Sin's wife, the goddess, Ningal," subjects we will examine later. Abraham and Sarah were separated from pure Semitic stock and from the chaos of polytheism by God reclaiming them and marking His reclamation by adding ah to both their names of Abram and Sarai.[4]

At the time God gave Abraham His blessing, less than 400 years had passed since the flood. Around this period of time, Genesis noted an unexplained alliance of kings, likely from Mesopotamia, who waged war against the kings from the plain of Sodom. This alliance continued on to battle against the Rephaites in Ashteroth, the Zuzites in Ham, the Emites in Shaveh Kiriathaim, and the Horites in the hill country of Seir—all unaccounted-for giant nations.[5] This powerful alliance additionally vanquished the Amalekites and the Amorites,[6] who must have been giants as well, for this war was waged entirely against giant-infested nations, noting all the while that the timing of this battle predates the Amalekite and Amorite genealogical record in the Table of Nations. One concludes, then, from this ancient war against giants that Sodom and Gomorrah must also have been infested with Nephilim.

The Rephaites would have required a number of generations to form into mighty, warlike states, threatening the balance of power of the world at that time. Logical deduction would dictate that the Nephilim would have reappeared immediately after the deluge. It is very possible, and most likely, that when Nephilim made their grand reappearance, they were also in contact by virtue of both geography and timeframe with Nimrod, whom we will discuss in detail shortly.

What is also worthy of note is that the same nation names were used at that point in history to describe the Rephaite nations as Israel would name them in their encounter at the time just after the Exodus, more than 500 years later. This could simply mean that when the historical record was written at later dates, the names of the nations as they were known at that time were applied, or it is even possible that there was another intriguing alternative: the original Rephaite nation nomenclature withstood the test of time, out of the respect or fear of the diverse peoples of that region of those terrible giant city-states skilled in war. One must consider that the Rephaite nations would have made a significant impression on the people of the postdiluvian world.

From this very same encounter, Josephus, too, made note of a war between the Assyrians and the Sodomites, just as Genesis 14 recorded, but Josephus included a very appropriate anecdote. During the campaign, Assyria laid waste to the region of Syria, where they overthrew the offspring of the giants,[7] the Amorites and the Amalekites.[8] Josephus, then, considered both the Amalekites and the Amorites giants. Therefore, the complete Assyrian campaign was a war waged against the giants and nations completely infested and overrun with Nephilim, which included the Amorite, Amalekite, and Horite nations.

It is interesting to note that this campaign took place before the time of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah and the cities of the plain. Therefore, if the Rephaites were part of the posterity of Noah, they would have been spawned by the early descendants of Noah, being as they were already recorded as full-fledged nations by that point in time. Hence, these specific Rephaite nations ought to have been listed in the Table of Nations, just as all the other nations descending from Noah were recorded for good or for bad, but they were not. We must therefore conclude that the Rephaites did not descend from Noah but from some other source, because the nations that were descended from the countenance of Noah are all listed in the Table of Nations. This does not preclude that the daughters of Noah’s posterity might have been required to procreate with giants, even though female Nephilim may also have survived the flood.

The second intriguing anecdote put forth by Josephus and Scripture testified to the fact that Nephilim dwelled among the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah at the time of Abraham, when God destroyed Sodom, Gomorrah, and all the cities of the plain because of their great sins and vile behavior.[9] The connection between Sodom and the Nephilim is quite illuminating. Based on what you have learned in the text thus far about the terrible impact and influence giants had on antediluvians and their panache for corrupting naive and innocent people, do you think the Nephilim could have had a part in God’s ultimate retribution toward the people of Sodom and Gomorrah?

For those who may not be familiar with the Sodom and Gomorrah narrative, God both judged and destroyed those two cities, as well as their companion cities of the plain. They were utterly destroyed by fire and brimstone, in a similar fashion to a nuclear attack, executing all those who dwelled within and leaving the entire district desolate to this day.[10] The crimes of Sodom were all well documented debaucheries of the antediluvian Nephilim. Sodom, Gomorrah, and the cities of the plain were all located in the desolate region known today as the Dead Sea.

The Qur’an describes the people of Sodom and Gomorrah as completely vile. They practiced idolatry, homosexuality, and violence to strangers. They were destroyed by angels of God who turned the city upside down, raining showers of burning stones upon them.[11]

Ezekiel testified to Sodom’s gluttony, arrogance, and unconcern for the welfare of the poor, noting they were haughty in their detestable practices before God.[12] Jude 1:6–7 records Sodom’s sins in this way: “giving themselves up to sexual immorality and perversion.” The outcry from Sodom became so great that God sent three of his angels to judge Sodom (Gen. 18:20–21). The account of Sodom and Gomorrah is one of the great Old Testament narratives that establishes both a moral lesson and a standard for all subsequent generations.[13] The two cities “serve as an example of those that suffer the punishment of eternal fire,” says Jude 1:7.

Even though God had previously bound a Covenant with Noah, punctuated with the rainbow as a sign of that everlasting Covenant to never destroy the earth again by water (Gen. 9:12–17), God could and still can judge the earth as retribution for humankind’s corruption and violence through other destructive forces, just as we will see in the last days of this age. God has always reserved this right should humankind ever backslide again into similar violence and corruption as that which horrified the late antediluvian age. Sodom and Gomorrah, and the companion cities of the plain, did backslide into a similar debauchery as in the antediluvian age. They defiled themselves and God’s creation through sexual perversion, idolatry, and collaboration with Nephilim, to the point where God was obligated to judge them with ferocity equal to how He had judged humankind prior to the deluge.

All this requires that we ask: was it the Nephilim who so corrupted the people of Sodom and Gomorrah that God decided to totally destroy those people from the face of the earth? There is no conclusive biblical evidence to support such a claim, but the coincidence of the Nephilim's presence in Sodom and the adjacent areas is inappropriate to ignore, just as the presence of the Nephilim in the Amorite and Amalekite nations was no coincidence. Furthermore, when we consider that Jude 1:6 connects sexual perversion of Sodom with sexual perversion of angels and we know that Nephilim were in the Sodom region at that time, the connection becomes firmly cemented with circumstantial evidence.

From the Gnostic perspective, Sodom and Gomorrah were destroyed by the God of the Bible not for their wickedness but because of their wisdom and insights.[14] This again testifies to Nephilim contamination, for the Gnostics believe the God of the Bible is the evil God who enslaves humankind in ignorance. Gnostics believe the postdiluvian Nephilim kings, on the other hand, were enlightened purveyors of forbidden wisdom and insight, and therefore, God destroyed many of the great postdiluvian sources of enlightened insight at Sodom and Gomorrah, as well as many of the surviving antediluvians, the giants.

It is difficult not to conclude that the Nephilim were the root cause for the sins of Sodom. In fact, one ought to deduce that Nephilim were, indeed, the root cause for their degeneration. Perhaps Sodom and Gomorrah were the founding city-states of postdiluvian Nephilim. Perhaps Sodom and Gomorrah were the centers for postdiluvian apostasy, where impassioned fallen angels once more procreated with human females out of spite. Perhaps all this was the extended reasoning for such an awesome display of destruction poured out on those corrupt cities, as a sign to future generations demonstrating God's indignation towards the birthplace of postdiluvian giants.

Gnostic gospels profess that three races survived the deluge: the Posterity of Seth, the posterity of Noah, and the apostates from the posterity of Noah. Seth, according to this myth, as you may recall, was the parent of the mysterious Immoveable Race, the posterity of Seth.[15] This was an imperishable race created in the image of the god Adamas (fallen angel) by another great angel, Autogenes, and is a holy race that purportedly will be lifted up above angels.[16] Adamas brought forth a child in his image and likeness, calling him Seth, who then produced with his offspring the imperishable race.[17]

From the Gnostic holy book of the Invisible Spirit we learn that Seth replanted his antediluvian seed with a female virgin who bore fruit with Sodom and Gomorrah.[18] Further into this gospel, we learn Seth sowed his seed in the "Earthborn Aeons" (beings likely giants), where their numbers were the infinite number of Sodom. The Aeons were called Seth's pasture or distribution of Gomorrah, and Seth took the plant from the spring of Gomorrah and planted it in the second location of Sodom.[19] Sodom and Gomorrah just may have been the location where the second spiteful spectacle took place, whereby vitriolic angels copulated once more with humans, this time the daughters of Noah, creating yet another new race of mortal giants in the cities where the surviving antediluvian remnant of giants had coalesced.

If there was any doubt as to this allegory of giants, the Gnostic gospel goes on to state that these Aeons were indeed the great Incorruptible Race that appeared from the three previous ages (antediluvian).[20] God then destroyed a large portion of the surviving original antediluvian giants at Sodom and Gomorrah, along with the newly created giants. The third surviving race from Gnostic mythology, the so-called apostates of Noah's seed, were the ones who intermarried with the surviving giants after the deluge.

Jewish legends further enlighten the Sodom/Nephilim relationship, beginning with Og, Abraham's slave. Nimrod gifted Og to Abraham, but Abraham freed Og after marrying Sarah; Og was known as Eliazer, Abraham's steward. After being freed, Og became a king, founding sixty cities among the Amorites, including Sodom, Gomorrah, and the cities of the plain, all with very high walls.[21] The five cities of the plain, which were part of the Sodom and Gomorrah alliance, were defeated by the four-king alliance of Chedorlaomer that carried Lot off as hostage from Sodom.[22]

Og learned of the hostage-taking and warned Abraham, hoping that Abraham would be lost in battle so that Og could steal Sarah for himself, because he coveted Sarah's great beauty,[23] just as a pharaoh in Egypt would later do. Sarah was of such extraordinary beauty that she was eagerly sought after by King Ablimelech of Palestine, as well as Og and Pharaoh, all who were kings.[24] Og, in other legends, tried to seduce Sarah on many occasions.[25] Og, in these legends, was actually the unnamed informant to Abraham that was recorded in the Bible.[26] What is important to note, though, is that Sodom, Gomorrah, and the cities of the plain were all founded and governed by Nephilim. All of these cities were Rephaite cities contaminated with the Incorruptible Race, the second-born race of antediluvian giants, Og and his kin, and the Nephilim-infested Amorites.

The cause of the War of Four Kings Against Five (Genesis 14), as it became known, was rooted in the successful rebellion of one of Nimrod's generals, Chedorlaomer/Kedorlaomer, who became the king of Elam.[27] The Bible recorded the four Mesopotamian kings as Amraphel, king of Shinar or Babylonia; Arioch, king of Ellaser; Kedorlaomer, king of Elam; and Tidal, king of Goiim, who fought against Bera, king of Sodom; Birsha, king of Gomorrah; Shinab, king of Admah; Shemeber, king of Zeboiim; and the king of Bela, also known as Zoar.[28] Other sources noted Chedor-la(g)omer of Elam was known alternatively as king Kutir-Lagamar of Susa, who was the loyal vassal and tax collector of Amar-Sin, the biblical Amraphel, and the third monarch of the Ur III dynasty, which was part of an alliance with two other great rulers of Mesopotamia: Zariku of Ashur, the biblical (Z)Arioch of Ellaser, and Tishadal of Urkish, the biblical Ti(sha)dal.[29] Elamites occupied the cities of Susa and Awan from before 2700 B.C.E.; they intermixed with off-shoot, wandering Aryans from the Indus valley and Amorites.[30]

Chedorlaomer had subjugated the five Hametic/Canaanite (Nephilim and Amorite) cities of the plain for twelve years, requiring tribute all the time.[31] The five cities then rebelled and refused to pay tribute in the thirteenth year, causing Chedorlaomer to form an alliance with three other kings to crush Sodom, Gomorrah, and the cities of the plain.[32] The five unruly Amorite cities, along with the Amalekite tribes, had threatened the stability of the Ur III empire for quite some time, so this refusal to pay tribute became the final insult.[33] The Ur III dynasty was the last Sumerian renaissance in Mesopotamia and was the birthplace of Abraham; it was continually threatened by roving Amorites along the western bank,[34] so they had ample motivation to join the alliance.

Preparations within the four-king alliance of Mesopotamia included gathering the largest military force the early postdiluvian epoch had yet witnessed.[35] They marched on the five Amorite cities, annihilating the descendants of the giants and taking Lot hostage as part of the plunder of war.[36] Bera of Sodom and Birsha of Gomorrah were slain in this great battle, while Admah, Zeboiim, and Bela fled into the hills and reached Abraham at Mamre.[37] Abraham then surprised the four kings of Assyria with a lightening, commando-like raid, freeing Lot.[38] From every perspective, Sodom, Gomorrah, and the cities of the plain were infested with the descendants of giants and were all Amorites, Canaanites, and possibly Amalekites, which Josephus also called giants.

Previously we discussed the inclusion of the Amorite and Amalekite nations as Rephaite nations. The case against those nations charged to be Rephaite nations was not fully presented. Genesis 14, where the Assyrian kings waged war against all the Rephaite nations of that time, clearly indicts the Amorites and then the Amalekite nations, for they, too, were listed among the Rephaites conquered in that campaign. Let us now complete that indictment against the Amorites.

Amorites are listed in the Table of Nations as the descendants of Canaan. It would appear that Amorites did interbreed with Rephaites, who subsequently produced such infamous Amorite/Rephaite kings as Bera, Birsha, Shinab, and Shemeber.[39] This would most certainly account for God’s disdain towards the Amorites, along with their interbreeding with Nephilim at Sodom, Gomorrah, and the cities of the plain. It also accounts for the correct listing of the Amorites as a nation in the same timeline of Abraham, during the Assyrian campaign recorded in Genesis 14. The timeline works because Sidon, founder of the Amorites, was the third generation from Ham, suggesting the Amorites were not pure Nephilim but humans who descended from the seed of Noah that interbred with the Nephilim, the apostate seed of Noah recorded in Gnostic Scripture. So interbred were the Amorites that they were considered an apostate race, just as all the biblical references indicate, and, as Louis Ginzberg records, giants.[40]

In Deuteronomy and Numbers, when the Israelites were scouting the land of the Amorites, the Amorites were described as much taller and stronger than the Israelites, in addition to identifying Anakites among the Amorites (Deut. 1:27, Num. 13:27–35). When one considers that the Amorites were included with the Rephaite nations during the time of Abraham and that they produced Rephaite kings 500 to 600 years later, this is all that is needed to label the Amorites a Rephaite nation, or more accurately, a Rephaiteinfested and dominated, apostate nation descended from Noah. Certainly, this conclusion becomes even more evident when one considers the other possible translation to the appellation Amorite, submitted by Unger's as "the tall ones."[41] Amorites were ostensibly diluted giant-hybrids.

The vile influence of the Rephaites would seem to run true to form once more as it applied to the Amorites. From Genesis, in regard to Abraham, we read: "In the fourth generation your descendants will come back here, for the sin of the Amorites has not yet reached its full measure" (Gen. 15:16). This prophecy came to pass beginning with the battles against Og and Sihon. It would seem that the Amorites became even more vile, corrupt, and violent with time, much like the people before the flood. They did not heed the warning from Sodom and Gomorrah, which then brought upon them the sword of God in the time of the Exodus.

The utter destruction of the great Amorite nation has been reserved for another chapter. Yet as severe as the retribution on the Amorite nation was, the Amalekite nation was destined to receive a double dose of divine judgment.

THE AMALEKITES

> Moses built an altar and called it the Lord is my Banner. He said, “For hands were lifted up to the throne of the Lord, the Lord will be at war against the Amalekites from generation to generation.”
> —Exodus 17:15

Why does Genesis 14 describe a war of giants, which included the Amalekites at the time of Abraham? If the Amalekites were truly the descendants of Amalek listed in the Table of Nations, we have a mystery! Here is why: Amalek descended from Eliphaz, who descended from Esau. Esau was the son of Isaac, who was the son of Abraham. Therefore, how could the nation of Amalek be formed at the time of Abraham, seeing as the father of this nation was three generations removed from seeing born? And yet, the Genesis 14 account clearly records the Amalekites as a nation during the early life of Abraham! The only clue provided with in this account is that the Amalekites, like the Amorites, were listed and considered a Rephaite nation.

As we have already discussed from Deuteronomy, Anakites that dwelled in the land of Seir were known as Horites. If we consider the idea that the Genesis accounts were put to print at a later point in time, it was possible that the Amalekite name was inserted for “Horites,” as both considered Seir their home. The descendants of Esau, who replaced the Horites along with the Amalekites, drove off the Horites. Inserting a familiar nominative like “the Amalekites” for a more unfamiliar name such as “Horites” is quite possible, but I do not believe this to be what actually transpired. However, linking Amalekites with Horites is an intriguing insight. Perhaps they actually were one and the same people.

In this light, let us take a closer look at 1 Samuel 27:8: “Now David and his men went up and raided the Geshurites, the Girzites and the Amalekites (from ancient times these peoples had lived in the land extending to Shur and Egypt).” This is a useful anecdote dropped some 400 years later in the Bible, after the conquest of the Promised Land. The book of 1 Samuel indicates the Amalekites did not descend from Esau, even though they seem to have adopted the name of Amalek once the Amalekites cohabitated with the sons of Esau in the land of Seir. This was the land that included Shur to Egypt, also remembered as the land of Edom or Esau. Remember, Amalek, son of Esau, merged along with his people with an unknown race that formed the Great Amalekite Race. This occurred in the same place known to be the home of an ancient race of giants, the Horites.

The book of 1 Samuel notes the people identified as Amalekites lived in Shur, or Seir, since the ancient times; translation: before the flood. Ancient times do not refer to the time of Abraham. The terms “ancient times, old, old, former times, long ago” and “before our time” were always understood as the pre-flood epoch. This understanding is underscored in its application in Sirach, Baruch, Wisdom, Deuteronomy, Psalms, Proverbs, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezra, Daniel, 1 Peter, and 2 Peter, where “ancient” always referred to the time of Noah before the flood.[1] This, then, suggests the Amalekites were in existence as a race of giants in the epoch of the antediluvian Nephilim. In other words, they were Nephilim both before and after the flood.

Were Amalekites the race of giants that descended from Utnapishtim or Gilgamesh? Or were the Amalekites the first strain of giants, the Incorruptible Race hidden from the deluge catastrophe by fallen angels? Amalekites do not appear to be a race created by impassioned fallen angels after the flood, such as Enikiden or those of Sodom. If “ancient times” does not refer to antediluvian times, then it most certainly refers to an age before Abraham, and most likely to the age immediately following the deluge.

Whichever the case may be, both predate the standard chronology of the Table of Nations. But in order to make all this stick, we must broaden the support claiming that the Amalekites were without any doubt a pure strain of the surviving Nephilim race. Numbers recorded more evidence for this.

"We even saw the descendants of Anak there. The Amalekites live in Negev" (Num. 13:23). This passage calls Amalekites Anakites. I do not know how to interpret this verse any differently, as it describes the descendants of Anak in the same breath and narrative as the Amalekites, thereby connecting the two, just as the flood narrative describes the flood and the Nephilim in the same narrative, connecting them also by application and implication. The passage from the book of Numbers does not implicitly state the descendants of Anak lived among the Amalekites; rather it seems to imply that the Amalekites were actually descendants of Anak! Numbers 13:22 states, "They went up through the Negev and came to Hebron, where Ahiman, Sheshai and Talmai, the descendants of Anak lived." Here, and in Judges and Joshua, three Amalekite/Anakite kings were clearly named.[2]

Nelson's describes Ahiman as one of three descendants of the Anakim, or Anakites, who were a famous race of giants that lived in Hebron/Kiriath Arba.[3] This was the famous home of giants in Josephus's writings, giants who were so large and their countenances so different than that of men that these giants were surprising, frightening, and terrifying to both the sight and hearing.[4] All were defeated later by Caleb in Hebron, over forty years later.[5] All three kings were the direct sons of Anak. Anak was the son of Arba, while Arba was the founding Rephaite of the Anakite branch.

All three giant names were further employed as descriptions reflecting their size and demeanor. Ahiman was the strongest of the three giants. His name translated as "like standing beside a mountain," while Sheshai meant "strong as marble." Talmai translated as "mighty strides that left plots"[6] and was Hurrian for "big."[7] Other Jewish legends also recorded the Anakim as enormous, terrifying, humanoid giants.[8] Legend even records the daughters of Anak as giants of enormous size and strength. In fact, Hebron, where the three Anakite kings reigned, was renowned in antiquity for being the home base camp for the descendants of Anak.[9] Testifying further to the race of giants from Hebron are carvings on Egyptian monuments, depicting a very tall race of light-skinned giants considered the descendants of Talmai, the Teanmahu.[10]

Anakites, too, according to Hebrew legends, were demigods living to great ages,[11] like those of the antediluvian variety. Is it possible that the Amalekites were indeed the true and pure branch of the Anakite line? Or were the Anakites just simply another Rephaite branch that dwelled among the Amalekites, who were possibly giants descending from the Horites? Scriptural records are not clear on this point. They only demonstrate subtly, over and over, that the Amalekites were some form of Nephilim, and in particular, direct descendants of Anak.

Finally, Numbers 24:20 describes the Amalekites as the first among nations, suggesting once more that they did survive the flood, just as the Nephilim did, to form possibly the first postdiluvian nation of war. If so, this would indeed qualify the Amalekites as a true Rephaite/aboriginal nation. All inferences from scriptural history documenting the Amalekites tend to verify vividly that they were an ancient nation, separate from the genealogy of Noah, dating their existence back to the antediluvian age. This is too much of a coincidence to suggest both Amalek and Nephilim survived the deluge together but were not one and the same, particularly when one considers the three Amalekite kings from Numbers 13 were clearly stated to be descendants from Anak, while respecting Anakites were documented descendants of Nephilim.

Turning back to the Horites for a moment is a worthy diversion. Unger's describes the Horites as another ancient and enigmatic people defeated by the famous Assyrian king Kedorlaomer/Chedorlaomer in the Genesis war fought against giants.[12] Horites were the shadowy chieftains recorded in the Table of Nations, who included a person named Anah that governed the Horites.[13] Generally speaking, the alliance of five kingdoms was fashioned from the Amorites of the plain of Jordan, which included Sodom, Gomorrah, and possibly the Amalekites of Seir.[14] This curiously and unexplainably links the biblically unaccounted-for Horites to the Amalekites, just as we have already proposed.

In fact, this campaign could have been called "the War Against Giants" as opposed to the War of Four Kings Against Five, because the expanded war included a campaign against an alliance of Nephilim-dominated kingdoms including the Rephaites of Ashteroth Karnaim, the Zuzites of Ham, the Emites of Shaveh Kitiathaim, the Horites of Seir, the Amalekites, and the Amorites of Hazazon.[15] This expanded campaign that included all the giant nations, then also likely included the Zamzummites of Ammon, the Avvites of Gaza, and the Anakites of Hebron/Kiriath Arba. All were Rephaite nations that for some reason included the mysterious Horites from Seir.

The Horites were inhabitants of the region called “Seir” before the Edomites settled there,[16] and they were known as the sons of Seir that are listed without explanation in the Table of Nations.[17] What is extraordinary regarding Seir is that he did not descend from anyone in the Table of Nations, thereby suggesting a distinct and different chronology, perhaps Nephilim. Seir’s name descends out of nowhere to be interjected into the Table of Nations, likely to make sense of the Edomite chronology that inbred with the reprobate race of postdiluvian giants. Genesis 36:20–30 records the Horites as the giant race Esau’s descendants drove out, the same sons of Seir listed in the Table of Nations (1 Chron. 1:38–42). Esau departed Hebron, home of the most famous and awesome giants, to settle in Seir after his father’s (Isaac’s) death, where he and his people lived and reigned over Seir/Idumea; Idumea is the Greek variant for Edom.[18]

What all this declares is that the Bible clearly indicates the descendants of Esau did, in fact, merge with the Horites, the unknown, indigenous giant race of Seir, with no genealogical ties to Noah, to form the Great Amalekite Race, its name derived from Amalek, son of Esau, or vice versa. This account brings to light the fact that the Edomites dwelled among the giants: the Horites; the Amalekites; and most curiously, the Anakites of Hebron, the giant capitol city of the Anak, even before the Edomites decided to settle in Seir. Did the Edomite relationship with giants at Hebron have any part in their decision to settle in Seir, among the Amalekites, Anakites, and Horites?

Nelson’s authenticates that Amalek received his name from the Amalekites,[19] suggesting that he and his descendants were from the seed of Noah, which defiled itself with Nephilim. Unger’s concurs, suggesting the tribe of Amalek merged with the original inhabitants of Seir,[20] the giant Horites, which formed the Greater Amalekite Nation. The Horites were the ancient aboriginal giants that became known as the Amalekites. They were the ancient civilization that became known to historical records as the Hurrians.[21] This, then, accounts for the name and the timeline. Hurrians entered Mesopotamia from the Zagros mountains from before 2000 B.C.E. Hurrians had previously welcomed a splinter group of Aryans, the Maryannu, into their tribes, who then bullied their way into the ruling class, later forming the upper and lower strata to the famous Mittanni of Mesopotamia. Hurrians later became the lower part, after the demise of the Mittanni empire.[22]

Esau and his royal Abrahamic descendants then married into the clans of the Horites, the enigmatic and cryptic chiefs listed in Genesis and 1 Chronicles, the sons of Seir. Seir, according to Unger's and Nelson's Dictionaries, actually translates as "rough skinned and hairy,"[23] just as Nephilim were famous for their rough and hairy skin, suggesting Seir and the Horites were indeed Nephilim by implication. In fact, according to Josephus, Hebrews came to call anyone with tough and hairy skin "Seir,"[24] again connecting Horites, rebellious Edomites, and Nephilim together.

Seir was the grandfather to Hori through his son Lotan; Hori is the likely root for the names Horite and Hurrian. Remember that Seir was considered a Horite, just as Timna was considered a Horite. Timna later married Eliphaz and was Lotan the Horite's sister.[25] Thus Eliphaz, the grandson of Esau, married the giantess Horite/Amalekite Timna. The Edomites of this branch then merged with the Nephilim Horites, which formed the Great Amalekite Race. In fact, later chiefs of the Horites, known as Amalekites, were listed as descending from Esau and Basemath,[26] the daughter of Ishmael.

As far as other leads from the Table of Nations go, Anah comes to mind as a possibility. "Anah" could be the source name for Anak or even Anakite. One of the original Horite Chieftains, Anah[27] had two children named Dishon and Ohilibamah, with Ohilibamah being a daughter.[28] Ohilibamah later married Esau and became one of Esau's three wives, producing three Amalekite/Horite chieftains, Jeush, Jalam, and Korah,[29] and yet another Edomite branch of giants. This then confirms the merging of the Edomites with the Nephilim Horites through Esau and the Horite/Nephilim female Ohilibamah, which likely formed another branch of giants included in the Great Amalekite Race, even though Amalek has been credited with all their apostasy.

Esau, according to Josephus, made it a habit of marrying Canaanite and other (Nephilim) wives, which his father Isaac did not did not approve of perhaps suggesting Esau took even more wives/concubines than Genesis recorded. Esau later married Basemath, daughter of Ishmael, as a peace offering to please Isaac.[30] Esau and his Canaanite wife, Adah bore a son named Eliphaz.[31] Again, as per Josephus, Eliphaz had five legitimate sons: Teman, Omar, Saphus (Zepho), Gotham (Gatam), and Kenaz.[32] Eliphaz, son of Esau and Adah, then consorted with a curious concubine, a Horite named Timna, who bore Amalek.[33] One might further conclude that a third, unexplored branch of Edomite giants was started through further offspring from Eliphaz and Timna.

Josephus did not consider Amalek to be a legitimate son of Eliphaz, for he was born through the Horite/Nephilim concubine Timna,[34] the sister of the great Horite chieftain Lotan.[35] Amalek, then, was the grandson of Esau.[36] Hittites, too, are conceded to have been northern Indo Europeans who sojourned down through Asia Minor and into the Middle East from before 2300 B.C.E.; they later made alliances with Kassite war chiefs and are part of the mysterious (and likely Nephilim) Aryans who migrated east to India.[37] This, then, accounts for Amalek being both an Edomite and a Nephilim crossbreed, from the Nephilim sister of the Horite chieftain and Aryan, Hittite blood from Adah, establishing the Amalekites as Nephilim from yet another perspective, even though Amalekites were likely an original, pure Anakite branch descended from Arba and beyond.

Perhaps one of the Nephilim branches such as the Incorruptible Race or the descendants of Utnapishtim and Gilgamesh were the roots for the Amalekites. In fact, Josephus recorded the dynastic descendants of Amalek and Timna adopted the name Amalek to mark and remember the peculiar original inhabitants (Nephilim) of Seir,[38] once more suggesting the Amalekites were an antediluvian race. This, then, implies that Amalek at one time possessed a different name that has been lost to history and Scripture and that Amalekites were indeed a pure, indigenous strain of surviving antediluvian giants. All this further suggests Amalek’s name possessed cryptic and unexplained antediluvian heritage.

CHAPTER 26

JETHRO AND CALEB

> Moses' father-in-law replied, "What you are doing is not good. You and these people who come to you will only wear yourselves out. The work is too heavy for you; you cannot handle it alone." …. Moses listened to his fatherin- law and did everything he said. He chose capable men from all Israel and made them leaders of the people, officials over thousands, hundreds, fifties and tens.
> —Exodus 18:17–21

Coupled to this genealogical voodoo is Jethro, Moses' father-in-law, and a mysterious Kenite named Caleb. What overlooked insights do these two relatively obscure figures shine upon the Nephilim/Israelite relationship?

Jethro was a priest and prince of Midia.[1] We are introduced to Jethro in Exodus as a priest that Moses spent his second forty years with.[2] Jethro is named also as Reuel (Exod. 2:18), and later he is called Hobab, the son of Reuel, the Midianite (Num. 10:29), even though he is called Jethro throughout Exodus (see Exod. 18:1–7). In Judges, and as supported by Unger's, a reference is made to Hobab, the brother-in-law to Moses, with a notation that this could be his father-in-law.[3] Unger's rationalizes this by noting that Reuel and Jethro were indeed different names, reflecting his titles as a priest and a prince of his tribe, while Hobab was likely Moses' brother-in-law.[4] Jewish legends suggest Jethro had seven names, all conveying his transformation from an idolatrous priest to a priest of God; all the listed names are part of his appellations, along with, Heber, Putiel, and Keni.[5]

Biblical legends recorded that a pharaoh immediately before the Exodus maintained three famous high priests during the latter part of the Israelite enslavement in Egypt: Job, Balaam, and Jethro.[6] Jethro was regarded as the High Priest of a Library of Stone Tablets in some versions.[7] All three priests played an intricate role in the Old Testament as it pertained to Israel, leading me to conclude that biblical legends recorded their names as priests of Egypt for a reason.

Job is oddly recorded in Scripture as a man from Uz in Seir.[8] From the text, it would appear Job was a very wealthy man and perhaps a ruler of some sort.[9] Certainly, from the wisdom recorded in the Book of Job and the intricate details regarding angels, Leviathan, Rahab, Behemoth, creation, and Satan, one might very well conclude that, indeed, Job was a famous priest during the time of the Exodus. Certainly, Job's overwhelming faith portrayed throughout the book of Job testifies to Job's uncanny faith in God. Job was noted as being blameless and upright, a man who was blameless and shunned evil; a man celebrated as the greatest man of the east (Job 1:1–3).

Interestingly enough, the name Job, Iyyob, not coincidentally, appears in the Armana correspondence dated to circa 1400 B.C.E.[10] The Armana dynasty plays an unexpected role in the latter portions of this book. In this correspondence, a prince of Pella was listed, noting that the land of Uz was located somewhere between Damascus and Edom but east of Palestine and Syria.[11] Both the location and the date eerily places this Job in the right time and the right place to have been the Job of biblical legends and a member of a sacred order of priests in Egypt, along with Balaam and Jethro.

All three priests represented possible rival nations that coveted the Abrahamic birth rights: Jethro and Balaam were Midianites, while Job was possibly a Horite/Edomite. Were all three endeavoring to inject themselves into destiny through influencing Moses? Both the Midianites and Edomites/Amalekites were posterity of Abraham through Esau and Keturah.[12] In addition, Job's three friends recorded in Scripture also have murky credentials. Eliphaz the Temanite conjures up Nephilim conspiracies, for Teman was the son Eliphaz who also married the Horite Timna, producing Amalek.[13] Bildad the Shuhite was a descendant from Shuah from Abraham and Keturah.[14] The third friend was Zophar the Naamathite, who dwelled in Namaah.[15]

Balaam was recorded in Scripture as being the son of Beor from Pethor in Aram Naharaim,[16] which was located in Northwest Mesopotamia.[17] One wonders: was Beor a descendant of the aboriginal Beor, the Horite chief that likely reigned immediately after the flood in Seir?[18] Pethor was a noted location of the Chaldean Magi.[19] Balaam seems to have lived among Midianites or perhaps even was a Midianite, for Balak, King of Moab, approached the elders of Midian to solicit Balaam's help.[20] Unger's states that Pethor was a city in Mesopotamia,[21] but I believe it was likely part of eastern Midia.

Balaam, at the time of the Exodus, was hired by King Balak to place a special and powerful kind of curse on Israel, but God forced Balaam to do the opposite, blessing Israel instead.[22] King Balak was terrified of the Israelites after witnessing how easily Israel destroyed the powerful Amorites,[23] even though Moab had nothing to fear, for they were part of the everlasting Abrahamic Covenant through Lot. Balaam was the priest that later issued an oracle regarding the destruction of the Amalekites and the Kenites.[24]

Balaam's endeavor to curse Israel for Moab was recorded disdainfully in Scripture as "Balaam's error," a rush to profit like Cain, as well as a want for a dishonest reward (Jude 1:11). Moses further charged Balaam with seducing the Israelites to turn away from God (Num. 31: 15–16). Revelation 2:14–15 additionally charges Balaam with teaching Balak to entice the Israelites into sin by eating food sacrificed to idols and committing sexual immorality. The Israelites later put Balaam to the sword for his black divination (Josh. 13:22). In the Popol Vuh, Balaam unaccountably translates as "sorcerer."[25]

Pharaoh did not welcome the pre-Exodus advice provided by Jethro about the growing Israelite problem, banning the priest Jethro-Reuel in disgrace to Midia,[26] which was ample motive for Jethro to have helped Moses prepare for his return to Egypt. All of this only leads us to speculate as to just who Jethro actually was, particularly when we consider that Judges 1:16 and 4:11 note that Moses' father-in-law (Jethro/Reuel) was a Kenite and not a Midianite [27] Add to this, Reuel was the son of Esau (Gen. 36:10–12). One wonders why Jethro possessed such a surreptitious designation as a Kenite.

A Kenite, according to Porter, was a descendant of Cain.[28] Similarly, biblical legends recant Kenites carrying the Mark of Cain as their tribal mark.[29] Except for this book's testimony, this would be impossible, for all humans except for Noah and his family were previously thought destroyed in the deluge. So unless the descendants of Cain, the Kenites were indeed the descendants of Rephaim and Sethian Nephilim, or were included in other salvations from the flood as previously covered, we, indeed, have a continuation to enigmatic, orthodox conclusions regarding the flood survival facts. Therefore, is all this controversial testimony suggesting that Jethro was a Nephilim/Amalekite/Horite of some form? Then did Moses actually marry a Nephilim or a Cainite Nephilim crossbreed named Zipporah?[30]

Kenites were an unexplained, wandering tribe first mentioned in the lands promised to Abraham in Genesis, along with the equally enigmatic and unaccountable Kenizzites.[31] Kenizzites were skilled in the arts of metalworking, like Cain and Tubal-Cain, and were related somehow to Kenites.[32]

What is also attention-grabbing is that Caleb, the son of Jephunneh the Kenizzite, first shows up biblically as one of the twelve spies sent by Moses to explore Canaan.[33] Caleb was rewarded for supporting Joshua's and Moses' plan to invade Canaan by being granted, along with Joshua, the right to enter the Promised Land after the forty years of wilderness living,[34] unlike all the other Israelites who had left Egypt. Caleb, then, though eighty-five years old, fought like he was forty-five, driving the Anakim from Hebron, and was thus rewarded as the head of the tribe of Judah, receiving the land of Kiriath Arba, Hebron, the homeland of the Anakim.[35] It is astounding to me that a Kenizzite, a person from a tribe with no genealogy linking back to Noah, and a tribe that mysteriously descended back to Cain and Nephilim, inherited Hebron, the home and capital city of the Anak!

Both the Kenizzite and Kenite tribes are generally believed descended from Kenaz the descendant of Esau,[36] but this cannot be. They, like Amalekites, existed before the birth of Esau and before the time of Abraham. Kenites are first listed inexplicably as a nation in God's Covenant with Abraham— nations to be given over to Israel.[37] This same conclusion of chronology is supported by Unger's, which, like this book, compares this paradox with that of the Amalekites.[38] I further extend this paradox to include Rephaites and the Incorruptible Race. This is the same mystery, in my opinion.

Unger's also declares Kenites were related to the Kenizzites, and like the Kenizzites, they were skilled in metallurgy.[39] Nelson's actually suggests Kenites may have actually traced their ancestry back to Tubal-Cain,[40] the master metallurgist. All this becomes even more evident and plausible when you consider the Kenites lived among the Amalekites as similar peoples in all aspects, up until the time of King Saul, when Saul ordered the Kenites to separate and move away from the doomed Amalekites.[41] Finally, as we will soon discover, Tubal-Cain was thought to be a Nephilim.

So, too, do Nelson's and Unger's state that the Amalekites and the Horites were closely associated and linked with the Kenites and, in a similar manner, to Amalek.[42] To this conclusion, Kenaz, son of Eliphaz, son of Esau, appears as one of the chiefs of Edom, the Horites, in the Table of Nations,[43] suggesting "Kenaz" was likely his adopted name from the Kenites. The Kenites and the Kenizzites must have been surviving Cainites descended from the people of day six, who later intermixed with the Horites and Amalekites.

Caleb also contains Horite names in his genealogy. To this end, and as with Caleb, Kenaz and Amalek were likely most popular names and epithets accepted by Horite chieftains.[44] Thus Kenaz could have been the founder of yet another giant tribe, a Horite/Nephilim, who later intermarried with the descendants of Esau, as did the antediluvian Amalekites. To this end, the Kenizzites and Kenites could very well have been descendants from both Tubal-Cain and Cain.

The information above sheds light on the strange final oracle of Balaam that included the destruction of the Amalekites and the unexplained Kenites: “Then he saw the Kenites and uttered his oracle: ‘Your dwelling place is secure, your nest is set in a rock; yet you Kenites will be destroyed when Asshur takes you captive’” (Num. 20:22). Asshur was the ancestor to the Assyrians.[45] The oracle of Balaam further links the relationship between the Amalekites and the Kenites to one of a symbiotic partnership. One begins to wonder, then, how many other strains of Nephilim and Cainites survived the deluge?

Jethro is documented in biblical legends as being a descendant of Keturah, one of the many unexplained wives of Abraham,[46] likely through her son Midian.[47] Eastern Midianites at some point in their history also linked themselves to and dwelled among the Kenites.[48] This, then, accounts for how the Bible listed Jethro as both a Midianite and a Kenite, complete with some mind-boggling, direct links back to Caleb. Otherwise, how does a Kenite, Caleb, become intricately involved with the Israelites, unaccountably ascending to chief of the tribe of Judah, except through Jethro? However, the Kenites did show kindness to the Israelites when they came up out of Egypt,[49] acting as guides in the wilderness.[50]

Can we now connect the postdiluvian Nephilim with the antediluvian Nephilim? I think we can. Anakites were considered descendants of Rapha or Rephaites.[51] We know additionally from Numbers that Anakites were descendants of Nephilim.[52] We also learned from Genesis 6 that Nephilim lived both before and after the deluge. Therefore, if Anakites descended from Rapha, and Anakites were descendants of Nephilim, the lineage graphs back like this: Anak to Rapha to Nephilim, and somehow Nephilim survived the flood, just as Genesis and the legends of Mesopotamia claim.

If we interject pantheistic legends of Utnapishtim and Og with all their kin surviving the flood, along with the Gnostic second race of angelic/human hybrids, the Incorruptible Race, all begins to make sense. Giants not only survived the deluge, but also we know that both the Amalekites and Kenites also survived the deluge. Even Gnostic gospels record Noah denying that he or his kin created the postdiluvian giants,[53] even though his apostate descendants evidently intermarried with postdiluvian Nephilim. All accounts from this period in antiquity then mesh harmoniously, relieving any hypothetical or biblical contradictions with it.

This further testifies through its implications that Amalekites were a branch of Nephilim who later interbred with the lineage of Noah through Esau, Eliphaz, Kenaz, and Amalek. This makes sense, because the original Amalekites were Anakites known variantly as Horites in Seir, bringing Genesis's chronology of nations into perfect harmony. Hence, Amorites are listed in the Table of Nations as descending from Ham through Sidon, while the originating source for the Amalekites did not. Aboriginal Rephaites, Anakites, Kenites, Kenizzites, and other Nephilim are not listed in the Table of Nations that is limited to only Noah's posterity. All these conclusions work if we view the Genesis flood account as a general accounting of events kept by saints descended from Noah for only the faithful, not a global, forensic accounting for cynical seculars and revisionist mystics. It further makes sense when we incorporate from the macro level that nothing occurs unless the God Most High ordains it.

We are now obligated to ask the troublesome questions: What unexplained influence did Nephilim have upon Nimrod and the Tower of Babel? And, what was Hermes's relationship with Nimrod and Babel?

CHAPTER 27

NIMROD

Cush was the father of Nimrod who grew to be a mighty warrior on the earth. He was a mighty hunter before the Lord.

—Genesis 10:8

What is so important about Nimrod? Quite simply, Nimrod was the most influential and infamous individual in the early postdiluvian epoch, and his historic ripples are felt to this day.

Nimrod was the son of Cush, son of Ham. In all likelihood, Nimrod was born within seventy years of the flood, since the Tower of Babel was built 101 years after the flood.[1] He was one of the few post-deluge pioneers told first-hand accounts about the epoch before the flood from his grandfather, Ham. This, then, poses the inevitable questions: Did the antediluvian world corrupted by the Nephilim horrify or intrigue Nimrod? What sort of impression did that information imprint on him? Did Nimrod have a relationship or contact with the postdiluvian Nephilim? Just what do we know regarding this obscure character judged noteworthy enough to have his name logged for eternity in the Bible? What did Nimrod do or accomplish that motivated Israel’s historians to devote such noteworthy recognition?

Genesis 10 provides us precious few details. According to this account, Nimrod was considered a mighty hunter before God. This appears to be quite the compliment, but extraordinary hunting skills would not have generated historical noteworthiness. However, Josephus recorded that Nimrod was a bold man who had great strength.[2] Nimrod must have been quite the physical specimen, gifted in tracking and skillful with the bow, but this was still not enough to earn Nimrod such privileged biblical recognition. Just as with the Amalekites, we are required to examine obscure scriptures and independent sources to knit together the details as to what made Nimrod so historically noteworthy.

Freemason legends teem with anecdotes regarding the mysterious Nimrod. The Cook Poem recorded Nimrod as a mighty man, strong like a giant.[3] George Smith, a scholar on ancient Babylon and Assyria for the British Museum, linked Nimrod to Izdubar. From the Chaldean account of Genesis, Mr. Smith identified Nimrod as a mighty leader who possessed greatness in the skills of hunting. Babylonians remembered Nimrod as an ancient hero.[4] All ancient sources concur concerning the enigmatic Nimrod, recognizing him as a legendary hero, due to his great size, strength, and hunting prowess.

“A mighty hunter before the Lord” may not be the most magnanimous of compliments as one might first surmise. In fact, this cryptic description just might render itself quite the contrary. Some suggest this appellation actually ascertains the absolute antonym to the definitive, idealistic notion of biblical kingship,[5] known by the shepherd allegory. The hunter gratifies only himself at the expense of the victim, while the shepherd ultimately expands himself for the good of his subjects under his care, just as Jesus was celebrated as the Shepherd of his flock during His time on earth.[6]

So, too, was Solomon remembered as a Shepherd King, while David was a warrior king; the dual aspect to the Messiah. It is this Shepherd King allegory that Gnostics and theosophists pervert into their Priest King and/ or Fisher King doctrine. Gnostic authors Wallace-Murphy, Hopkins, and Simmons write that Nimrod’s designation as a hunter was clearly applied to connect allegorically the founding of Nimrod’s military-based mentality and his military-based government, which was characterized by absolute force and tyranny.[7]

We learn from the Nelson's that Nimrod was a mighty one on earth, a powerful king and the first mighty hero mentioned in postdiluvian Genesis.[8] "Nimrod was a conqueror of both men and animals," according to Demond Wilson.[9] According to Hebrew legends, Nimrod possessed unconquerable strength, for he was the greatest of hunters and warriors.[10] Nimrod indeed was a hero in the tradition of the Nephilim. From other independent sources, we learn Nimrod was likely the most powerful warrior king since the time of the deluge and for quite some time after. All this information concurs accurately with the Freemason legends, which record Nimrod as a mighty leader (king).[11] It also agrees with Genesis, which accurately chronicles Nimrod as a mighty warrior and leader, establishing many cities in his empire.

The name Nimrod was not thought to be Hebrew in origin but rather Akkadian. Akkad was a variant of the word/city Accad, one of the cities Nimrod was credited with founding.[12] Akkad was the northern division of ancient Babylonia. Sometime after Nimrod, Sargon the Great of the Assyrians founded the latter imperial dynasty of Accad;[13] he was variantly known as the Cup-Bearer and an illustrious king and mythos many kings tried to claim as their progenitor. Sargon's mother was oddly recorded on an inscription as a changeling.[14] Nimrod, then, was the founder of the ancient Babylonians, Assyrians, and Chaldeans; therefore, the Akkadian language from which Nimrod's name was thought to be derived fits perfectly.

Accad and three other cities were the beginning of Nimrod's post-Babel empire.[15] The empire extended to the land of Accad, between the Tigris and Euphrates Rivers, where the two rivers run closely together. The latter dynasty of Accad was believed founded, but more than likely inherited, by Sargon the Great around the twenty-third to the twenty-fourth century b.c.e, when his men overran the Sumerian homeland.[16] Sargon was the first to conquer and then turn the alliance of Mesopotamian cities into an empire, winning thirty-four battles and pushing into Awan of Elam and Mari in the north. Sargon maintained representatives of all the old ruling families (Nephilim) at his court, honoring their "exalted" lineages.[17]

It was from the Sumerians that the Akkadians adopted all the antediluvian Sumerian writings, religious doctrines, gods, legends, and architecture as their own. Akkadian language was one of the earliest forms of Assyrian and Babylonian dialects; it was written in wedge-shaped characters or cuneiform and was originally developed by the antediluvian Sumerians.[18] An inscription noted Akkad fell to Gutian Barbarians circa 2150 B.C.E.[19]

The name Nimrod is theorized to originate from the Akkadian god of war and hunting, Ninurta; he was also called “the Arrow” and “the Mighty Hero.”[20] Ninurta, as it turns out, was a Nephilim son of Enlil and Ninlil.[21] The symmetry to the meaning and its origin would tend to lend credibility to its accuracy, particularly if Nimrod did view himself as a Nephilim, at least in ambition.

Meanwhile, the Hebrew translation for Nimrod provides the balance to the allegory of his name, for it translates as “rebel, to rebel against, brave, and to subdue.”[22] By fusing the definitions from the different cultures, languages, and religious perspectives, we arrive with a complete definition, personifying the allegory of Nimrod. He was a great warrior king/potentate who modeled himself after the Nephilim from antiquity. He was incredibly brave and proud; Nimrod’s hubris led him to subdue the people of Shinar through tyranny, while inciting the people of Shinar to rebel against the true God of the universe, just as his antediluvian role models did.

Let us now examine whether or not Nimrod lived up to these allegorical indictments.

We must remember that before the flood, the descendants of Adam and Seth were vegetarians; they were strictly an agrarian people. It was not until after the flood that God permitted Noah and his descendants to eat meat;[23] whereas hunters from day six regularly dined on wild game. We also know that even after the flood, Noah was a man of the soil, a vegetarian. One can assume Noah’s three sons were reared as vegetarians and likely remained so. Therefore, meat likely began to take hold as a staple in the time of Nimrod’s father, Cush, once animals had become plentiful enough to hunt once more. One can surmise that wild game, indeed, was the rage, with those supplying the new and exotic meat idolized as heroes.

Nimrod grew to be a mighty warrior on the earth.[24] Along with Nimrod’s great strength, the transition from hunter to warrior would be easy and logical. But this is the point where events become disturbing once more. This was just the second generation from the flood. God had wiped out the inhabitants of the earth less than seventy years prior, and now we are presented with a fellow renowned for his prowess as a warrior.

To be a mighty warrior, one must have conquests of war. Now consider that Nimrod has been spoken of this way: “Since the Creation of the world there has been none like Nimrod, a mighty hunter of men and beasts, and a sinner before God.”[25] Are we to believe that such violence permeated the postdiluvian epoch so soon after the second chance provided to humankind? Are we to believe that wars had become commonplace so early into the postdiluvian age? Are we to conclude that humankind did not learn anything from the greatest catastrophe ever to strike humankind? And yet, this is most certainly what Genesis 10 suggests, even though the postdiluvian Sethian civilization had not yet separated into individual civilizations. So who did Nimrod war with?

If we concede that Nimrod did become the first warrior king of the early postdiluvian world, subsequent misunderstood events that followed tend to come into focus. Jewish legends recorded that before Noah died, the descendants of Shem, Ham, and Japheth appointed princes to lead each of their three peoples: Phenech, prince of the Japhethites; Johkan, prince of the Shemites; and Nimrod, prince of the Hamites. Jealousy then erupted among the new governing princes. Soon, war broke out, too, with Nimrod’s army routing Phenech’s army; Nimrod then seized absolute power as king, with Johkan and Phenech subservient to Nimrod.[26] In fact, through the valor of Nimrod, the new kingdoms of the Euphrates valley were again united after the Babel dispersion, under one king, Nimrod. This fact leads to the conclusion that Nimrod held a disturbing, parallel influence before the dispersion, underlining the legitimacy to Jewish legends regarding Nimrod defeating Phenech.

Some scholars regard Nimrod as a very powerful king, benevolent in his actions; he later provided the ancient Babylonians with both unity and prosperity under his leadership, as reported by George Smith from ancient Assyrian and Babylonian discoveries.[27] But was Nimrod actually a benevolent king, both before and after the dispersion? Did Nimrod uphold high moral values under the laws of God? Or is this simply brazen revisionist history?

Genesis 10 includes the many great cities that were in Nimrod’s kingdom or that he had built or conquered. As innocuous as the statement might first appear, it is again loaded with difficulties. If Nimrod had many cities in his kingdom, he would have been the greatest ruler of that time since the flood, ruling over eight of the great cities of that time in both Babylon and Assyria, post-Babel. And, at Babel, Nimrod just might have been the absolute dictator of Sethian humankind at that time, and indeed, as it turned out, he was. Josephus further testified that Nimrod changed his government to tyranny, leading his people away from God and into rebellion; the people then became completely dependent upon Nimrod and his newly founded mystical religion.[28]

Demond Wilson believes Nimrod desired a one-world government, with a man as its god.[29] This was certainly worthy of biblical notation, to record by name the first universal king of the postdiluvian period, who was bent on heresy and the doctrines of the Antichrist. More accurately, Nimrod would have been ruler of the first great world empire after the flood, and it would appear that he ruled through war and tyranny. Does this scenario begin to ring familiar? We must now ask the questions: Was Nimrod an evil potentate/ Gibborim? Was Nimrod the first postdiluvian Nephilim king?

Some suggest so, thereby establishing Nimrod as the father of the postdiluvian Nephilim. There is some merit to this hypothesis. The terms Nephilim and Gibborim are virtually interchangeable in their connotations when translated from ancient Hebrew and in application, if one is not very careful when applying the Gibborim term. Gibborim was defined as ancient heroes, just as the Nephilim in Genesis 6 were described. Gibborim also accurately describes Nimrod in ancient Hebrew. Gibborim was also translated as “potentates,” as defined by its ancient Hebrew application employed in Ezekiel 32, or as “allpowerful rulers.” One can most certainly state that both Nephilim and the post-deluge Nimrod were just that. The key, however, is that Gibborim does not necessarily link to nor define itself as being derived from the posterity of angels, nor of giants. The differentiation, then, is simply this: Nephilim can be described as Gibborim quite accurately, but Gibborim were not necessarily Nephilim. Gibborim could simply be just very powerful, human potentates. This is one of the reasons that it is logical to reject the notion that Nimrod was a Nephilim. Nimrod was likely Gibborim but not Nephilim; although, an assortment of arcane legends and reticent organizations persist in linking Nimrod to the descendants of Cain and Nephilim bloodlines.

The second reason for rejecting Nimrod as Nephilim originates in Nimrod’s genealogy. I have already noted previously that Nimrod descends directly back to Noah through Cush and Ham. Again, as I have discussed in previous chapters, Nephilim and Nephilim nations did not descend from the countenance of Noah, and therefore, were purposefully not documented in the Table of Nations. Nimrod, of course, was listed in the genealogical record, lessening the possibility of his being a Nephilim.

Masonic legends, however, at first perusal, suggest that Nimrod was a giant. The Cook Poem clearly references Nimrod as a mighty man, strong like a giant. Ancient historians, Orientalists, recorded Nimrod as a giant, but Masonic critics labeled this description a gross exaggeration,[30] concluding that Nimrod was of great physical stature and presence but was not a Nephilim. Armenian traditions, too, maintain that Nimrod was a giant of a man and that he enlisted giants.[31] Even early Christian writers such as Augustine of Hippo (354–443 C.E.) and Isidore of Seville (560–636 C.E.) conceded Nimrod may have been Nephilim.[32] No doubt these and other notable authorities from antiquity fueled the transformation of Nimrod's extraordinary human qualities into being Nephilim. But since Nimrod was recorded in the Table of Nations as the son of Cush, I am confident in concluding Nimrod was not a Nephilim but rather modeled himself after the great giant warrior kings.

Nimrod was the most famous and influential individual of his time and for many generations to follow. It would be a long time after they were dispersed from the Tower of Babel before the various peoples would be numerous enough in the same tongue to once again organize themselves. Nimrod was the first and last emperor before God confused the languages of the people of Babel. But can we leave Nimrod with such a neat and superficial closing as this? The answer is an emphatic “no.” There is still much more to elusive Nimrod. Nimrod, from the precarious few details provided in Genesis 10, walked a very similar strut to that of the ancient giants. Nimrod deserves proper scrutiny and investigation in the light of this comparison.

CHAPTER 28

THE PEOPLE OF THE PLAIN

Now the whole world had one language and a common speech. As men moved eastward they found a plain in Shinar and settled there.

—Genesis 11:1–2

According to Josephus, Nimrod was a great leader of the people of Shinar after the flood.[1] Laurence Gardner states the word Shinar resonates with a strong sense of antediluvian déjà vu, for “Shinar” was an (little understood) alternative name for Sumer.[2]

One begins to wonder whether or not the desire of Nimrod and his people was to only migrate away from Noah, as a first bold step in recolonizing the planet. Was there was an unexplained, early schism among the deluge survivors, with Nimrod and his followers exiting to recreate the outlawed antediluvian society of Sumer? Whatever the inspiration, the people of Shinar were remembered as very courageous for first venturing out from the mountains and down to the plains, where Shinar/Sumer was located.

Remember, less than seventy years before, there had been a worldwide flood, the ark came to rest at the top of the mountains of Ararat (Gen. 8:4). From there, the survivors and their children watched as the flood waters slowly receded, revealing the lowlands over a long period of time. The safety of the mountaintops would have been imbedded into their consciousness, branding any thought of leaving the high ground a mark of lunacy, for fear of another great flood.

According to Porter, humanity appears in Genesis at this time as a small, homogenous group that travels cautiously from the mountains and to the east, to the Plain of Shinar.[3] Josephus explained that when the migration from the mountains took place, the people decided not to spread out and separate.[4] Did they believe their survival over nature was more secure through virtue of sheer numbers, or was it due to a fear of the unknown? Even more importantly, could the early pioneers of the plain have been afraid of another civilization that was terrible in war? Josephus noted that after the flood, God instructed the descendants of Noah to go forth and to recolonize the planet, but the people refused out of fear of oppression.[5] This is logical if the pioneers of the plain feared the Nephilim, wandering Aryans, and violent day six races. Clearly, whatever the rationale, the people of Shinar made a conscious decision that their early survival depended upon their remaining one people.

According to the Legend of Nimrod, Nimrod united the people of the plain and then kept them united through tyranny, just as we already noted. Nimrod was remembered as the autocratic maker of laws. Masons further record Nimrod as the unrestricted sovereign power, dictatorial with his legislation and implementation of his decrees. He was a tyrant king, who both abused and misused his powers.[6] Nimrod was not the benevolent ruler, Izubar, that George Smith would have us believe.

The book Rosslyn, a source not complimentary to the literalist Christian perspective, describes Nimrod as an evil character.[7] He was an evil dictator/potentate modeled after the antediluvian potentates, the Nephilim/Gibborim. Of this fact, there can be no doubt, for all the ancient sources concur as to the results of Nimrod's actions. Nimrod was recorded in Genesis not as a hero to be fondly revered, but as a brutal dictator to be sadly contemplated upon for all the generations that were to follow.

Josephus, then, attributed Nimrod with sponsoring the introduction of doctrines to the people of Shinar that honored values other than humility and the worship of the true God,[8] just as before the flood. Nimrod introduced idol worship, according to Ginzberg, and led his subjects into evil.[9] Nimrod began to teach the people of the plain to believe in themselves and in their own works and accomplishments. He ignited the second generation of survivors from the deluge to neither submit to nor honor God as the Lord of the universe.[10] This was the very same sin the antediluvian giants and the Cainites of day six were recorded as committing in both biblical and pantheistic traditions.

Nimrod was the first potentate after the flood to incite the people of the earth to rebel against God, just as his Hebrew name implies. Ginzberg notes that Nimrod taught gullible people to believe in their own strength and courage,[11] just as Nimrod had done because of his own great strength and courage. He taught his subjects to abandon their faith in God's strength and wisdom, just as the antediluvian Nephilim had done. Nimrod imposed the belief that they and their works, and not God, would procure their future and their happiness.[12] Again, this was yet another doctrine from the antediluvian Nephilim—that one does not need God, to be happy, that one's future happiness is in one's own free choice and independent from God.

Ultimately, this line of thinking relegated the true God to a lower plain of power and authority, where God would be considered just one of many gods, some more powerful than others, some more kind than others, and some more wise than others. This is another cornerstone doctrine to all religions of the pantheon. The Greek and Egyptian pantheons, as well as others, all contained numerous gods, both male and female, who were of varying stature, authority, and values. This was the same doctrine from Enochian mysticism and continues to be a central doctrine in the contemporary version of The Genesis 6 Conspiracy.

With all this in mind, we can see Nimrod was somehow deluded by the fallen angels, Jinn, demons, Nephilim, and/or Hermes into this belief system. Dark angels, demons, and Jinn made up Nimrod's pantheon of gods, fostering the belief that the true God was just one of many and no more important than any other god. In fact, in the aftermath of the flood, God likely was portrayed as one of the evil gods who did not have the better interest of humankind close to their hearts. It is possible that those fallen angels or the Nephilim seduced Nimrod into believing that they would protect him from God, should God determine to take action against him and or his people.

This notion becomes all the more plausible when one considers the Mesopotamian explanation for the flood. The Mesopotamians believed humankind had become too plentiful and, therefore, too noisy for their masters, the gods.[13] Therefore, the deluge was deemed the solution by the gods for the noise problem caused by the too-numerous humans. One could easily understand just how inviting it would have been to have cast the true God of the universe and His loyal angels as those violent, evil, and intolerant gods who conspired, as described by Enoch,[14] to commit genocide against the human race via the deluge. This is the teaching and doctrine of the Gnostics, who call the God of the Jews and Christians Ialdaboth, the impious god who enslaves humankind in ignorance and mortality and caused the flood to spite humans. The evil God of Christians and Jews doctrine is the same doctrine set forth in the Sumerian legends, where Enlil, the Jewish God, Adonai, conspired to bring about the deluge disaster against the wishes of the alleged good god of wisdom, Enki/Satan.

If indeed this was the case, then what Nimrod did next makes perfect logical sense. The result tabulated from this deluded manner of thinking manifested itself in its full spurious glory at Babel.[15]

CHAPTER 29

THE TOWER AT BABEL

> They said to each other, “Come, let us make bricks and bake them thoroughly.” They used brick instead of stone, and tar for mortar. Then they said, “Come, let us build ourselves a city, with a tower that reaches to the heavens, so that we may make a name for ourselves and not be scattered over the face of the earth.”
> —Genesis 11:2–4

Genesis 11 seems to leave more unanswered questions than it resolves about the origin of the disparate languages of the world. For example: why build a tower that could reach into heaven? Surely they must have known that was impossible.

The tower could only have made a symbolic statement towards heaven. If so, who was the statement intended for, and what was the statement? And did the tower at Babel have any relationship whatsoever to the Sumerian ziggurats that both predated and postdated Babel?

To resolve these questions, we must first look back to the new religion introduced to the people of the plain. If the people of Shinar did embrace the pantheistic religion of the Nephilim and fallen angels, then the statement must have been directed to one or more of the gods who did not reside on the earth but in heaven. Therefore, the tower must have either been built as a monument of respect or defiance, or both. The tower could have been built in honor of the newly adopted pantheon of gods, but it certainly was not erected in respect for the one true God. In fact, God looked most unfavorably upon this mystical masterpiece of Masonry, stopping its construction before the people of Shinar were able to complete it. God then confused the people by imposing new and different languages upon them. He subsequently scattered the people to the four corners of the globe.[1]

So why did God object to such a project? Surely a tower erected in honor of false gods would not totally defile all humankind. With the resurgence of the false religion, surely many idols and symbols of idolatry had already been created and were already in wide use.

The root of the issue was simply this: The tower was erected not only to honor the false gods but also to memorialize their act of defiance and rebellion towards the true God of the universe, who had sent the flood. Nelson's Bible Dictionary states the tower was erected as a symbol for human pride and rebellion.[2] It was an act of self-glorification and a statement of independence, marking the rebirth of the antediluvian epoch of corruption, debauchery, and rebellion.

Nimrod desired to be worshipped as a god in his own right. He wished to create a world government with himself as the absolute dictator, in direct opposition to God. The Tower at Babel was Nimrod's monument for his rebellion and an insult directed at God. Porter noted Babel was the embodiment of all evil, a wicked kingdom set adroitly against God and his chosen people, a symbol of pride, oppression, wealth, luxury, sexual license, and idolatry.[3] All this took place at a time when a dictator, Nimrod, had usurped absolute control by force, establishing the first empire of the new epoch, with Babel as its first united project. Nimrod ignited a conspiracy modeled after The Genesis 6 Conspiracy, which had constructed the Egyptian pyramids and the Sumerian ziggurats as memorials and a legacy to their spurious, antediluvian accomplishments.

The construction project strained the resources and limited labor force to the point of collapse. Babel was an enormous burden to both the people and the material resources. Nimrod was obliged to be a tyrant of legendary proportions when he enslaved the people of Shinar and accomplished such a feat. Charles Sellier and Brian Russell assert that he was an evil tyrant[4] for these reasons.

The basis of the new Babylon religion was to unite under one umbrella religion in order to build a new world, a new Atlantis. Nothing was to be impossible for them, just as God confirmed in Genesis 11:6: “But the Lord came down to see the city and the tower that the men were building. The Lord said, ‘If as one people speaking the same language they have begun to do this, then nothing they plan to do will be impossible for them’” Through their unification of beliefs and combined efforts, they would fear no enemy, nor even the God of the universe. Providing they banded together and worked united in this new utopia, utilizing all the spurious sciences, then nothing was to be unattainable for them.

Once more, according to Nelson’s, the people sought security from within a community, and they sought a life and culture independent of God.[5] The religion was centered in peace for humankind and the benevolent evolution of the human spirit, under the dictatorship and guidance of Nimrod. This ancient utopia of Shinar holds a significant prophetic role as a parallel lesson from antiquity for the last days, if we are wise enough to heed the end time’s prophetic warning known as The Sign of Noah in the last days of this age.

So what is the point of Babel? God had just two generations previously washed the world of its corruption via the flood. And now the earth was vulnerable to the same terrible fate of backsliding into absolute violence, corruption, debauchery, apostasy, and rebellion, disguised in a disingenuous promise for utopia. This was why God looked so unfavorably on what was taking place at Shinar. The tower, combined with the pantheistic religion that had just recently taken hold at Babel and Nimrod’s dictatorship gripping all people under his tyranny and the rebellion presented the worst-case scenario for the future of humankind.

Satan was close to winning the experiment with his third revenge at this point in time; the world was standing dangerously once more at the edge, gazing over the precipice to oblivion. Humankind was determined to totally rebel against God, in favor of Satan, justifying the great angelic rebellion, condemning the future of humankind. God, therefore, intervened, providing humankind once more with a new opportunity to succeed, through confusing the languages and scattering the people around the earth. His action ensured that humankind would never again fall totally under one dictatorship, until the last days, when all things that must take place are to be completed at the new Babel.

The second major question deriving from the Tower of Babel that was left dangling is: make a name to whom? The city and the tower, according to Porter, were built to provide the people of Shinar both an identity and security.[6] Three ways to make a name for themselves come to mind. The first might be to honor their pantheon of gods. The second might be to show their rebellion against the one true God, which we have already covered. The third might have been to show their enemies how strong they were. I believe the Tower of Babel was erected to make all three statements. But, as to the third, who were their enemies?

The odd application of language surrounding the construction of the Tower of Babel is perplexing; the people of Shinar would make a name for themselves and not be scattered over the face of the earth.[7] Just what could cause a diaspora of Shinar? Historically, most Christian scholars believed only the descendants of Noah repopulated the earth and the people of Shinar could not have known that God would later disperse them for building the Tower. Some interpret the statement about not being scattered over the face of the earth as they were endeavoring to prevent the people of Shinar from being wiped out from the face of the earth. This is an interpretation that I sympathize with, particularly in light of Josephus's account, where he stated that the people were fearful from being oppressed,[8] and from Porter's anecdote that Babel City was built for their security.

Supplementing the theory of fear of enemies was the fact that those people of Shinar came down out of the mountains together, so as to not be divided.[9] There is a clear undercurrent in this narrative that the early descendants of Noah knew of and feared some other form of humanoid, some enemy that caused them to unite under Nimrod's tyranny, to both build a city and a tower for their protection. Nimrod was a warrior and a conqueror of cities and people. So there must have been at least one enemy out there to worry them that eventually led to Nimrod's fame. Could the enemy have been the dreaded Nephilim?

Josephus provides some bizarre anecdotes as to why Nimrod commanded that the tower be built. Josephus articulates two reasons: The first was in case of another deluge—the people could take refuge on the tower and wait until the flood waters receded, thereby saving humankind. The second reason was to construct a tower so high as to allow Nimrod to climb into the heavens to avenge both the people and himself through slaying the one who had caused the great flood of Noah's time, should God ever decide to judge the earth with another great flood.[10] According to Hebrew legends, Nimrod even staged events where he shot arrows into the heavens in an attempt to slay God.[11] Nimrod knew, of course, that God had already promised never to destroy the world again through flood and had sealed this Covenant with the rainbow. Therefore, Nimrod's blasphemous and inflammatory overreaches were all designed for show, to rally the people of Shinar behind him. It is my contention that this great ziggurat was a symbolic gesture of his intention to rebel against God in the spirit of The Genesis 6 Conspiracy.

Nimrod's drivel must have made great speeches to ignite the fervor of the people into open rebellion against God. To hear Nimrod claim that he could and would slay God, should God ever step out of line again, is indeed language of the legendary and the walking dead. It further enhanced the notion that God was just one of many other gods. Nimrod just may have been the most arrogant man ever to have lived or who ever will live, aside from the future, modern Nimrod that is yet to come, who will be a mighty warrior before God.

Josephus further notes Nimrod stating that it was his intent to get revenge on God for destroying their forefathers;[12] although, Josephus does not record how Nimrod said he was going to accomplish that feat. The forefathers Josephus spoke of were not the descendants of Seth, but rather the posterity of Cain and the Nephilim, Nimrod's role models. Once more, Nimrod was likely utilizing the tower as a symbolic gesture—he would climb it and hold God accountable, and it would also be a monument to the antediluvian Nephilim and their epoch. Nimrod must have seemed larger than life to the people of Shinar, for him to stand before them and God. He must have appeared to be like a messiah.

Nimrod lined up adroitly against God, threatening to slay God for destroying Nimrod's adopted ancestors. The pieces to the Nimrod puzzle now all begin to come together. Nimrod usurped power over the people of Shinar and then reintroduced the religion of the pre-flood Nephilim as a means of control and persuasion over the people, to inspire them to rebel against God and follow Nimrod. Nimrod was easily capable of painting

God as one of the more powerful gods but also one of the more iniquitous and violent gods. God was framed as a most powerful God, but no more powerful than the pantheon of gods worshipped by Nimrod and his followers.

Returning to the notion that Nimrod was seeking revenge for the destruction of his forefathers, we must postulate it is likely Nimrod was disturbed by God's treatment of the antediluvians. It is likely Nimrod must have been sympathetic to the Nephilim and their followers, when one considers the kind of government Nimrod imposed (like that of Gibborim and Nephilim), alongside the mystical, pagan religion of Hermes, which Nimrod further imposed on the people of Shinar. I, therefore, conclude that Nimrod was lamenting over his fallen, idolized demigods and the descendants of Cain, not his own ancestry dating back to Seth.

The new doctrines included the promises of renewed enlightenment, the ancient knowledge and beliefs of Atlantis and the entire antediluvian world, the occult, idolatry, secret rituals, and secret societies. But try as the followers of Nimrod must have done, not all the people of Shinar would convert and worship the pantheon of gods. Not all of the people were gullible enough to willingly come out in open rebellion against God. Some, and more likely many, held true to God and His righteous ways, rejecting the new Nephilim doctrine being introduced by Nimrod. In order for the postdiluvian rebellion to have fully taken hold and to ultimately succeed, more was required than the art of deceptive persuasion.

This was when Nimrod usurped absolute control over all the governing bodies in the first coup d'état of the postdiluvian age. Nimrod became a Gibborim, a potentate like that of the antediluvian Nephilim. According to Josephus, Nimrod changed the nature of the government to tyranny[13] under his brutal and evil dictatorship, just as an evil potentate would do, and even more importantly, just as an evil Nephilim potentate would do. Through the brutal and corrupt power of his government, Nimrod imposed his will and state-sponsored religion upon the people of Shinar. Through brute force and fear, Nimrod was successful in implementing his rebellious and heretical religion on most of the people at that time. Those who did not abide by the new ways were callously removed, likely by death, from the so-called enlightened, foreshadowing the great end-time genocide that will be waged first by the religion of Babylon (Rev. 7:1–17; Rev. 18:24; and Rev. 19:2) and then by the Antichrist (Rev. 13:5–18).

Nimrod might just as well have been a Nephilim. Remember, the people of Nimrod even drank blood, just as the Nephilim did, in spite towards God. Surely this was no coincidence. Either Nimrod purposely modeled his society after the antediluvian Nephilim empires past, or he modeled his new utopia after Nephilim societies of the postdiluvian world. But whichever the case, it is clear that Nimrod idolized the giants and purposefully conspired to recreate with the early descendants of Noah the same kind of godless world (in the sense of the one true God) that existed before the flood.

Evidence points to Nephilim coexisting with Nimrod, whom Nimrod likely warred with regularly, winning his heroic stature and establishing his dictatorial credentials. One ought to conclude that the people of Shinar united under the warrior skills of Nimrod out of fear of being wiped from the face of the earth and remembered no more, all at the hands of the terrible Nephilim.

In addition, one should also conclude the Tower of Babel was constructed in part as both a warning and sign to the Nephilim of the people of Shinar’s capabilities and as a witness to their newfound allegiance to the pantheon. One might further speculate that it was from the postdiluvian Nephilim that Hermes and Nimrod received or stole their illicit knowledge pertaining to the antediluvian epoch, complete with all its sciences and religions. Add to this the transatlantic legends of Central and South America concerning giants and Babel, and the line of thought putting Nimrod in coexistence with giants is significantly reassured.

An Aztec legend records a famous ziggurat known as Teotihuacan being built by giants endeavoring to transform men into gods.[14] Another Aztec legend asserts that a famous ziggurat was constructed by “gigantic men” that resulted in the dispersal of humankind:

> Immediately after the light and the sun arose in the east there appeared gigantic men of deformed stature who possessed the land. Enamored of the light and beauty of the sun they determined to build a tower so high that its summit should reach the sky. Having collected materials for the purpose they found a very adhesive clay and bitumen with which they speedily commenced to build the tower…. And having reared to the highest possible altitude, so that it reached the sky, the Lord of the Heavens, enraged, said to the inhabitants of the sky, “Have you observed how they of the earth have built a high and haughty tower to mount hither, being enamored of the light of the sun and his beauty? Come and confound them, because it is not right that they of the earth, living in the flesh, should mingle with us.” Immediately the inhabitants of the sky sallied forth like flashes of lightening; they destroyed the edifice and divided and scattered its builders to all parts of the earth.[15]

The allies of the Aztecs, the Choula, also held a legend regarding the Great Pyramid that stood 220 feet high and was nearly twice the width of the Great Pyramid of Egypt. This massive structure was recorded in legend as being erected by “white giants” after the catastrophic deluge. At the foot of this monument stood a temple dedicated and enshrined to the meteorite that had fallen from heaven in a ball of flame, the asteroid or star from the Pleiades constellation that ignited the deluge catastrophe. But before this pyramid was completed, fire fell from the heavens, killing its builders and causing the abandonment of the project,[16] again a story similar to that of Babel.

I cannot imagine closer versions to the biblical account, but it is only in these American versions where we are forced to consider the willing partnership of the Nephilim with Nimrod, which the Genesis account does not include. Were Nephilim partners in the Babel project? Were Nephilim coconspirators in the rebellion against God at Babel? Or were only the deformed giants, like those of the Irish Formorians that suffered the curse of Ham, enslaved by Nimrod to construct the ziggurat?

The History of the Armenians does support this notion, for it records that Nimrod enlisted giants to build the mountain-like Tower at Babel,[17] just as the Aztec legends do. Yet another Mesopotamian tradition suggests that Babel was believed to have been a center of activity for the postdiluvian Anunnaki,[18] which contained a temple dedicated to the stars of Pleiades, which had caused the flood, just as the Aztecs recalled. It does appear clear that Nimrod did, in fact, partner with some Nephilim to build Babel City, the great tower, and a temple dedicated in honor of the antediluvian Nephilim and Cainites slaughtered in the deluge disaster.

Nimrod did become a mighty warrior against some of those giants, so he did not tame all the Nephilim. Remember, the descendants of Nimrod, the Assyrians, warred with the giant nations in the time of Abraham, as recorded in Genesis 14, at a time when Nimrod may even have still been alive. It is prudent to suggest that the Assyrians took their lead from their idolized god of war, Nimrod, who most likely earned his legendary reputation through battling the giants. Also, remember that Nimrod coveted world government, presupposing that he would have had to subdue the giants, bringing them under his will, to do so. If the Aztec and Armenian legends are accurate, then Nimrod did indeed subdue some of the giants, subjugating them into building Babel alongside humans.

Furthermore, Armenian legends recount that Nimrod fought a battle against T’orgom, son of Hayk (Hayk was directly related to the word gigantic in the Armenian language), who was the legendary father of the Armenian race, in a war against rival giant armies,[19] suggesting Nimrod was either a giant or that he enlisted the services of giants.

The postdiluvian world then faced a similar fate to that which the antediluvian world faced, unless something was done—hence, the Babel dispersion and confusion of languages.

CHAPTER 30

THE ORIGINAL GREAT WHITE BROTHERHOOD

The first centers of his kingdom were Babylon, Erech, Akkad, and Calneh, in Shinar (Babylon). From that land he went to Assyria where he built Nineveh, Rehoboth Ir, Calah and Resen, which is between Nineveh and Calah; that is the great city.

—Genesis 10:10–12

How, then, did Nimrod receive all the Secret Sciences and the Enochian religion from the antediluvian world? How did Nimrod utilize the knowledge of the corrupted Seven Sciences and the vile pantheistic religions from the antediluvian world?

Hermes, of course, discovered and translated the degenerate data from Enoch’s hieroglyphs, which were etched into the twin towers constructed by Lamech’s children.[1] All of the reprehensible evils Noah witnessed before the flood, then, came back to haunt Noah in his later years. The twin evils of spurious knowledge and Nephilim both fell into the hands of the tyrant of Shinar for the detriment of postdiluvian society. The impact of the forbidden knowledge did not remain inert. Nimrod reactivated the corrupt knowledge with all his heart and all his soul. This was why Genesis 10 recorded that anything that humankind could conceive was then attainable, even though the people of Shinar did not possess the heavenly wisdom to apply this spurious knowledge for only the good of humankind. The seven spurious sciences are purportedly so powerful that anything is possible through their application.

To this end, Craft legends recorded Nimrod was a Mason who “loved” the (spurious) sciences.[2] Nimrod was captivated with aggression stemming from his newly found power. He is celebrated as a great Mason,[3] who applied his trade as he pleased. Not only was Nimrod a great Mason, but also he was the Grand Master,[4] the leader of the new cult. Nimrod, in fact, was the first Masonic Grand Master for the postdiluvian world.[5] He was the Grand Master who paraded the postdiluvian world into disaster. The Regius Manuscript supports this notion that not Solomon but Nimrod was indeed the first Excellent Grand Master of the postdiluvian Masons.[6]

Because of all this illicit knowledge, Nimrod was (inaccurately) regarded as the founder of the Seven Sciences by some Craft legends;[7] whereas what was more accurate was that Nimrod sponsored and partnered with Hermes, who led the renaissance of the postdiluvian, spurious sciences. Nimrod taught all the Masonic signs and tokens (and knowledge) to distinguish his builders and their Craft from the rest of mankind.[8] He organized and fused the newly founded cult with the elite of society, forming a transgenerational secret society, to which he provided a constitution complete with laws of their governing.[9] Nimrod was therefore honored in Craft legends for creating postdiluvian Masonry.[10] In one quick stroke of diabolical genius, through his unprecedented state power and organization, Nimrod ruined the postdiluvian society, as well as all subsequent generations, with all the terrible evils that caused the demise of the antediluvian epoch.

Nimrod began to construct cities and ziggurats[11] to consummate his credentials as a Master Mason, just as Scripture accurately records Nimrod as the builder of many cities. His most noteworthy accomplishment was, of course, the infamous Tower of Babel. Even though Scripture does not record specifically that Nimrod was responsible for the construction of Babel, in fact, other legends do.[12]

The legend of Nimrod confirms Nimrod utilized Babel for symbolic purposes, for his idolatrous and pantheistic new religion.[13] He constructed the tower with more than a thousand Masons already indoctrinated in the sciences, employing the project, according to Masonic legends, to teach its practical application. Nimrod spent fifty-three years in the Craft at Babel.[14] This founding Masonic organization at Babel became known as the ultra-secret Great White Brotherhood, which later transferred to the famous priests at Heliopolis, Egypt, and which was then inherited by the Essenes. Nimrod's ancient White Brotherhood Organization now rests within the confines of the super-secret Illuminati, who defiantly sport the Great White Brotherhood title.

Babel was the first Masonic project of the postdiluvian world.[15] It was considered the first physical application of the spurious knowledge and the beginning of modern Freemasonry, including mysticism.[16] The construction of the Tower of Babel was part of the larger, more ambitious project of erecting a great city remembered as Babel and Babylon, which took fifty-three years.[17] This first great project by the people of Shinar was memorialized in Masonic legends as the glory of the renaissance of the antediluvian sciences. From this enigmatic source of Babylon and the Tower of Babel emerges Scripture's figurative Babylon to describe the spurious, false, antediluvian religion of mysticism, which was reincarnated at Babel and will be again in the end time[18].

Babel was then, without question, a Mesopotamian ziggurat after the style and spirit of the antediluvian Sumerians. "Ziggurat" was an Assyrian/Babylonian word deriving from ziggurratu, meaning "sacred tower or mountaintop."[19] Another translation rendered the meaning as "towers rising into the sky."[20] The knowledge attributed for the building of Babel was believed to have been antediluvian in its origin, just like that for constructing the pyramids, from the spurious sciences.

The same can be stated regarding the Sumerians, who were attributed with the first invention of writing in the form of the curiously shaped, wedge-like signs, cuneiform, from around 3300 B.C.E., antediluvian times. Sumerians were also attributed with the instigation of the technological revolution of the fourth millennium B.C.E., which included agriculture, mathematics, metallurgy, and architecture, all in the spirit of Cain, Enoch, and Tubal-Cain. The Sumerians dedicated those newfound skills and knowledge to writing and architecture as a form of worship and honor to their gods that manifested itself in the form of ziggurats.[21] The same scenario played out in Egypt with hieroglyphs and pyramids.

It would seem most likely, then, that the descendants of Cain were Sumerians and Egyptians, and presumably the people of day six. It would seem just as likely that Babel was a ziggurat after the spirit of the Sumerians, but on a much grander scale. Remember, the base of Babel Tower was twice the width of the Great Pyramid.

As it was in Sumer, so it was in Babel; it was consecrated to their guardian deity, Enki, [22] the rival of Enlil/Adonai. Remember, Shinar is Akkadian for “Sumer.” It was in this regard that Sellier and Russell note the tower was alternatively built as a gateway or star gate to the gods, as a way to communicate with them.[23] Nimrod commanded the tower to be built with knowledge provided by Hermes, as the first Masonic construction project in the postdiluvian world, to communicate, manipulate, and honor the gods.

The Tower of Babel did not have any redeeming virtues in its symbolism. In fact, Babel was translated from Akkadian as follows: Bab-gate and El-gods, meaning “gateway to the gods,” as Russell and Sellier note. The star gate; the rings of kingship; the various antediluvian gods; the antediluvian civilizations, including Atlantis; the bellowing voices; and the glowing eyes of the Nephilim have all been kept alive in this generation through the Star Gate and Star Gate Atlantis science fiction movie and television series.

Additionally, one begins to ponder whether or not Babel was a symbolic gesture memorializing or honoring another infamous antediluvian event, again after the spirit of the Genesis 6 Conspiracy, just as the Egyptian pyramids and the Sumerian ziggurats were. As noted previously, Babel is translated from Akaddian as the gateway (bab) to the gods (el). Babel’s construction might have been a figurative gesture by Nimrod, inviting gods to once more descend to earth, just as they did in antediluvian times, where they took their thrones as watchers/rulers/archons. Perhaps it was an open invitation for the previously unimpassioned watchers to descend upon the earth to once more take daughters of men as their wives, to once more create new Nephilim, the new man, just as the infamous 200 had done at Mount Hermon/Nippur. Was Babel in fact a postdiluvian recreation of Mount Hermon? Was this the beginning of the second spiteful violation of creation, which was then transplanted to Sodom and Gomorrah, after the dispersion from Babel and as recorded in the Gnostic gospels?

Indeed, one must conclude Babel was constructed for exactly those purposes. The ancient ziggurats were designated as sacred mountains and as hills of heaven, according to Gardner.[24] Knight and Lomas articulate that the concept of a holy mountain connecting the center of earth with heaven was Sumerian, the legendary Nippur, home of the ruling Council of the Anunnaki, where kingships were issued and decreed both before and after the flood. To this conclusion, the northern nomads knew the Tower of Babel as the Tower of Sumer. Knight and Lomas further note that Sumerian ziggurats were created as artificial mountains built to connect the center of earth with heaven,[25] just as antediluvian legends recorded regarding Nippur and Mount Hermon. One must conclude Nimrod was endeavoring to rebuild Kharsag of Nippur, for as Andrew Collins states, “Kharsag of Nippur” was synonymous with Mount Hermon.[26]

Nimrod’s hubris was, and is, undeniable. Jewish legends note that he became completely corrupted. He was recognized as the greatest sinner since the flood. Under Nimrod, a parallel kingdom to that of the future Antichrist was established, where war, violence, and murder were common. Ginzberg notes that Nimrod endeavored to convert all the people of the earth to his new religion; he set himself up as a god and made a throne in the imitation of the throne of God. Ginzberg goes on to note that all nations came and paid homage to the divine Nimrod; the people said of him: “Since the Creation of the world there has been none like Nimrod, a mighty hunter of men and beasts, and a sinner before God.”[27]

This overt arrogance did not please God, who is known in Freemasonry as the lover of humility.[28] Confusing the tongues and the dispersing of the people to the four winds of the earth at Babel was God’s considered retribution and His plan to impede practicing the spurious craft, this according to the Anderson Legend.[29] Carol Rose additionally notes that God judged Nimrod and giants loyal to Nimrod,[30] along with the balance of humankind, dispersing them and confusing their languages.

Unfortunately, not all the knowledge of the spurious branch was lost in the dispersion. Nimrod once more rallied to preserve and propagate the sciences after the dispersion.[31] He reestablished his ancient Babylonian empire by utilizing his Masonic knowledge. He built the ancient cities of Arach, Archad, Calan, Shinar, Caleh, Rehoboth, and of course, Nineveh of Assyria.[32] Biblical legends record that the generation of Babel and their descendants were skillful and adept in all the arts, sciences, and knowledge.[33] Under Nimrod, the Masonic cult once more flourished, where it was perpetuated as an inheritance by the Chaldeans’ mathematicians, also known as Wise Men and Magi.

Chaldeans originated in Accad, northern Babylon. They were an aggressive, warlike people proficient in astrology and astronomy.[34] Chaldeans were undoubtedly the sons of Nimrod. At Chaldea, Nimrod persuaded his subjects to become idolatrous fire worshippers, casting all those who refused to become fire worshippers into giant furnaces as sacrifices to his corrupt and vile pantheon,[35] a trait that another Antichrist figure, Hitler, would adopt 5,000 years later, as will the forthcoming Antichrist.

As for the murdering of people in furnaces, there is yet another legend that had Nimrod threatening to do the same to Abraham.[36] According to Jewish legend, Abraham denounced Nimrod face-to-face for denying God and leading people in rebellion away from God. Nimrod then cast Abraham into a dungeon for one year and then cast him into a furnace after that, but Abraham did not burn nor die, for he was righteous in the eyes God and under His divine protection.[37] Legend and Genesis 14:14–21 record Abraham later inheriting the priestly blessings from Melchizedek (Shem).

The scenario of Nimrod and Abraham is possible but unsubstantiated. However, a confrontation with Nimrod may have been one of the reasons Scripture recorded Abraham fleeing from Ur and Chaldea to Canaan,[38] for his own protection and away from the tyranny of Nimrod. Further, the ultimate monotheist, Abraham passionately protested against his father and the people of Ur for prostrating themselves continually before idols of their false gods.[39] The people of Ur threatened to stone Abraham for these protests and to burn him to death, but God saved Abraham from the fire and sent Abraham away to a new land.[40] All this does tend to support an encounter between Nimrod and Abraham.

Nimrod was true to his tyrannical beginnings to the end. He replanted the seeds of the spurious knowledge,[41] for it then flourished in Chaldea, waiting for the opportunity to spread its corruption to the other newly established empires of the post-Babel world. The Chaldeans were the keepers of the spurious knowledge, just as their Egyptian counterparts were, in accordance to the leadership of Hermes.

As for Nimrod after “Language-gate,” Nimrod did not leave Assyria and Babylon.[42] Nimrod lived out his days in Babylonia, continuing to build cities and endeavoring to rebuild the first-world empire of the postdiluvian epoch. The rebuilding, in reality, would not take place for ages to come, until the time of the great Assyrian, Babylonian, and Persian empires.

Nimrod's first great empire was known for its fierce aggressiveness,[43] along with his warlike prowess and passion for the chase, and it became the perfect model for the warrior kings of Assyria, who would follow in his footsteps. They established some of the most brutal and barbaric kingdoms ever to dominate humankind. Assyria was even called "the land of Nimrod" by Bible authors (Micah 5:6). As for Nimrod, Armenian legends record him as dying in the battle with T'orgom, from Hayk's arrow.[44]

It was for all of these reasons God broke the yoke of evil once more at Babel, providing a new opportunity for the descendants of Noah to propagate good and turn from evil. Nimrod's infamy was well earned. Nimrod was considered the most evil of men during the early postdiluvian world, and for that matter, one of the most evil men of our age period.

Nimrod is indeed a worthy role model for the coming Antichrist. As a testimony to this sedition, Nimrod and Babel are documented in Genesis as a witness warning all generations that would follow that, indeed, "there is nothing new under the sun." Circumstances will once more come about in the not-so-distant future, just as they did at Babel, inspiring a renewal of the spirit of sedition and rebellion known as The Genesis 6 Conspiracy, if we do not heed the Sign of Noah.

CHAPTER 31

FORGING THE NATION OF DESTINY

> So all the people took off their earrings and brought them to Aaron. He took what they handed him and made it into an idol cast in the shape of a calf, fashioning it with a tool. Then they said, "These are your gods, O Israel, who brought you up out of Egypt."

> —Exodus 32:3–4

Why was Israel reared in Egypt into a nation of acquiescent slaves? And what was the relationship between Nephilim, Israel, and the conquest of the Promised Land?

Within the Exodus miracle rest obscure keys to unlocking little-understood Nephilim bloodlines and the mystery of the apparent barbaric slaughter of unsuspecting nations. The land of milk and honey promised to Moses by God was comprised of hostile Canaanites, Hittites, Amorites, Perizzites, Hivites, and the Jebusites,[1] all who were infested with Nephilim. Historians and theologians always seemingly overlook or dismiss the Nephilim presence when they examine this staggering turning point of history.

Further secular historians dismiss the Exodus as fanciful folklore and not a historical event. They summarily declare Israelites were Canaanites, not foreigners.[2] But why would a people say they were foreigners if they were Canaanites? Claiming to be foreigners would only cause tensions. Conversely, secular history's first definitive documentation of Israel's existence derived from the Stele of Pharaoh Mernepteh, circa 1210 B.C.E., clearly identifying Israelites as a distinct people from Canaanites, Hurrians, and Bedouins of the same region.[3] If Israelites were not foreigners, they certainly would have been recognized in antiquity as part of the other aboriginal nations of the region. And why would a nation write its history as beginning in slavery?

Israel began the Exodus heading due east. After some setbacks, they wandered in the desert for forty years. During those years, Israel was forged into a nation. At the start, Israel was a ragtag collection of slaves, indoctrinated under a pantheon of gods during their 400-year bondage in Egypt, with only faint monotheistic beliefs whispered to them by Joseph and his twelve sons, like a faint echo from the past. Then came Moses, who led them to freedom once more under a monotheistic doctrine, which was almost foreign to the Israelites by that time. This is why Israel refused to enter into the Land of the Covenant to do battle, in spite of God's promises to ensure their success. Israel was afraid, trembling from reports describing the fearsome people of war that lived there, vowing to never enter into the land of fearsome people.[4]

And then the infamous golden calf incident occurred.[5] God determined the Israelites, the world's last, best hope, would require forty years of discipline before entering into the Land of the Covenant. Moses' spies brought back alarming reports about Nephilim and powerful nations. Israel's faith had not yet forged into a sturdy metal. They were not yet strong enough to battle both physically and spiritually with those powerful nations. Israel was sentenced to attain a loyal, monotheistic following before God would again consider leading them into their destiny. The golden calf incident sadly bore witness to their fragile faith. They were still conflicted in their beliefs and were easily swayed to and fro.

> "They have been quick to turn away from what I commanded them and have made themselves an idol cast in the shape of a calf. They have bowed down to it and sacrificed to it and have said, 'These are your gods, O Israel, who brought you up out of Egypt.' I have seen these people," the Lord said to Moses, "and they are a stiff-necked people. Now leave me alone so that my anger may burn against them and that I may destroy them. Then I will make > you into a great nation." But Moses sought the favor of the Lord his God. "O Lord," he said, "Why should your anger burn against your people, whom you brought out of Egypt with great power and a mighty hand? Why should the Egyptians say, 'It was with evil intent that he brought them out, to kill them in the mountains and to wipe them from the face of the earth'?"…. Then the Lord relented and did not bring on his people the disaster he had threatened.

> —Exodus 32:8–14

Israel's backsliding into pantheism almost thwarted, or at the least delayed, the hope for humankind. Due to the Isralites' religious rebellion and their fear of the Amalekites, Canaanites, and Nephilim living in the Promised Land,[6] God almost rewrote history. But for the determined efforts by Moses, an entirely different history might have been written, albeit with similar results.[7] In the thoughts of Thomas Cahill, God concluded forty years of desert discipline would dispense with the Egypt-bred complainers and that the soft polytheists would be replaced with a rugged generation, hardened by wilderness trials,[8] loyal to the monotheistic cause.

The golden calf altercation communicates more significance than the superficial text delivers, explicating why God responded the way He did. The idol was part of the bull cult of Canaan and Atlantis, the original antediluvian mysticism of Enoch. The golden calf would not have been a calf but rather a bull, according to Porter.[9] Cahill, too, concludes Exodus describes the idol as a calf to denigrate it and states that the idol would indeed have been a bull, the aboriginal symbol of potency.[10] Others, though, conclude the golden idol was indeed a calf and base this on the Apis/Osiris bull cult of ancient Egypt. In this most ancient of religious doctrines, Isis bore from her womb a calf that died and later became Osiris. The Apis bull was part of the Horus-king tradition[11] and part of the complete Egyptian religious fabric from the beginning in the antediluvian epoch.

The bull from Egypt's rival bull cult was a symbol of power and defiance towards God and a common idol of the Near East religions.[12] Add to this, some conclude the skill set required for Aaron to manufacture the golden calf came from Jethro and that these skills were derived from his Kenite background[13] that allegedly dated back to Tubal-Cain and Cain, the master antediluvian metallurgists.

After the golden calf incident, Israel departed Mount Sinai, in the second year of the Exodus (Num. 10:11–13). They wandered from place to place in the desert of Sinai, between such places as Horeb and Paran, establishing with the newborn the foundations for a disciplined nation of destiny under one God. ("Horeb" is the old name for Sinai.[14]) Israel sojourned in the desert one year for each of the forty days they had explored the Promised Land but had been afraid to seize it.[15] The desert area was located south of modern Israel and east of Mount Sinai. After the forty years, Moses declared it was then time to leave Horeb to take hold of their destiny.[16]

The Israelites were instructed to annex the lands of the hill country of the Amorites in Arabah; the mountains in the western foothills, inclusive of Negev to the Mediterranean coast; Canaan to the north; and the land to the east as far as the Euphrates, just as God had promised this land to Abraham over 500 years previously (Deut. 1:6–8). Not all that land was to be expropriated for Israel in this age; however, God's direction was due to Israel's backsliding from their Covenant. Israel fell well short of their Covenant obligations. Israel's failure to drive those various peoples from the land permitted pantheistic religions to pollute subsequent Israelite generations. God promised to drive out the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Hittites, the Philistines, the Perizzites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites (Exod. 34:11). Notably missing from this list were Nephilim nations, along with the Amalekites, whom God segregated for both an extraordinary and extreme form of eradication.

The Israelites did not select the shortest route after their forty-year indoctrination, which was to head due north through Philistia (Palestine). Israel chose, without explanation, the longest route possible. Consider that the Philistines were a powerful, warlike nation that had previously conquered Palestine, establishing it as the Philistines' new home. The Philistines destroyed the Hittite empire in this campaign, and they menaced the Egyptian empire at the same time.[17] Perhaps God and Moses concluded that the Philistines should not be the first nation for Israel to cut their newly formed militaristic teeth on. Certainly, this was the conclusion of God when the Israelites first left Egypt: "When Pharaoh let the people go, God did not lead them on the road through the Philistine country, though that was shorter. God said, 'If they face war, they might change their minds and return to Egypt.' So God led the people around by the desert road toward the Red Sea" (Exod. 13:17). Perhaps God determined that Israel needed to acquire confidence in their military capabilities before entering into the dragon's lair of powerful Nephilim and Philistines.

Gardner notes Moses chose not to travel north from Sinai because of the five great fortresses defending the route, the five city-states of the Philistines.[18] The Philistines had purposely organized into a league of militaristic city-states: Gaza, Gath, Ashod, Ashkelon, and Ekron, and then they had assimilated the Canaanite religions into their own.[19] The Philistines were a militant people who instilled fear into their neighbors. The Israelites chose to travel south of the Land of the Covenant, heading east. They traveled by the area where they had warred with the nefarious Amalekites forty years before.[20]

Not only did the Amalekites live just south, but also they were branded as a people of the east.[21] As for the eastern Amalekites, they lived east of the river Jordan, alongside the Midians, whom they allied themselves with in their generational, genocidal war against the Israelites. But do understand that it was the Amalekites in Sinai who first attacked Israel and not the eastern Amalekites. The Israelites then endeavored to march east, through Edom.[22] This rugged region was known variantly as Seir and The Land of Esau. This, then, pinpointed the Exodus location, just south and east of the land of Israel, in what is now known today as Saudi Arabia.

Moses sent messengers to the king of Edom, asking permission for Edom’s brother to pass safely through Edom, but Edom refused, threatening to march out to war with Israel if they entered Edom.[23] Israel then replied:

> “We will go along the main road, and if we or our livestock drink any of your water, we will pay for it. We only want to pass through on foot—nothing else.” Edom still replied, “You may not pass through,” and marched out to meet Israel in war with a large and powerful army. Since Edom refused to let Israel pass, Israel turned away from them.
> —Numbers 20:19–21

They went an alternate way to avoid war with Edom. Israel was not permitted to war at this time with Edom, Ammon, or Moab, for they were all nations of the Abrahamic Covenant.

Israel then set out for Mount Hor, from Kadesh, where Aaron died as punishment for his rebellion against Moses at Meribah.[24] So, too, did Miriam rebel with Aaron at Meribah,[25] and she also died at Kadesh[26] as punishment[27] for her part in the rebellion. Meribah and Kadesh are essentially the same place,[28] the location where God extracted water from the rock. Israel mourned thirty days for Aaron at Mount Hor before soldiering on.[29]

The Canaanite king of Arad in Negev learned Israel was approaching. Without explanation or cause, he marched out against Israel near Mount Hor.[30] Understood that in proper historical context of the blood oath sworn by the Amalekites and Nephilims against Israel, this unprovoked assault comes as no surprise. Arad was a Canaanite city, dating to 2900–3200 B.C.E., now known as Tell Arad.[31] Arad was established in the Negev, in what later became Judah,[32] positioned just seventeen to twenty miles south of Hebron. Moreover, arad translated as "fugitive."[33] Could the word refer to fugitive Nephilim who escaped the flood?

Israel utterly defeated Arad, destroying its towns; Israel renamed the place of their victory Hormah, meaning "destruction."[34] One wonders about the connection to Mount Hor, the Horites, the Nephilim, and the translation as "destruction." One further wonders, was the name Hor a prophetic foreshadowing of what was to happen to all the giants? Certainly, the Israelites did swear to destroy all their cities if God delivered the king of Arad and his army into the hands of the Israelites (Numbers 21:2–4).

From Mount Hor or Hormah, Israel then traversed along the Red/Reed Sea to travel around Edom.[35] From Seir, the Israelites then marched due north. They forged their way towards the land of the Ammonites and Moabites, located around the eastern Dead Sea region, with Ammon being to the north of Moab. This district was also inclusive of the region to the east of the Jordan River but slightly to the west of the eastern Amalekites and Midianites, who lived in the western Mesopotamia region. Babylon and Assyria lay just east of the Midians and Amalekites in the eastern Mesopotamian region. Israel then marched to Oboth and camped in Iye Abarim, in the desert that faced Moab toward the sunrise, and then marched to the desert extending into the Amorite territory. Arnon was the border between Moab and the Amorites.[36] From Arnon, Israel marched onward to the desert of Beer and then to Mattanah, Nahaliel, and Bamoth, to the valley in Moab where the top of Pisgah overlooked the wasteland.[37]

The nations that elected to drive Rephaim from their land were Moab and Ammon. Nations not from the posterity of Abraham did not drive giants from their land. A third nation, Esau/Edom, contained the tribes of Amalek, Eliphaz, and Kenaz. They appear to have forged an alliance with the Horites, along with Esau, which created the Great Amalekite Nation. God reserved them for a specific kind of annihilation because of this alliance and because of later atrocities that the Amalekites would levy against Israel, even though one must remember not all Esau forged with the Horites; some remained free from Nephilim contamination. The balance of Esau, who drove out the Horites, remained independent of the Horites, resulting in the specific, divine judgment being reserved specifically for the Amalekite/Horite nation, just as the Table of Nations testifies to.

This is important only from the perspective that Israel did not make war with any of those three nations of Abraham, which were free from Nephilim (Esau, Ammon, and Moab), during their conquest of the Promised Land. This demonstrated a conspicuous, generational war with Nephilim by God’s chosen people. Again, this generational and genocidal war had a direct parallel with the marked generational war cited in Exodus, which the Israelites waged against the Amalekites.[38]

God then instructed the Israelites to pass by the regions of Moab at Ar, on their way to the land of the Amorites. Deuteronomy 2:18 records God’s instruction not to harass the Ammonites nor provoke them in any way to incite them war, so Israel passed by without any confrontations. Both nations were free from the Nephilim scourge by the time of the conquest. Israel also passed by Esau, save the land of Amalek. Israel was commanded to eradicate the Nephilim from the balance of the Land of the Covenant as part of their misunderstood Covenant obligations sworn upon the mountain, just as Edom, Moab, and Ammon had done. Secular history unaccountably dismisses the actions of Edom, Moab, and Ammon, while chastising Israel’s actions.

CHAPTER 32

THE NEPHILIM WARS

Hear O Israel, You are now about to cross the Jordan to go in and dispossess nations greater and stronger than you, with large cities that have walls up to the sky. The people are strong and tall—Anakites! You know about them and have heard it said, "Who can stand up against the Anakites?"

—Deuteronomy 9:1–2

The Amorites occupied land both east and west of the Jordan River, between modern northern Saudi Arabia in the south and into modern southern Syria to the north. At the time of the Exodus, the Amorites illegally held much of the Land of the Covenant. Once Israel had turned northward, they marched adroitly into the land of powerful Amorites, east of the Jordan River.

We have already read that Moses asked Sihon for peaceful passage through the Amorite land en route to the Covenant Land (Num. 21:21–23; Deut. 2:26–30). But Sihon refused the Israelites passage and chose war. I do not conclude this Nephilim-led nation coincidentally stood as a barrier to Israel entering into the Promised Land. Sihon and Og strategically positioned their kingdoms, protecting the east entrance to the Promised Land, with powerful fortresses reflecting the generational war waged between the demonically sponsored Nephilim and the people of God's Covenant.

Once the Israelites crossed the Arnon Gorge in Moab, they marched straight into Sihon (Deut. 2:24). King Sihon marched against Israel in the desert at Jahaz; Israel put Sihon and his army to the sword and annexed Sihon's territory from Arnon to Jabbok, but only as far as the border of the Ammonites (Num. 21:23–24; Deut. 2:32–36) to the north. Israel captured all the Amorite cities of Sihon, including Heshbon, the city of Sihon that Sihon had captured away from the Moabites (Num. 25–26; Deut. 2:37). The Israelites then pivoted to confront Og along the road to Bashan. They engaged at Edrei, where the Israelites routed and slaughtered Og's (giant) sons and Og's army, taking possession of Og's lands (Num. 21:32–35; Deut. 3:1–7).

These victories east of the Jordan captured territories from the Gorge of Arnon (Sihon) and as far as Mount Hermon (Og), including Bashan (Deut. 3:8–11). These mind-boggling victories set the stage for the campaign across the Jordan: "This very day I will begin to put the terror and fear of you on all the nations under heaven. They will fear reports of you and will tremble and be in anguish because of you" (Deut. 2:25).

This mortal grip of fear among the Amorite, Canaanite, and Philistine nations came to pass, as witnessed by a group of Hivites, who tried to make peace with Joshua and the Israelites:

> They answered: "Your servants have come from a very distant country because of the fame of the Lord your God. For we have heard reports of him: all that he did in Egypt, and all that he did to the two kings of the Amorites east of the Jordan—Sihon king of Heshbon, and Og king of Bashan, who reigned in Ashteroth."
> —Joshua 9:9–10

Israel immediately marched to the plains of Moab, where they camped alongside the Jordan River, directly across from the mighty city of Jericho (Num. 22:1). Surprisingly, then, Moses marched east against the Midianites as his last important act before dying, defeating and taking revenge on the Midianites for their past sins. The Midianites continuously raided and harassed Israel, as part of their evil alliance with the Amalekites, during the forty years Israel spent in the desert wilderness (Num. 31:1–13).

During this battle with the Midianites, Moses put five Midian kings to the sword: Evi, Rekem, Zur, Hur, and Reba (Josh. 13:21–22; Num. 31:8).

Israel slaughtered all the Midianite men, captured all the women and children, and seized all the Midianite herds, flocks, and goods as plunder (Num. 31:9–15). Judgment against the Midianites was swift, harsh, and just, due to the last great sin committed by the Midianites. Though they were not a Nephilim nation, under the five kings later executed, the misguided Midianites had willfully allied themselves with King Sihon against Israel. (Josh. 13:21–22).

Israel then reassembled at their camp on the plains of Moab, directly across from Jericho.[1] From there, Joshua led the Israelites across the Jordan River,[2] where they headed due west and directly into the Land of the Covenant. They camped at Gilgal, on the eastern border of Jericho.[3] All the Amorite kings west of the Jordan, who by then were familiar with the astounding stories depicting Israel's stunning victories over the Egyptians, Amalekites, Midians, the King of Arad, and of course, the mighty Amorite kings of Og and Sihon east of the Jordan, now heard how God had dried up the Jordan River, enabling all Israel to cross.[4] Amorite hearts began to melt away with fear; they no longer had the steely courage to face the Israelites (Josh. 5:1).

The Amorite/Canaanite nations west of the Jordan resided in the hill country to the north and just to the south of the point where Israel crossed the Jordan River. Amorites strategically controlled all the essential mountain roads branching from the spine that ran down the center of the mountain range. This then positioned the Amorites, who lived west of the Jordan in Samaria (Ephraim), known today as Syria, and in northern Judah. The other descending sons/nations of Canaan, as well as the Hittites, were living in the northern and northwestern regions, towards the Mediterranean, while the Girgashites and the Perziites resided to the south and to the east, which was still part of the hill country. The Philistines occupied the area to the south and to the west, towards the Mediterranean, in what is known to today as Gaza. The Jebusites occupied central Judah and, more specifically, the region surrounding modern-day Jerusalem. Jebusites were, in fact, another sect of Canaanites, as were many of the peoples of the Covenant Land,[5] and just as the Phoenicians were also Canaanites.

Ancient Canaanite society was very much like ancient Greek civilization and was comprised of city-states, whose principal cities were Tyre, Simyra, Byblos, Jerusalem, Sidon, and Akko, among others. Canaanites' favored deities were Baal and Astarte/Ashtar and Molech, the infamous cult of the bull. They worshipped a trinity of gods known as El the father, Astarte the mother, and Baal the son, also identified as Adon/Adonai/Adonis. When the Greek satirist Lucian enigmatically referred to Adonis, he was referring to Adon, meaning "Baal."[6] Baal was known variantly as the Great Storm God of the Sea; he was rewarded with kingship for his great victory over the sea monster Tiamet by the supreme creator, El.[7]

El was the mightiest of the three gods and was represented by the sun and its light. El was exceedingly fond of impregnating human females. This was the impious god of Middle Eastern theology, who appointed a god to each of the nations, analogous to Deuteronomy 32: Chemosh to Moab, Milkom to Ammon, Yahweh to Israel, as well-known examples.[8] El was a bloody tyrant in legend; he dethroned his father, Uranus; murdered his favorite son; and decapitated his daughter. El was a lustful and morbid character[9] and part of the celestial mafia of watchers.

Baal, son of El, was not immortal,[10] just as some of the Nephilim were not immortal. By the fourteenth century B.C.E., Baal had superseded El as the deity of choice in Canaan, infiltrating and influencing Israel until the sixth century.[11] Two accompanying beliefs stand out: First, all the Canaanite kings considered themselves to be living gods, descending from the demigod offspring (Nephilim) of El and perhaps Baal, as witnessed to by the famous Phoenician King Hiram, who partnered with Solomon to build the temple in Jerusalem. Second, Phoenician tomb inscriptions describe a lineage of kings who represented themselves as the earthly representatives of gods (Nephilim).[12] These two beliefs offer strong evidence that Nephilim were the kings of all the Canaanite nations, while the Amorites were an intermeshed, Nephilim-hybrid nation.

First on the list of nations to be vanquished were the indistinguishable Anakite and Amorite nations, who infested the hill country. The first Amorite city to be conquered was Jericho, while Ai was the next city. Ai was key to protecting Joshua's base camp at Gigal and was slaughtered in a similar manner to Jericho. Joshua and his army then vanquished the five southern Amorite, Jebusite, and Anakite kings and cities, which included Adoni-Zedek of Jerusalem, Hoham of Hebron, Piram of Jarmuth, Japhia of Lachish, and Debir of Eglon.[13]

On the day he slew the five southern Amorite kings, Joshua took the city of Makkedah and slew the king of Makkedah, capturing the city in the same manner as Jericho. From there, Joshua turned his attention to Libnah, slaying the king of Libnah, as well destroying the city of Libnah in the same manner as Jericho. Joshua then captured the city of Lachish and put Lachish to the sword, even though Joshua had already defeated King Japhia of Lachish and his army, along with the other five Amorite kings. Meanwhile, King Horam of Gezer marched to Lachish in support but was also defeated by Joshua. Joshua then took the cities of Hebron, Eglon, Debir, and all the Anakite region of Negev, leaving no survivors.[14] Deuteronomy confirms these were all indeed Amorite kings who lived in the hill country of Horeb; they were all infested with Anakites.[15]

Once the south had been brought under Israeli domination, Joshua returned to base camp at Gilgal (Josh. 10:43). When word reached the other peoples of the Promised Land concerning the destruction administered in the south, panic took hold. The northern Amorite king, Jabin of Hazor, gripped by fear and foreboding, sent word to kings Jobab, Shimron, and Acshaph, as well as to the northern kings of the mountains. He then sent word to the kings of Arabah in the western foothills. Included were the Canaanites in the east and the west, the Hittites, Perizzites, and the Jebusites in the hill country, and the Hivvites of Mizpah. This panic-stricken alliance of kings banded together against Joshua with a gigantic army (Josh. 11:1–4). Joshua challenged this astonishing alliance of Anakite kings from many peoples and their large armies at the waters of Merom, where Joshua and the Israelites soundly whipped them. The battle at Merom is perhaps the most sensational military victory ever recorded; the odds were simply overwhelming.

The list of kings conquered by Joshua and the Israelites in the conquest was staggering: the king of Bashan (Og); king of Heshbon (Sihon); and the kings of Jericho, Ai, Jerusalem, Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish, Eglon, Gezer, Debir, Geder, Hormah, Arad, Libnah, Adullam, Makkedah, Bethel, Tappuah, Hepher, Aphek, Lasharon, Madon, Hazor, Shimeron Meron, Acshaph, Taanach, Megido, Jokneam, Naphoth Dor, Gigal, and Tirzah. In all, Joshua defeated thirty-one (Nephilim) kings.[16] And let us not forget the victories Joshua and Moses had accumulated over the king of Negev, the five kings of Midia, and of course, the Amalekites and the Egyptians forty years previously.

Once Israel had won the battle of Merom, Joshua turned his attention to the remaining Anakite refugees in the hill country, which included Hebron (Kiriath Arba), Debir, and Anab, as well as the hill country of northern Israel, leaving no Anakites living in Israelite territory. One wonders whether or not the final remnant of Anakites were later slaughtered by the tribe of Ephraim and not by Joshua. I mention this because the tribe of Ephraim objected that its allotment of land in the hill country of northern Israel was too small and also was the land of Perizites and Rephaites, suggesting Rephaites still remained. In fact, Ephraim further objected to the fact that Canaanites who lived there were a formative military force that possessed iron chariots. Joshua countered that the tribe of Ephraim was more than numerous enough and powerful enough to wrest control of the allotted land (Josh. 11:21; 17:14–18).

At that point, Caleb, the mysterious Kenizzite, approached Joshua and demanded from Joshua what God had promised to Caleb, the land of Hebron/Kiriath Arba, the capitol of the Anakite kingdoms (Josh. 14:6–9). Because of his devotion to God, Joshua blessed Caleb, granting him and his descendants the lands of Hebron as part of Judah's allotment (Josh. 14:13–15).

Joshua did not conquer the Philistines and Geshurites in control of the land from the Shihor River on the east of Egypt to Ekron in the north; the Canaanites in the land of Arah to Aphek; the Amorites and Gebalites in the land of Lebanon to the east, from Baal Gad below Mount Hermon to Lebo Hamath; or the Sidonians in the mountain districts of Lebanon to Misrephoth Maim.[17] The Philistines harassed the Israelites throughout the age of the judges and until the time of King David. Even though the Philistines held the upper hand over Israel during that period, which included an iron embargo,[18] the Philistines never governed over Israelite land.

CHAPTER 33

THE HOLY COVENANT

However, If you do not obey the Lord your God and do not carefully follow all his commands and decrees I am giving you today, all these curses will come upon you and overtake you. You will be cursed in the city and cursed in the country…. The Lord will bring a nation against you from far away, from the ends of the earth…. A fierce looking nation without respect for the old or pity for the young…. You who were as numerous as the stars in the sky will be left but few in number…. Then the Lord will scatter you among all nations, from one end to the other.

—Deuteronomy 28:15–64

How did Israel’s failure to complete the expulsion of all foreign peoples from the Covenant Land, and the complete eradication of the Nephilim, come back to haunt Israel in the decades that followed? Why were there curses stemming from their not fulfilling their Covenant obligations?[1]

Frankly, Israel did not fulfill the Covenant obligations sworn atop the mountain to the exact letter of the instructions rendered by God. Although Joshua and the Israelites vanquished all but the land of the Philistines and parts of modern-day Lebanon, Israel did not totally annihilate or completely drive out all the former guardians of the Promised Land.[2] Remnants of the Amorites survived, remembered as the Gibeonites.[3] Gibeonites were Hivites/ giants conscripted as woodcutters and water carriers for Israel by Joshua, after Israel had been deceived into a treaty with Gibeonites not to destroy them, as the Gibeonites said they did not live in the Covenant Land.[4] Gibeonites survived in the Covenant Land well past the time of David because of this treaty, as a portion separate to Israel, within Israel. Gibeonites were clearly identified as surviving Amorites, spared in this treaty from the Exodus, which Saul later violated in his zeal, endeavoring to annihilate the Gibeonites, which cost Saul seven of his sons as punishment.[5]

Israel was dictated a very clear and comprehensive set of instructions, bound into the Holy Covenant through Moses, regarding the conquest. Should Israel have completely fulfilled their obligations to the Covenant, they would have received the full part of the blessings of the Covenant that included full possession of all the lands promised to Abraham, along with unheard-of prosperity.[6] But because Israel did not completely fulfill their Covenant obligations, they were subject to the curses from the Covenant. Israel afforded mercy to the nations they vanquished, permitting vestiges to live among them and share in the Covenant Land.

One must consider that Israel was created and then set aside from all other nations of the world. Israel was created for a specific destiny, to save humankind; held to a significantly higher criterion; and then sentenced to horrific punishments when they failed. Israel was bound into a Holy Covenant with God that demanded tough and specific requirements:

> You yourselves have seen what I did to Egypt, and how I carried you on eagles' wings and brought you to myself. Now if you obey me fully and keep my covenant, then out of all the nations you will be my treasured possession. Although the whole earth is mine, you will be for me a kingdom of priests and a holy nation.

The Qur'an recorded the Holy Covenant this way: "Remember when We took your pledge, and made a mountain tower high above you, and said, 'Hold fast to what we have given you and bear its content in mind, so that you may be conscious of God.' Even after that you turned away. Had it not been for God’s favor and mercy on you, you certainly would have been lost.”[7] “Moses said to his people, ‘My people, God’s blessing on you: how He raised prophets among you and appointed kings for you and gave you what he had not given to any other people. My people go into the holy land which God has ordained for you—do not turn back or you will be the losers.’”[8] One must always look through this lens when judging events from the conquest and in the tragic history of Israel throughout the ages.

Covenant curses were imbedded in the contagion that arose from the infected nations that formerly occupied the land of Israel. Adulterated practices and traditions were rooted in pantheistic and Nephilim philosophies that would, given the opportunity, contaminate the monotheistic Covenant Israel had just entered into. Because of those influences, Israel backslid into apostasy through the eventual acceptance of those polytheistic religions into their own culture, just as the Old Testament and the Essenes attest to. The bull cult plagued Israel throughout the age of the judges and the age of the monarchy. Israel’s ultimate power, obtained through the Holy Covenant, was eroded, first spiritually, and then by its physical weakening and vulnerability. Israel became vulnerable and weak, suffering several defeats at the hands of their enemies in subsequent generations.

The Qur’an recorded Israel’s rebellious behavior this way: “When they became steadfast and believed firmly in Our messages, We raised leaders among them, guiding them according to Our command.”[9] Through many spiritual revivals of the Covenant, Israel regained the upper hand over their enemies. The ups and the downs of the Israeli kingdom’s success, throughout its duration, were directly proportionate to the levels of apostasy and Covenant revival that Israel was going through at that time.

Eventually, no amount of Covenant renewal could save Israel from the curses of the Covenant. For every renewal, there was always another equal or greater backslide into apostasy. Finally, Israel was utterly destroyed in war by the Assyrians, who completely overran the northern kingdom. They replaced the Israelites in the land, enslaved the remnant of Israel into bondage in Assyria, and then sold Israel into slavery around the world, where they were dispersed and lost to history.[10] Israel will not be fully reunited again until the end of this age for the tribes of from the northern kingdom are still lost within the nations of the world they were scattered to. Soon the lost tribes awaken to remember who they are so that they may be led back to the Promised Land by their Messiah. The Second Exodus and the mystery to lost tribes is resolved in the end time and is the subject of my next book.[11] Judah (the southern kingdom) suffered the same fate some one hundred years later, at the hands of the Babylonians;[12] although, it was the Romans who dispersed Judah to the four corners of the globe. Covenant violations to the pledge made to God and witnessed by the holy angels on the mountain are cited as the root causes for Israel's and Judah's destruction.[13] Additional violations recorded in the Qur'an included their nonbelief, as well as rejecting Jesus as their Messiah, killing and rejecting the messages of prophets, and breaking the Law.[14]

One wonders, then, why the Israelites and Joshua never attacked the Philistines, after defeating all the Canaanite nations of Nephilim and the Anakites of the hill country. This is a mystery. Throughout the 400-year epoch of the judges, the Philistines were a continual thorn in the side of Israel, at every opportunity. And because residue of the Nephilim, or Avvites as the Philistines called them, dwelled among the Philistines, one can deduce that it was the Nephilim who incited the Philistines into continual, generational warfare with the Israelites. Nephilim were the root for Philistine disdain from the conquest forward, just as Nephilim had persecuted God's people from the beginning.

Only the peoples descending from Abraham sought to eradicate the giants from their land, as though there was a generational war being waged with the Nephilim by God and His chosen people, just as God declared with the Amalekites. The eradication of Nephilim was further bound into the Holy Covenant of Israel as part of Israel's obligations. The Nephilim appear to have responded in kind. This suggested the generational war against the Nephilim was not a coincidence. Israel was merely fulfilling the decree issued in the times of Noah, when the flood was brought forth to rid the earth of the Nephilim infestation. Israel was commissioned by God to be His new sword of justice and wrath, completing the antediluvian edict to eradicate the giants, even though the edict was not completed until the time of David and the monarchy.

Tracing Israel's footsteps through the Exodus, conquest, and the Holy Covenant is the only way to determine the defining, underlying context. There is a formative, ongoing spiritual battle for earthly domination, fought between the people descended from giants and dark angels against the people descended from Abraham, Noah, Seth, and Adam. The Israelites conquest was more than the violent, superficial context most secular cynics claim it to be. The Israelites were commissioned to cleanse the Covenant Land from the dreaded Nephilim and to cleanse the land from the people that the Nephilim had adulterated. Meanwhile, the Nephilim had sworn their own blood covenant to prevent the nation of destiny from completing its divine commission to save humankind, through defending the Covenant Land to their death. Nephilim patiently dwelled there for generations, all the time waiting in ambush for the children of hope. The facts make this undeniable.

Many view the viciousness of the conquest with utter horror, wondering how a good and kind God could commission such violence and brutality, but remember that God did not commission the Israelites to dispense the same sort of violence against the rest of the nations of the world. God only commissioned Israel, as His holy nation of priests bound in a Holy Covenant with God, to cleanse the Holy Land of the Covenant from people defiled by the Nephilim, people who were terminally diseased, just as the antediluvian people were, who equally needed to be eradicated by the deluge. And because Israel did not totally fulfill their Covenant obligations, those infected people who were not totally eradicated came back to haunt Israel. They lured Israel into apostasy through their adulterated religions and through the Nephilim, resulting in the eventual destruction of Israel by the Assyrians in 721 B.C.E. and of Judah by the Babylonians in 587 B.C.E.

God was neither brutal nor vicious when He commissioned Israel to cleanse the Covenant Land of the people who had previously, knowingly, and illegally possessed it. God was merely enacting the only long-term solution for the good of the future Israelites, as well as for the good of the future world, against people so thoroughly corrupted they could never have been rehabilitated or a positive influence on humankind.

Consider God’s prophecy to Abraham concerning the Amorites: “In the fourth generation your descendants will come back here, for the sin of the Amorites has not yet reached its full measure.”[15] One should also contemplate the sins the Amalekites rained upon the Israelites, which have been listed in this and other chapters, before unwisely and fool-heartedly judging the Judge. Because Israel did not fulfill their Covenant obligations, the world was not provided with the opportunity to witness what could have been under the full blessing of the Covenant and of God’s kindness. We will now have to suffer the hell that is surely coming, patiently enduring for Jesus to return to introduce the millennium.

It was no coincidence that it was David who completed Israel’s commission, for it was through David that God established his Royal Family and kingship on earth, inclusive of its eternal kingdom, through which the Messiah would enter. It is the Messiah, Jesus, from the bloodline of David, who will ultimately defeat Satan and his cohorts, saving humankind from the great human experiment that we are currently subject to. It is the Messiah who will judge the fallen angels, condemning them to their destiny of eternal fire on the great day of judgment.[16]

JERICHO

See, I have delivered Jericho into your hands, along with its king and its fighting men. March around the city once with all the armed men. Do this for six days. Have seven priests carry trumpets of rams' horns in front of the ark. On the seventh day, march around the city seven times, with the priests blowing the trumpets. When you hear them sound a long blast on the trumpets, have all the people give a loud shout; then the wall of the city will collapse and the people will go up, every man straight in.

—Joshua 6:2–5

The Amorites heard the rumors of the Egyptian debacle from the Amalekites, as well as the Amalekite humiliation at the hands of the Israelites. The Amorites of Jericho were all too familiar with the annihilation levied against their Amorite brethren led by Sihon and Og east of the Jordan River. This explains why the fear-gripped Amorites cowered within the ancient and mighty walls of Jericho, clinging to the hope that those tall and mighty walls would save them.

But why did Israel bring down the walls of Jericho through inexplicably odd rituals and ceremony? What is the unexplained and underlying meaning of Jericho’s destruction?

Jericho was an extraordinarily famous city of antiquity, dating as far back as 11,000 years, according to most archaeologists. Some believe Jericho to be the oldest city in the world.[1] Neither the way in which the city was vanquished, nor that Jericho was the first city to be vanquished in the Covenant Land, nor its great age and symbolism are coincidental. The Bible simply does not function in this manner. Remember, too, all the other southern Amorite city-states were utterly destroyed in a similar manner to Jericho. One wonders if the same rituals of destruction, with trumpets, were also performed at the other southern Amorite city-states.

The Israelites did not just assault this legendary city of old, with its mythical walls of extraordinary height and strength. No, the Israelites, led by Joshua and the Ark of the Covenant, were instructed to march around that great, fortified city of old with all of their armed personnel once a day for six consecutive days, with only seven priests permitted to blow loudly on their trumpets. The army of Israel was instructed not to say a word during this weeklong drama.

The ritual of the seven trumpets was an ancient, symbolic gesture of destruction, symbolizing the renewal of all things.[2] The conquest, then, represented the start to the renewal of the Promised Land bequeathed in Deuteronomy. Jericho was considered the first fruits of the Covenant Land, offered to God in a holy ritual, as part of the Holy Covenant with Israel.

The battle of Jericho commenced during the Feasts and Sabbaths of Passover and the Feasts and Sabbaths of Unleavened Bread. In fact, the ritual of the trumpets began on the first day of Passover, while Passover was celebrated just before the attack.[3] If Jericho was not selected for special significance and religious meaning, then why was the peculiar preparatory, religious, and ritualistic ceremony performed throughout the seven-day Passover and Unleavened Bread Feast to the Lord? Why not wait until after the Holy Feast of God? What was the rush in or importance of waging war during the Holy Festival? Remember, 1,500 years later, another holy spectacle took place on the day after Passover and the start to the Feast of Unleavened Bread; it was the holy first offering of the first fruits of salvation, the crucifixion of Christ.

Note, too, that on Preparation Day of this week-long holy festival, all leavened bread and all yeast were removed from every home and dwelling of the Israelites.[4] The puffing action of the yeast on the bread was symbolic of pride, haughtiness, and sin.[5] Pride symbolically represented Nephilim as the cause of the violence and corruption of the antediluvian epoch. All this symbolism cannot be a simple coincidence, for the Bible does not work through coincidences.

The Amorite ploy of cowering within the mighty walls of Jericho did not work, for Jericho had been set aside for a special sacrifice to the Lord. Jericho was ordained to be delivered into the hands of the Israelites, providing the Israelites followed God's instructions to the letter. On the seventh day, the last day of the week of Passover and Unleavened Bread, the armed forces of Israel repeated the same ritual as they had done for the previous six days. On this day, they added blowing the trumpets seven times to the ritual of marching around the city. The people of Israel all shouted in symphony with the trumpets, and the walls of Jericho came tumbling down.[6] The Israelite army swarmed into the legendary city, slaughtering all the bewildered and stunned occupants, save Rahab the prostitute and her family, for they had lent assistance to the Israeli reconnaissance spies.[7] The entire city was leveled, burnt, and completely destroyed, save the house of Rahab. All the treasure was earmarked for the treasury of the Lord's house. Finally, Joshua pronounced a curse on any who would attempt to rebuild the legendary city in the future.[8] Jericho was separated for a specific kind of destruction, as an example to the world for all generations to follow.

This epic, biblical narrative is strange indeed. Why was so much ritual and mystery included in Jericho's demise? I believe God wished to make a forceful statement to the other peoples who inhabited the Promised Land that Israel was nourished and supported by the omnipotent, one true God of the universe. The Bible described cities of the land with walls up to the sky.[9] No doubt, Jericho was set aside specifically as an example for all of what was to befall all Nephilim-infested cities of the Promised Land.

Jericho's destruction, in addition to the miracle at the Jordan River, combined with the slaughter of Og's and Sihon's armies, plus the rumors the nations would have heard about what had befallen the Egyptians, were all designed to reap complete and utter terror throughout the ranks of the other nations infested with Nephilim. The Exodus miracles were designed as a warning for other nations to heed, nations that, until then, had remained untouched by the wrath of God. But those adulterated nations ignored the warnings.

Additionally, we must consider the great age of this legendary city. Archaeologists believe Jericho's foundations were laid around 8300 B.C.E. During its first thousand years of existence, three enormous walls, stretching sixteen feet high, were constructed that were further enhanced by a deep ditch gouged out of hard bedrock, which encircled the great walls.[10] Why were such defenses erected? From whom were they safeguarding themselves? Remember, too, that Cain built the cities of Enoch and sixty other cities, all fortified with walls for war. One also recalls the descriptions of Uruk, in Sumerian mythology, being a mighty city of the antediluvian epoch and the postdiluvian epoch. Could Jericho, Uruk, and, Enoch be related?

Of course, these events predate the flood. There is archaeological evidence, according to Collins, to suggest Jericho indeed traded with a culture known as the watchers of Lake Van.[11] Remember, Sumerians, Babylonians, and Akkadians believed all the antediluvian cities were originally constructed by the gods, before the advent of the human Black Heads and the Nephilim. Jericho was a city linking antediluvian times with postdiluvian times. It was quite possible that Jericho was celebrated as a defiant shrine to the violent antediluvian age plagued by Nephilim and watchers.

Certainly, Jericho's walls represented the antediluvian wars, just as walls were an antediluvian idiom for the surface of the earth, according to Alford. And in these terms, Jericho likely represented the antediluvian earth.[12]

Now, the seven trumpets employed to destroy Jericho and its mighty walls also announced the destruction of Jericho and renewal of the covenant land of Israel. Jericho's destruction by Joshua represented figuratively the destruction of the antediluvian world by the flood, along with the earth's renewal through Noah and his family. Also, Jericho's destruction represented the official start to the eradication of the surviving antediluvian contagion. The settlement of the Israelites into the Covenant Land represented the renewal of the land.

In addition to all this, Joshua instructed all but Rahab's family were to be slaughtered, including all animals; all plunder, according to Josephus, was to be collected and offered as a sacred offering to the Lord as part of the First Fruits of the Covenant Land offered unto God as the first city conquered.[13] All inhabitants were put to death, while the complete city, including the corpses, was burnt,[14] again consistent with a burnt offering to the Lord. The Feast of First Fruits in ancient Israel always began the first day following the first Sabbath, when the harvest was just about to become ready.[15] In this case, it was the Sabbath of Preparation Day for the Feast of Unleavened Bread.

The Feast of First Fruits included the sacrifice of a lamb in a burnt offering, together with the first fruits of the grain and grapes, before Israel could partake in the harvest,[16] just as Jesus later would be the First Fruit of the salvation harvest. It is a celebration of the first fruits of the bounty that will come from the harvest. So, too, in prophetic allegory are a harvest and the Feast of Weeks of the Harvest[17] figurative for a great slaughter, as in the end-time harvest of Revelation[18] and as defined in Matthew.[19]

The figurative Jericho harvest was the first fruits for the sacrifice dedicated to God, foreshadowing the great harvest/slaughter which was to follow in the conquest of the Promised Land of the Covenant. And the Jericho destruction took place on the first Sabbath before the allegorical harvest. The Feast of Weeks of the Harvest then followed fifty days after the Feast of First Fruits, after the harvest, just as the Pentecost does.[20] Similarly, the saints of Revelation are considered the first fruits for the end-time holocaust or harvest.[21] Jericho was, in this allegory, the first fruits to the harvest of the Promised Land of the Covenant, offered in the religious burnt offering and ceremony of the feasts of Israel, complete with trumpets.

Similarly, the Feast of Trumpets and the Feast of Booths (also called Tabernacles) have always been considered by many scholars as representing the renewal of creation.[22] It was the shofar, the ram's horn, which was utilized in the Feast of Trumpets.[23] The shofar was also blown when Israel went to war[24] and when announcing a solemn assembly. The shofar is known metaphorically for its trumpeting during the future, second coming of Jesus and at the solemn assembly of the end-time judgment. The long, flared trumpets were used during sacrifices and also in the announcements of the beginnings and endings of Sabbaths.[25] Likely, then, both kinds of trumpets were used at Jericho.

In latter times, trumpets were blown throughout the day in Jerusalem, during the festivals, but never outside the walls of Jerusalem.[26] One then wonders about the connection to Jericho, where the trumpets were blown outside the walls. Were the Israelites afraid of bringing down the walls of Jerusalem?

Rabbis believe the first day of Trumpets is the allegorical day of prophecy, when God will judge all men as they pass before him.[27] Jericho was set aside for an extraordinary ritual and mystical destruction in honor of the one true God and as a sign to the infected peoples corrupted with Nephilim. God destroyed the Nephilim grip on humankind in antediluvian times, and He was now prepared to do so once more. And there was nothing that the Nephilim, their false gods, or the peoples of that time could do to prevent it.

Enigmatic details in the Bible are not there for redundancy, nor are they there for mere effect. In this case, they describe complete and utter annihilation. The symbolic manner of this destruction rendered the power of the gods of the pantheon silent and conspicuous by their absence. When the chips were down, the so-called gods of the pantheon were all subservient to the one true God of the universe.

CHAPTER 35

CURSE OF THE AMALEKITES

“Edom will be conquered, Seir, his enemy will be conquered, but Israel will grow strong….” Then Balaam saw Amalek and uttered this oracle: “Amalek was the first among nations, but he will come to ruin at last.”

—Numbers 24:18–20

What happened to the mysterious Amalekites, who did not imprint upon the historical records? The Amalekites were not included in the lists of the nations waylaid by the Israelites in the conquest of the Covenant Land.

We must once again return to the time of the Exodus. This was a time when Israel was not yet forged into a nation and not yet bound together with the glue of monotheism, the discipline of their cause, or the faith of the prophetic nature that was to be their being. They were a spiritually weak and vulnerable nation that had been fed on Egyptian pantheism. They were fearful of the many militaristic and powerful nations led by their gods of war, nations that dominated the Middle East of that epoch. It was in this very vulnerable period that the Israelites first encountered the Amalekites.

The cowardly Amalekites attacked Israel without just cause or proper notice, with all the fury and might they could muster.[1] The Israelites were completely unprepared for such an event. They were in no way a military match for the militant and vitriolic Amalekites. Israel was incapable of winning this confrontation through human endeavors. This was a mismatch of gigantic human proportions, ripe for a slaughter. However, God was with Israel that day, and the day was won for Israel.

As long as Moses kept his hands in the air, the Israelites prevailed, but when Moses tired and his arms sank, the Amalekites prevailed. The battle wore on from sunup to sundown, ebbing and flowing, back and forth, with the momentum based on the height of Moses' outstretched arms. By the end of the day, Moses, with the support of Aaron and Hur, kept his arms raised long enough for the Israelites to prevail (Exod. 7:8–15).

But why did the Amalekites feel compelled to attack such a weak and vulnerable nation? If the Amalekites were a pure branch of Abraham's seed through Esau, they had nothing to fear from the Israelites, just as the Moabites, Ammonites, and the balance of the Edomites had nothing to fear. If the Amalekites were not a Nephilim nation, Israel would not have attacked them, plain and simple.

The Amalekites were viewed as the most violent and warlike people of that age. According to Josephus, Amalekites were the most warlike nation of that region. They were aggressive and obsessed with stirring up rumors and suspicions among the other nations of that region regarding Israel. Amalekites spread vicious rumors that Israel intended to bring all other nations of that region to destruction, just as they had done to the Egyptians.[2] Amalekites successfully persuaded their neighbors to war against Israel before Israel had gained the opportunity to establish themselves and gather their strength, to prevent Israel from ever becoming a formidable opponent. All this occurred at a time before any of the other nations knew of Israel's intent to annex the lands of the Covenant.

From the beginning, the Amalekites aligned themselves as mortal enemies of the Israelites and tried to influence many other nations to join their side. Does this not seem strange? How did it come to pass that such a great power, possibly the greatest military power of that time, next to Egypt and the Philistines, was so fearful of a rag-tag group of slaves? One can only answer such hateful commitment to war with the Israelites in one of two ways.

The first answer concerns the rumors concerning the Egyptians that must have been circulating through the known world at that time. Surely the other nations must have heard fearful things concerning the breathtaking events that had overwhelmed the Egyptians. The people of the Middle East must have wondered about the accuracy and authenticity of such tales. But in the end, I find it difficult to accept that these various people groups truly believed such miraculous and incredible events had actually taken place. It would have been much easier to accept that the Egyptians simply mishandled the slaves and lost ownership of the Israelites through entropy and incompetence. And as for the rumors of great miracles and disasters that had befallen the Egyptians, those were just tales of cover-up that were set in place by the embarrassed Egyptians to explain how the powerful Egyptians could have been defeated by a group of slaves.

I do not believe, however, that the nations totally dismissed the rumors. Surely it was food for thought that weighed heavily on their fears. But if the fears weighed so heavily on their minds that the Israelite slaves would invoke a similar plague of disasters upon their nations as they had done with Egypt, surely those nations would not have allied themselves against the Israelites. Surely those nations would have rushed to befriend the Israelites, accommodating the Israelites with whatever they could, in an attempt to prevent such disasters. They certainly would not have rushed headlong against a nation they believed so powerful in sorcery. Still, something was brewing underneath all this, for why else would Hebrew legends and Scripture have recorded Amalek swearing an oath to be the enemy of Israel?[3]

No, there must have been something else, a second option for what was inspiring the Amalekites and other nations to war with Israel. Only the Nephilim and their procreators, the angels of rebellion, including demons, could have deceived and inspired so many people to challenge God and his people in the face of utter destruction. Those rebellious nations must have glowed with confidence under the false protection of their false gods and Nephilim warriors, who offered nothing other than deluded, false hope.

The nations influenced by Nephilim did, in fact, unite under one banner in war against the Israelites; whereas the nations descending from Abraham, who exterminated the Nephilim from their territories, save Amalek, did not wage war with Israel. And yet, the nation most influenced by the aboriginal Nephilim, the Amalekites, did not engage Israel in war once Israel was completely prepared for war, at the time of the conquest, even though they were the most instrumental nation in stirring the other nations to conspire to war against the Israelites. This was not and could not have been a coincidence.

Nor was it a coincidence that the Amalekites first attacked the Israelites when they were the most vulnerable, at the beginning of the Exodus. The spineless Amalekites knew that the best opportunity to stop the nation of destiny was in the beginning, before the Israelites developed the discipline and the skills of war. The Amalekites refused to support the alliance forty years later, after their cowardly ambush against Israel; the Amalekites were only enticed to war with Israel when they could catch Israel off balance or by surprise. Unprovoked and unexpected ambushes against Israel were common behaviors in the Amalekite relationship of hate towards Israel in the many generations that followed.

The Amalekites, from the beginning, swore a blood covenant to eradicate Israel from the face of the earth, to be remembered no more, that did not die throughout any of the subsequent generations. One can surmise that all the Nephilim-dominated nations took a similar vow, for there were far too many nations that banded together against Israel to assume this was not the case. Each of those nations was an enemy to the others, until Israel united them in common cause.

In this same line of thinking, and according to Ginsberg, Esau, the patriarch of Amalek, was born evil and lost his birthright from Abraham to Jacob, even though Esau was the firstborn of Isaac. Because of this, Esau's last wish on his deathbed, according to Jewish lore, was for Amalek to cut off the fledgling nation of Israel from their birthright, before they became too formidable, to stop Israel from acquiring the Land of the Covenant. These Jewish legends also recorded Esau as being a mortal enemy of Jacob, even to the extent that Esau swore an oath to bite Jacob dead with his mouth and suck his blood dry[4] (like a vampire).

The Bible supports Esau's hatred towards Jacob, with Esau's own angry words and with his mother's advice to Jacob:

> "He has deceived these two times: He took my birthright, and now he's taken my blessing!"…. Esau held a grudge against Jacob because of the blessing his father had given him. He said to himself. "The days of mourning for my father are near; then I will kill my brother Jacob…."
> —Genesis 27:36–41

> Your brother Esau is consoling himself with the thought of killing you. Now then, my son, do what I say: Flee at once to my brother Laban in Haran. Stay with him for a while until your brother's fury subsides.
> —Genesis 27:42–43

Hebrews 12:16–17 further underscores Esau's anger: "See that no one is sexually immoral, or is godless like Esau, who for a single meal sold his inheritance rights as the oldest son. Afterward, as you know, when he wanted to inherit this blessing, he was rejected. He could bring no change of mind, though he sought the blessing with tears." One wonders whether or not this passage in Hebrews as this book continues to assert, has anecdotally connected and/or equated Esau's godlessness (independent and/or apart from God) and Esau's sexual transgressions (to create more Nephilim/human hybrids in Abraham's descending bloodline) to the sexual sins of dark angels that created the Nephilim. Certainly Esau married at least two Horite/Nephilim females, Adah and Oholibamah, and a number of Esau's posterity married Horites, such Eliphaz and Amalek. And Esau's descending family tree is both inexplicably interwoven and located with the Horites of Seir in the Table of Nations (Gen. 36:1–40; 1 Chron. 1:35–51).

When Jacob returned from Paddam Aram (Mesopotamia), he sent a messenger ahead of his caravan to appease Esau with gifts; when the messengers returned, they informed Jacob that Esau was coming to meet Jacob with 400 men. Jacob then divided his caravan into two, out of fear, in case Esau came to attack. Jacob then prayed, "Save me, I pray, from the hand of my brother Esau, for I am afraid he will come and attack me, and also the mothers with their children."

The ongoing hatred seems to subside, according to the Bible, for when Esau and Jacob finally meet, all seemed to have been forgiven.[5] However, Esau, according to legend, promised to slay Jacob after the death of their father, Isaac, and Isaac was still alive when Jacob returned from Paddam Aram. When Isaac died, Esau and Jacob together buried Isaac at Mamre, near Kiriath Arba/Hebron.[6]

Sometime after Isaac's death, legends articulate that Esau brought forth a great Edomite and Horite army, an army from Seir that likely included Amalekites, to slay his brother, Jacob, and Jacob's entire family, but Esau and four of his sons—Reuel, Jeush, Lotan, and Korah, all noted Horite chiefs— were slain in this battle.

Ginzberg records that at the time of the Exodus, the descendants of Esau (Amalek) decided they must destroy Israel so that Egypt would not endeavor to put Amalek into bondage as a substitutes for Israel, for both nations were sons of Isaac.[7] Keep the Abrahamic birthright covenant well in mind, for this will become a key factor in the discussion of the Dragon bloodline in the last chapters. Now add to this that the original Amalekites were a surviving antediluvian giant race, and you have an explosive recipe for a vitriolic, generational blood vow.

Deuteronomy testifies to (25:17–19) and 1 Samuel (15:2–3) supports the record of the Amalekites attacking Israel during the Exodus, when Israel was weary and worn out; Israel was completely vulnerable. The Amalekites slaughtered all those who lagged behind due to exhaustion. The cowardly Amalekites preyed on the weak and lagging, just as spiritually unclean beasts, such as hyenas, would do. The Amalekites fought a despicable war of cowardly terrorism before engaging the helpless Israelites in a formal battle.

Jewish legends once more provide intriguing context to the guerilla warfare tactics employed by the Amalekites. They hurriedly marched out of the land of Seir so that they would be the first nation to declare war on Israel. At first, they remained in the hills outside of the Israelite camp, pretending to be friends and kin to Israel. The Amalekites would call out Israelites by name, inviting them to mingle and dine with their cousins, before ambushing, murdering, and mutilating the corpses of all those who did, all the while openly mocking Abraham’s covenant with Isaac and Jacob. Ginzberg notes the Amalekites struck like “a swarm of locusts … their purpose was to suck the blood out of Israel” before they became strong.[8]

Deuteronomy goes on to note that the Amalekites showed no fear of God (Deut. 25:18). They felt false comfort and security behind their false shield of protection afforded to them by their false gods. They believed their gods were superior to the true God, and they believed all these falsehoods in spite of the deluge. They continued to maintain and nourish their faith in the fallen angels that had saved the remnant of Amalekites from the flood. These people of sorcery employed black magic when they attacked Israel, and only with the strength of God did the Israelites prevail over this sorcery,[9] witnessed by Moses and his raised hands during the daylong battle.[10]

Eventually, the cowardly Amalekites mustered up enough courage to challenge the Israelites to a formally declared, two-sided battle. The authors of the Old Testament still considered the challenge an evil act of savagery because the Israelites were untrained in the art of war:

> Then the Lord said to Moses, "Write this on a scroll as something to be remembered and make sure that Joshua hears it, because I will completely blot out the memory of Amalek from under heaven." Moses built an altar and called it "The Lord is my banner." He said, "For hands were lifted up to the throne of the Lord. The Lord will be at war against the Amalekites from generation to generation."
> —Exodus 17:14–16

> Remember what the Amalekites did to you along the way when you came out of Egypt. When you were weary and worn out, they met you on your journey and cut all who were lagging behind; they had no fear of God. When the Lord your God gives you rest from all of the enemies around you in the land he is giving you to possess as an inheritance, you shall blot out the memory of Amalek from under heaven. Do not forget!
> —Deuteronomy 25:17–19

> This is what the Lord Almighty says: "I will punish the Amalekites for what they did to Israel when they waylaid them as they came up from Egypt. Now go attack the Amalekites and totally destroy everything that belongs to them. Do not spare them, put to death men and women, children and infants, cattle and sheep, camels and donkeys."
> —1 Samuel 15:2–3

The despicable warfare tactics of the Amalekites made them the most despised nation recorded in the Bible, other than the Nephilim; not even the Philistines were held with such disdain.

The second charge against the Amalekites derived from their inciting other nations to war against the Israelites.[11] They caused other nations to be fearful of Israel. They incited all the surrounding nations to unite and defend themselves against the "Israeli threat" through totally destroying Israel with war. Josephus tells us that the Amalekites informed the other nations that Israel lay in wait, only to ruin them at a later date. The Amalekites said they should all band together to destroy those foreigners before they had sufficient time to gather their strength.[12] This then brings into perspective the odd passage from the Psalms:

> See how your enemies are astir, how your foes rear their heads. With cunning they conspire against your people; they plot against those you cherish. "Come," they say, "let us destroy them as a nation, that the name of Israel be remembered no more." With one mind they plot together, they form an alliance against you—the tents of Edom, and the Ishmaelites of Moab, and the Hagrites, Gebal, Ammon, and Amalek, Philistia, with the people of Tyre. Even Assyria has joined them to lend strength to the descendants of Lot.
> —Psalm 83:2–8

This vengeful nature continued throughout the subsequent generations, appearing in all its nastiness with every available opportunity to wage an allied war against Israel. But after the Exodus encounter, we never read of a war waged by the Amalekites independent of their subservient allies. We learn in the book of Judges that the Midianites, along with other eastern peoples and the Amalekites, would often join forces to invade Israel whenever the Israelites planted their crops, leaving a lost-crop year in their wake, along with considerable devastation.[13] This generational vengeance that Amalek undertook against the Israelites persisted well past the age of Judges and into the age of the monarchy, with King David.

The third charge against the Amalekites pertained to their self-induced, brutal, and evil nature. Josephus recorded the Amalekites as the most warlike of all nations,[14] drawing a parallel once more with the warlike tendencies of the Nephilim. The Josephus anecdote further indicted the Amalekites as Nephilim, just as 1 Samuel did when it listed the Girzites and Geshurites alongside the Amalekites as people living in Seir to Egypt since antediluvian times.[15] Both the Girzites and the Geshurites additionally lived in Gilead and Geshur, the land of Og, and Mount Hermon.[16]

Geshur and Gilead were principalities located east of the Jordan River, between Mount Hermon and Bashan.[17] Hosea described Gilead as a place of wicked men stained with the footprints of blood, where marauders lay in ambush.[18] Now, consider that Gilead, Geshur, Mount Hermon, and Bashan were the homelands of the Rephaites recorded in Deuteronomy that were not conquered by Joshua.[19] Unger's further notes that the Girzites and the Geshurites were tribes closely associated with the Amalekites from ancient times and were undocumented tribes that survived the flood, just as the Amalekites were undocumented.[20] All were Nephilim tribes.

Amalekite brutality, too, was supported in 1 Samuel, where Amalek was recorded as a cruel and bloodthirsty nation that had a peculiar bias in its blood oath against Israel. This oath to destroy Israel was further underlined by Josephus,[21] who cited many biblical passages supporting his conclusion. In fact, in reference to when King Saul assaulted the Amalekites and captured their king, Agag, Josephus made another intriguing connection.[22] An Amalekite character at the time of Esther, some 500 to 600 years after the time of King Saul, evidently engaged in conspiring to convince the Persians to destroy the remnant of Judah.[23] The Amalekite in the book of Esther was named Haman the Agagite; he was a direct ancestor of Agag.[24] The appellation Agagite was interchangeable with Amalekite in its ancient application, reflecting their joint heritage.[25] The first Agag was one of the three sons of Anak, while the second Agag was the king of the Amalekites that Saul defeated. That Agag, too, was a giant. The Agagite title was a proud declaration of Amalekite heritage worn proudly by Amalekite/Nephilim kings.

What is most curious is that almost 700 years after the Amalekites were utterly destroyed by David and Saul, a descendant of the remnant of Amalek was still conspiring to continue the blood war against Israel. This blood oath[26] was no simple pledge of vengeance. It ran much deeper than that. It almost seems to have been encoded into the Amalekite DNA by virtue of its generational ferocity. What simply cannot be argued is that such an obsessive blood feud could have been sponsored by a simple dislike towards a nation of slaves' exodus to freedom. There simply had to be something sponsoring this hatred that continually kept it simmering within their bloodline.

The reality is that the blood oath against Israel and Judah has simmered ever since. The charcoals of hate have been fanned countless times over the millennia, boiling the feud over with genocide and holocaust by such people as the Assyrians, Babylonians, Romans, various corrupted Christian and Muslim nations, and of course, the Nazis. The Amalekite hatred and dedication to wipe Israel and Judah from memory will once more be stoked in the last days, against Israel, Judah, Christians, and Muslims, by end-time Babylon, the world government, and the Antichrist—by the descendants and wannabe descendants of the Nephilim races.

With the charges laid and the guilty verdict in, only divine judgment for the crimes remained. The sentence proclaimed was clear and simple; the nation of the Amalekites was condemned to utter destruction. Amalek was to come to ruin.[27] This violent and barbaric nation of war was not to be permitted the grace of any mercy or sympathy. This was the righteous and tragic consequence for aligning themselves with forces rooted in lies and darkness. But ruin was not enough for the crimes committed against God and Israel. Amalek had to be made an example of for all the generations to follow and in this age.

Israel was appointed the executioner for Amalek, which was just reward for the crimes committed against her. Israel was commissioned to "blot out the memory of Amalek from under heaven."[28] The judgment was equitable, in exacting proportions to the crimes committed. What Amalek endeavored to do in an alliance with her surrounding neighbors was to "destroy them [Isarel] as a nation, that the name Israel be remembered no more" (Psalm 83:4). The judgment pronounced by God was equal to the crime perpetrated by Amalek towards Israel, no more and no less.

The charge against Amalek, to blot out the nation’s memory from under heaven, extended to all the Nephilim nations of the Middle East. Only Nephilim nations originally opposed Israel in war, and it was the vitriolic Amalek who incited their brethren, the Nephilim-infested nations, to war against Israel. The passage quoted from Psalm 83 (above) unites the indictments and punishment of the Amalekites and all Nephilim nations allied with the Amalekites, those who swore to destroy Israel as a nation so that Israel’s name would be remembered no more. All the giants were to be exterminated.

CHAPTER 36

KING SAUL AND KING DAVID

When you enter the land the Lord your God is giving you and have taken possession of it and settled in it, and you say, "Let us set a king over us like all the nations around us," be sure to appoint over you the king the Lord chooses.

—Deuteronomy 17:14–15

Why was the Amalekite execution not carried out immediately? Why did God instruct Israel to wait until they were given rest from their other enemies before fulfilling their judicial commission?[1]

This time of rest did not come to pass until well into their future. The divine judgment resonated from the time of the Exodus and before the conquest. God instructed that when this rest came about and the people demanded a king like other nations, the monarch must be an Israelite and not a foreigner of any sort, the monarchs should not accumulate great wealth, and they should not return to Egypt. The kings were not to be polygamists, nor were they to consider themselves greater than any other Israelite. The kings were to make a copy of these laws and read every day; only then would the descendants of these kings reign a long time (Deut. 17:14–20). All this was decreed in direct defiance and opposition to polygamist Nephilim kings of other nations, who chose an opposite set of principles. The responsibility for the first Israelite kingship fell first to King Saul and then to King David.

According to Jewish legends, Saul was chosen because of his military record. Saul captured the tablets of the Law back from the famous Goliath, an insult that Goliath would not forget.[2] As a sign of God's favor with Saul and the ordaining of Talut/Saul to kingship, the Qur'an notes that Talut fought Goliath and his army with just a few faithful warriors, defeating the Philistines and retrieving the Ark of the Covenant, which contained the tablets of the Law.[3] Saul was the bravest Israelite, a hyperbolized hero of old, which clarifies why he was made king.[4] He was as strong as a lion, in conjunction with his tall and handsome appearance. Saul's, original name was Labaya, meaning "great lion of Yaw (weh)," but he was renamed Saul, meaning "asked for," as the people of Israel asked God for a king so they could be like other nations.[5]

Scripture records Saul as a large man, a man without equal, a head taller than any of the others.[6] He was very handsome, exceedingly modest, innocent, and of very good Messianic bloodlines.[7] He was the son of a high-ranking chieftain Kish, son of Abiel, from the clan of Matri.[8] Abiel was the son of Zeror, son of Becorath, son of Aphiah, son of Benjamin.[9]

When Samuel became old, the people asked him for a king to lead them as all the other nations had, because Samuel's sons were not fit to carry on as judges.[10] According to the Qur'an, Israel asked the prophet for a king, and in return, they would fight God's good causes.[11] Then Talut/Saul was declared king. Talut is Arabic for "Saul."[12]

According to Pinsky, the people asked for Saul because he was tall and a powerful warrior, but Saul was not Samuel's choice.[13] Saul was chosen by God, sent to Samuel to anoint, and drafted to rescue the Israelites from the oppression of the Philistines.[14] Pinsky writes that Samuel saw in Saul his capacity to lead; ruthlessness; willingness to murder, lie, extort in the name of policy; and the ability to play off courtiers against each other. Samuel anointed Saul, but Saul was the antithesis of Samuel and everything he stood for.[15] Samuel warned against taking a king, for the king would war regularly, taking their sons; taking the best of the daughters; taking their land and trades to feed, arm, and look after his armies and taxing a tenth of everything to pay for those armies.[16] Additionally, Saul did not have the backing of the nobility, simply because Saul did not possess his own great wealth.[17]

Labaya likely refers to Lab' Ayyu, who secular institutions believe led a people of the Middle East, the (obscure) Apiru.[18] The Armana Archive and Letters of Egypt referred to Labaya, the prince of the northern highland city of Shechem, who unexpectedly expanded his empire to encompass Jerusalem and Gezer in the south, to Megiddo and the Jezreel Valley and beyond in the north. The Armana Letters suggest Labaya allied himself with the Apiru of the south to secure his empire. Apiru is sometimes transliterated as "the Habiru."[19] Scholars believe Habiru were wandering chieftains arriving in Canaan from Mesopotamia around the end of the third millennium B.C.E.; likely referring to the arrival of Abraham. They were Semite mercenaries recorded as Apiru in Egyptian sources and as Abiru in Mesopotamian sources.[20] Certainly, Abraham was well known for his military prowess in the War of Four Kings Against Five, his mercenary activities for the king of Sodom, and his frequent conflicts with Canaanite authorities.[21]

Shechem was the city where God confirmed the Promised Land to Abraham's descendants, whereby Abraham built an altar in the hill country of Ephraim.[22] Shechem is where Jacob built an altar upon his return from Padan Aram[23] and where the Hivite princes, Hamor and Shechem, were slaughtered by Jacobs' sons for raping Dinah.[24] Jacob purchased a significant parcel of land there, and he bequeathed it to Joseph and his descendants.[25] Joshua later renewed the covenant with God at Shechem after the conquest.[26] After that, the Covenant was renewed there annually.[27] Joshua also allotted Shechem to the sons of Joseph, Manasseh, and Ephraim,[28] and Shechem was where the bodies of Joseph and Jacob were brought back from Egypt and buried in the tomb bought by Abraham.[29]

Archaeology has shown that Shechem was Tell Balath, a very prosperous city between 1400 and 1200 B.C.E.[30] Shechem was the location where the Israelite judge Abimelech destroyed the House of Baal-Berith in 1150 B.C.E.[31] Later, King Rehoboam, successor to King Solomon, went to Shechem to be crowned king over all Israel.[32] Subsequently, when King Jeroboam rebelled away from Judah and Rehoboam, Jeroboam refortified Shechem, making it the capital city for the northern nation of Israel.[33]

The Apiru recorded in the fourteenth-century B.C.E. Armana Letters are thought by historians to have been the Hebrews (Judah) who operated outside the Egyptian authority and were notorious enemies of King Abdi Heda of Jerusalem. Apiru were recorded as late as 1000 B.C.E., and then mysteriously there is no record of them thereafter, which is likely explained by David's rise to power after Saul, when the Apiru then operated as a united Israelite entity in a new, expanded empire that thereafter included Jerusalem. The Armana Letters recorded the Apiru as "treasonous, dangerous, and cutthroats." The Letters recorded a tenth-century B.C.E. strong man and Apiru leader who emerged from Hebron to capture Jerusalem.[34] This then is the probable Gentile record of David's rise to power. It is likely that Middle East dragon dynasties would have considered the Israelite king an illegitimate barbarian.

Archaeological records recording David's founding dynasty are stingy at best, causing many seculars to conclude David is a complete mythology. However, an Aramaic inscription, dating back to the ninth century B.C.E., discovered in 1993 C.E., in the ruins of the ancient city of Dan, clearly recorded the words "House of David."[35] This and other archaeological records already presented, set alongside monotheistic scriptures and the lasting imprint David left on Western society, all testify of the reality of the House of David. At the end of the day, there are no real concrete reasons to deny the historical existence to the House of David or the House of Saul.

Reasons cited later in biblical legends for removing Saul as king, other than the violating of his kingship covenant to utterly destroy the Amalekites from the under heaven, were that Saul was too mild a ruler, but even more importantly, his royal bloodlines were so immaculate with nobility that it was feared his descendants would become too proud and haughty.[36] Saul's bloodlines included such impressive relatives as the judges Ehud and Gideon.[37] Saul's ancestors included a long line of heads of families and chiefs of tribes.[38]

At Saul's anointing, Samuel recommissioned Israel to obliterate the Amalekites.[39] No one, including men, women, children, and infants, was to be spared. The Israelites were not to spare any livestock or any animal the Amalekites possessed. Even the possessions of the Amalekites were not to be looted. Everything about the Amalekites was to be utterly destroyed, erasing the Amalekite name and memory from under heaven. All this was to be carried out in the name of the Almighty. The instructions should not have been a source of confusion for any reason. The edicts from God must always be carried out precisely as God dictates. Once the Omnipotent has spoken, who can stand or challenge the All-Knowing?

The answer seems obvious, but God's judgment was not carried forth to the letter of the edict. Lack of complete obedience resulted in devastating consequences for Saul and his Benjamite descendants. Remember, though, Saul only fought the Amalekites because he was forced to through his kingship covenants. Therefore, Ginsberg records that Saul was easily persuaded to keep the spoils of war,[40] which violated his covenant with God. Saul was never totally committed to slaughter all the Amalekites from the face of the earth.

Refreshing your thoughts for a moment, the Amalekites occupied two separate locations in the Middle East. They dwelled in the area of the Sinai, just to the south of the Land of the Covenant, as well as in the western Mesopotamian region, just east and slightly north of Israel. It was the southern Amalekites that Saul chose to attack, and the Israelites scored an overwhelming victory, slaughtering the Amalekites where they found them. Josephus records Saul defeating the Amalekites in the regions of Pelsium of Egypt to the Red Sea,[41] while Samuel supported those records by stating that Saul defeated the Amalekites in the region of Shur to Egypt.[42]

Saul chose to spare some of the Amalekites, including their king, Agag, in addition to the prized and valued animals.[43] Saul further spared Agag because Saul admired the tall and handsome king.[44] Saul was a very large warrior himself—if Saul found Agag to have been very tall, one wonders just how big Agag actually was. Agag was named after a former Nephilim king, a son of Anak, from the time of the flood,[45] undoubtedly suggesting Nephilim blood still flowed through the veins of Amalekite kings.

The violation of God's righteous edict ordained at Saul's anointing could not be left without being addressed, no matter the reasons Saul might have had for doing so. Sparing Agag's life triggered the persecution of the Jewish people many centuries later, while Judah was in exile. Haman the Agagite, recorded in Hebrew legend as a direct ancestor of Agag, conspired to rid the earth of the Jewish remnant while under Persian rule.[46]

Consequently, Samuel denounced Saul for his sins, proclaiming the everlasting kingdom of God would not continue from Saul's Benjamite loins.[47] God removed the right of succession for Saul's sons to the throne of Israel, and therefore the lineage of the Messiah, as proper punishment for his failure.[48] Saul was permitted to continue on as king for as long as he lived, but there was not to be a royal dynasty spawned in Israel from his bloodline. The Messianic bloodline and the everlasting throne were transplanted to the tribe of Judah, just as it had been originally prophesied in Genesis.[49]

Ironically, it was Saul's mercy and empathy for the Amalekites that eventually killed him, for it was Saul's vassal army of Amalekites, according to Rohl, which was protecting the back of Saul's army[50] during a later battle against the Philistines. Before this great battle against Achish of the Philistines, Achish sent his mercenary, David, away, because the Philistine commanders did not trust David and his men in a battle against their own people.[51] The Amalekites then betrayed Saul, permitting the Philistines to encircle and assault the Israelites, wounding Saul.[52] This was a battle where the Israelites fled before the Philistines on Mount Gilboa and where the Philistines pressed hard after Saul and his sons; Saul then fell on his own sword, killing himself.[53]

Saul's and his sons' bodies were hung unceremoniously by the Philistines at Beth Shan, and they were later stolen by the citizens of Jabesh Gilead.[54] The Philistines stripped Saul from his armor, cutting off Saul's head; they then hung Saul's head and his armor in the temple of Dagon, the father of Baal in some versions of mythology,[55] until the valiant men of Jabesh returned the bodies of Saul and his sons back to Jabesh.[56] David eventually confiscated the bones of Saul and Jonathan, burying them in a tomb of Saul's father, Kish, at Zela in Benjamin.[57]

By the time of the Philistine battle, Samuel had passed away. Saul summoned a medium to bring back Samuel from the grave, in the hopes of gaining victory over the Philistines, but the spirit/ghost of Samuel angrily rebuked Saul once more for not completely destroying the Amalekites and then prophesied Israel would be defeated by the Philistines and that Saul would be killed in that battle.[58] "Saul died because he was unfaithful to the Lord; he did not keep the word of the Lord and even consulted a medium for guidance. So the Lord put him to death and turned the kingdom over to David, son of Jesse" (1 Chron. 10:13–14).

Now, after the original battle between Saul and Agag, Samuel had taken events into his own hands to ensure the fulfillment of divine Judgment.

Samuel had slain Agag himself.[59] Samuel had then proceeded to anoint a new, future king of Israel, the young David, son of Jesse, of the tribe of Judah, to fulfill the divine obligations and replace the family of Saul in the Royal House.[60] David then took possession of the throne after Saul died.[61] Much jealousy exuded from Saul towards David during the balance of Saul's reign, for David was commissioned to be the new king while Saul was still alive and still king.[62]

It is clear that Saul did not totally annihilate the Amalekites, for the book of Samuel records David fought the Amalekites (1 Sam. 8:12), destroying them at Ziklag (1 Sam. 30:1–31). It would seem likely that David exercised more of a mopping-up operation in the south, but he must have waged all-out war against the eastern Amalekites. Although the Bible provides little detail, it is clear that David did destroy the Amalekites,[63] just as other legends describe Joab's adventures and the destruction of the Amalekite capital.[64] Certainly, 1 Samuel underscores that David defeated the entire Amalekite nation, while the King James Version records this victory as a complete "slaughter of the Amalekites" (2 Sam. 1:1 KJV).

Should there be any doubt that David actually did fulfill his judicial obligation, Psalm 9:4–8 puts this notion to rest:

> You have sat on your throne, judging righteously. You have rebuked the nations and destroyed the wicked; you have blotted out their name forever and ever. Endless ruin has overtaken the enemy, you have uprooted their cities; even the memory of them has perished.

This passage can only be interpreted and attributed to the Amalekites. No other nation other than that of the Nephilim had their memory blotted out forever and ever. No other nation during the conquest was judged from the throne of God. No other nation of that period received the wrath of endless ruin poured out on them. Therefore, one can apply this passage to both of those vile and corrupt peoples, for both peoples had that exact divine judgment pronounced upon them by Moses and God, but even more specifically, on the Amalekites.

During the reign of King Hezekiah of Judah, the Simeonite sons of Ishi invaded the hill country of Seir, killing the remaining Amalekites who had escaped.[65] One would expect that this final blow finished off whatever remnant of Amalekite culture and society that had somehow survived from David's genocidal purge against the Amalekites.

Although we do hear from Amalekite residue during the Babylonian exile, with Haman the Agagite in the book of Esther,[66] neither history nor the Bible ever again records Amalekites as a nation. Secular history has forgotten the Amalekites, as though they never existed; only the Bible has maintained their existence as a witness to the world. Amalekites were not merely eradicated from the face of the earth. They were blotted out from memory under heaven and completely ruined, just as the divine judgment required. The Amalekite remnant was lost into the disparate nations of antiquity.

With the completion of the judicial obligations regarding the Amalekites by David, we must now turn our investigation to David's other divine obligation to God. This was in respect to the other Nephilim. Both the Amalekites and the remnant of the Nephilim survived until the time of David, with the Nephilim descendants, the Avvites, still residing in the region of Gaza, where the Philistines lived. David was the final executioner's sword of God levied against both the Amalekites and the Nephilim at the same general time. The Nephilim and David chronicle was yet another story in itself, which included the Goliath legend. All this and more is reserved for the next chapters.

As for the true identity of the lost Amalekite nation, logic suggests Amalekites were part of the Horites. Remember, Horites dwelled in Seir, the land of the southern Amalekites. Additionally, Amalekites were an ancient nation that dwelled from Shur to Egypt since ancient times.[67] Strangely, Seir does not have a father listed in the Table of Nations, even though the Table of Nations recorded Seir, as the father of the Horites, who dwelled in Seir before Edomites arrived there.[68] Seir, then, was a Horite/Amalekite/Nephilim chief.

Seir derived from the word se-ar, meaning "hairy," just as Enkidu, a giant from the Gilgamesh Epic was hairy.[69] "Hairy" was also the description applied to the prominent dynasts of Sumerian lore, descending from Luluwa through the Anunnaki King Nergal and Queen Eresh-kigal.[70] Nephilim were believed to have had rough, hairy skin, just as Esau did.[71] Furthermore, Numbers 13 cited Amalekites as being the descendants of Anak,[72] just as Genesis 14 included the Amalekites as a giant nation defeated by Chedorlaomer.[73]

Similarly, Amalek merged with the indigenous race of Seir (Horites) that formed the Great Amalekite Race, just as the Rephaites were branded as an aboriginal race, meaning Horites were likely Rephaites. Horites were non-Semites associated closely with the Hurrians, both whose etymology connects back to early cave dwellers. Moreover, Hurrian/Horite tablets discovered in Nuzi and Mari mysteriously connects this ambiguous nation to the (equally important) Kingdom of Mittanni.[74]

These connections suggest Amalekites were indeed a pure Anakite strain before merging with Amalek and a distinct but separate branch of the Rephaim. The Amalekites may have been another surviving remnant of antediluvian Nephilim, along with Seir as the founding father. This becomes clearer when we revisit the antediluvian appellation of Amalek.

Listed among the names of antediluvian Nephilim was the name Amalek. He was noted as the twin brother to Samael.[75] We now have an actual antediluvian giant to trace this enigmatic nation back to, for Amalek was the forefather of Seir. In another tradition, Amalek was the prominent antediluvian Sumerian king Akalum-Dug, understanding that Akalum was Sumerian for the infamous, evil "Lamech," which found its true anagram in producing the name Amalek,[76] and that all the antediluvian Sumerian kings were Nephilim.

We can also connect yet another variant name of a king to Amalek: Anam' Melech, pronounced as "a-nam-e l-lek." Anam' Melech was worshipped by the Babylonian people from the city of Sepharvaim. Melech, as we will learn later, is Hebrew for "king," as in Molech/Malech, the god of the Canaanites, son of Baal, who required the sacrifice of children in his worship. Anam' Melech translates as "Anu, is king," with Anu, of course, being the great sky god and parent of the Anunnaki. Like Molech, Anam' Malech also required the sacrifice of children.[77] One wonders, was Anam' Malech the mythical god Molech? This is likely another variant and the same Amalek and/or Lamech, a Nephilim demigod of barbaric proportions.

The twin brother of the antediluvian giant Amalek was Samael. One of Samael's wives, Naamah, was considered the angel of prostitution and the mother of demons.[78] Samael the giant must have been the offspring of Samael the angel and Namaah. Namaah was sister to Tubal-Cain and daughter of Lamech (Amalek),[79] again neatly tying Cain's daughters of men to Nephilim and Amalekite origin to Nephilim. Amalekites named themselves after their forefathers, the Nephilim and Cainites, along with the merging of the descendants of Amalek, a tribe of Esau.

CHAPTER 37

DAVID AND GOLIATH

Goliath stood and shouted to the ranks of Israel, "Why do you not come out and line up for battle? Am I not a Philistine, and are you not the servants of Saul? Choose a man and have him come down to me. If he is able to fight and kill me, we will become your subjects; but if I overcome him and kill him, you will become our subjects and serve us." Then the Philistine said, "This day I defy the ranks of Israel! Give me a man and let us fight each other." On hearing the Philistine's words, Saul and the Israelites were dismayed and terrified.

—1 Samuel 17:8–11

"David and Goliath" is a timeless tale taught in Sunday school to enchanted young minds eager to emulate David. But what are the unexplained relationships between the Davidic throne and Nephilim kingships, royal bloodlines, and the bloodlines of the Antichrist?

David was the first of the true dynastic bloodline leading to Christ nearly 1,000 years later, on whom God built his earthly but royal government that Jesus would later inherit. David is also from the dynastic bloodline that all spurious royal bloodlines now desperately strive to align themselves with, in order to further enhance their own perceived pedigree and credibility.

The passage opening this chapter recounts a riveting drama that unfolded at one of the most important crossroads of Israel's prophetic journey. This is the first time we are introduced to a very young David, who intercedes to influence Israel's destiny. This was a time when King Saul and his army were about to confront the powerful and militaristic Philistines. They antagonized the Israelites incessantly with continuous incursions and insults.

Philistines represented the greatest militaristic threat to Israel, preventing Israel to that time from achieving an age of peace, where they could build their dream, manifested in what later became the first temple. It was no coincidence that the Nephilim-led Philistines were such a formidable military force or that they harbored such a bloodthirsty oath against the Israelites. The other antagonizing nations, such as the Jebusites and Moabites, were not a match militarily for the then hardened Israelites, but the Amalekites and Philistines led by Nephilim were a completely different and more dangerous set of foes.

The Philistines and the Israelites squared off, each occupying the high ground separated by a river valley. Both sides realized the downright danger in launching the first attack volley, leaving the enemy to fight with a lethal advantage from the high ground. The Israelites were well aware of the mighty Nephilim warriors that enhanced the strength of the Philistine ranks. Israel was not prepared to give any advantage to such a warrior nation as the Philistines. The Israelites trembled with trepidation from the historical scars inflicted upon them by the Philistine skirmishes past. The Philistines, too, were warily respectful of Israel's resiliency in warding off the Philistine incursions for so many years. This was a classic, ancient Mexican standoff —eye-to-eye with each other, both locked in stalemate by fear, all the while begrudged with respect.

As the tension escalated, the Philistines steadfastly increased the pressure by several notches. A giant from Gath named Goliath began to proceed into the valley every morning and every evening, defying and challenging all Israel to scrounge up a worthy opponent, to settle the affair with him personally, in mortal, one-on-one combat. The winner would take all, thereby subjugating the other people. This was a corrosive challenge, poured spitefully over the courage of Israel, which the Philistines did not anticipate Israel would accept. This denigrating challenge, vitriolic to both God and Israel, required yet another awe-inspiring, divine intervention for the sake of the chosen people. This was David's time.

David was a complex individual, who was strapped with all the weight and pressure for the future of humankind. God selected David for this role because of what was in David's heart,[1] not for his perfection. David possessed the heart that was true and zealous in pursuit of God. The Qur'an underscored David's devotion to God as a man of strength that always turned to God for support.[2] Most presume this automatically meant David was totally pure of heart and full of peace. David was pure of heart and true in faith to God, but we are not privileged to know this inner part of David, except that he, too, struggled with his humanity, as do all humans.

The role David was selected to play in Israel's destiny was not that of a peacemaker. David was a warrior king, selected to subdue the enemies of Israel. It was David who fulfilled the Israelite obligations from the Covenant through violence and war. It was David who overran the remaining nations and enemies of Israel, securing an age of peace. Just as David completed the task of defeating the Amalekites, he also defeated the balance of the antagonizing nations surrounding Israel, who all took their turn at tormenting Israel throughout the times of the judges and Saul.[3] Mohammad said this regarding David: "God gave him sovereignty and wisdom and taught him what he pleased. If God did not drive some back by means of others the earth would be completely corrupt, but God is bountiful to all."[4]

It was David who established Jerusalem as the heart and soul of Israel. It was David who battled his entire life, enabling Solomon to become the peaceful king of wisdom. And it was Solomon who was permitted to build the holy temple, not David, because of the blood that was on the warrior hands of David. We must not forget that David became famous for being the great warrior king, not the peace-giving priest king Solomon was.

Some critics of scriptural history might consider David barbaric, not worthy to head the royal dynasty of priest-kings. From a purely secular point of view, one can easily arrive at this conclusion. But, we must understand David was merely fulfilling his commission after David was ordained to king by Samuel, and as directed by God (1 Samuel 16: 1-23), and the Holy Covenant “The King” edict: “When you enter the land the Lord your God is giving you and have taken possession of it and settled in it, and you say, ‘Let us set a king over us like all the nations around us,’ be sure to appoint over you the king the Lord your God chooses” (Deuteronomy 17:14-15). David was chosen by God immediately following Saul’s failure to uphold God’s command to eradicate all Amalekites (1 Samuel 15:1-35), and to free Israel from and Philistine oppression (1 Samuel 14:47-52). David fulfilled God’s edict against the Amalekites, in addition to fulfilling his war time Covenant obligations, as the ordained king of God’s Holy Covenant: to “Drive Out the Nations” (Deuteronomy 7: 1-6) where it states: “Do not look on them with pity and do not serve their gods, for that will be a snare for you” (Deuteronomy 7:16); and in Numbers :“But if you do not drive out the inhabitants of the land, those you allow to remain will become barbs in your [Israel’s] eyes, thorns in your [Israel’s] sides” (Numbers 33:55-56), all the while noting the “Going to War” edict to: “put to the sword all the men it” (Deuteronomy 20: 13) lest God “do to you [Israel] what I plan to do them” (Numbers 33:56). Hence, one concludes all these edicts were still in effect at the time of Saul and David as directed by the “King”, “Driving Out the Nations”, and “Going to War” edicts, while noting from the “Driving Out the Nations” edict that “The Lord your God will drive out those nations before you, little by little. You will not be allowed to eliminate them all at once, or the wild animals will multiply around you” Deuteronomy 7: 22).

It is no secret that David had blood on his hands. He fought numerous battles, killing countless other warriors and people. It was said of David: “Saul has slain his thousands and David his tens of thousands.”[5] David slew 200 Philistines, delivering their foreskins to Saul as the price to marry Michal, Saul’s daughter.[6] David was even guilty of conspiring to murder Uriah, husband of Bathsheba, all due to unbridled lust.[7] David was then rebuked by Nathan. After David repented, he was forgiven of his sins by God.[8] These records show that David was still merely a man and not a form of deity. Certainly, David was not and is not to be considered a king of peace, or a minister of all that was gentle and perfect, nor a human who was free from sin. We must regard David for what he was a warrior king executing the divine judgment of God, just as his descendant will do in the great day of the Lord’s wrath.[9]

God did not permit His great warrior to be the builder of His holy shrine. This responsibility was left for Solomon, the king of peace and wisdom of that time, reflecting the other half of the dual nature of the Messiah, who is the King of Peace and Wisdom, as well as the conquering Warrior of God, avenging His martyred saints.[10] One might conclude the first two kings of the Messianic dynasty reflected the dual character traits of the Messiah; however, both lacked the perfection required by the Law to suffice as the Lamb of the sacrifice. One can say, though, that David was the Lion trait, and Solomon was the Lamb aspect, foreshadowing the dual nature of the true Messiah, Jesus.

David’s devotion was rewarded with great knowledge and wisdom,[11] remembered in the Qur’an as graced with favor over many of the prophets and messengers, and graced with the Psalms as his Scripture.[12] David’s kingdom was strengthened for his devotion, and he had a decisive demeanor when speaking.[13] God made the mountains join David in glorifying God, and the birds all echoed his praise.[14]

As with most legendary warrior kings, a childhood mythology grew up around David that had mystical and fantastic beginnings. Most critical secular historians consider the Goliath tale to be a gross exaggeration of the truth at best and, more than likely, just a mythical story created to further enhance the glory of the warrior king who succeeded in forging a royal dynasty. Cynical secular historians make similar conclusions about the childhoods of both Moses and Jesus, declaring that all legendary kings had similar childhood myths, citing Romulus and Remus or Alexander the Great of the Macedonians as examples of their great earthly wisdom. They note these as parallel childhood mythologies from other legendary kings as supposed support for their arrogance.

Those assertions underscore their nonbelief in the literal truth and accuracy of the Bible. The Goliath narrative was not a coincidental tale clumsily inserted into Scripture. The Goliath narrative oozes with context and relationships of all that is important in the Old Testament. The narrative resonates to the heart of the judicial obligations from the Covenant, including the coronation obligations rendered onto David by Samuel. Furthermore, the Goliath narrative is an unusual narrative directly related to the Nephilim narrative and to the unexplained Avvites.

Surprisingly, Goliath, according to Jewish legends, was related to David, for Goliath was the grandson of one of David's relatives, Orpah, related to Ruth, from whom David received his royal, Messianic bloodline.[15] Ruth married Boaz, who begat Obed, who begat Jesse, the father of David.[16] Now, in the time of the Judges, there came a great famine, and an Israelite from Bethlehem named Elimelech and his wife, Naomi, escaped to dwell in Moab; they bore two sons named Mahlon and Kilion. Elimelech then died in Moab, leaving Naomi and her two sons. The two sons then married Moabite women named Orpah and Ruth, but both Mahlon and Kilion died ten years thereafter, leaving Naomi, Orpah, and Ruth all as widows. Naomi then returned to Bethlehem, with Ruth accompanying her, while Orpah returned to her parents' household.[17]

Pinsky notes that both Ruth and Orpah, according to the twentieth-century Hebrew poet Hayyim Nahman Bialik and the Dead Sea Scroll of Orpah, were no ordinary Moabites, for both Ruth and Orpah were the daughters of the king of Moab, Eglon. Apparently, King Eglon had prudent respect for Israel and permitted the marriages of his princess daughters to Kilion/Chilion and Mahlon. Orpah then returned to the royal household after Naomi went back to Bethlehem with Ruth. This, then, makes Goliath a third generation cousin to David, as Goliath was the grandson of Orpah.[18]

If Goliath was not Nephilim but just a gigantic Philistine warrior, then Goliath has no part in this book. But if Goliath was Nephilim, then we are obligated to investigate him. Certainly, everyone knows that Goliath was stated to be over nine feet tall.[19] Goliath's breastplate weighed 125 pounds! He slung his spear over his back because the spear was too heavy to be grasped and drawn for battle. The spear's point weighed fifteen pounds alone.[20] Goliath required a harem of servants to follow him at all times, just to carry his armor.

Goliath was the hero of the Philistines. Goliath in biblical legend was celebrated as the strongest and the greatest of warriors written about in Scripture; in fact, legends note Scripture tells precious little concerning what might have been recorded about this extraordinary warrior and his exploits. What we do know from Jewish legends is that Goliath was born to either Orpah (or a daughter of Orpah with the same name), along with four other giants.[21] This suggests Philistia was brimming with iniquitous giants, as four giants came from one mother alone.

Gibborim translated from Hebrew to “hero potentate,” as it was applied in Genesis—one of the tyrant kings of ancient city-states. Now consider Goliath was from Gath and that there were five potentates of Philistia that reigned in Ashod, Ashkelon, Ekron, Gaza, and Gath. Philistines recounted these five potentates as Avvites.[22] Was Goliath a Nephilim/Gibborim from one of the five city-states of Philistia? This is a legitimate postulation, but can we in fact establish it as so?

The book of 2 Samuel listed four other prominent giants among the Philistines: Ishi-Benob, Saph, Lahmi brother of Goliath, and a six-fingered and six-toed giant named Sippai.[23] What is most probable is those four other giants were four of the Nephilim/Gibborim potentates of the five city-states of Philistia. The Bible does not explicitly state that they were, but we need only take a lesson from history; wherever Nephilim abounded, they were always the evil potentates, governing the people they lived among, from the days of Noah to the Amalekites and the Amorites. Goliath would have simply been the fifth Nephilim/Gibborim reigning in Gath, with the other four giants ruling Ashod, Ashkelon, Ekron, and Gaza. Goliath, as already stated, was a Gittite from Gath in Philistia.[24]

Now, Joshua, during the conquest, cleansed the Covenant Land of Nephilim, leaving only a remnant in the land of the five kingdoms of Philistine—Gaza, Ashod, Ashkelon, Gath, and Ekron—the very same Pentapolis of city-states listed in the David and Goliath narrative. This cannot be a coincidence. Joshua knew the Pentapolis as the five Avvite kingdoms of Philistia,[25] suggesting that many more giants must have dwelled among the Philistines. The books of 2 Samuel and 1 Chronicles concurred, lucidly identifying Gath as the land where the descendants of Rapha lived.[26] Therefore, no one should be surprised that a giant originating from Gath was actually a Nephilim.

Further, when the Bible speaks to the leaders of Philistine, it refers to “the five [Avvite] kings of the city-states” or “the rulers of Philistine” or “the five rulers of Philistine.”[27] According to Neil Asher Silberman and Israel Finkelstein, the word utilized that translates into English as “rulers,” “lords,” or “kings” of Philistine is most unusual and was not a Hebrew word. The original term utilized was the five seranim of the Philistine Pentapolis. Seranim is thought to have been adopted from the Philistines into the Hebrew language. Silberman and Finkelstein assert scholars link seranim etymologically with the Greek word tyrannos, or “tyrant.” The first ruler who was called Tyrannos in Greek literature was Gyges, the king of Lydia.[28] Greek Titans were known variantly as Gyges,[29] and as you will recall, gyges is the root word for giant and gigantic. The Avvite kings from the Philistine Pentapolis were all giants; let there be no doubt.

This does not prove Goliath was Nephilim, but all the circumstantial evidence testified that Goliath must have been a Nephilim/Gibborim. What other explanation could there be? Certainly Goliath was a Philistine warrior leader. He challenged would-be heroes of all Israel to one-on-one, mortal combat, with the victor subjugating the entirety of the loser's people. It would appear Goliath was the leader of the Philistines, for no other leader was mentioned. There can be no other reasonable explanation when this information is combined with the knowledge that Nephilim were the warrior potentates from both pre- and post-deluge periods. It follows that Goliath must have been one of the potentates/kings from the five city-states, and Gath would have been the city-state over which he was king, for Goliath was a Gittite.

Scripture does state the five famous giants descended from Rapha and Gath. The KJV recounts the five famous giants descending from a specific giant from Gath. Therefore, was Og actually Rapha, or was Rapha a descendant of Og, who was the father of the Rephaites? Certainly Og did survive the war with Moses and Joshua, living to a great age.

The David and Goliath narrative begins with the Philistines gathering all their forces for war and assembling them to fight the Israelites at Socoh in Judah.[30] Saul and the Israelites assembled, making camp in the Valley of Elah.[31] The Philistines controlled one bank, while the Israelites controlled the other bank, in the adjacent valley from their camp. This quickly became a stalemate, in which the Israelites had no interest in being the first to break the deadlock, and neither did the Philistines. This prompted the scenario for the legendary David and Goliath story to unfold.

Goliath, arrogant beyond belief, saw this stalemate as a great opportunity to humiliate the Israelites. Every morning Goliath would suit up in his armor and challenge the Israelites to send forth their strongest and bravest warrior to do mortal combat with him, with the victor winning the subjugation of the loser's people. Samuel recorded Goliath went forward with this arrogant challenge for forty mornings and forty evenings, with no Israelite daring to take up the challenge. Goliath utterly humiliated all Israel, covering the nation with the shroud of cowardice. The Israelites were, quite frankly, justifiably terrified and dismayed by the challenge; they were mortified by the sight of Goliath parading his hubris before them every morning and every evening.[32]

At first read, one might look at this scenario as embellished or contrived. Why would any nation or army place their future well-being into the hands of one warrior in single, mortal combat, no matter how powerful the warrior was? An all-or-nothing contest with two individuals seems a bit fanciful, when both had large armies ready to do battle. But, in fact, Cahill notes single combat was often used in ancient times to avoid the gruesome bloodletting of a battle that would decide who would be subject to whom; similar accounts were also recorded in The Iliad as further proof.[33]

There seemed to be no warrior throughout all Israel, including the large and famous warrior King Saul himself, who was prepared to take up the challenge. Goliath defiled the name of Israel continuously, day after day. This was Goliath's revenge for Saul embarrassing Goliath previously, when Saul retrieved the tablets of the Law from Gath, which were under the protection of Goliath at that time.[34] Saul was not about to provide Goliath with his revenge, refusing to engage Goliath in mortal combat. One wonders, was his legend, in addition to the Qur'an account, based on the Philistines capturing the Ark of the Covenant?[35]

Not until a teenage boy named David, son of Jesse, from the tribe of Judah, stepped forward was the challenge accepted by the Israelites. This was a day that was recorded as a witness to one of the great days of victorious faith for the meek. David went forward to meet the giant in mortal combat, one-on-one. Josephus recounted the event, picturing David moving forward with disdain and disgust towards the giant.[36] This seems odd—unless you consider that David, through his faith, was under the protection of God— that a teenage boy would not be too overwhelmed with fear and trepidation when approaching a great warrior giant in combat. In fact, the niv Bible states Goliath was a fighting man from his youth, and the KJV says Goliath was a "man of war from his youth" (1 Sam. 17:33).

Goliath cursed David by Goliath's gods, asking if David thought Goliath was a dog for coming at him with sticks.[37] Josephus notes that David declared Goliath was not a man, nor even a dog, but rather a creature worse than a dog.[38] David declared Goliath to be nothing better than a beast, a description reserved for the vilest of people and demons. David then vowed to slay the giant that day, cut off his head, and feed his carcass to the birds.[39] This statement once again testified to an amazing declaration of disdain, defiance, determination, and courage in the face of such an awesome foe, and yet David remained poised, delivering the threat with uncanny due diligence.

The whole affair was so comical to Goliath that he roared with laughter.[40] Israel, after forty days of humiliation, had finally sent forward their warrior of salvation to reclaim their honor for all Israel. But the warrior commissioned to restore the honor of Israel was nothing more than a boy barely out of puberty, who now faced a nine-foot giant, one of the most ferocious warriors of that time, and perhaps of all postdiluvian time, according to various legends. The irony, drama, and comedy were inescapable, and yet this was the scenario being played out that morning at Socoh. For these reasons, one understands why Goliath could not restrain himself from erupting into bellowing laughter.

At this point, the Bible records what seems to be an obscure anecdote. It is almost always overlooked as unimportant, but it has significant relevance to Israel's commission to exterminate the Nephilim and to the even more remarkable testimony of courage and faith David exhibited. When David sauntered down to do battle with Goliath, he sifted through pebbles until he found five, selected for their smoothness, that he would use as projectiles for his sling (1 Sam. 17:40).

Why choose five smooth stones? At first read, this may appear to be innocent, normal, and nominal, assuming that David decided to pack extra projectiles, just in case he should miss. This natural conclusion, however, does not stand the test of scrutiny. If David was under the protection of the Almighty, and he was, one stone would be ample, and God would have seen to it that it was, just as the epic described. So why did David select five stones?

The solution to the conundrum is quite simple, if one considers the facts. David was simply preparing to kill all five Nephilim warrior kings that were present that day. David was prepared to do combat with all five kings from the Philistine Pentapolis, should the events require it. David selected five projectiles to kill five Nephilim/Gibborim. Sippai, Saph, Lahme, and Ishi-Benob were all present that day as the reigning kings of the five Philistine city-states, along with Goliath. The other Avvites did not come to Goliath's aid that day, but David could not be certain that they would not. No matter, the other four Nephilim kings came to their destruction later, at the hands of David and his famous fighting men.

The one-on-one battle to the death was an anticlimactic spectacle. This was not a brutal slugfest, leaving the combatants spent with exhaustion. David simply selected one of the smooth stones and slung it toward Goliath. The stone launched like a missile. It sank into Goliath's forehead, dropping him like a giant redwood. Once Goliath was felled, David advanced toward the giant and beheaded him with Goliath's own sword, for David was not packing a sword that day. David held Goliath's decapitated head high in the air for all to see. The Israelites clamored with excitement, but the Philistines began to tremble with fear (1 Sam. 17:49–51).

Critics look at David's using a sling to slay a warrior giant as yet another reason to ridicule this narrative. However, we must once again slip into the shoes of that period to understand the sling was undeniably a wise choice and a most formidable weapon. The sling came from those used by the 26,000strong Benjamite army in the Benjamite war, where Benjamites employed 700 left-handed slingers, who could each sling a stone at a hair and not miss (Judges 20:14–17). Later, David accepted into his army slingers from Benjamin (1 Chron. 12:2), again demonstrating David's faith and value in this weapon.

Indeed, the sling was a fearsome weapon used by ancient armies for a long period of time.[41] It was a common weapon employed by Egyptian, Assyrian, and Israelite armies on a wide scale and later with Greek and Roman armies. Stones were selected for their smoothness, just as the David and Goliath epic recorded, and they could be accurately slung to a distance of 600 feet,[42] meaning that David was not required to get all that close to slay Goliath. Stones were more damaging projectiles than arrows, and slingers were also a more mobile force than archers, possessing a greater and more accurate range than archers.[43]

The terror-stricken Philistines soon panicked, fleeing at the sight of their vanquished hero. The Israelites then instinctively surged forward at the signs of the Philistine panic. The surge gained momentum with every passing second. It transformed into a human tidal wave, overtaking the fleeing Philistines. The Israelites hunted the Philistines all the way back to Gath. Philistines suffered one of their greatest military defeats of all time that day, leaving thousands of their dead strewn from Socoh to Gath.[44]

What was even more remarkable was that David did not immediately ascend to king after the Goliath incident; David was still a boy, and Saul was permitted to remain king until he died. Saul did, however, take David under his wing in a relationship that evolved into a soap opera of paranoia. It was to be quite some time before David would once more take up his judicial commission against the Nephilim, to exterminate the remnant of the giants and to blot the name of Amalek from under heaven.

CHAPTER 38

THE AVVITES

All the tribes of Israel came to David at Hebron and said, “We are your own flesh and blood” …. When all the elders of Israel had come to King David at Hebron, the king made a compact with them at Hebron before the Lord, and they anointed David king over Israel.

—2 Samuel 5:1–3

After the death of Saul, why was David unaccountably anointed king at the infamous Hebron/Kiriath Arba? And why did David systematically develop and enhance a powerful elite force while in exile, with skillful warriors, David’s mighty men?

David was indeed the tenth-century B.C.E. Apiru strongman who emerged from Hebron to capture Jerusalem, an event which was recorded in the Armana Letters. This elite band of deadly commandos was indeed the very same band of treasonous cutthroats despised by the Egyptian empire, assembled in exile to fulfill God’s plans to eliminate Nephilim kingships from the Promised Land. The key commandos in this elite militia were Jashobeam, Eleazer, Abishai, Benaiah, Elhanan, Johnathan, and Sibbeccai.

The balance of the mighty men of David is listed by name in 1 Chronicles 11:26. It was with this elite fighting force of cutthroats deployed as the military spearhead that David conquered the remaining enemies of Israel and completed the extermination of the Nephilim in Gaza.

When the Philistines received word David had succeeded Saul as king, they immediately mobilized and then marched against David, thinking if they struck early, they could subdue Israel with surprise, destroying Israel and their unprepared king.[1] The Philistine Pentapolis clearly comprehended just how dangerous a foe Israel would become if left unchecked under David's skillful guidance and formative leadership. Hence, the Philistines immediately attacked Israel, without notice or provocation, in a place called the Valley of Rephaim, or Valley of the Giants, where David planted yet another punishing blow on the Philistines.

We know from Joshua that the Avvites dwelled within the five Philistine kingdoms in Gaza, just to the south and west of Jerusalem. Avvites/Avvim was a native tribe among the Canaanites, who lived on the Philistine plain as far as Gaza.[2] Unger's refers to the Avvites as "a people," the inhabitants of the southwest corner of Palestine along the seacoast.[3] This curious tribe has been linked scripturally with the ancient city in Benjamin recorded as Avvim, which bordered on the infamous Valley of Rephaim.[4] Avvim were further linked by Jerome to both the city of Ha-Avvim in the district of the Hivites and to the Hivites.[5]

Hivites were one of the seven nations that were to be destroyed by the Israelites;[6] they were thought to be Canaanite people descended through Sidon.[7] The Bible murkily records Esau marrying Oholibamah, the daughter of the Horite/Nephilim chief Anah, known alternatively as a Hivite.[8] One wonders if Hivites were in fact Horites, as Anah was recorded in the Table of Nations as part of the Horite chiefs of Edom.[9] Unger's suggests there is confusion between Hivite and Horite (Hurrian) in the original text of Genesis 36:2, 20, 29 and Joshua 9:7. Unger's goes onto note that it is possible that Hivites were an ethnic subdivision of Horites.[10] Nelson's further notes no secular references exist outside the Bible regarding Hivites and that many scholars believe Hivite was either a scribal error for Horite or Hivites were a smaller group within the Horite federation.[11] In my opinion, the Hivites were a Nephilim/Horite ethnic subdivision that interbred with the Canaanites.

Hamor and his son Shechem were Hivite princes[12] and the founders of the future capital city of the northern Israelite nation.[13] If the Hivites were indeed interbred giants, this clearly explains the Jacobite reaction, for the Jacobites slaughtered the Hivite giants, even though the Hivites asked for peace and forgiveness, even offering, for all Hivite males to be circumcised.[14]

So how closely were the Hivites and Avvites related to the Philistines? Certainly, both peoples lived alongside or with the Philistines. They were all further connected as similar peoples and enemies of Israel in Judges: "These are the nations the Lord left to test all those Israelites who had not experienced any of the wars in Canaan: the five rulers of the Philistines, all the Canaanites, the Sidonians, and the Hivites living in the Lebanon mountains" (Judg. 3:1–4). In this verse, the five Philistine rulers that Joshua labeled as Avvites, the Philistines, and the Hivvites were all connected as ongoing enemies of Israel, whom David would exterminate later. This cannot be a coincidence.

Again, what is most curious regarding the Hivites is that they instructed Joshua they were a people who had traveled from a distant country (Josh. 9:9).[15] So, too, did the Philistines travel to Gaza from a distant country, Caphtor, known also as Crete, noting the Caphtorites, and thus, the Philistines, destroyed most of the Avvites and settled in their place.[16] The Philistines were recorded in Genesis 10:13 and 1 Chronicles 1:12 as descending from Casluhites[17] and seemingly by inference were closely related to Caphtorites. Were the Hivites then a sub-tribe of both the Philistines and the Horites?

Crete evidently was home to the Caphtorites, Casluhites, and a people known as the Cherethites. Both Casluhites and Cherethites were closely linked in the Bible to the Caphtorites/Philistines, suggesting that all were part of an originating, invading group of people.[18] As you will recall, the Philistines viciously expropriated their lands from the Hittite and Egyptian empires, just before Israel's conquest of the Promised Land. Unger's records the Casluhites being born in Egypt, with their descendants leaving Egypt circa 2900–2700 B.C.E.[19] Scripture records Casluhites as the sons of Mizraim, the founder of Egypt, "from whom the Philistines came" (Gen. 10:13–14). Cretan history, for reference, is segregated into three distinct periods: the Neopalatial, circa 1720–1450 B.C.E.; the Protopalatial, circa

2000–1720 B.C.E.; and the Prepalatial, circa 3200–2000 B.C.E., suggesting antediluvian roots.[20] Philistine is Egyptian in its roots, deriving from the Egyptian word Prst, or Plst.[21] It was the Egyptians who first inferred the name Philistines to describe the sea people of Caphtor. Among the Assyrians, this group was referred to as the Philisti, or the Palastu, while the Hebrew word Peleshti is the basis for the name Palestine.[22]

Philistines were a non-Semitic race that apparently descended from the infamous Aryans.[23] Aryans, as you will recall, were originally Titans from Atlantis, suggesting that the Philistines possessed formative and direct Nephilim bloodlines. Reliefs at Rameses III's temple at Medinet Habu depict the Philistines as a very tall race of Hellenic-looking people.[24] They were depicted on other Egyptian reliefs that recorded their incursion as clean-shaven and wearing short tunics and Cretan-styled, crested helmets.[25] Again, one wonders, did the surviving, interbred bloodlines of humans and antediluvian giants, the originating Philistines and Hivites, later intermix with their Middle East cousins, the giant Horites and Avvim?

We do know Philistines immigrated to Gaza during the Neopalatial period, circa 1550–1400 B.C.E., obliterating King Suppiluma and the Hittite empire in their wake.[26] After overrunning the Hittite empire, Philistines colonized Gaza, forming their famous Pentapolis of city-states; Gath was the strongest city of the Pentapolis. Philistine pottery bore distinctive Mycenaean characteristics, and the Philistines adopted the Canaanite language and customs.[27] We also know Crete and Santorini were home to the Minoans, who descended suddenly into decline after 1450 B.C.E., when Santorini was destroyed.[28] Minoans were known to be skillful in the art of smelting bronze and other metals and were famous for the home of the antediluvian labyrinth, minotaur, and King Minos, where the bull cult of Poseidon flourished.[29] Minos was the Nephilim son of Europa and Zeus.[30]

Philistines controlled the original iron trade of the ancient world.[31] Scripture records that the Philistines were skilled in the secrets of smelting iron from beyond 1400–1450 B.C.E., for Joshua noted Judah could not annex Gaza because of the Philistine iron chariots and weapons (Judg. 1:18–19; 4:1–3). Although iron is generally accepted in secular history as being popularized and discovered sometime after 1200 B.C.E., certainly the Philistines had gained mastery over this skill beforehand, which provided them a fierce advantage in war.[32] Nelson's speculates the Philistines learned this smelting skill from the Hittites, who were discovered utilizing iron around 1400 B.C.E.[33] However, the Philistines defeated the Hittites well before this and likely utilized the knowledge of iron to destroy the Hittite empire. Hittites and Canaanites likely traded for iron implements and weapons of war afterwards. Is it possible the Philistines of Crete, the Minoan descendants, learned to smelt iron while on Crete?

Anthropologists suggest knowledge of the ironworking spread from Mycenae along the sea trade routes. The Philistines originated from within the Mycenaean culture.[34] Iron was known in the ancient world from before 3100 B.C.E., in Egypt; it was known as the “metal from heaven” on cuneiform tablets.[35] An iron blade and an iron axe, circa 2700 B.C.E., were excavated in Mesopotamia and Ur respectively.[36] All this goes to support Genesis’s account of Tubal-Cain forging tools out of bronze and iron (Gen. 4:22). We also know the Philistines hoarded this secret technology for their own monetary gain and military advantage, for they refused to permit Israel to train blacksmiths for their farm implements, for fear the Israelites would smelt iron to be used in weapons of war (1 Sam. 13:19–22). Iron was the secret to the power of the Philistine Pentapolis, along with the Nephilim. Iron weapons and chariots might have been an underlying reason the Israelites did not choose to seize the Promised Land directly through Gaza and the powerful Philistines.

In the days of the Judges and David, a potentate from each of the five-city Pentapolis governed the Philistine cities.[37] These were the ruling Seranim. These rulers exercised complete and absolute power in both peace and war, ensuring the Philistine Pentapolis remained strong and united, in direct contrast to the loosely organized tribes of Israel.[38] It was in this world of Philistines made up of Cherethites, Hivites, Avvites, and Caphtorites, who occupied the five cities of Gath, Ashod, Ashkelon, Gaza, and Ekron that David grew up.

After David slew Goliath, there were still four or five remaining Nephilim/potentates clinging to power; even after David formally became king of Israel, they still ruled the city-states of Philistine. It is wise to conclude that yet another Nephilim likely succeeded Goliath at Gath. With respect to the four named Nephilim/Gibborim kings, the Bible does indeed record the deaths of those four giants by name, and we will briefly follow them to their destruction. To ensure that all are comfortable that these four potentates were Nephilim, please read from 2 Samuel 21:22: “These four [Ishi-Benob, Saph, Goliath's brother, and the six-toed and six-fingered man] were descendants of Rapha in Gath, and they fell at the hands of David and his men," even though the KJV only refers to these giants as sons of a specific giant. They were Nephilim, pure and simple—end of story.

Ishi-Benob, who Josephus variantly named "Achmon, the son of (the giant) Araph,"[39] was killed in yet another battle Israel waged against the Philistines. The six-fingered and six-toed giant was slain by Jonathon, the son of Shimeah, and David's brother.[40] David sent Jonathon specifically to slay this mutant, who zealously claimed to be a son of the giants, in single combat. In still another battle, this time led by Sibbeccai,[41] Saph was slain at Gob, by Sibbeccai.[42] Sibbeccai also killed a giant identified as Sippai.[43] Josephus recorded Sibbeccai killing many that claimed they were of the posterity of giants.[44]

Lahmi was the remaining giant of the famous four. I have reserved Lahmi for last, because within the Lahmi account, yet another great mystery is resolved for secular cynics of the Bible. The book of 2 Samuel 21:19 ignites the mystery: "In another battle with the Philistines at Gob, Elhanan son of Jaare-Oregim the Bethlehemite killed Goliath the Gittite, who had a spear with a shaft like a weaver's rod." This particular passage from 2 Samuel is perpetually propped up over and over as a classic example of how the Bible continually contradicts itself with its inaccuracies.

This is sheer nonsense; the translation, according to the New International Version, can be written in one of two ways. The first is the same as the excerpt quoted above, where the giant slain by Elhanan was Goliath. However, the second possible option is that this passage could be legitimately translated as Elhanan killing the brother of Goliath (see the NIV notation).[45] The argument boils down to a matter debated based on your own beliefs.

I am confident, however, that the Bible does not leave such things to chance and error. The Old Testament book of 1 Chronicles 20:5 resolves this riddle, because it records the parallel account to this narrative: "In another battle with the Philistines, Elhanan son of Jair killed Lahmi the brother of Goliath the Gittite, who had a spear with the shaft like a weaver's rod." This is an exact duplication, word for word, as the same account recorded in 2 Samuel, with one small alteration: Goliath was substituted for Lahmi, the brother of Goliath, which is, of course, the other possible translation for 2 Samuel, except that 1 Chronicles established the true name of Goliath’s brother, who also happened to be one of the five giants listed as Nephilim/ potentate kings of Gaza.

Unger’s citing that 2 Samuel has suffered a corruption in the course of transmission supports my assertion that Elhanan slew a giant other than Goliath. It notes that a close study of the original texts suggests both Samuel and Chronicles originally read as: “And Elhanan the son of Jair killed Lahmi the brother of Goliath,” or “Elhanan the son of Jair the Bethlehemite killed the brother of Goliath.” The Qur’an concurs that, indeed, it was David who slew Goliath from Gath.[46] Contradiction settled.

Yet another outside source suggests an alternate solution to this alleged contradiction by its inference. David Rohl suggests that David was not his original name, that David was the title given to him by the Philistine potentate of Gath and his Hurrian/Horite/Hivite/Amalekite bodyguard when David was made king after the death of Saul. David then became recognized as David, Tadua, and or Dwd, or Dud, a Hurrian title, or a royal coronation meaning “beloved of Yahweh.” This royal title was later Hebraized to Dadua and David.[47] Arab literature and poets recorded David as Da ud, Dawud, and Dahoud.[48]

The Bible recorded that David fled to Gath, to the (Avvite) King (Abimelech) Achish, son of King Maoch, for safety during the reign of Saul, but Achish drove David off, as David pretended to be insane.[49] David again returned to Gath and Abimelech/Achish after the death of Samuel, where David and his 600 men were employed by Achish as a mercenary force that fought many battles for the Philistine king.[50] Again, this is the period when David and his men most likely earned their reputation recorded in the Armana Letters as treasonous cutthroats led by a strongman from Hebron.

At this time, Pinsky notes David was the vassal of Achish, calling himself his loyal servant.[51] David fought extensively against the mortal enemy of the Israelites, the Amalekites, during this period, with David earning unheard-of favor and praise from the Philistine king,[52] which is exactly why the Philistine alliance so feared the coronation of David that they immediately attacked David and Israel without notice. Therefore, the Davidum title deriving from the Amalekite bodyguard of a Philistine king of Gath is possible.

Unger's additionally notes that David is translated from Hebrew as both "beloved" and/or possibly even "chieftain" and is very close to the Hurrian translation as "beloved of Yahweh." Unger's notes that in the Mari Letters or Tablets, references are made to plundering Benjamites and its leader by the title Dawidum, meaning "leader."[53]

Gardner suggests that David was never his real name, that his original name is likely unknown; he suggests that David, in fact, was a title, "the Davidum," like an emperor or a Caesar, and this title stuck in history as his name. All later kings of Judah were then known subsequently as Davidums. As I will discuss in the last half of this book, all senior Essene dynasts from the House of Gold in Grail lore were also known as Davidums.[54] Rohl suggests that David's original given name was "Elhanan," the youngest son of Yishuya, Jesse.[55] If so, then both biblical accounts are accurate, whether it is David or Elhanan slaying Goliath, for they are one and the same person.

Let us return to 2 Samuel that lists the four remaining Rephaite potentates, including Ishi-Benob; Saph; a six-toed and fingered giant; and of course, the brother of Goliath,[56] who we have now established as Lahmi, which Elhanan, son of Jair, slew. This passage is the new, defining light for viewing the David and Goliath epic, for it clearly states Goliath's brother was Rephaite. This, therefore, requires that Goliath was also Rephaite, a Nephilim.

Underlining the conclusion that Goliath was Nephilim is the Scroll of Orpah. After Orpah moved back into the Moabite royal palace, a very tall Philistine warrior passed through Moab.[57] According to Pinsky, this warrior was a descendant of the prehistoric giants.[58] Orpah saw this glorious man and joined herself to him immediately; she then followed him back to Gath.[59] Could this man be the Philistine from Gath who was a descendant of Og that we discussed previously?

The Goliath narrative is not simply a chance happening in history or a fictional enhancement clumsily inserted to glorify the founding king of the royal Jewish dynasty. The David and Goliath story was part of a common narrative that wove itself throughout the Old Testament, whereby the Israelites were commissioned to eradicate the Nephilim plague from the face of the earth. Neither defining context nor backdrop is provided in the recanting of this story. The Covenant obligations established the divine commission of David to complete the 500-year commission of Israel to exterminate the giants from under heaven. It was automatically assumed as common knowledge whenever this epic was told in ancient Israel, but it is either not understood or recognized in our contemporary age.

As Knight and Lomas note, Saul and David's commission to eradicate the giants actually gave legitimacy to their kingship.[60] Remember, kingship descended to earth from on high, from the gods to the Anunnaki/Nephilim, in both the antediluvian and postdiluvian epochs. Therefore, God instructed Saul, and then David, to eliminate and destroy the false claim of the giants to kingship on earth in the Covenant Land so that the throne of David would be the only legitimate throne on earth that was authorized from heaven. Adding insult to injury for the Nephilim kingships, David was first anointed king of Judah at Hebron and then later anointed king of all Israel at Hebron,[61] the infamous capitol for Anak. The legitimacy of heavenly sponsorship for David's dynasty is also the root of why the polytheists will falsify records to illegitimately connect their kings and bloodlines, and more importantly, the end-time, false messiah, to David and Saul, along with their Nephilim/ Dragon bloodlines, for the Davidic throne did, in fact, become the true earthly kingship sponsored by heaven and God.

Nephilim are relegated to the nether reaches of Christianity, not to be disturbed, seriously investigated, or pondered about. Yet we have learned what a large impact these giants imprinted on ancient history, both before and after the flood. I do not endeavor to justify or defend the shelving of this subject matter. But are we really free from the impact of these ancient times in our current age? The answer is "no." And just as the Nephilim heritage retains importance even for our generation, so, too, do the Messianic bloodlines of Genesis and David hold sway over our terminal generation. All intertwine and will culminate in our contemporary Age of Aquarius, which will once more witness the reincarnated spirit of The Genesis 6 Conspiracy in its boldest array of sedition.

SECTION IV: The Terminal Generation

THE TIME OF JACOB’S TROUBLE

CHAPTER 39

NOTHING NEW UNDER THE SUN

What has been will be again, what has been done will be done again; there is nothing new under the sun. Is there anything of which one can say, "Look! This is something new"? It was here already, long ago; it was here before our time.

—Ecclesiastics 1:9–10

So how does all this talk about ancient giants and secret snake societies relate to our generation and to each of us? Why do these heretofore unexplained turning points of human history have relevance to this generation? And how do arcane macro events from ancient epochs illuminate end-time prophecy?

These misunderstood waves of sedition attributed to Nephilim residue have lapped over our contrived view of our human journey. Shocking and terrifying repercussions from hidden Nephilim bloodlines will crest with catastrophic consequences in our generation. Nephilim dregs have persistently manipulated our history with diabolical intentions to divert our destiny. Hence the elemental importance of the historic record only becomes known when we decode it and then learn from it. We must respect and understand what transpired free from revisionist rewrites and interpretive corruptions by collaborating polytheist moles and secular elitists.

Humankind is not appreciably different today than we were 6,000 years ago, if, in fact, we are any different at all. Only our knowledge base and technology have increased, but we are no better, no more intelligent, no more civilized, no less violent, no wiser, and certainly no more evolved. Any statement to the contrary only underscores our ignorance and our arrogance. We have not elevated our species to a godlike status, nor will we ever evolve into such beings while we possess our current, earthly, physical forms and continue to live on the earth as it currently exists and as we perceive it. We are the same beings with the same weaknesses and frailties that our earliest biblical ancestors possessed. This may come as a direct challenge to modern theologies, such as the New Age movement or other pantheistic religions, including Gnosticism and the secular religion of evolution, but it is true.

It is for these reasons we study history. We study history to learn of our mistakes so that we might avert the mistakes of our forefathers. We have all heard the popular proverb: if we do not learn from the mistakes of history, we are destined to repeat the very same mistakes in the future. This is a crucial concept that has been imprinted on the psyche of academia for the last few centuries. It is a notion developed to help guide our species from obliterating ourselves from the face of the planet.

But when unexplained hubris propelled by advances in knowledge and technology blinds us into believing we are superior to our forebears, as we do today, then we have embarked on a journey into destruction. We have been skillfully preconditioned to repeat the mistakes of our forefathers. We have been blinded by self-deluding doctrines, just as our ancestors were before us.

Nothing new is under the sun. Nothing that is being done today or will be done in the future is new. All has been seen and done before. Ancient peoples vehemently believed the future was always to be a replay of the past,[1] merely an earthly replay (projection/matrix), reflecting the melodrama of the heavens. This, of course, is the only manner in which all humankind could be judged fairly throughout the generations. It is the constant and the standard that will be applied at the great judgment. The same forms of narratives and plots have taken place over and over and over in the last 6,000 years, just as the plots to movies have not changed over the last one hundred years. Only the actors, places, and time settings for the movies have changed, but the basic narratives are and will continue to be the same. I believe this generation must be even more diligent to this discipline of discerning all its wisdom from the wise, for this generation will be tested like no other. This is the Terminal Generation described by Hal Lindsey in his book bearing that name.[2]

Scripture teems with prophecy, and specifically apocalyptic prophesies. This is the generation to which I believe all apocalyptic prophecy should be applied. In a nutshell, end-time prophecy foretells the major apocalyptic events that will take place at the end of this age, preceding the arrival of the Messiah. Jesus will save the world and its saints from the coming destruction, leading the saints into a thousand years of peace and heaven on earth before continuing on into eternity.

Endeavoring to interpret the future as it relates to the end times is not sacrilege, nor is it naive. In fact, Scripture instructs us to be wary and alert to the coming of these times:

> As Jesus was sitting on the Mount of Olives, the disciples came to him privately. “Tell us when will … this happen, and what will be the sign of your coming and of the end of the age?”
> —Matthew 24:3

> No one knows about that day or hour, not even the angels in heaven, nor the Son, but only the Father.
> —Matthew 24:36

> Be on guard! Be alert! You do not know when that time will come … What I say to you, I say to everyone. Watch!
> —Mark 13:33, 37

We must heed the lessons and major events of antiquity as they apply to end-time prophecy. We must learn the lessons and parallels well so that we might cope with the hell that is surely coming.

Ironically, this future obliteration will be the root cause for humankind uniting in rebellion against God. There is nothing new under the sun, What transpired in antediluvian time, at Babel, and during the conquest of the Covenant Land will replay again. Rebellion will echo loudly once more with our generation. Bloodlines of Nephilim kingships, the Atlantean world empire, the spurious snake cult of secret societies, the Amalekite Blood Covenant against Israel, and the bloodlines of Saul and David all have curious, unexplained relationships throughout history and with this last generation.

CHAPTER 40

THE NEW MAN

Those who are wise will shine like the brightness of the heavens, and those who lead many to righteousness, like the stars for ever and ever. Daniel, close up and seal the words of the scroll until the time of the end. Many will go here and there to increase knowledge.

—Daniel 12:3–4

The antediluvian epoch was a unique period. It was a time teeming with burgeoning knowledge, yet having a vitriolic, split personality.

Is there a hidden relationship between our exploding knowledge and technologies and antediluvian knowledge and technology? Indeed, there is, and the disturbing, prophetic connection is crucial for this unprepared generation. Corruption of knowledge doomed the ancient world to destruction. Without the proper morals and wisdom, the application of such knowledge and its offspring, technology, is a road that only leads to disaster and apocalypse. The descendants of Cain applied their corrupted knowledge in defiance to God. The deployment of the seven spurious sciences was void of any moral governances or acknowledgement of the true God, restricting what the unintended consequences would be. All was heralded with hubris under the guise of advancement or progress. Does this ring familiar?

We live in an age of unprecedented advancements, all accomplished in the name of progress. We have quickly surpassed our ability to assess what we are achieving or where we are heading, due to the pandemic pace of ever increasing knowledge and advancements. Our generation has surrendered its authority, not to mention its ability, to decide what technologies should be advanced and just how we would hope to shape our future. Not only are we speeding headlong into an unknown future, but also there are neither adequate restrictions nor standards governing our burgeoning knowledge. The world is now drunk; it has become intoxicated with technology, utilizing the Internet as an efficient cyber highway to distribute unfiltered knowledge, technology, and rebellion.

Our civilization is standing at the precipice of unknown disaster, teetering at the hands of our own intelligence, but we do not perceive the danger. We only perceive the paradoxical opportunities of false hope. We have spawned a world intoxicated with unrestricted employment of our arrogance. All advancements are double-edged swords that can cut in the direction of good or in the direction of evil. Just as the science of splitting the atom gave us tremendous sources of energy, it also gave us atomic bombs. To this conclusion, then, understand that modern science is rooted in and nourished by the originating seven spurious sciences.

As you will recall, the great antediluvian sin was the sexual union between the human species with the angelic realm. The parallel antediluvian sin was that Cain’s progeny lived out their futile lives in a perpetual state of defiance and rebellion against God. A generation so self-deluded and so dismissive of God could easily be deceived into doing or believing anything.

The notion of angels copulating with humans still permeates modern society. Astonishingly, numerous Hollywood productions seemingly advocate violations of the laws of creation. Films depict beings from the angelic realm having sex with human females, which produces in most encounters hybrid offspring. This rogue notion is a common theme in horror films depicting satanic cults and the theatrical theme for the creation of the Antichrist and his appearance in this last Terminal Generation.

Similar seeds of transgression have been well planted in another unexplained genre that is transfixing this unsuspecting generation. The alien phenomenon is yet another diabolical deception and violation of the laws of creation. One may find it surprising, but the Vatican recognizes the extent of alien encounters and the size of the universe, dictating there must be alien life forms, as testified to by the high-ranking Vatican representative for alien life forms and UFOs, Monsignor Corrado Balducci.[1] If one assumes that alien abductions are deceptive tactics employed by fallen angels, they might be the most likely method to introduce another form of Nephilim. Almost all abductees report similar experiences. They are probed and experimented upon, DNA samples are taken from them, or they are implanted with something. All memories of these experiences are lost unless retrieved through extraordinary techniques such as hypnosis.

I am not defending the credibility of all such encounters, but one must take a step back to consider the sheer number of them, just as the Vatican has. They are ever increasing in numbers, escalating to some form of climax or revelation. Combined with all other UFO mythology, one must at least acknowledge that something is indeed taking place. I believe the alien phenomenon is a spurious deception that is designed for our easily deluded but technologically advanced Terminal Generation.

If there is indeed any truth to the abduction stories, whether they be angelically inspired or actual aliens, then the door is left wide open for a similar violation of the laws of creation that occurred during antediluvian times. The scientific experimentation aliens tend to be concerned with is with regard to DNA and sexual reproduction. The common theme is that the aliens appear to be exploring the compatibility of their DNA to that of humans to create a hybrid being: half human and half alien. This is exactly what was done in antediluvian times with Emmakha Seth.

Expect that such a violation of the laws of creation will be presented to humankind after the world has accepted we are not alone in the universe and after some form of elaborate hoax, which will be a coming-out celebration for these so-called aliens. It is as though we are being seduced into this notion, only waiting for the right time to officially announce it when the people of the world are ready to accept their role as part of a universe teeming with alien life.

Within this elaborate deception, the connection to the unifying mystery religion and the curious antediluvian world becomes clear. Cross-breeding aliens with humans will create a so-called superior human being that no doubt will be larger, stronger, and smarter—and will live longer. If all these traits are not inclusive of this new superhuman, then why do it at all? A superhuman would downgrade the average human, making him or her obsolete. Dull humans resisting the new utopia will not be considered part of the new age but relegated for extinction or slavery. Inferior beings will serve no other useful purpose. They would be considered uncomplimentary reminders of an inferior past. Someone not embracing the coming utopian future will be considered mundane, worthy only for toil, servitude, or extermination, just as Black Heads were regarded in antediluvian Sumerian lore. The mundane will serve those who embrace the new age of universal intelligence, including the new superhuman, and, of course, the aliens.

All these characteristics will be wrapped within the coming mystery religion of Babylon.[2] Superhuman crossbreeds will be cleverly presented as part of the natural evolution—ascension to a new plane of existence en route to humankind's right to full-fledged godhood.

Superhumans may very well be DNA-altered demigods, contemporary Nephilim. Aliens would be considered gods, just as our ancestors considered them. Only in this new age we will understand gods as beings more advanced technologically, mentally, and spiritually. They will be considered gods, but more specifically, evolved gods. We humans may want to evolve and aspire into their state.

Under this new age, humankind will be offered a "cosmic gift" unlike any offered before, or so we will be led to believe. These false doctrines will be the norm:

- We are gazing at the precipice of human evolution.
- We are about to vibrate/evolve into a higher being in mass numbers.
- We will collectively ascend into another level of godhood, just as the mystic religions have taught for 6,000 years.

Those who will reject the "gift of godliness" will be debased as pariah, vermin that need to be exterminated for the betterment of humankind. Genocide will once more disfigure this generation in unprecedented levels of savagery.

If the laws of creation are not to be broken through the procreation of a new species via the union of two distinct beings, then we can brace ourselves for another violation of creation. This will swing about in the form of our own advances in technology and gene or DNA manipulations. Humankind is within a precious few short years of both mapping and completely understanding DNA. Having that ability will allow us to create heretofore never thought of life forms, which might both benefit and/or destroy our way of life. It is easy to envision a time where scientists will also begin to manipulate DNA to improve the human being as a species. Once we have changed our DNA and improved our specie's biologically, we will have created a superhuman race.

In other words, humankind is on the precipice of creating a contemporary Nephilim all on its own, even without receiving any assistance offered from aliens or angels. Although this future, modern Nephilim, known in today's mythos as the New Man, is more than plausible and attainable in the next ten to twenty years, I do not believe the modern Nephilim will be a totally human-sponsored endeavor. It is my contention that this future achievement will likely come in partnership with the angelically sponsored aliens, through cross-pollination of DNA. Remember, this is the true form of Nephilim: a union between angels and humans. Nephilim Emmakha Sethites were created from within a cloud by the gods —translation: DNA manipulation via aliens.

A question may arise at this point: why is crossbreeding of different beings or animals sinful? The answer invites another question: what God has created should not be altered or violated, for who can compare with the wisdom of God, and who could improve upon what God has already created? Only delusional pride can account for such unbridled arrogance.

We do not know the unintended consequences of altering the laws of creation. Only God knows. Such alterations ought to be left within the domain of the Creator. Such is the spirit of the law provided for us in Leviticus 19:19 and 37: "Do not mate different kinds of animals…. Keep all my decrees and all my laws, and follow them. I am the Lord." This law does not restrict interbreeding of like species, such as dogs with other forms of dogs. But it clearly instructs against crossbreeding dogs with cats.

Note the language. The keywords in this example are the words "kinds of animals," which was consistent in Scripture for different species. The same language is employed in the flood narrative, where so many so-called expert antiquarians tend to co-opt in support of discrediting the Bible. Noah sailed off with every form of land animal according to its kind, two by two for unclean animals and seven by seven with clean animals (Gen. 7:1–16).

Clearly, Noah did not take every form of every species; the ark was not large enough to do so, and that is not what the Bible recorded. Every kind of species was represented on the ark according to its kind, and whether it was clean or unclean determined the numbers taken. Only the appropriate representatives of those species required to repopulate the earth after the flood were taken. In fact, the Qur’an backs up this assertion, recording Noah only took pairs of each species onto the ark.[3] The respectful appreciation of the efficiency and accuracy of the language dictates a much more feasible and believable flood narrative. So much for the vitriolic cynics!

With the advent of DNA technology, we are about to completely obliterate this decree in unheard-of ways, not to mention what we are prepared to do to our own sanctioned beings. Violations of the laws of creation are sins of the ancient epoch and will be sins of our generation. The Qur’an has noted that those who prostrate to false gods are thus deluded to tamper with God’s creation.[4]

Such potential violations bring to mind legendary, antediluvian Greek beings and fantastic beings from other cultural mythologies. These mythologies teem with fantastic examples of interbreeding different kinds of animals. Technology is quickly advancing to the level that such creations will no longer be relegated to the domain of the fantastic, but rather to the domain of the ordinary extenuation of our abilities.

One begins to ponder whether or not this form of violation extended beyond the realm of the Nephilim and into the realm of other animals. Were the ancient mythologies of humans with the bodies of horses and humans with wings, along with so many other fantastic accounts of human/animal interbreeding, fanciful creations of the imagination or were they very real indeed? Perhaps centaurs and other mythological beings actually existed. Perhaps their existence accounts for such a law being given to the Israelites as the one in Leviticus 19. A plausible nightmare earmarked for this Terminal Generation may reoccur, all backed by the powerful descendants of the Nephilim.

CHAPTER 41

THE NEW AGE OF AQUARIUS

> One of them said to the man clothed in linen, who was above the waters of the river, "How long will it be before these astonishing things are fulfilled?" The man … lifted his right hand and his left hand toward heaven, and I heard him swear by him who lives forever, saying, "It will be for a time, times, and half a time. When the power of the holy people has been finally broken, all these things will be completed."
> —Daniel 12:6–7

Science, knowledge, and technology have advanced in what most believe is a secular vacuum, with a nonreligious standard for objectivity. But is this truly the case?

Unfortunately, it is not.

We must grasp the unexplained religious implications and their prearranged effects taking place today with respect to science, education, technology, aliens, and related issues. So, then, the question becomes: how have common, unexplained threads woven into a common patchwork theme derived from the same furtive root religion?

Science is merely another religious variety steeped in evolutionary mysticism. In the evolutionary faith, all animals, including humans, continuously evolve along (mystical) “paths” to their highest, most appropriate life forms, culminating with godhood for humankind. The same spurious doctrine and analogous path are taught by New Age and other mystical Eastern religions. Seemingly unconnected organizations exploit similar doctrines, secret rituals, and allegories. Evolution is merely another numinous tentacle that is preaching to naive, mundane masses the doctrine of reincarnation from another perspective. Thus, seemingly innocuous symbolism permeates highly educated fraternities of engineers, scientists, and medical practitioners, with disturbing motifs, oaths, and rings overtly symbolizing their ambiguous links back to the Seven Mystical Sciences of Enoch.

Similar symbolism will be the trademark of modern Nephilim. Mysticism will be their taciturn religion, albeit a “progressive” incantation designed to deceive our generation. Expect the new mysticism will mix all religions, including Christianity, Islam, and Judaism, with all of the pantheistic religions of the world. Mysticism will possess a new scientific slant, intermixed with aliens and a universe that teems with godlike beings. Expect this new religion will rely on Ezekiel and Revelation as examples for aliens being witnessed from antiquity and will claim the throne of God described was actually a spaceship.[1] The Theosophist New Age movement emerged in the 1950s from UFO controversies; by the 1970s and 1980s, New Age had attracted avant-garde thinkers (philosophers) from various scientific communities[2] and the elite.

Expect that Sumerian legends, as Jim Marrs notes with respect to the creation of the human race and the Anunnaki kings, will be liberally employed, supporting the notion that the gods and angels of antiquity were, in fact, extraterrestrials from the mythological twelfth planet, which has now purportedly orbited back into range.[3] The new doctrines will proclaim aliens were the creators of humankind, from which all religion and legends derive. And the new religion will preach that UFO sightings of our age and of ages past were actually spaceships piloted by aliens, as they monitored humankind’s evolutionary path to godhood. This extraterrestrial twelfth planet theory is the main thrust to Zecharia Sitchin’s many novels.

Genetically created superbeings will spearhead this new movement; they will be the undisclosed leaders of religious activities and government, just as they led antediluvian religions and governments. They will be the Nephilim/ Gibborim of our age, the potentates. The new leaders and wannabes of this New Age will be leading the world into an exciting direction of boundaryless peace and cooperation among the peoples of this world. They will be the ones to cement the New World Order together with their new, improved religious doctrines. The world will unite in understanding we are not alone in the universe, in the same manner as the people of the earth do in science fiction films and just as in Star Trek. This will be a world redirected to a new path, a world evolving/vibrating, reaching its potential. All things will seem to be possible, including all kinds of miraculous deceptions, signs, and wonders.

This New Age is none other than the famous Age of Aquarius that has been advertised since the 1960s. This is the epoch of the Water Bearer, Aquarius, whose ideals, according to author Dan Brown of The DaVinci Code, will reflect humankind's need to learn the truth about all things, as well as its seizure of the right to learn and decide for himself what to do.[4] These New Age ideals are finely scripted euphemisms designed to disguise humanity's naive independence from God while en route to rebellion.

This is the ancient, mystic dogma of Gnosis and enlightenment. It is the future resolution to the incident at Eden, where Eve, and then Adam, ate from the Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil, the Tree of Gnosis and Knowledge, whereby they unwittingly chose independence for humankind. All this is part of the revenge plot of Satan to deceive humankind—that he is actually liberating humankind with knowledge, freethinking, and free choice, away from the bonds of ignorance and the Christian God, who enslaves humankind.

However, the Age of Aquarius in astrology is a period of harsh judgment reigned over by Saturn. Aquarius is "the Water Bearer, who is the bringer of the [fiery] torrents from heaven."[5] The Age of Aquarius, the end of this age, the end time, and the last days all encompass the same idea. It will be a time of tribulation and heartrending decision, when all will have to choose between Satan and his deceptions rooted in reason and logic versus faith in the righteousness, peace, freedom, and enlightenment of the true God. Spurious forces will bend truth in ways that will impress a pretzel manufacturer. They will interpret the Bible allegorically, proclaiming the end of this age and the end times expressed by literalist Christians are nothing more than deceptions of an apocalyptic cult entrenched in its alleged evil beginnings.

Spurious forces will declare literalist Christians are nothing more than illegitimate apostates and imposters, who were originally given legitimacy by Emperor Constantine and the heretical Pauline sect of Catholicism, which has persecuted the true Gnostic Christian church for 2,000 years. To this end, the Gospel of Judas charges the twelve disciples and the bishops, together with the Roman persecutors, as all who worship demons.[6] Spurious forces will proclaim the end of this age doctrine fanatically shouted by literalist Christians is nothing more than a deception that only refers to the end of the astrogical age of Pisces.[7] Spurious forces will declare the New Age of Aquarius will be the beginning to the Theosophist thousand years of peace led by the Theosophist false messiah, known figuratively as “Lord Maitreya,” the new Buddha.

For the record, the Bible does not state the end of this age is the end of this world, even though it will come close to being so. Scripture does, however, state that after the great tribulation and the Wrath of God, the world will enter into the true millennium, a thousand years of peace led by Jesus, before moving onto eternity (see Rev. 20:1–6). Do not be deceived!

As the nations of the world relinquish their authority over to world government, evil potentates will seize control under the guise of peace, prosperity, and the advancement of humankind, but the end result will be far different than the pastoral picture painted by those potentates. What they will sell as “peace” will lead to destruction.

This coming world empire will not be as unified as its illusion will promise. Differences among the nations will continue to resurface, dragging this utopian empire back into the depths of greed, power, and war. It will be just as the prophet Daniel prophesied:

> Just as you saw that the feet and toes were partly baked of clay and partly of iron, so this will be a divided kingdom; yet it will have the strength of iron in it, even as you saw iron mixed with clay. As the toes were partly iron and partly clay, so this kingdom will be partly strong and partly brittle. And just as you saw the iron mixed with baked clay, so the people will be a mixture and will not remain united, any more than iron mixes with clay.
> —Daniel 2:41–43

The New Age will be a world steeped in rebellion against the true God. Those who overtly stand against God will be the potentates who hold all the power; they will emulate their ancestors, the Nephilim and Nimrod.

Potentates will be the ones who will entrench state-sponsored tyranny, imposing the new religion upon the entire world, just as the Nephilim and Nimrod did. Those who oppose the new religion will be exterminated. One can imagine secret police in the style of the Gestapo, KGB, and the death squads of Central America being deployed around the world to carry out the extermination of the “obsolete” humans, the ones who refuse to accept the New World Order and it’s demonically sponsored religious systems and beliefs.

One can also imagine a rekindling of the blood oath sworn by Amalekites and Nephilim against the descendants of Jacob. One can easily imagine another holocaust against both those who do not accept the new religion and, in particular, against the people of Judah and Israel. This will be the time of Jacob’s trouble, as described by the prophet Jeremiah (Jer. 30:7). The time will come when the demon-sponsored religion and government will once more take up the blood covenant, vengefully turning to wage war against all branches of the people of Israel (Dan. 11:3–32). After all, the children of Israel are the naturally born enemies of the disciples of demons and fallen angels, while the faithful Gentile followers of God are Israel’s adopted brothers.

The world will be separated into ten kingdoms or regions (Rev. 17:12) that are governed by evil potentates but united under one New World Order, until the Antichrist usurps absolute control. It will be through these kingdoms (blocks of nations) that the world will be paraded into destruction. Peace will not be the signature this empire will be remembered by, but rather war and destruction. The future potentates will be deluded into war by demons, just as their ancient, antediluvian counterparts were.[8]

Fallen angels that procreated with humankind and were imprisoned into the Abyss will be released:

> The fifth angel sounded his trumpet, and I saw a star that had fallen from the sky to the earth. The star was given the key to the shaft of the Abyss. When he opened the Abyss, smoke rose from it like the smoke from a gigantic furnace. The sun and the sky were darkened by the smoke from the Abyss. And out of the smoke locusts came down upon the earth and were given power like that of scorpions of the earth…. They made as king over them the angel of the Abyss, whose name in Hebrew is Abaddon, and in Greek, Apollyon.
> —Revelation 9:1–11

Dark angels will create the same havoc they created in the antediluvian epoch. The evil these demons and fallen angels will create cannot be perceived, and they will not be limited to merely creating modern Nephilim. War and destruction will be on their minds:

> I saw three evil spirits that looked like frogs; they came out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast and out of the mouth of the false prophet. They are spirits of demons performing miraculous signs, and they go out to the kings of the whole world, to gather them for battle on the great day of God Almighty.
> —Revelation 16:13–14

The evil potentates of the New World Order will pave the way for the Antichrist and for Armageddon by permitting demons and fallen angels to delude them. Beware of “the Path” and “the Way” of the Antichrist and his alleged messenger! They will bring about earthly, divine judgment by fire through their own arrogant actions unto the inhabitants of the earth, whereas the antediluvian Nephilim brought the divine judgment by water unto the inhabitants of the earth.

The seeds of destruction have been well planted. The harvest is sure to reap a bumper crop based upon the fertile conditions of this Terminal Generation. All will conclude with the great, allegorical harvest of the end time, renowned as Armageddon.[9] Two distinct and important institutions rooted in antiquity will sprout among the terminal crop like weeds, overtaking the garden and suffocating it. These two crucial institutions required by prophecy, and utilized by God as His sickle, are the great end-time universal, political, and religious institutions, united by the spirit of the end-time catastrophe, all of which will be covered in the chapters to follow.

CHAPTER 42

THE SIGN OF NOAH

Just as it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be in the days of the Son of Man. People were eating, drinking, and marrying and being given away in marriage, up to the day Noah entered the ark. Then the flood came and destroyed them all. It was the same in the days of Lot. People were eating and drinking, buying and selling, planting and building. But the day Lot left Sodom, fire and sulfur rained down from heaven and destroyed them all. It will be like this on the day the Son of Man is revealed.

—Luke 17:26–30

What has happened in the past will happen once more in the future with similar results. We are a very predictable species. It is for these contentious reasons that those who are wise must devote close attention to the signs of the time and, more specifically, to the signs of our generation.

Passages in Luke and Matthew document an oration by Jesus,[1] clarifying when the end of the age is to come and what will be the signs that generation should look for. The end of the age is additionally known as the Second Coming of Jesus. Therefore, we must interpret both these passages through this eye-opening context as a sign to the last generation of this age, when the Messiah will return and the Apocalypse will unfold with all its fury.

Is it not perplexing that one of the central signs warning the last generation should come from prehistory? Does it not astonish you that the last generation is forewarned by Christ to comprehend the epic narrative concerning Noah and the flood in an age when Genesis's testimony has been purposely and unaccountably relegated onto the shelves of fictional mythology?

This Terminal Generation could not possibly be more arrogant about or ignorant of the Bible's true origins, let alone its truths and warnings. This generation could not possibly be more blinded to the truth or unprepared for what is about to take place. Again, spiritual blindness is not a coincidence; it is part of the warning, the prophetic signature for the Terminal Generation. This generation's hubris is a crucial component to the Sign of Noah and the requisite platform to support the end-time conspiracy that the balance of this book will continue to argue and examine.

The Sign of Noah does not refer to the great deluge. Nor does it refer to the sign of the rainbow covenant between Noah and God, when God promised never to judge the earth again by water.[2] Rather, understanding the Sign of Noah is to learn and be forewarned about the circumstances of Noah's generation, which brought the deluge Apocalypse upon the antediluvian world. Jesus prophesied circumstances that would parallel the days of Noah.

This generation's fate will not be manifested in watery, divine judgment. God did not promise to never punish humankind again; He only promised not to judge the earth with water again. Humankind will be judged once more, this time by fire, just as Sodom and Gomorrah were punished.[3] This is why the Sign of Noah is linked to Lot in Luke. Both Matthew and Luke echo Nephilim negligence that precipitated the corruption, echoes this generation ignores at its peril. Somehow Nephilim will mark this generation. The question is: how.

According to Gnostic teaching, the flood was merely a prototype for the end of the age.[4] Therefore, the end of the age will be destroyed by a similar catastrophe, but mostly with fire this time. The Popol Vuh also recorded a deluge of fire will destroy this age, whereas a deluge of floods destroyed the last age.[5] North American Indian legends further instruct that certain ages of the world inevitably end in catastrophe.[6] Both ancient Mayan and Babylonian astrological lore contain catastrophes past caused by fire at specific celestial precession cycles, or dates.[7] Remember, the Egyptian priest in Plato's Timaeus warned future generations that the earth was traumatized many times throughout the ages with global catastrophes caused by fire and water,[8] and it will be again.

That Apocalypses would reoccur was a doctrinal foundation stone in antiquity. The Roman author Seneca quoted Berosus, stating that when planets align in Cancer, the world is ravaged by fire; when the planets align in Capricorn, the world is ravaged with water.[9] Berosus was one of numerous ancients citing global destruction within cycles of time, but according to John Michael Greer, Berosus is the only known astronomer to have fixed dates to these cataclysmic events based entirely on astrological alignments and celestial precession of the zodiacal ages.[10] Earth's orbit moves the equinoctial and solistial points backwards throughout the zodiac at a rate of one degree every seventy-two years; one great month (a zodiacal age like Pisces) is 2,160 years.[11]

These astrological and astronomical signs are undoubtedly end-time signs in the stars, sun, and moon prophesied by Luke, Matthew, and Mark: "There will be signs in the sun, moon, and stars. On earth, nations will be in anguish and perplexity at the roaring and tossing of the sea. Men will faint from terror, apprehensive of what is coming on the world, for the heavenly bodies will be shaken."[12]

The antediluvian age was destroyed because of evil and violence and because Nephilim fashioned the rebellion. So will it be for the same reasons this age will be destroyed with fire, because of evil, corruption, violence, and rebellion fanned by Nephilim descendants. The Gnostic holy book of the Invisible Spirit corroborates this line of thought, noting that the Incorruptible Race, the Posterity of Seth, were the cause of the flood and will also be the cause for the destruction at the end of this age.[13] I think that most will be utterly disturbed and shocked at the direct parallels our current generation holds with the last three generations preceding the flood. The book of Wisdom documents the evils cursing the last generation before the flood:

> A blessing was on Noah's boat that allowed righteousness to survive, but a curse is on an idol made by human hands…. And so God's divine Judgment will fall on pagan idols, because even though they are made from something God created, they become horrible things that trap the souls of foolish people…. Sexual immorality began when idols were invented. They have corrupted human life ever since they were first made. Idols have not always existed, nor will they exist forever. It was human pride that brought them into the world, and that is why a quick end is planned for them…. Once there was a father who was overwhelmed with grief at the untimely death of his child, so he made an image of that child who had been suddenly taken from him. He then honored a dead human being as a god, and handed on secret rituals and ceremonies to those who were under his authority. As time went on, these ungodly customs became stronger. Finally it became law, and idols were worshipped at the command of powerful rulers…. So all this became a deadly trap, because people who were grieving, or under royal authority, would take objects of stone or wood, and give them the honor reserved for the One God. One thing led to another. It was not enough to be wrong about the knowledge of God. They lived in a state of evil warfare, but they were so ignorant they called it peace. They murdered children in their initiation rituals, celebrated secret mysteries, and held wild ceremonial orgies with unnatural practices. They no longer kept their lives or their marriages pure. A man might kill another by an act of treachery or cause him grief by committing adultery with his wife. Everything was a complete riot of bloody murder, robbery, deceit, corruption, faithlessness, disorder, falsehood, harassment of innocent people, ingratitude, moral decay, sexual perversion, broken marriages, adultery, and immorality. The worship of idols, whose names should never be spoken, is the beginning and the end, the cause and the result of every evil.[14]

The Wisdom passage provides context to the behavior permitted, implemented, encouraged, and enforced by royalty. These depravities will have an identifiable signature for our generation.

The first perversion was idolatry. Nelson's defines idol or image as "a symbol of an object of worship and/or a false god, but generally a statue or something of human manufacture people substitute for God."[15] Perhaps the best definition of an idol is something we make into a god, anything that stands between us in the worship of God, and/or something we substitute for God. Webster's New Compact Format Dictionary defines idol as "an image or object of worship."

So just how does all this reflect on our generation? In pantheistic religions, all worship their gods via idolatry. All utilize idols in their worship. They bow down to these statues or objects or trees as part of their ritualistic ceremonies of worship. It is the worship of one or many false gods through the use of idols that is important, for it is the fundamental discipline of worship for many of the world's religions.

Christianity, too, is inexplicably enveloped with the sin of idolatry. Christians of this generation and many before us are all too guilty of breaking the second and third commandments concerning idolatry. Take a careful look at the third commandment in Exodus 20:4–5: “You shall not make for yourself any idols in the form of anything in heaven above or on the earth beneath or in the waters below. You shall not bow down to them or worship them.”

Our churches are inundated with idols that allegedly aid in worship—the cross, icons, and rosaries, for examples, which are innocently placed between God and us or are employed as some form of intermediary between God and us. Modern Christianity is swamped with idols that we imprudently worship or use in worship. The second and third commandments are clear: God commands us to never create images of beings or objects in heaven, on earth, or in the seas and oceans for use in any form of worship. Yet our churches are overflowing with such embellishments.

God only requires a simple altar for worship, void of idols and beauty:

> Make an altar of earth for me and sacrifice your burnt offerings and fellowship offerings…. If you make an altar of stones for me, do not build it with dressed stones, for you will defile it if you use a tool on it. And do not go up to my altar on steps, lest your nakedness be exposed on it.
> —Exodus 20:24–26

The only objects of worship permitted were those God had instructed, which symbolized the throne of God on earth, such as the Ark of the Covenant. These one-of-a-kind, holy objects were to be housed only in the Holy of Holies, nowhere else.

This generation idolizes a great many things. We idolize famous people, only because they are famous. We idolize power and money. We idolize computers and technology as the gods of our future. As a society, we bow down every day to these things, for they are our masters or our gods. We do not control them, but they enslave and rule over our lives. Our modern civilization is nothing more than a monument to idolatry. We are no better than our forefathers. We serve our technology and idolize the wealth it creates. We are mesmerized by the evil, hypnotic suggestions planted by evil spirits, who cleverly play to our narcissistic vulnerabilities of greed and jealousy, all the while denying God created all things.

In fact, this generation will prove to be one of the most wicked and arrogant generations ever to walk this earth, reviving idolatry en masse unlike any generation before it. Idolatry will reign supreme as religious ceremony and daily life once the great harlot religion, Babylon, takes its seat on its preordained throne as the universal religion and the queen of kingdoms in the last days.[16] It will introduce a new paradigm for all idols at the midpoint of the tribulation, the abomination that causes desolation, in the future holy temple at Jerusalem.[17] The great mystical religion of antiquity will once more be imposed on us in the coming age of unbridled tyranny powered through world government.

Wisdom 14 states that idol worshippers in the antediluvian age murdered their children in the initiation rituals of the universal religion. I do not know whether or not child sacrifice will come back as part of the end-time harlot religion, but certainly we must be prepared for such an abominable possibility. Indeed, it was all part of the bull cult of Poseidon and Molech that also poisoned Middle Eastern, mystical religions up to, during, and beyond the age of Israel and Judah. Even if the end-time religion does not incorporate child sacrifice into its secret initiation ceremonies, our current generation is still undeniably disfigured by mass murder of children, infanticide.

Consider the abortion crisis. There are more than one million abortions performed in the United States alone every year, with uncounted millions around the world. As many as one in four pregnancies is being aborted today. The slaughter of unborn children is a disfiguring trait of our generation, but it has been diabolically disguised under the spurious doctrine of women’s free choice. Abortion doctrine is a disfiguring hangover from Progressives; Nazis; and turn-of-the-century, Rockefeller-sponsored globalism. Eugenics, the practice of improving human characteristics through birth and population control, was initially funded by the Rockefeller, Harriman, and DuPont families. Abortion extends directly from eugenic dogma to control the population of the “inferior”—the unwanted and the poor. In 2006, Planned Parenthood received a third of its funding from globalist, tax-exempt foundations I will detail later, while the balance came from the globalist-bent government in Washington.[18] Abortion was part of the evil antediluvian belief system. Azazel taught antediluvian women the doctrine and methodology of abortion.[19]

Abortion is yet another shameful doctrine reflecting Enochian mysticism, which echoes its warning to our generation. Conversely, Scripture directs, “If men who are fighting hit a pregnant woman … if there is a serious injury, you are to take life for life, eye for an eye, and tooth for a tooth."[20] Clearly, Old Testament Law recognized unborn life with after-born life as equal. In the view of Scripture, abortion is murder. This generation justifies infanticide under a spurious, religious doctrine of tolerance and choice, a cornerstone in our dubious preparation for godhood.

The next charge levied against Noah's world was adultery. One can certainly sympathize with this antediluvian heresy in view of our own generation. Marriages break down at a rate of 50 percent in North America, with similar numbers, or greater, reflected in polls showing adultery taking place in existing marriages. Adultery has become acceptable as extramarital contraband and entertainment. Adultery is a clear sign to this generation.

Murder, robbery, deceit, corruption, and disorder were other disfiguring traits plaguing the generations preceding the flood. The same can be stated of our generation. Innocent life has lost its respect. Murder is rampant. Crimes of every sort are pandemic across the globe. Our world is desensitized to violence. We naively persist in a world of the "me generation," where only what matters to the individual is important. Normal rules of restraint and respect are shoved to the side, just as evolutionary doctrine teaches our innocent youth. Children are raised in a wayward society, desensitized, and taught to summarily denigrate the innocent. We are, therefore, cursed to an ever more violent and corrupt future, with each subsequent generation further contaminating the generation that comes after it.

Corruption is the way of business and the world; it is the norm, not the exception. It is now difficult to differentiate many of the actions and values of business, government, and their genitive institutions from those of organized crime. Yet, all this is veiled beneath superficial platitudes of the New Age doctrine we are now teaching our youth, in which corruption and bigotry are commonly branded as tolerance.

Harassment of innocent people today is rampant. Just to be considered religious or Christian, by its application, is to be considered a leper. One is all but ostracized from mainstream society if you are Christian. One is taunted, jeered, and discriminated against, on a daily basis, particularly in the business and government world. Even those who are not professed Christians but opt to do what is right are summarily taunted and ostracized for doing so. We live in a world where disrespect, violence, corruption, sexual perversion, lies, and all forms of moral decay prosper. Any who stand against such things stand dangerously outside the mainstream of society, and they endure disdain from those who pride themselves on being "tolerant."

Sexual perversions are yet additional sinful signs identifying this generation. Although it is intolerant, politically incorrect, and increasingly illegal to speak out against such perversions, immorality and sexual perversion is pandemic today. One can easily cite homosexuality and lesbianism as the most prominent of these scriptural transgressions, but one must also include group sex, sado-masochistic perversions, bestiality, sexual molestations, sexual harassment, rape, prostitution, pornography, child molestation, child rape, and many other forms of sexual perversion. Our society is plagued with sexual perversion, just as it was in the days of Noah and Sodom, only now we uphold these perversions in the names of civility, tolerance, and enlightenment.

The prophetic Sign of Noah includes another subtle and compelling description connecting both epochs. Luke and Matthew described the days leading up to judgment as calm and ordinary as Noah's Apocalypse approached; so it will be for Armageddon. People were not concerned for their safety; they carried on just as they had always done, just as their forefathers had done. Neither narrative suggests the people gave any heed to the disasters that were to come. One can only attribute this lack of urgency to a total state of nonbelief, and not ignorance. They shrugged off the apocalyptic prophecies and all the dire warnings from a plethora of God's prophets.[21] This is how it will be with regard to the second coming, Armageddon, and how it is today, in truth.

Very few ponder the pending Apocalypse with any solemnity. Even devoted Christians are ignorant of the signs of the times, while other Christians imprudently refuse to interpret the Bible literally, discounting any possibility of such things ever having the remote chance of taking place. Today, only select contingents of contrarians view the Bible both literally and seriously, but this elite minority is consistently battered with malice, as Noah was. They are viciously slandered and labeled as vitriolic fanatics emanating from maliciously motivated, apocalyptic cults. The cries of warning are falling, and will continue to fall, on the egotistical and closed ears of an evil generation, deluded with its own self-importance, believing they're on the evolutionary path of godhood. Nevertheless, God will mercifully send 144,000 prophets and two very special prophets from ages past to warn this narcissistic Terminal Generation of the imminent Apocalypse.[22]

CHAPTER 43

THE GODLESS GENERATION

But mark this: There will be terrible times in the last days. People will be lovers of themselves, lovers of money, boastful, proud, abusive, disobedient to their parents, ungrateful, unholy, without love, unforgiving, slanderous, without self-control, brutal, not lovers of the good, treacherous, rash, conceited, lovers of pleasure rather than lovers of God—having a form of godliness but denying its power. Have nothing to do with them. They are the kind who worm their way into homes and gain control over weak-willed women, who are loaded down with sins and are swayed by all kinds of evil desires, always learning but never able to acknowledge the truth.

—2 Timothy 3:1–7

Notice the similarities in the signs in 2 Timothy to the sins of Noah's age. Both eerily describe a rebellious, independent, and evil people.

Is any of this pertinent and/or poignant for today? Are we, indeed, the cursed, godless generation? Indubitably we are, particularly if one considers the misguided priority placed upon the individual. All is void of the righteous trait celebrated as honoring and garnering respect for others. We are more concerned with our own outward beauty than our inward beauty. Just look at the diets, exercise programs, cosmetic surgeries, hair coloring, tattoos, body piercing, and the fashion industry's clothes that preoccupy our society, all in pursuit of beautiful people. Children are caught in a void of peer pressure fashion and the pursuit of material goods. We have created a generation of self-lovers that will only increase in its vulgarity.

The apostle Paul's second letter to Timothy goes on to describe this generation as "lovers of money." Have you ever read about a generation so preoccupied with money and materialism as this one? We are a generation living for now and for the good times our money can buy. Wealth is the measuring stick and the ranking of class in the world today—whether it be new money or old money, it matters not. What matters only is that you have it. Was there ever a more consuming generation than this?

The next set of adjectives is once more accurate to this godless generation. We are described as "proud, abusive, disobedient to [our] parents, and ungrateful." We are so proud of and arrogant about our accomplishments. We delude ourselves into believing we are better than our parents and ancestors. We dismiss our parents as outdated and obsolete in the modern world of technology. We delude ourselves into believing we are superior; we are more tolerant, less violent, more intelligent, and more civilized. Soon our children will consider us obsolete in the face of changing technology, and they will discard us easily and without emotion, just as we have taught them. We will soon become a burden to our technologically enlightened progeny.

"Without love, unforgiving, slanderous, without self-control, brutal, not lovers of the good, treacherous, rash, conceited," and "lovers of pleasure" are the next set of descriptions for this enlightened generation. Again, I find them all to be right on the money. We are without true, collective love; we are only concerned with ourselves. Has there ever been a more slanderous society, lacking restraint, or without regard for what one says about one another? Slanderous denigration of others is now the standard we elevate ourselves with, through devaluing others. We are indeed without self-control, not wanting to be limited in any regard or denied anything; pleasure is our only pursuit. We are rash in our decisions, not concerned with the future, and swollen with conceit because of our accomplishments.

It is the last denunciation that is so poignant, enlightening, and disturbing. Our generation is prophesied to be ever learning but never acknowledging truth, having a form of godliness but denying God’s power. What an accurate portrayal of our current generation. We are indeed ever learning, with our knowledge now doubling every three years or less. We are blessed with data banks of knowledge and are unlocking the secrets to the universe. We are overpowering nature and are at the precipice of decoding and manipulating DNA. But with all this learning, understanding, knowledge, and technology, we do not have the wisdom to interpret its meaning or the moral discipline for its application.

We are so blinded by pride, conceit, and arrogance that we cannot see God; nor do we care to recognize or acknowledge the Author (Word) of our creation. We observe the genius to God’s design and handiwork every day, but we deny His very existence. We decipher God’s obscure but requisite laws governing the universe but tribute random chance for its manifestation and perfection. We seek to comprehend life forms, with their mystifying, complex organs and bewildering, wholly integrated bio-systems, all which remain well beyond the reach of our ingenuity and understanding. But we attribute these unexplainable manifestations to the mathematic impossibly of unintelligent evolution.

We do not recognize the signature of God imprinted in all of creation and the universe. We deny God as the Creator, searching any and all other places and possibilities for answers, simply to justify our arrogance, ignorance, and independence. The apostle Paul describes the Terminal Generation:

> For since the Creation of the world God’s invisible qualities—his eternal power and divine nature—have been clearly seen, being understood from what has been made, so that men are without excuse. For although they knew God, they neither glorified Him as God nor gave thanks to Him, but their thinking became futile and their foolish hearts darkened.
> —Romans 1:20–22

We are the same as our impious and independent antediluvian ancestors, who refused to honor God for all things.

Indeed, if we were not approaching the last days, I am certain uncountable criminal investigations would have already been initiated.

Serious reprimands would already have been dispensed, publicly punishing the powerful (and seemingly paradoxical) left wing and fascist academia. Fascism began as a nationalistic, totalitarian, right-wing belief system, but one must remember Nazi Fascism (national socialism) was a mutation of left-wing socialism. This is a concept essential to understanding the coming partnership between the end-time universal religion and world government.

Webster defines fascism as those believing in principles and practices of a strong centralized government, similar to that in Italy that suppressed all criticism and opposition.[1] In a general sense, fascists believe in an authoritarian style of central government and social organization that is intolerant to opposing views, which viciously suppresses free speech. Therefore, I have coined contemporary Progressives as "left-wing fascists," closely related to Nazis from Germany.

Hence, Vitriolic intelligentsia rally against and hunt into submission any who suggest Intelligent Design, even though Intelligent Design resolves the unexplainable conundrums to the origin and progression of life, as well as the universe. So much for objectivity and the open debate of ideas in the sciences and universities. Rancorous mystical scientists and globalists now inflict a numinous inquisition against all who disagree with them, including those who disagree on the theory of global warming. The discussion is not over. Only elitists, and what I have coined left-wing fascists, wish to eliminate debate, the free flow of ideas, and respect for opposing views.

The Apocalypse will engulf this deluded generation without the fanfare one would expect. And if not for the true elect and the forthcoming prophets of God,[2] this generation would unknowingly plunder its way into oblivion, even though the Apocalypse is the event the Bible most often refers to. The suggestion that the Terminal Generation will be so blind to the times we are in and ignore all the warnings from Scripture is seemingly unbelievable, and yet we are witnessing its inauguration. People now eagerly embrace this prophecy from 2 Peter 3:3–4:

> First of all, you must understand that in the last days scoffers will come, scoffing and following their own evil desires. They will say: "Where is this 'coming' he promised"?

People now scoff at the promised second coming, and they will in ever increasing numbers, especially after the rapture tragedy, casting them as wistful dreams from spiritually retarded and obsolete fanatics. This Terminal Generation is recreating Sodom and Gomorrah on a global scale. This may seem to be a gross overstatement of analogy at first perusal, but I assure you it is not. Before this last generation is finished, the world will appear like a reincarnated Sodom and Gomorrah, which was why Jesus' words in Luke 17:28–29 associate this end-time generation with the generation of Sodom and Gomorrah, as well as with the flood:

> It was the same in the days of Lot. People were eating and drinking, buying and selling, planting and building. But the day Lot left Sodom, fire and sulfur rained down from heaven and destroyed them all. It will be just like this on the day the Son of Man is revealed.

The Sodom parallel is strikingly appropriate and ingenious in its transitional analogy to the end times. The antediluvian, divine judgment was with water, after which God promised in a covenant represented by the rainbow that He would never judge the earth by water again.[3] The judgment of the end times will be with fire and brimstone, just as Sodom and Gomorrah were judged,[4] once more demonstrating the perfection in which the Bible supports itself. Jesus' words in Luke, even though Jesus did not mention Nephilim, underscore the same kinds of crimes as those at Sodom and Gomorrah and those that took place just before the flood. And I must note that both the flood and Sodom communities were infested with Nephilim that corrupted those societies. Jesus then foreshadows with Sodom what the end-time judgment will be akin to—divine judgment by fire.

The sins of Sodom, Gomorrah, and the cities of the plain were well known and infamous. They were renowned for their violence and sexual improprieties, which included all forms of sexual deviance, orgies complete with human sacrifice, polygamy, rape, bestiality, adultery, and many other deviant practices. Again, this is a specific moral equivalent for this generation. Have we ever seen such a widespread movement euphemized under the banner of sexual liberation and equality since Sodom? Remember, too, that Gnostics remember Sodom and Gomorrah as ancient cities of light, knowledge, and sexual tolerance, just as they refer to the coming end times as the same sort of New Age of Enlightenment.

The apostle Paul foresaw this age:

> Although they claimed to be wise, they became fools and exchanged the glory of the immortal God for images made to look like mortal man and birds and animals and reptiles. Therefore, God gave them over in the sinful desires of their hearts to sexual impurity for the degrading of their bodies with one another. They exchanged truth for a lie, and worshipped and served created things rather than the Creator—who is forever praised. Amen. Because of this, God gave them over to shameful lusts. Even their women exchanged natural relations for unnatural ones. In the same way the men also abandoned natural relationships with women and were inflamed with lust for one another. Men committed indecent acts with other men.

—Romans 1:22–27

Just as it was in the time of Noah, when only eight were deemed worthy of saving, and just as it was in the time of Lot, when just four were granted the right to survive (although Lot's wife died after fleeing the city),[5] so will it be for this generation. The elect will transform directly to heaven in a miraculous, prophetic event of the last days, before the earth will be judged by fire.[6] This is exactly what took place when Enoch of the line of Seth was transformed directly into heaven before the deluge as a reward for and a sign for future generations of his righteousness and faith.[7]

Rapture will occur in this generation, saving a select few from the horrors of the wrath of God. Just as another select few rode out the wrath aboard an ark, so will there be an additional select number not raptured, who will have their righteousness baptized by fire during tribulation.[8] Just as Lot and his daughters survived Sodom, some saints will endure God's wrath[9] to help repopulate the earth at the beginning of Christ's thousand-year reign.

The prophet Micah describes the godless generation of the tribulation best:

> The godly have been swept away from the land; not one upright man remains. All men lie in wait to shed blood; each hunts his brother with a net. Both hands are skilled in doing evil; the ruler demands gifts, the judge accepts bribes, the powerful dictate what they desire—they all conspire together. The best of them is like a brier, the most upright worse than a thorn hedge. The day your watchman has come, the day God visits you. Now is the time of their confusion. Do not trust a neighbor; put no confidence in a friend. Even with her who lies in your embrace be careful of your words. For a son dishonors his father, a daughter rises up against her mother, a daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law—a man's enemies are the members of his own household. But as for me, I watch in hope for the Lord, I wait for my God my Savior.
> —Micah 7:2–7

This wicked generation has been reserved for these last days so that the mystery of God might be completed. Hearts will continue to be hardened, just as the hearts of the people of Noah's time were and just as Pharaoh's heart was hardened during the time of the Exodus.[10]

> Furthermore, since they did not think it worthwhile to retain the knowledge of God, he gave them over to a depraved mind, to do what ought not to be done. They have become filled with every kind of wickedness, evil, greed, and depravity. They are full of envy, murder, strife, deceit and malice. They are gossips, slanderers, God-haters, insolent, arrogant and boastful; they invent ways of doing evil; they disobey their parents; they are senseless, faithless, heartless, and ruthless. Although they know God's righteous decree that those who do such > things deserve death, they not only continue to do these very things but also approve of those who practice them.

> —Romans 1:28–32

No matter how many warnings or signs there are, they will not soften this generation’s hearts. The Apocalypse cannot be avoided. Time is short and the task overwhelming. The balance of this book is a handbook for the saints in regard to what is and what will be.

CHAPTER 44

BABYLON CITY

Woe! Woe, O great city, O Babylon, city of power! In one hour your doom has come!

—Revelation 18:10

Revelation is the most misunderstood book of the Bible and the only book of the Bible that comes with a special blessing for those who take the time to read it.[1]

So, then, why is such an important testament cloaked in so many allegories? Is there an unidentified design to these oblique allegories? Could the book of the future be encrypted with intentional allegories from apocalypses past?

Revelation is reserved for believers who steadfastly study the Bible. You see, for committed enthusiasts, the allegories of Revelation are not stumbling blocks, nor are they subjective in their application. All scriptural allegories are self-defined within biblical text. One is only required to be knowledgeable enough to know where to look to decode Revelation's metaphors. There is no mystery to it whatsoever.

The most obvious point of reference connecting this generation to ancient epochs is Babylon. Our civilized world is ready to naively embrace a new Tower of Babel that will bring about all the evils of the first. It will include a new Nimrod, who is now patiently waiting in the wings for his preordained time.

The people of the plain chose to not be divided—to live as one people, with one language, with one government, with one collective ambition. They bound together with such collective intensity that they rebelled against God, utilizing a clever repository built in antediluvian times by the progeny of Lamech. With this illicit knowledge, nothing was beyond their grasp. The newfound technology and knowledge was sponsored by the spurious religion, which attached itself to the illicit knowledge. This illicit knowledge and power stemming from the authority of the religion enabled Nimrod to usurp absolute power over the united people of Shinar. It is through this lens that we must critically examine our Terminal Generation.

Babylon is the figurative term confused by so many with regard to end-time prophecy. The confusion stems mostly from ignorance of how to define the context to the allegory. Those who confuse what the end-time Babylon will be generally err on the side of the physical ancient city being reincarnated in the last days, thereby pointing to Iraq’s restoration of this ancient treasure. Others tend to err on the allegorical side, where Babylon will become the great end-time world government prophesied to trample the nations. They presume end-time Babylon will be a governmental institution. Both interpretations are partly correct.

We must first accept from the numerous biblical prophecies that Babylon will be an end-time city.[2] Prophecy clearly states Babylon will be a city as part of its end time characteristics, just as the quotation introducing this chapter verifies. The only question is what city? Will it be an existing city, or will it be the restored Babylon of antiquity? Or even more tantalizing, will it be a city yet to be built in commemoration of the forthcoming utopia globalists are currently trying to bring about? Because the time of the end will be so short, seven years, plus a few more additional but precious years leading into the tribulation, I do not believe there will be time to build a new city. With this conclusion, then, we must look forward to Babylon being an existing city.

The prophetic Babylon city was defined through three ill-famed examples from antiquity. Revelation allegorized this future city as Babylon; Isaiah employed Tyre and Babylon; Jeremiah allegorized Babylon; Zephaniah and Nahum utilized Nineveh.[3] All of these prophets were speaking to the same future city. However, their different allegorical utilization was not meant to be contradictive or confusing, but rather more enlightening with its content. Furthermore, with the exception of John's period of time when he penned Revelation, this future Babylon had not yet established itself as a city on the world stage. Therefore, all the other prophets had to apply allegories for the future city. John had other motivating reasons to allegorize this city as Babylon. All three allegories provide a macrocode for the end-time city of evil.

Let us first examine the great Canaanite city of the ancient Phoenicians, Tyre, the home of the King Hiram and the infamous Adept, Hiram Abif. Tyre was the greatest city of the postdiluvian world with regard to trade. Tyre was famous for its business principles, commerce, and seafaring trade routes, which brought products from the beyond the known world back to Tyre, only to be reshipped to all the important cities of the ancient world. Tyre was the marketplace for the ancient world. She became rich because of her ingenuity in business. Tyre made merchants all around the ancient world opulent through the enormous volume of trade they commissioned through her. In an age of free global trade, such a city is necessary to perform like a conduit facilitating the free flow of trade.

Such will be the case again in the not so distant future. GATT treaties, the World Trade Organization, and many other corrupted United Nation organizations are bent on institutionalizing global free trade. Once this diabolical ideal is both completed and institutionalized, the world will become a total free trade zone, pitting every citizen in the world against all other fellow citizens of the world. The Last Days will be a time unlike we have ever seen since the fall of the Roman Empire, where free trade was a significant part of its legacy, and operational successes. This ill-reputed future City of Blood will become the center of trade for the world, just as Tyre and Atlantis were in antiquity; a city of commerce that will dwarf New York City by comparison.

We know Babylon will be a city of commerce as Revelation 18:11–24 describes it, where the merchants of the world will grow rich and will mourn at her destruction. Just consider the level of commerce that the city will partake in:

> The merchants of the earth will weep and mourn over her because no one buys their cargoes any more—cargoes of gold, silver, precious stones and pearls, fine linen, purple, silk and scarlet cloth; every sort of citron wood, and articles of every kind made of ivory, costly wood, bronze, iron and marble; cargoes of cinnamon and spice, of incense, myrrh and frankincense, > of wine and olive oil, of fine flour and wheat; cattle and sheep; horses and carriages; and bodies and souls of men.

Babylon City will impose a tribute from all commerce that will take place throughout the entire world. Tyre and Atlantis are the perfect allegorical cities to describe the business characteristics for the future city of evil.

The second allegorical city was Nineveh, the city originally founded by Nimrod after the dispersion from Babel. Nineveh was the capital city of ancient Assyria and likely the most impious of the seven great world empires of the postdiluvian epoch: Egypt, Assyria, Babylon, Persia-Medes, Greece, Rome and the future Roman Empire.

Assyrians were renowned for their violence through both war and torture and for their carrying out of mass genocide. They were tyrannical, showing no mercy to their vanquished victims, impaling prisoners and/or skinning them alive. Assyria was the most bloodthirsty postdiluvian empire, while Atlantis was Assyria’s antediluvian role model. Nineveh, as recorded by Nahum, was the City of Blood because of all the violence, murder, and torture that took place within those evil walls.[4] Remember, Assyria was the land of Nimrod; the Assyrians were indeed their father’s sons!

The future City of Blood will be regal in its wealth and powerful in its glory, but it will also be reckless in its ruthlessness: “By your magic spell all the nations were led astray. In her was found the blood of the prophets and the saints, and all who have been killed on the earth” (Rev. 18:23–24). And, “He [God] has avenged on her [Babylon] the blood of his servants” (Rev. 19:2). This will be the city where the genocide of the saints will be plotted, a holocaust of the scale and nature not seen before or ever again. Babylon City will vibrate with such a bloodthirsty fever that it will forever be remembered as the true City of Blood, paling Nineveh’s sins by comparison. “He [false prophet] was given power to give breath to the image of the first beast, so that it could speak and cause all who refused to worship the image to be killed” (Rev 13:15). Babylon will not be the tolerant, utopian religion it will profess to be; rather, it will be the religion of the Nephilim. Babylon will impose a new, unprecedented form of global idolatry through the forced worship of the image of the Antichrist.

Babylon is the third symbolic city from applied history, which best defines its characteristics. It was from ancient Babylon, and Babel, the true inward spirit was derived. J. R. Porter notes Babylon became the name applied to any empire that was the enemy of God or of his servants.[5] Porter additionally views Babylon as the embodiment of all evil, a kingdom of wickedness that is set against God and His chosen people; it was a complex symbol of pride, oppression, wealth, luxury, sexual license, and idolatry.[6] Babel reflected images of the new Atlantis and Sodom in its tyranny, debauchery, religion, and rebellion.

With this discussion in mind, let us now divert back to Revelation 17:3–5:

> Then the angel carried me away in the Spirit to the desert. There I saw a woman sitting on a scarlet beast that was covered in blasphemous names and had seven heads and ten horns. The woman was dressed in purple and scarlet, and was glittering with gold, precious stones and pearls. She held a golden cup in her hand, filled with abominable things and the filth of her adulteries. This title was written on her forehead: MYSTERY—BABYLON THE GREAT—THE MOTHER OF PROSTITUTES—AND OF THE ABOMINATION OF THE EARTH.

The woman on the great beast is the mother of all prostitutes, who clenches a golden cup filled with abominations and her adulteries. Adultery and prostitution were biblical allegories defining unfaithfulness to the true God (adultery), while worshipping another god was viewed as sleeping with the local prostitute of choice (or god). This was defined in many parts of the Old Testament, but Hosea and Ezekiel stated it most succinctly: “They consult a wooden idol and are answered by a wooden stick. A spirit of prostitution leads them astray; they are unfaithful to their God” (Hosea 2:13). “Confront them with their detestable practices, for they have committed adultery and blood is on their hands. They committed adultery with their idols…. Then I said about the one worn out by adultery, ‘Now let them use her as a prostitute, for that is all she is’” (Ezek. 23:36, 43). The prostitute and adultery images clearly imply that Babylon is figurative for the ancient, pantheistic religion spawned by Cain and Atlantis and then reintroduced to the postdiluvian world by Hermes and Nimrod at Babel.

Let us once more read what Revelation 18:2–3 has to say about the nature of this religion, to ensure that there is no confusion: “Babylon the Great! She has become a home for demons and a haunt for every evil spirit, a haunt for every unclean and detestable bird. For all the nations have drunk the maddening wine of her adulteries. The kings of the earth committed adultery with her, and the merchants of the earth grew rich from her excessive luxuries.” Babylon City will center the future world, harlot religion; let there be no misunderstanding with regard to this.

The other vivid description of Babylon is the word abominations, which filled the golden chalice. Unger's defines abomination as something "unclean … the word is used to denote that which is particularly offensive to the moral sense" and "is the practice of sins—such as the swellings of pride, lips of falsehood, the sacrifices of the wicked, and the foul rituals of idolatry."[7] This succinctly describes what this great end-time religion will be like. Babylon will be built on lies; cloaked with a glorious and righteous disguise; adorned in beauty, riches, power, and false hope. Babylon will appear to be an enlightened, universal religion, gathering in all the religions of the world, including Christianity, Islam, and Judaism, but it will truly be the spurious, ancient religion of Babylon and Atlantis, which denies Jesus as the Christ and denies God as the true God of the universe.

We must not underestimate the power and influence this powerful religion/city-state will exert on the world stage: "Come, I will show you the punishment of the great prostitute, who sits on many waters…. The waters you saw, where the prostitute sits, are peoples, multitudes, nations and languages" (Rev. 17:1, 15). This city-state/religion will sit as queen of kingdoms over all peoples, kings, and nations (Isa. 47:5). She will be a center for global business and the center for the powerful, new, universal religion. Babylon will be an authority unto its own, unlike anything we have ever seen before—opulent in its glory and wicked in its adjudication of power. The nations will become hopelessly drunk; they will sip liberally and shamelessly from the inebriating chalice of abominations, which will be utterly intoxicating them so that they eagerly stagger after the prostitute and their destruction. Babylon will reign with absolute power and control over the nations and peoples, their commerce, and their religion.

We can determine the city and where its religion will be centered. First of all, let us consider the time of the writing of Revelation—the reign of the Roman Empire, which was ruthless in its oppression against those who dared to rebel against her or those who dared criticize in any way. Any writings that might be interpreted as rebellious or critical in any way against Rome were hidden beneath a veil of codes and a shroud of secrecy. To the Jewish people, these codes were known as Peshur, in which allegorical names were applied to sensitive places and names, hiding the true meaning from the Romans and Roman sympathizers. The writers in Judah drafted Babylon as Peshur for the city of Rome.

As you will recall, Berosus recorded Babylon was an allegory employed by Chaldean priests for Atlantis, and Frank Joseph believes the Bible employs Tyre and Babylon as an allegory for Atlantis.[8] Perhaps this is allegorically so, but most certainly, the selected biblical passages were definitive prophecies for the future, end-time Babylon. The future, allegorical city of Atlantis in the New Age and the new empire of Atlantis destined for the last days will, in truth, be the city of Rome, known figuratively as Babylon.

Finally, Revelation presents a more detailed definition of who the future Babylon will be: “This calls for a mind with wisdom. The seven heads are seven hills on which the woman sits” (Rev. 17:9). The only city in the world that rests on seven hills, or mountains, is the city of Rome. Rome will be the global capital city for both business and religion; it will center the future utopia, which will house the institutions for world government and obligatory cooperation. Rome will provide the location from which the future world government will govern, housing all the essential global government institutions. Babylon will be Rome, capital of the new, future, revived Roman Empire.

Isn’t it an intriguing anecdote of historical coincidence that one church of global nature is already seated on seven hills, in a city-state? This city-state, also known as a universal religion, is, of course, the Vatican. Is it not equally intriguing that Catholicism, by literal definition, is defined as “universal,” thereby translating Roman Catholicism as the universal church? One should then expect that something utterly diabolical will forcibly stake its beginning within Catholicism and then will spread to incorporate all other religions of the world, thereby becoming a true, inclusive, universal church.

I am not indicting the current Catholic Church as the future, harlot religion. I am merely stating that the future, harlot religion will be spawned secretly within, in the holy confines of Catholicism, through an evil usurping of its power from within. Rome is indeed the future Babylon City.

CHAPTER 45

REFLECTIONS FROM WITHIN THE THIRD REICH

After this I looked and there before me was a great multitude that no one could count, from every nation, tribe, people and language, standing before the throne and in front of the Lamb. They were wearing white robes and holding palm branches in their hands … "These in white robes—who are they, and where did they come from?" I answered, "sir you know." And he said, "These are they who have come out of the great tribulation; they have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."

—Revelation 7:9–14

Why will Babylon not be tolerant to any opposition?

Babylon will be a worldwide, institutionalized religion enforced through tyranny by the state or world government of that time.

Although this spurious religion will advocate a veneer of tolerance and evolution of the spirit into godhood, just as all politically correct movements do, this future religion will not have the patience or tolerance for those who disagree. Those who do not accept the future, universal religion will be considered inferior beings, neither worthy nor capable of evolving/ ascending into a higher consciousness. Those who oppose the coming tyranny will be relegated to cattle and slaughtered without remorse, in the same spirit Fascist Islamic terrorists act today.

The saints who stand against Babylon will be boisterous in their opposition to the spurious, false religion. Their opposition will spark a bloody, barbaric genocide. "I saw that the woman was drunk with the blood of the saints, the blood of those who bore testimony to Jesus" (Rev. 17:6), and "in her was found the blood of the prophets and of the saints, and of all who have been killed on the earth" (Rev. 18:24). This coming genocide is further supported by the secret, internal writings of the end-time conspirators, where they acknowledge they will be obliged to murder off all such people and societies through organized troops, to eliminate these so-called infections.[1]

One might look to the Roman Empire's genocidal orgy waged against the early Christians for a terrible testimonial of the woe that is to come. In 65 C.E., motivated by hate and needing to deflect attention from his own misdeeds, Nero fraudulently laid blame upon the helpless Christians for the fire of Rome.[2] Sulpicius Servus's Chronicle noted this:

> Nero could not, by any means he tried, escape from the charge that the fire had been caused by his orders. He therefore turned the accusation against the Christians, and the cruelest tortures were accordingly inflicted upon the innocent. Nay, even new kinds of death were invented…. [At] that time Paul and Peter were condemned to death, the former being beheaded with a sword, while Peter suffered crucifixion.[3]

Tacitus details the horror:

> Nero fastened the guilt and inflicted the most exquisite tortures on a class hated for their abominations, called Christians by the populace. Christus, from whom the name had its origin, suffered the extreme penalty during the reign of Tiberius at the hands of one of our procurators, Pontius Pilatus, and a most mischievous superstition, thus checked for the moment…. Accordingly an arrest was first made of all who pleaded guilty; then, upon their information, an immense multitude was convicted, not so much of the crime of firing the city as of hatred against mankind. Mockery of every sort was added to their deaths. Covered with skins of beasts, they were torn by dogs and perished, or were nailed to crosses, or were doomed to the flames and burnt, to serve as nightly illumination, when daylight had expired. Nero offered his gardens for the spectacle, and was exhibiting a show in the Circus, while he mingled with the people in the dress of a charioteer or stood aloft on a car. Hence, even for > criminals who deserved extreme and exemplary punishment, there arose a feeling of compassion; for it was not, as it seemed, for the public good, but to glut one man’s cruelty, that they were being tortured.[4]

Perhaps Nazi Germany, which also glutted one man’s cruelty, is a more tangible example of the horrific genocide that is to come. Nazis were a political force that held the reins of government, bent with evil motives, complete with the prophesied evil second Antichrist/Nimrod/potentate of Nostradamas, Adolf Hitler. The first Nostradamas Antichrist figure was Napoleon, while the third and last Antichrist figure will be the Beast of Scripture. Had the Nazis been completely successful, they would have established a world government under their oppressive rule, crowned with Hitler as the world dictator/ Antichrist. The coveted Nazi reign, of course, was the elusive, infamous German Third Reich, which promised a thousand-year reign of prosperity, just as the authentic Antichrist will aspire to with his promise of the New Age.

Most do not realize the Nazi regime was steeped in mysticism and occultism, because it wore a Christian public cloak. Nazis secretly subscribed to the Theosophist doctrine of New Age pantheism. British prosecutor Airy Neave noted the collective Nuremberg prosecutors suppressed knowledge and documentation concerning Nazi esoteric thought and influence at the highest levels, because they concluded it was too bizarre to be admitted into evidence and for fear of insanity pleas from indicted Nazis. Churchill insisted that it not be revealed to the public.[5] Mystical dimensions to National Socialism were not a secret before or World War II. Occult periodicals of the 1930s discussed Hitler’s preoccupation, just as magician Dion Fortune circulated letters among the British.[6]

Historians recognize that the Nazis were indeed, gripped by occultism inspired by their spiritual mother, Helen Blavatsky, the founder of Theosophy, and, to a lesser degree, Aleister Crowley. Theosophy was first established in Germany in 1884 C.E. By the turn of the century, Theosophy had spread throughout Germany. Theosophy spawned numerous pan-Aryan and anti-Semitic societies, providing a fallacious justification and breeding ground for Nazi racial theoreticians. Between 1892 and 1900 C.E., Blavatsky incorporated the swastika, an ancient sun symbol from Hinduism and Tibetan Buddhism and Blavatsky’s personal emblem, on the cover of all her works. It was enclosed by a circle and surmounted by interlocking triangles forming a six-pointed star.[7]

Theosophy and its occultist doctrines were the foundation stones for the Central European offshoot, Ariosophy, which brewed Germanic racist beliefs mixed in with Germanic occultism and Theosophy.[8] Ancient German pantheism was adopted as the Folk Soul, known alternatively as “Das Volk” and/or Volkishe ideology, throughout Germany in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries C.E. Then it was inherited by the Nazis. This belief drew upon an ancient Heroic Collective Entity divinely ordained to manifest power, which further provided the foundation for the philosophical doctrine of racial supremacy. Volkishe ideology fondly harkened back to a pre-Christian epoch of pan-Aryanism. It was an ideology hostile towards Christianity, and it transformed Jesus into a mortal teacher.[9]

A report prepared in the 1930s by a Catholic priest, Muckerman, declared Nazism to be identical to neo-paganism, as advocated by the writings of the Nazi apostle Alfred Rosenberg. Bloodlines and race were constitutive elements of this political religion. Another envoy and priest of Rome, Alois Hudal, wrote that Christianity was alien to the Nordic race. Christianity was replaced by the Nazis with a “new, revived paganism” that amounted to a form of national mysticism, deifying blood and race.[10]

Nazis were obsessed with finding hallows of the Grail castle. Hitler was additionally infatuated with Grail romances glorified in Wagner’s works. Hitler saw himself, according to Baigent and Leigh, as a Grail knight; thus, Hitler exalted the SS members as equals to the Teutonic knights and the Knights of the Round Table.[11] The SS members devoted three departments to research on the occult and Ariosophy, as Himmler was a committed student of both. [12] Nazis excavated the fortress at Montsegur and the infamous Languedoc in 1944 C.E., led by Hitler’s top SS Commando SS Standartenfuehrer Otto Skorzeny overseeing a battalion of SS troopers, followed the research of Otto Rahn following the research of Otto Rahn, who believed Cathars held the Holy Grail, as mentioned in Eschenbach’s Perceval. Nazis were smitten by Rhan’s research.[13]

Treasured Grail hallows included the ancient Sword, the Chalice, the Platter, and the Spear, which evolved over time into the four suits of the Tarot Minor Arcana.[14] Tarot cards were devised to pass on secret ideologies banned by the Roman Church; they contained heretical cards like the female pope,[15] an allegory for Mary Magdalene and Isis. Tarot cards are thought to have been created in Milan in the early fifteenth century C.E., but the Legominism codes were lost, until a French occultist decoded the occultist secrets once more in the eighteenth century C.E. Tarot cards survived this period employed as playing cards;[16] the swords, cups, pentacles, and wands of the tarot cards later became the famous spades, hearts, diamonds, and clubs[17] that we know today. Spades/swords were an allegory for the male aspect of gods; hearts/cups were an allegory for the feminine, the Grail/womb; the clubs/scepters/wands represented the Royal San Greal bloodline; and the diamonds/pentacles/ pentagrams represented the feminine goddess (Isis).[18]

Hollywood’s Indiana Jones trilogy has depicted its version of the Nazi quest for Grail hallows. In the real quest, the explorers obtained an ancient lance mythologized to have been the lance of Charlemagne, known also as the Spear of Longinus, named after the centurion that pierced the side of Jesus at the crucifixion. Rhan’s research concluded the Jerusalem Treasure included the Grail, Tablets of the Testimony, the Emerald Cup, the Ark of the Covenant, numerous scrolls holding ancient occult knowledge, gold coins, copper scrolls, and the Spear of Longinus. Otto Skorzeny sent a one-word telegram signed with his nickname, “Scar”, on March 15, 1944 to Berlin that read: “Ureka.” Berlin returned the telegram to Skorzeny signed, “Reichsfuehrer”, stating: “Well done. Congratulations. Watch the sky tomorrow at noon, Await our arrival.[19] What little is known of the discovery was noted by a Colonel Buechner of the 45th Infantry Division recorded that before the “Treasure of the Ages” was split up, the treasure contained thousands of Roman gold coins, fragments of wood they believed belonged to the Ark od the Covenant as well as other gold items from the Temple of Solomon, indecipherable inscriptions on twelve pre-runic tablets, a silvery goblet/grail with precious jewels flaunting three inscribed gold plaques with cuneiform script, a large number of religious objects made of gold and silver inlaid with precious jewels, and a large volume of precious stones in various sizes and shapes.[20] Rosenberg and Himmler are believed to have handed out medals at Montsegur in the spring of 1944, honoring the discoveries.[21]

This famous lance of Charlemagne, also remembered as the Spear of Destiny in Grail lore, is now kept on display in the Hapsburg museum in Vienna. The lance Hitler sought was variantly thought to be the infamous spear or rod of the Anunnaki/Nephilim kings rooted the Ring Lord tradition. The rod of the Anunnaki/Nephilim was referred to then as "the Rule,"[22] the rule of government.

Nazis saw themselves as a quasi-religious movement born out of secret organizations, whose goals were the same as Freemasonry and the Illuminati. Many orthodox historians refer to the SS as Nazi Freemasonry.[23] The Nazi movement grew from occultist and secret societies—Freemasonry, the Illuminati, the Germanenorden, the Teutonic knights, and the Thule Society[24]—while invoking the agenda of Bavarian Illuminati that included the dogma that the end justifies the means. Nazism was a left-wing, political movement that got out of control. Left-wing Nazism Fascism (National Socialism) is a merger of the state with corporate oligopolies to achieve the goals of the state. Nazism is distinctly a far-left-of-center movement that's only slightly right of pure socialism; whereas socialism is slightly right of communism and anarchism. Nazism was originally conceived and funded by western financiers to check their other abomination, Communism, which also got out of control.[25]

On the surface, the Germanenorden was a group dedicated to the promotion of old German literature, but underneath, it was a front for the reincarnated Teutonic order of wealthy nationalists who promoted radical politics, race mysticism, and the occult with an Illuminati agenda.[26] The Germanenorden was patterned after Freemasons but were decidedly anti-Mason and anti-Jewish.

The Germanenorden, meaning "German Order," was created in 1912 by a number of Von List's disciples.[27] The order focused on an Aryan revival, drawing upon Druids, Ariosophy, and Wagner.[28] Von List and Jorg Lanz Von Liebenfels were the architectural theorists for the offshoot Ariosophy, according to Greer.[29] List was the first writer to combine Theosophy, occultism, and Volkishe ideologies, overlaying them with ideology from the The New Temple Order.[30] The anti-Semitic New Temple Order was created in 1907 by a Cistercian monk mentored by List and Adolf Josef Lanc, who also assumed the title Jorg Lanz Von Liebenfels. The organization garnered the swastika on their flag. Von Liebenfels believed antediluvian, Aryan mystery cults were devoted to deviant sex with subhuman dwarfs,[31] likely another mythos of DNA manipulation and/or interbreeding, much like dwarf aliens now do with humans and dwarf fairies did in Celtic mythology. Liebenfels further published an anti-Semitic journal called the Ostara.[32] The Ordo Novi Temple heavily influenced both Hitler and Himmler, who wove the order's rituals into the SS[33] and drew large doses of symbolism from List's Armanen-Orden that represented the ancient Indo-Aryan highest caste of hereditary priest kings, the Brahman.[34]

In 1918, a Germanenorden faction spawned a new order, the Thule Society.[34] This was the Munich Lodge.[35]It was led by Rudolf Von Sebettendorf, who added Vril (a mysterious potency held within certain bloodlines that will engender a future race of superior beings) and Volkishe doctrine to the society. Other members included Rudolf Hess, Dietrick Eckhart, and Alfred Rosenberg.[36] The Thule Society was dedicated to destroying the Aryan's racial enemy; the society members were "Atlanteans," who were also known variantly as the Teutonic Knights. Their adversaries have always been the pure seed of Adam, the Israelites,[37] and the children of God.

The Thule Society emerged as a ruse to counter and resist Communism; their logo, too, was a Theosophist swastika superimposed by a sword. Thule was a mythic German homeland believed to be a Teutonic Atlantis. This dark, occultist, Ariosophic organization readily adopted Thule as its own alternative Atlantis and home of its ancestral Aryan people.[38] Ariosophy maintained a cosmology where members of an original, semidivine Aryan race had fallen from grace and lost their superhuman powers through inbreeding with mundane mortals.[39] The Thule Society was an Aryan order immersed in black magic and Satanism, just as Atlantis was immersed in the black arts. It extolled the glories of German mythology regarding the Teutonic Knights through other contemporary, associated orders that were originally formed by the Knights Templar.[40] The modern Teutonic Knights were a companion organization to the Templars. In Himmler's eyes, the infamous SS was a reincarnated Teutonic order, or the Knights of King Arthur's Round Table.[41]

The Thule Society organized a German Workers Party, the DAP, in 1918; Hitler joined the DAP in 1919.[42] The DAP and Hitler were funded by the Thule Society through Dietrich Eckart.[43] The Thule Society purchased a newspaper, the Volkishe Bepbachter, with Eckart as editor, and the periodical then became the official organ for the Nazi Party. By 1921, Hitler became the owner.[44] The Thule Society organized the Nazi party by merging with an organization of workers called the Harrer-led Political Workers Circle, which was founded by the Theosophist Sebettendorf, who was instrumental in creating the secret Germanenorden.[45]

Theosophy further inspired the writings of Schelling, Bohme, and of course, Dietrich Eckhart.[46] Eckhart maintained membership in both the fledgling Nazi party and the Thule Society. Eckhart realized the Nazis needed a leader; he found this prospective leader in Hitler.[47] Eckhart was the person who initiated Hitler into the Secret Doctrine that largely stemmed from the Theosophical Society.[48] Hitler was a long-time student of the occult and a convinced Ariosophist[49] (a believer in Aryan Theosophy). Nowadays, most historians consider Dietrich Eckhart to have been Hitler's occult mentor[50] and a widely read author espousing Ariosophic doctrines.[51]

The German Youth Movement was yet another key component in the Nazi, occultist infrastructure. The Wander-Vogel Movement began in the 1920s. This pantheistic-based movement was annexed by Nazis into their movement. Hitler Youth were initiated into neo-pagan rituals at very early ages; they were taught Hitler was the divine's representative on earth. Stefan George's poetry and literature were always read and recited during the Hitler Youth meetings. George was a German writer and poet in the early 1900s, whose compositions burgeoned with mystical, pantheistic, and esoteric teachings. His fame rivaled that of T.S. Elliot and Yeats, according to Baigent and Leigh.[52]

George saw himself as a Pythagorean figure analogous to Chiron, the centaur mentor to the heroes Jason, Achilles, and Hercules.[53] Chiron was celebrated throughout antediluvian Greece for his wisdom and acquirements. All the renowned heroes (Nephilim) of that age had been his pupils.[54]

George's and Nietzsche's teachings were drafted by Nazis as their spiritual precursors, along with George's swastika motif and his book Das Neue Reich (The New Reich). In 1907, George published The Seventh Ring, reflecting Helen Blavatsky's Theosophical movement and doctrines. George was anti-Christian and unabashedly pagan in his beliefs. George believed in and promoted the Theosophical Avatar, a term employed prominently in Theosophy, applied to invisible, secret masters,[55] which were demons and fallen angels. As you will recall, Lucifer, too, was referred to as the Avatar tempter that fell from grace.

George co-opted, from Wagner's Grail opera Lohengrin, the title Führer, more commonly spelled "Fuehrer" in English, meaning "leader."[56] George elevated the original Fuehrer meaning so it would represent messianic qualities and exalted, religious connotations, according to Baigent and Leigh.[57] Wagner was decidedly Volkishe, and so were his works, which drew heavily upon pagan German folklore, pan-Aryan mythology, and Grail mythology. Wagner was a prominent master magician and a master alchemist,[58] who promoted an Aryan world philosophy.[59] He drew upon Wolfram Von Eschenbach to set Grail Mysteries into the German context, while adding his own pan-Aryan slant.[60] Wagner was decidedly anti-Semitic, and his works inspired Hitler.[61] Thus, much of Wagner's music and philosophy was co-opted by the Nazis.[62]

Alfred Rosenberg was known as the apostle of this new, political religion;[63] he was the Nazi's official theoretician.[64] Rosenberg wrote Myth of the Twentieth Century, which contained intense hostility towards Christianity and, in particular, Catholicism. His book proclaimed Christianity's imminent death, the birth of the New Religion, and the Creation of the New Man, an idea which grew out of the new German blood cult. Rosenberg asserted Paul only promoted the interest of the Jews.[65] Rosenberg believed the Nordic race would regain its soul under the guidance of a German church committed to the Volkishe mythos.[66]

Nazi mysticism relied on yet one more apostle, Ernst Bergman. Bergman published Die Deustshe Nationalkirche (The German National Church) in 1933. He was a prominent member in a movement known as Movement For German Belief. The Vatican envoy, Alois Hudal, vehemently objected to Bergman's book, stating Bergman promoted a Germanic race set apart and requiring a national church as an expression of its race and that Catholicism was alien to the Nordic race. Bergman argued that Christianity was infected with the "spirit of Semitism," the Bible had promoted a false image of Jesus, and Jesus was a pantheist of Indo-German origin. Bergman further argued Ariosophy was the Cult of Mithras,[67] a foremost Gnostic and numinous religion, a populace cult of the pre-

Christian world, including Rome; its grand secret was the precession of the equinoxes, which tracks the sun through the zodiac.[68] Mithraism recognized the Father of Light, also known as "The Great Architect," as its god, as did Zoroastrians[69] and the Freemasons.[70]

On July 22, 1933, after enjoying Wagner's Parsifal, Hitler orated a radio speech to announce the creation of the Reich Church, a state-sponsored church designed to supplant Christianity. By September of 1933, the Reich Church was established, complete with its own bishop, Ludwig Mueller.[71] On February 7, 1934, in a conversation with Cardinal Karl Josef Schulte, Hitler declared that he identified with and supported Alfred Rosenberg and his heretical doctrines as the maker of party dogma. Rosenberg then partnered with Josef Goebbels as the chiefs for the Nazi Thought Police.[72] The Movement For German Belief thus organized an alternative church, based on racism, for the Nazis.[73]

With the emergence of the Reich Church, Hitler became obsessed with his messianic intentions, according to Baigent and Leigh. Hitler saw himself as a messiah or, more accurately, a pan-Aryan Avatar leading the new Reich and a spirit descending from the Hohenstauffen Empire. (That was the German dynasty of kings from 1138–1254 C.E. that invaded Rome in 1166 C.E., installing its own pope, Paschall III. Frederich I then utilized his puppet pope to extend his empire to include Bohemia, Hungary, and Poland.)[74] Hence, Hitler built his messianic personification on George's co-opted Fuehrer from Wagner's Grail opera Lohengrin.[75] Hitler transformed himself into a usurper of Christianity akin to Simon the Magus (Acts 8:1–25), adapting only Christian remnants into his Reich Church, while providing a superficial Christian cloak, just as Babylon will do.

Jews, Muslims, and Christians remaining loyal to their God will in the future suffer the horrors of holocaust. The future world government and religion will partner to eradicate inferior humans, who will be charged with holding back the balance of humanity from evolving into its so-called rightful plane of consciousness. The same occurred under the tyranny of the Nazis, as the Aryans, the "emerging super race," judged the people of Judah as subhuman and inferior. Nazis conspired through eugenics to create modern Nephilim, branding it as the super Aryan white race that simmered in genetic manipulation. The Nazis co-opted Nietzsche's philosophy of the Superman[76] into the notion of creating the New Man.[77] National Socialism was based in esoteric Rosicrucian doctrine that demanded the genesis to super beings, a new Master Race of Supermen.[78] This was the Rosicrucian/Vril doctrine of Volkishe ideology, where Supermen are created through something special in the blood. The Vril/Rosicrucian societies that included Hess, Haushofer, and Hitler believed Aryan super races came to earth in the distant past. Professor Haushofer was connected to the Order of the Golden Dawn and Aleister Crowley. Haushofer was a mentor to Hess and Hitler, whose connections were crucial to the Japanese-German alliance, and was the author of Hitler's "Living Space" policy for a hemmed-in Germany.[79]

Colin Wilson writes that Nazism was immersed in the Hermetic, pantheistic doctrine of heaven brought down to earth.[80] The objective was to create an evolved superhuman, void of a world infested with God's chosen progeny, stemming from the mundane Seth. Anyone not deemed worthy to evolve into a higher plane would have been eventually enslaved to serve the new Nephilim. The initiate of the secret doctrine of the Nazi's New Man was declared a witness to the whole evolution of the world and humanity. Hitler believed the mixing of pure bloodlines was the Original Sin in the world.[81]

Hitler believed Hans Hoerbiger, whom we discussed previously, author of Glacial Cosmology, was one of history's three greatest astronomers. The Nazis readily adopted his cosmology.[82] He believed giants recorded in Sumerian and biblical lore dominated the antediluvian world. Under this Theosophist doctrine, Nazis believed nonhuman visitors, great masters who secretly guide human evolution, came to earth long ago; they produced through gene manipulation a divine hybrid being, a kind of god-man, during the age of Atlantis,[83] which the Nazis believed the original Germans descended from. All this sounds eerily similar to alien experimentation on human DNA. Hence, Nazis created dedicated orders, led by Eckart, to communicate with nonhuman intelligences, for Hitler believed the power behind the occult was characterized by invisible hierarchies and unknown superiors from a distant location.[84]

CHAPTER 46

THE FALSE PROPHET

But the beast was captured and with him the false prophet who had performed the miraculous signs on his behalf. With these signs he deluded those who had received the mark of the beast and worshipped his image. The two of them were thrown alive into the fiery lake of burning sulfur.

—Revelation 19:20

At Babel, there was a false prophet who changed the future of humankind through the reintroduction of the spurious sciences. Who was this false prophet accredited with founding the Babylonian and Egyptian mystic religions at Babel?

This rebellious mystical icon and reticent patron saint of alchemy was, of course, Hermes. Similarly, Enoch the Evil was the false prophet for the root mystical religion and catastrophe during the antediluvian epoch. Therefore, if the misunderstood last days are to strangely emulate the ancient times, how will the future false prophet introduce, impose, and then lead the end-time, universal religion?

One should look fearfully forward to this end-time, spurious religion seizing center stage through the corrupting and reorganizing of a shattered Christianity. We know this must take place because Revelation describes this future religion and its leader as follows: “He had two horns like a lamb, but he spoke like a dragon. He exercised all the authority of the first beast on his behalf, and made the earth and its inhabitants worship the first beast, whose fatal wound had been healed. And he performed great and miraculous signs, even causing fire to come down from heaven in full view of men. Because of the signs he was given power to do on behalf of the first beast, he deceived the inhabitants of the earth” (Rev. 13:11–14).

The lamb allegory represents Christ and His church, just as Jesus is the Lamb of God.[1] The beast with two horns like a lamb is the little-known False Prophet; he will lead the future religion of Babylon. And the dragon represents Satan. The beast with two horns like a lamb symbolizes a spurious Christian leader, for this scurrilous beast speaks like a dragon, marking its true nature. This beast speaks the doctrine of Babylon, the pantheistic theology first introduced in the age of dragons and Nephilim. This forthcoming Babylon will cleverly cloak itself behind a perverted and altered form of Christianity. The second beast described in this prophecy is the notorious Antichrist. The future, universal religion must first infiltrate and then corrupt mainstream Christianity before branching out to the rest of the global religions, thereby giving it a universal, Christian appearance.

The future, harlot religion will be led by one of the most villainous characters of the Adamic epoch, the False Prophet.[2] This iniquitous character, described as the beast of Revelation 13,[3] will be revered to be one of the great prophets of all the ages. He will be respected like Moses in both esteem and pomp; his role will be that of the false Elijah. The False Prophet has been commissioned to clear the way for the entrance of the false messiah; he will cunningly usurp the identity of Elijah and his holy commission as the sign of the coming of the Messiah,[4] just as John the Baptist came in the spirit of Elijah when he cleared the way for Jesus from the wilderness and introduced Jesus to the world.

The False Prophet will be equipped with superhuman powers to delude the population to accept his false credentials. He will perform great and miraculous signs and miracles, even causing fire to come down from the heavens.[5] The future Hermes will be a Magus unlike any our generation has witnessed; he will be very convincing. His powers will be buttressed by masterful manifestations and all the mind-boggling muscle that fallen angels can muster.[6] The overarching objective for both the False Prophet and the false religion will be to bring about the crowning of the false messiah, the new Nimrod. Anticipate that this future Hermes will rediscover and reintroduce the lost knowledge of Atlantis, Enoch, and Babel.

This heretical Hermes of the future will be accompanied by all forms of modern Magi and sages, revered to be other, new false prophets of various levels: "for false Christs and false prophets will appear and perform great and miraculous signs to deceive the elect if that were possible."[7] Modern manifestations of sorcery, masterfully performed by modern Magi, will be prevalent and may include the alien deception. All will be designed to persuade and deceive this biblically ignorant, technologically advanced, and rebellious generation to embrace the so-called enlightened religion that embraces all religions of this world, including the monotheistic religions.

Religious unification proposed in end-time prophecy is a deterrent for many to trust in; at least it is for those who disbelieve what must take place in this Terminal Generation. However, all the pantheistic religions could easily be united under one banner or umbrella religion, simply because they are all embedded in the same original, spurious religion of Cain. Even the eastern religions of Hinduism and Buddhism are Babylonian derivatives. Hinduism was an offshoot of Babylonian mysticism, replanted in India via the Aryans of Persia, while Buddhism was originally a new sprout from Hinduism.[8] Gary Kah states in his book En Route to Global Occupation that all eastern religions are traceable to ancient Babylon through Hinduism and Buddhism.[9] Hinduism today influences the Indian subcontinent, while Buddhism influences Sri Lanka to Tibet, China, Southeast Asia, and Japan.[10]

Monotheistic religions, too, are all rooted in the same God, with Judaism being the root religion. Christianity is an offshoot of Judaism, fulfilling Judaic prophecy. And of course, Islam is a green shoot proclaiming monotheism,[11] focusing primarily on the Judgment. However, radical and fascist elements of Islam consider the original words and laws of God corrupted by the people of Judah but reformed and divinely reinstated under their inspired prophet, Mohammed. Von Grunebaum, author of Medieval Islam, notes that Muslims believe Islam resurrected the religion of Abraham, which the Jews had voluntarily abandoned.[12]

The truth is that the literal Qur'an does not dismiss the Old Testament or the Gospels of the New Testament as corrupted. The Qur'an Scripture delivered to Mohammad from the angel Gabriel steadfastly supports the accuracy and legitimacy of the two previous Scriptures and reinforces those Scriptures with parallel testimonies and narratives of the same events, with even more detail in some cases.[13] The Qur'an testifies as a companion, or third Scripture, in complete congruence with the first two, noting the true saints who believe in the Torah and the Gospels will believe in the Qur'an as well.[14]

In fact, the Qur'an testifies about the immaculate conception of the pious Virgin Mary, the crucifixion of Jesus, and the Resurrection of Jesus. And it testifies that Jesus indeed was the prophesied Messiah and Christ of Israel,[15] who came to fulfill the Law.[16] The Qur'an vehemently objects only to the notion that God may have somehow copulated with Mary, as God only needs to speak (Word) and it happens, just as Adam was created.[17] And in this spirit and in its scripture, the Qur'an testifies that Jesus was the Word made flesh, just as John and Revelation testify:[18] the Word who was with God from the beginning, the Word through whom all things were made at Creation.[19]

Jesus is difficult to classify: a being who now sits at God's right hand,[20] who was there in Spirit from the beginning, whom God created all things by.[21] Respectfully put, I believe God speaks through His Word/Jesus just as this conclusion is reflected Genesis 1:1-31: “And God said [Word/Jesus], Let there be…” and all things were then created. I conclude Jesus is God's Word and thus God speaks to us through the Word/Jesus, just as God created all things through His Word/Jesus: “But in the last days he has spoken to us by his Son, whom he appointed heir of all things, and through whom he made the universe” (Hebrews 1:2) Thus God and Jesus are the Creator in perfect union and yet the Word Jesus is somehow distinct from God that I will endeavor to explain. Ergo, the Word/Jesus and the Holy Spirit appear to us as God's greatest beings that operate in unison but separate from God; doing God's greatest beckoning. In this sense, Jesus' imagery as the Branch[22] of God would be precision accuracy. The Son is the radiance of God's glory and the exact representation of his being, sustaining all things by his powerful word. After he had provided purification for sins, he sat down at the right side of the Majesty in heaven" (Hebrews 1:3). "He [Jesus] is the image of the invisible God, the first born over all creation" (Colossians 1:15). If the Holy Spirit and the Word are somehow extensions/branches of God, who is Spirit, then all Scripture and all monotheism is indeed congruent, whether the various divided, institutionalized belief systems recognize this or not. The Qur'an, therefore, testifies as a parallel witness to the Holy Spirit and the Word, where Jesus became the Messiah, but that God, the Holy Spirit, and Jesus are somehow separate but indistinguishable beings.

The apostle John goes further: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. He was with God in the beginning, through him all things were made; without him nothing was made that has been made" (John 1:1–3). And: "The Word became flesh and made his dwelling among us. We have seen his glory, the glory of the One and Only, who came from the Father, full of grace and truth…. 'None has ever seen God, but the God the One and Only, who is at the Father's side, has made him known'" (John 1:14–18). "He [Jesus] is dressed in a robe dipped in blood, and his name is the Word of God . . . He treads the winepress of the fury of the wrath of God" (Revelation 19: 14-15).

The Old Testament book of Proverbs goes even further:

> The Lord brought me forth as the first of his works, before his deeds of old; I was appointed from eternity, from the beginning, before the world began. When there were no oceans, I was given birth, when there were no springs abounding with water; before the mountains were settled in place, before the hills, I was given birth, before he made the earth or its fields or any of the dust of the world. I was there when he set the heavens in place…. Then I was the craftsman at his side. I was filled with delight day after day, rejoicing always in his presence, rejoicing in his whole world, and delighting in mankind. Now, then, my sons, listen to me; blessed are those who keep my ways … For whoever finds me finds life and receives favor from the Lord. But whoever fails to find me harms himself; all who hate me love death.
> —Proverbs 8:22–36

Colossians supports my contention the Word Jesus is a distinct being, while also supporting Proverbs 8: " . . . Growing in the knowledge of God, being strengthened with all the power according to his glorious might so that you may have great endurance and patience, and joyfully giving thanks to the Father, who has qualified you to share in the inheritance of the saints in the kingdom of light. For he has rescued us from the dominion of darkness and brought us into the kingdom of the Son [Word/Jesus] he loves, in whom we have redemption, the forgiveness of sins. He [Word/Jesus] is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn [Word/Jesus] over all creation. For by him [Word/Jesus] all things were created: things in heaven and on earth, visible and invisible, whether thrones or powers or rulers or authorities; all things were created by him and for him [Word/Jesus]. He [Word/Jesus] is before all things, and in him [Word/Jesus] all things hold together. And he [Word/Jesus] is the head of the body, the church; he is the beginning and the first born from the dead, so that in everything he [Jesus/Word] might have supremacy. For God was pleased to have all his fullness dwell in him [Word/ Jesus], and through him [Word/Jesus] to reconcile himself all things, whether things on earth or things in heaven, by making peace through his blood, shed on the cross" (Colossians 1:11-20).

Now, Hermeticism/Sabianism has exerted extraordinary influence on Islam[23] since its incorporation. In fact, Baigent and Leigh state (for intended misdirection) that Islamic teaching recognizes other religious prophets and their teaching, as long as they are from a "Book," including such prophets as Jesus, Moses, Buddha, and Zoroaster.[24] When the Qur'an refers to a "People of the Book," it is referring to a people who follow a monotheistic Scripture sent by God Most High, not polytheist scriptures.

Conversely, Muslim philosophy is directly associated with Hermes, who is renowned in mystical Islamic tradition as Idris/Enoch.[25] But again, Idris of the Qur'an was recorded as a monotheist prophet with Scripture.[26] Philosophy, the love of wisdom, derives from Greek phileo, "to love," and from sophia, "*w*isdom," and endeavors to develop a consistent worldview and way of life based on a peculiar zeal in the arts, sciences, or any branch of knowledge[27] (Seven Sacred Sciences). Philosophy is concluded to be superior to the particular sciences; it is their arbiter dedicated to harmonizing and uniting the sciences.[28] Muslim philosophy and Hermeticism descended from Enoch the Evil. Ergo, Arabic philosophy is not Islamic monotheism. Muslim philosophy is polytheism/mysticism, which overran the Islamic world though Sufis, Ishmaelites, and other Middle Eastern cults. The Sufi religion, according to Booth, relies heavily on Hinduism for its teaching on Chakras and is a cosmology of monotheism, Aristotelian philosophy, Hinduism, Zoroastrianism, Buddhism, Neo-Platonism, Gnosticism, and Chinese science.[29]

The apostate splinter sect of John the Baptist followers, the Mandaeans/ Sabians, heavily influenced Sufi mysticism, and in turn, the Sufis heavily influenced the Gnostic Templars.[30] Sabianism is the sun- and star-worshipping religion of Enoch the Evil. Islam, then, already is sympathetic to mysticism and, conversely, would be sympathetic to both Christianity and Judaism if not for mystical influences imposed upon Muslims by mystical Islamic Fascists and Islamic institutions, even though this may not be obvious from Islamic fanaticism that shadows the world today.

Because subtle but seemingly infinitely large chasms now separate the beholders of monotheism, the three great monotheistic religions could, in truth, be bridged and, indeed, unified for all the wrong reasons should specific deceptions be employed. First of all, the Christian Messiah, Jesus, would have to be devalued from deity to just another of many great prophets. Therefore, expect some earth-shattering discovery to explode onto the world scene in the not-too-distant future, revealing Jesus was a man, not God, and that Jesus was not crucified, nor did He actually die on the cross. Jesus will have to be proven not to have been resurrected as part of the Holy Trinity. One of the three must come forward in the devaluation process, for Scripture teaches the spirit of the Antichrist is to deny Jesus as the true Messiah[31] but not necessarily deny Jesus as a historical being of noteworthiness. Therefore expect Jesus to be devalued to that of just another prophet.

The False Prophet rising out of this shattered Christianity will seditiously support Gnostic and Fascist Islamic doctrine that declares Jesus to be mortal and not the Messiah. The False Prophet will declare Jesus to be a great prophet, but a mortal prophet, and certainly not the Messiah. The False Prophet will lead shattered Christianity through false, “enlightened” wisdom and miracles into the new, universal religion centered in Rome. Eventually he will lead all into the arms of the Antichrist. All this will be acceptable to both Judaism and Islam. Islam mystical institutionalism views Jesus as one of a sequence of prophets sent to this world,[32] just as parts of Judaism already recognize Jesus as one of a very long line of prophets who were martyred, providing that Jesus is not accredited to be God, the Son of God, or Messiah/Christ.

You see, Christianity is the enigma, just as Christianity was a plague to pantheistic Rome. All other religions believe they have yet to receive the true, universal Messiah and are still looking for His arrival, whereas Christianity is the only religion to believe we have actually witnessed His first coming and are only waiting for His last triumphant return. One might be surprised to learn that even pantheistic religions are eagerly looking for the arrival of their (false) messiah, but this is indeed factual, according to their own doctrines and scriptural writings.

The Qur'an does not in any way discount Jesus as the Messiah or the Christ. Moreover, the Qur'an testifies to Jesus as being both the Christ and the Messiah,[33] as well as being a great messenger and prophet.[34] Furthermore, the Qur'an testifies to the Holy Spirit coming to Mary, who then gave a virgin birth to Jesus.[35] It testifies to the commission and miracles of Jesus, as well as the death and Resurrection of Jesus.[36] However, most of Islamic institutionalism would be satisfied with Jesus being recognized as an elevated being, the specific Messiah limited to Israel, and a great prophet. Islamic institutionalism and philosophy, in direct conflict with the Qur'an, inexplicably degrades Jesus back to prophet status and a lower grade of prophet than Mohammed.

When one then considers the heretical branch of Christianity known as Gnosticism, this end-time scenario becomes all the more clear; although, Gnosticism is much larger than its Christian sect. Gnosticism is the mystical branch of Christianity that is upheld by modern institutions such as Freemasonry and nurtured by past organizations such as the Knights Templar, the Cathars, the Manicheans, the Bogamils, the Fisher Kings, Rex Deus, Priory of Sion, the Essenes, and others. Gnosticism can be accurately described as the esoteric part of the Theosophical Society; Gnostics were precursors to the occult movement. James Robinson, an assembler of the Nag Hammadi Library, notes that Theosophy absorbed Gnosticism into its universal, free-associative style, creating a greater occultist synthesis.[37]

"Occultism" is a word coined by G. I. Gurdjieff from the Greek word legomenon, meaning something communicated, a structure of ideas presented in a form intended for some entirely different purpose, such as tarot cards. Contemporary occultists refer to this as Legominism. Others suggest "occult" originated from the Latin occultus, meaning "hidden," as in a hidden philosophy and or science.[38] However, Webster's defines occult as "mysterious, magical, supernatural, and the study of things hidden or mysterious"—in other words, Theosophy, which reflects the true spirit of the practice. Supernatural religions have been classified as the domain of the occult.[39] Occultists agree that spiritual forces from the hidden dimension of existence continually influence the material world and humanity can learn to experience these forces directly.[40]

Legominism in occult traditions is a method by which wisdom is transmitted in a form through Holy Grail tales and fairy tales that appear to be intended for an entirely different purpose;[41] some occultists refer to this arty code as the "green language" or the "language of the birds."[42] To this end, occultists believe Christianity and its source document, the New Testament, is a form of Legominism and that the New Testament is merely a collection of symbolic stories not to be taken literally, for the events and people recorded were crafted to transmit truths that become obscured by the literal translations.[43]

Christian Gnostics assert they are the authentic Christian church and that they have been persecuted by false Christian Catholicism and its literalist doctrines. Christian Gnostics do not believe the modern version of the Bible came from heaven but rather that it was a product of man manipulated by Catholicism and Constantine.[44] Gnosticism is the mystical branch of Christianity that does not consider Jesus to be God. They consider Jesus a great prophet but not God incarnate. They also believe Jesus did not die on the cross but that His Royal Bloodline continued in secrecy and that it is intact to this very day, only waiting for the opportunity to take center stage.

Christian Gnostics further believe early Christianity, and in particular, the Jerusalem Church, regarded Jesus as a mortal prophet, great and powerful but still mortal. They believe the mortal Jesus remained part of mainstream Christian variants, except for the heretical Pauline branch. Christian Gnostics believe the deity of Jesus occurred through the highly influential Pauline sect, which exerted extraordinary influence over Rome and Constantine. They believe Jesus only became the Son of God after the Council of Nicaea, where the bishops voted to elevate Jesus to God status, thereby hijacking the alleged original message and church of Jesus.[45] Constantine then only funded and supported bishops who agreed to this (new) unifying definition and doctrine of Christianity established at Nicaea in 325 C.E.[46] That part is true, but Gnostics do not even acknowledge Jesus as the Word, the Son of Man, the Messiah, or the Christ, nor do they recognize the virgin birth and the Resurrection.

In this alternative line of thinking, the elevation of Jesus to deity status was perpetrated to further expand and solidify the power of Constantine and the Roman Church. Gnostics believe it was Emperor Constantine who decided to elevate Jesus to deity status and then conspired to assemble a select Cannon of Gospels that underscored the deity doctrine of Jesus. Constantine and the Catholic Church then ordered the destruction of all other gospels that conflicted with Jesus being the Son of God, but some Gnostic gospels that purportedly speak to Jesus in purely human traits survived, such as the Dead Sea Scrolls and the Nag Hammadi Library,[47] through underground Gnostics and their reticent organizations.

It is also thought that this underground, spurious form of Christianity has completely infiltrated the Mother Church, Catholicism, and is ready to place its own candidate at its head. Can you imagine a pope who denies the Resurrection? One can only shudder at what heretical doctrines such a person would impose on the Mother Church. Even so, one should expect a Gnostic heretic to ascend to the apex of Catholicism, becoming pope, ensuring the way will be made clear for the False Prophet. The black pope will, in all likelihood, be the infamous antipope prophesied by the Catholic prophet Malachai.

What is more horrific to contemplate is that Gnostics believe they have evidence to support their positions. Their evidence will, of course, be full of lies and clever deceptions, but this is the intended diabolical plan. At the right time, they shall come forward with the earth-shattering discoveries intended to rip mainstream Christianity apart at its soul and spirit. Christianity will be left waffling in the winds of catastrophe from the two-fold attack of the denying of Jesus as the Christ and the implementing of the antipope atop the Mother Church. All those not deeply rooted shall be rocked to the soul of their faith, with most faltering, then capitulating. It is at this point when the False Prophet will make his entrance at center stage, carrying the same message. With his false evidence, false knowledge, and false miracles, the False Prophet will bind all religions together into one false religion, destined to welcome the false messiah.

At this point, it might be good to remember 1 John 4:2–3: “Every spirit that acknowledges that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh is from God, but every spirit that does not acknowledge Jesus is not from God. This is the spirit of the antichrist.” Note, as well, 1 John 2:22: “Who is the liar? It is the man who denies Jesus is the Christ. Such a man is the antichrist.”

CHAPTER 47

THE DISCIPLES OF LIGHT

> For such men are false apostles, deceitful workman, masquerading as apostles of Christ. And no wonder, for Satan himself masquerades as an angel of light. It is not surprising, then, if his servants masquerade as servants of righteousness. Their end will be what their actions deserve …
> —2 Corinthians 11:13–14

Make no mistake; scurrilous, spurious forces have crafted and dispatched serious plots to utterly dismiss Jesus completely or manage Jesus as one of many sent to guide humankind.

Demond Wilson has noted that the combined endeavors by organizations upholding secular humanism, communism, Freemasonry, and New Age have produced a formidable movement to belittle Jesus to a minor role.[1]

Communism, for example, diminishes Jesus by reluctantly acknowledging Jesus lived as a historical being but lacked a divine spirit. They would rather relegate Jesus strictly to mythology if they could, but, of course, they cannot. Freemasonry and Gnosticism acknowledge Jesus as a true, important, historical figure, but they devaluate Jesus to a wise and enlightened individual, but still a man. New Age, polytheism, and Fascist Islam recognize Jesus historically but brusquely diminish Him to prophet status, while science and education systems summarily dismiss Jesus as a historical person.

But can these spurious forces pull this grandiose scheme off? And how will they accomplish this?

Such notions require mind-boggling planning, time, and effort to take root. The seeds must be planted and nourished throughout an extended period of time, in order to produce hallucinogenic fruit that will deny Jesus as the Messiah. Indeed, this was planned for 6,000 years. Showing their rebellious spirit, Theosophist Alice Bailey unexpectedly stated that it has been the objective for the forces of the coming world religion to affect preparedness through three powerful, western institutions: the church, educational institutions, and the Masonic Fraternity.[2] The evidence of their success is everywhere.

Christianity is rotting from within, collapsing from its own lack of faith. It is not uncommon for ministers and priests not to believe in the literal virgin birth and the literal Resurrection. Christianity is inundated with leaders who dismiss the accuracy of biblical history. Christianity is degrading beyond recognition through lack of faith and through allegorical interpretation, while justifying its existence by denying its truths. This is not by chance. Christianity has been diabolically infiltrated with heretics to corrode from within, and the results have been impressive. Gnostics who deny the divine status of Christ permeate the highest levels of these Christian institutions. They stand behind the allegorical application of truths as opposed to the indisputable application of those truths as facts. The church was the first pillar for pantheistic preparedness and sedition.

Christianity has been systematically ostracized from educational institutions funded by the public. Those institutions that have not yet been overrun are now being pursued under the guise of modern idioms, such as political correctness, tolerance, and application of hate crimes. Do not expect to see any form of Christian-influenced education in the not-so-distant future, unless these schools will be totally privately funded. Either that or their Christian dogma will be so polluted with apostasy that it will no longer be recognized as fundamental Christianity.

Creationism and Intelligent Design have been banished, replaced with the religion of the evolutionary theory and now taught as fact to the innocent. Evolution is a religion requiring more faith than any other religion. It is inundated with unsubstantiated conjectures, half-truths, impossibilities, contradictions, and politically motivated censorship. Only the truly fanatical of the so-called intelligentsia and those who are easily deceived continue to uphold such nonsense; they inexplicably prefer to deny God's existence. Christianity has been replaced with the doctrine of the new religion that includes sexual freedom for youths, sexual tolerance for gays, and acceptance of alternative lifestyles. Even mainstream Christian churches are accepting gay lifestyles, gay marriages, and even gay priests.

Environmental globalism is yet another key doctrine pounded into the young minds, alongside the fear of all forms of apocalypse. Global socialism is elemental to this indoctrination; students are conditioned to accept that thriving parts of the world should support those that are not. The minds of the young, over an extended period of time, have been bombastically brainwashed by provocateurs into world unification under a barrage of cultic, globalist policies so that we do not destroy ourselves from the face of the planet, thereby opening the door to the future utopia, the new religion, and world government.

Masonic fraternities are the true globalists. Generally the globalist organizations, and there is an impressive number, almost an uncountable number, are controlled by Freemasons and their upstart organizations. The United Nations is overwhelmed with globalist organizations sponsored by Freemasons—the World Trade Organization, the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank, or any other globalist organization you wish to serve up—and they are doing a marvelous job at bringing about the New World Order. One cannot cite a leader from any of the great industrialized economies who is not touting globalism. You can change the name of the country, the name of the leader, the party that he or she was elected with, and it matters not. Politicians all spout the same New World Order rhetoric and are working diligently at bringing it about. Their objective is to bring about the requisite governmental institutions to introduce world government at the first opportunity, which will partner with the new religion.

Ralph Epperson writes that Freemasonry desires to destroy current government and religion, thereby restoring humankind to the first estate, the spurious Garden of Eden, through a spurious redeemer. In other words, Freemasonry wishes to replace the God of the Bible as a cornerstone to recreating (the Hermetic) heaven on earth, through the Luciferian messiah,[3] just as the Nazis endeavored to do. Alex Mellor echoed this subversive conspiracy in the September 15, 1964 edition of the Avocat a la Cour de Paris, where he wrote: “Freemasonry was founded to become a counter-church…. Freemasonry does not destroy churches, but prepares to replace them.”[4] Freemasonry is the Third Pillar of preparedness and sedition.

The inner circle of Freemasonry, controlled by the ultra-secret Illuminati, has as part of its New World Order agenda, according to Demond Wilson, a diabolical plan to all but destroy Christianity. These globalist forces will intend to fold the surviving remnant of Christianity into the new, universal religion of Babylon led by the False Prophet. This emerging New Age pantheon, according to Masonic writings, considers Christianity to be darkness and evil.[5] Powerful, delusional attacks will deceive the elect of Christianity, if that were possible.[6] To my way of reckoning, the only deception that could fulfill this diabolical scheme would be false evidence to suggest, or prove, the Resurrection was a hoax, for just as the apostle Paul stated, all Christianity hangs on this single doctrine (1 Cor. 15:14) that Jesus was resurrected from the dead. One can also expect that the virgin birth will also be discredited to complete the devaluation of Jesus’ deity and Messiah credentials.

The conspiracy to devalue Jesus must leave Christianity with a new interpretation and meaning, modified to cooperate within the plurality of the future world religion, which will espouse one loosely unified doctrine. This newly organized and apostate mutation of Christianity will be the religion of the lamb that speaks like a dragon.[7] The new, apostate Christianity will ooze with new allegorical corruption and doctrine. Hence, modified Christianity must begin with the renewed persecution of the father of Christianity, Saul of Tarsus, the apostle Paul. Paul is the great divide separating opponents from Roman Christianity into its disparate, other spurious sects. The teachings of Paul proclaim the divinity of Christ as opposed to Jesus being just a human Messiah or prophet. Paul is unilaterally condemned by Gnostics as a heretic. This clearly lends itself to the likelihood for an all-out blitz in the future, attacking the character and credibility of Paul.

All monotheism, then, believes in the sanctity of Adam, Abraham, and Moses, and all recognize the importance of all other prophets delivering their God-inspired enlightenment to the world. The False Prophet will introduce new and unknown enlightenment that will bring Mohammed into the new Christian/Judaic fold as a great prophet of God. All will be acceptable to the new apostate Christianity and mysticism within Judaism and Islam, when they form a common alliance with the Gnostics of Christianity. Mysticism within monotheism is a contaminate, holding true to its spurious beliefs, endeavoring to turn monotheism over to pantheism and the doctrines of Babylon. Various mystical contaminates to monotheism will likely be the vehicles employed to ensure monotheism converts to mystical polytheism.

All the great prophets of monotheism, such as Moses, Abraham, and Mohammed, as well as Jesus, are already recognized in the mystic religions as great prophets and spiritual enlighteners, alongside others, such as Buddha, Hermes, and Confucius. They are all crowned as great enlighteners sent to help humankind on our evolutionary ascension to godhood. Spiritual leaders from all religions will be recognized as builders of enlightenment and spiritual guides for all of humankind under the new, universal religion of delusion. With Christianity in shambles and the mystic forms of the three monotheistic religions usurping control, the bridge from monotheism to pantheism is ready to be built; it’s only waiting for the timely and inspirationally measured catalysts.

Therefore, keep close to your heart that the surreptitious objective is to deceive and enslave the rebellious, naive, ignorant peoples of the earth into worshipping Satan and rejecting the true God of the universe. It is not enough for the rebellious angels to discount Jesus as the true Messiah. This is why only the chosen of the initiates, those who are always at the power center of the religions, are granted the true revelations of the Mysteries. Secrecy and deception are elemental doctrines in the pantheons, for the knowledge that Lucifer is their god and that fallen angels are their minor gods would surely collapse their credibility among the masses, unless careful, long-term preparation is done before revealing Lucifer as god to the people. As ludicrous as this first seems, do not dismiss it too quickly. In truth, the greater part of civilization today already follows pantheistic religions and doctrines.

Remember also that these religions and the people do not believe Lucifer, in his personified allegories, is evil; in fact, they truly believe the opposite. The gods of the pantheon, such as Osiris, are all sun gods and/or gods of light, and the religious pantheons are all religions of light and enlightenment. Light, according to spurious doctrine, is essentially the revelation of both truth and the knowledge of both good and evil:

> "You will not surely die," the serpent said to the woman. "For God knows that when you eat of it your eyes will be opened, and you will be like God, knowing good and evil." When the woman saw that the fruit of the tree was good for food and pleasing to the eye, and also desirable for gaining wisdom, she took some and ate it.
> —Genesis 3:4–6

In this short narrative, the core doctrines of the pantheistic religions were set out. First, by eating of the fruit, Adam and Eve rebelled against God and followed Satan unknowingly. Second, the doctrine of light or knowledge was established, that knowledge of good and evil, or wisdom derived thereof, was key to evolving into gods, for Satan clearly stated that knowledge would make them like God. The two divine attributes of God have always been immortality and the capacity for the application of rational and ethical judgment.[8] This is why mysticism always professes secret knowledge and wisdom; it is the key doctrine for evolution into godhood, just as knowledge is the light, for Adam and Eve's eyes were opened after eating the fruit, enabling them to gain the wisdom of the divine. This then binds knowledge and mysticism together, just as Enoch the Evil created mysticism to hold the Seven Sacred Sciences, known as the knowledge of both good and evil. Third, the religion of light is always disciplined by reason and logic. It is the capacity to apply rational and ethical judgment at all times. The evolution to godhood dictates that the discipline in reason and logic is essential, similar to the New Age-like aliens memorialized as Vulcans in Star Trek.

Fourth, the final point: The true God is established as the alleged oppressor, who tries to keep humankind under the oppressive bondage of ignorance for His own oppressive desires. Meanwhile, Lucifer is the god of light, who freed humans from ignorance so that they might achieve godhood. Lucifer is transformed into a god of light and knowledge, the redeemer of humankind, as opposed to the scriptural adversary of humankind. Conversely, the true God is flipped into the role of the evil oppressor of humankind, stifling their rightful evolution into gods. As

Laurence Gardner states, both Christianity and Judaism are the suppressers of learning and knowledge.[9]

According to Webster's, Lucifer is Latin for the planet Venus. Nelson's ties the name to the morning star, just as Isaiah refers to Satan as "O morning star, son of the dawn."[10] The sun is also known as the morning star denoting light. Unger's defines Lucifer as Hebrew for "brightness."[11] Derivative words from Lucifer are words lucent, meaning shining and/or bright, or lucid, meaning shining, transparent: easily understood, and intellectually bright.[12] All derive from the genitive Latin word lux or lucis, meaning "light."

Gods like Osiris were sun gods and allegories for Lucifer.[13] Lucifer is the acknowledged god of light. The same allegory is acknowledged in Greek mythology, where Prometheus was the bringer of God's fire (light/knowledge) to humankind. Prometheus was banned from heaven for this act, just as Lucifer was. Lucifer was the bringer of light to humankind, as well as the patron god of hard work and builders.[14] Masonic writers Knight and Lomas note Freemasonry believes God has always existed; He has simply taken many names as people have perceived Him, including Marduk, Amon-Re, Yahweh, and Allah.[15] This will be a cornerstone doctrine in the spurious, end-time, harlot religion of Babylon.

According to the renowned Freemason Albert Pike, author of Morals and Dogma of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite of Freemasonry/Pamphlets, the light that all Masons seek is the true knowledge of who their god is, Lucifer.[16] Pike formalized the Scottish Rite of Freemasonry in 1868 C.E., which is now overseen by the Supreme Council of the Thirty-Third Degree through his work, Pike's Morals and Dogmas. Pike is further noted for his recruitment efforts through his many writings after the Civil War, when membership had diminished significantly.[17] Pike further formalized the Templar inheritance into Freemasonry rituals via the Scottish Rite. Pike sided with the rebellious Confederacy.[18] He was a senior member of the KKK, founded by Freemason and first Imperial Wizard Confederate General Nathan Bedford Forest in 1866. When Pike was asked about mixed-race Masonry, he replied: "I took my obligation to white men, not to Negroes. When I have to accept Negroes as brothers or leave Masonry, I shall leave it."[19] One must view Pike's true nature and intentions through this lens.

One wonders whether or not the KKK was/is part of the web of Luciferian secret societies dedicated to The Genesis 6 Conspiracy to enslave humankind. The KKK was closely related to Freemasonry, complete with tacit alliances;[20] passwords; and secret, left-handed handshakes.[21] KKK's organizational hierarchy overflows with unaccountable dragon, Nephilim, Atlantean, and fairy imagery. The KKK was to be an invisible empire (Otherworld/Tarterus) centered in Atlanta (Atlantis) and led by the Imperial Wizard and his fifteen Genii (Jinn). Each state was to be a Realm governed by a Grand Dragon and his eight to nine Hydras, each congressional district a Dominion governed by a Grand Titan and six to twelve Furies, each county a Province governed by a Grand Giant and four Goblins, each town a Den governed by a Grand Cyclops and two Night Hawks and/or twelve Terrors.[22]

These false religions do not consider Lucifer to be evil, nor do they consider him to be the devil. Satan is elevated to being the good god of freedom, liberty, and knowledge. He is the eternal rebel and the first free thinker, just as the Knights Templar and the Freemasons believed they were free thinkers and rebels against any form of artificial thought or economic controls.[23] Lucifer is the emancipator of worlds. He is whispered to be a good spirit to whom a great wrong has been done.[24]

Thirty-Third Degree Freemason and Satanist Aleister Crowley, curiously portrayed on the cover of Sergeant Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band, once noted the serpent, Satan, made our race gods through knowing good and evil. According to Crowley, Satan is life and light, while his zodiacal sign is Capricornus, the leaping goat, whose attribute is liberty.[25] Crowley had an eerie fascination with the Knights Templar, according to Freemason Ian Gittins.[26] After being initiated into philosophy, Crowley joined the Order of the Golden Dawn in 1898 C.E., and then after a mystical experience, he believed he was a chosen prophet of the new religion destined to replace Christianity.[27] Crowley identified himself with the Antichrist; he believed he received messages through his wife from Aiwass, a messenger of the gods, to invoke the Way of Horus and a New Order for humanity led by the messiah of the New Age.[28] Crowley came to view himself as the great 666 Beast of Revelation.[29]

Crowley enthusiastically wrote many articles and publications in support of Hitler and Nazism in the 1930s, but he was later discredited for doing so with the advent of World War II. Crowley was considered at one point the most wicked person in Britain; but he is also considered a distinguished prophet of the New Age.[30] Crowley's image and authority as a New Age prophet received a remarkable renaissance during the 1960s, with the rise of the drug culture and the genesis of the New Age movement.

Lucifer is believed by these religions to be the equal of Adonay. Adonai, according to Pike, was the rival of Baal and Osiris.[31] Baal and Osiris were the most important deities to the rival Egyptian and Canaanite spurious religions. Now, Adonai, or Adonay, was the God known by ancient Egyptians as Aten or Adon in Hebrew, the God that temporarily gained controlled over Egypt, either just before or just after the time of Moses. Pike notes:

> If Lucifer were not God would Adonay (the God of the Christians) whose deeds prove his cruelty, perfidy, and hatred of man, barbarism and repulsion for science, would Adonay and his priests calumniate him? Yes Lucifer is God, and unfortunately Adonay is also God.… Thus the universe is balanced by two forces which maintain its equilibrium: the force of attraction and that of repulsion. These two forces exist in physics, philosophy, and religion.… Thus the doctrine of Satanism is a heresy; and the true and pure philosophic religion is the belief in Lucifer, the equal of Adonay; but Lucifer, God of light and God of good, is struggling for humanity against Adonay, the God of darkness and evil.[32]

Remember that in the time of Babel, Nimrod and his spurious religion rendered God to be one of many gods, no more powerful than many others. The gods were relegated into various classes of power, authority, and personal disposition. We must now understand that these pantheistic religions view the true God as an evil, oppressive God and believe that God and Lucifer are rivals. Adonai is the one who slanders Lucifer via the Bible and its genitive religions.[33]

Pike believed Christians preach love but practice hate; they preach tolerance but practice persecution; Christians are forces of darkness.[34] Mysticism has turned everything upside down and inside out. The Masonic fraternities, the Illuminati, Rosicrucians, the New Age religion, Rex Deus, the Priory of Sion, and all associated religions and genitive organizations that worship the pantheon uphold and worship Lucifer as the "Fallen Angel" who was wronged.[35]

This is the ultimate role reversal that all the globalists, corrupted religions, Masonic fraternities, educational institutions, and governments are either conspiring to or are blindly assisting in bringing about. They have been systematically preparing the world for such a deception since the time of Babel and antediluvian times, but they have been held back, despite these endeavors, by God so they will take their place in the last seven years of this epoch, denoted by the Antichrist confirming a (peace) covenant with the world, a period renowned as the tribulation period.[36]

Freemasonry is endeavoring to bring about the destruction of contemporary government (nationalism) and religion (Christianity) through a restoration of humankind to the first estate (Eden) via a redeemer or Christos (Antichrist). They are attempting to replace God with Lucifer while creating (the Hermetic) heaven on earth with a Luciferian messiah.[37] The Bible has given us adequate warning: "For such men are false apostles, deceitful workmen, masquerading as apostles of Christ. And no wonder, for Satan himself masquerades as an angel of light. It is not surprising then, if his servants masquerade as servants of righteousness. There end will be what their actions deserve" (2 Cor. 11:12–15, emphasis added).

Expect a renaissance of the antediluvian and Babel spurious sciences. Expect to see these sciences exploited in heretofore unheard-of forms and magnitude, when combined with technology and alien influence. Expect mystical mythology will be employed, further glorifying the new Babel religion for its nurturing and maintenance of such knowledge from the time of Babel to the present. Expect that they will detail and martyr their history of survival under the brutal persecution of monotheism and, in particular, Christianity.

The chronology will be presented with famous, legendary icons of antiquity recognized as the guardians of the Seven Sciences—Aristotle: dialectics, Cicero: rhetoric, Euclid: geometry, Boethius: arithmetic, Ptolemy: astronomy, Donatus: grammar, and Pythagorus: music.[38] The Seven Liberal Sciences were kept alive in secrecy throughout the millennia by organizations such as the Pythagorus Mystery School that disseminated its obscure knowledge throughout Europe[39] via Rex Deus organizations such as the Knights Templar. They, in turn, spawned and passed on the spurious knowledge to organizations such as Freemasonry, Rosicrucianism, and the Royal Society.

Pythagorus, founder of Greek mathematics, circa 582–507 B.C.E., is considered a patriarch of mysticism. Pythagorus was a proponent of reincarnation; he believed the essence of all things was a number. Pythagorism is celebrated as "number mysticism"; he also promoted the numerical qualities held within music.[40] Pythagoras is accredited with synthesizing esoteric thought from around the world into a “perennial philosophy,”[41] a strikingly similar philosophy to that of the Upanishads of India of the same time period. He was the first to call himself a lover of wisdom, a philosopher.[42] He was likely one of the first Sophists, for philosophy first formed in Greece in the sixth century B.C.E. Sophists were the taciturn link between Pre-Socratic philosophy and the post-Aristotelian philosophy, which purportedly advanced beyond mythologies.[43]

The Polychronicon recorded Pythagoras actually discovering one of the Pillars of Lamech, while Hermes found the other; although this version is not recorded in any other legends,[44] suggesting Pythagoras was either a student of Hermes or a direct inheritor of his knowledge. Jamblichus, the biographer of Pythagoras,[45] wrote that both Pythagoras and Plato developed their varieties of philosophy after reading the inscriptions from the two infamous, antediluvian columns,[46] suggesting that these infamous columns were still in existence up to circa 500 B.C.E. Pythagoras has been recorded as living circa 585–565 to 495–470 B.C.E.[47]

Pythagorean Mystery Schools later received additional knowledge from the Essenes, the Kabbalistic descendants of Solomon and David.[48] Pythagorean Mystery Schools were established in Crotona, Italy.[49] It is believed that Pythagoras migrated to Crotona from Samos Island in 530 B.C.E., where he organized the aristocratic elite into a powerful, ascetic religious order.[50] These Mystery Schools, incidentally, also held very close ties to the ancient White Brotherhood in Egypt that I will address later.

From Crotona, Pythagorean philosophy was propagated throughout Europe, from France to England.[51] It was from both Pythagoras and the Gnostic Basilidian system of religion that the original philosophy and morality derived, which then founded the Freemasonry (and thus the Templar) belief system.[52]

CHAPTER 48

THE ALIEN PHENOMENA

Babylon was a gold cup in the Lord’s hand; she made the whole earth drunk. The nations drank her wine; therefore they now have gone mad.

—Jeremiah 51:7

Such diabolical schemes of deception would not be complete unless they totally confused and manipulated the modern mind with fantastic delusions.

So, what kinds of fantastic delusions might we look for?

Let us first begin with the alien phenomena—the picture-perfect, stateof- the-art deception designed for a dissonant generation.

Unprecedented waves of UFO sightings and abductions increase exponentially every few years. We are also experiencing unprecedented and increasing waves of literature and entertainment promoting the acceptance of such notions. Our collective attitudes on a global scale have been altered dramatically in such matters over the last fifty years. This kind of global brainwashing will continue until our collective minds are completely prepared for deception.

Since the dawn of the Space Age, public perceptions and opinions have reached critical mass, and statistics suggest that more than 50 percent now believe alien life forms both exist and interrelate with us on a regular basis.

In less than one complete generation, we have become voluntarily predisposed to accepting an inevitable, formal encounter with alien beings from around the universe, where we then will take our rightfully reserved chair at the table of governing galactic species, just as in the Star Trek or Babylon 5 tradition.

Hollywood tends to set forth a set of ideals about aliens, primarily that they will provide humankind with new, secret, and increasing knowledge in the tradition of mysticism and a closer, intimate relationship with the universal life force. We are about to dawn a new age of peace and prosperity. We are at the precipice of a momentous quantum leap in our evolution; we are about to morph, as New Age philosophy likes to phrase it, vibrate into a higher plane of existence through the discipline of reason over our exploding knowledge. They promise an age where people will only be concerned with achieving enlightenment (immortality), an age where the truth of Brahma will come from heaven and will be led by the future Buddha, Lord Maitreya.[1] In other words, we will experience our final triumph over the knowledge gained in Eden by Adam and Eve when they ate from the Tree of Gnosis.

These alien messages exude mysticism and New Age doctrine. We are led to believe we have misunderstood the enlightened commission of Jesus. They profess Jesus was merely ahead of His time, sent forward as a guide to our destiny, that Jesus had already attained the gift of harnessing the power of knowledge as an example for the world and that Jesus was not professing to be the Messiah and Son of God. Gnostics attempt to lead us to believe that the so-called joint Essene message of Jesus and John the Baptist was to proclaim all would evolve into gods once they learned and mastered the mystical secrets remembered as the Way,[2] just as they had. These mystical secrets of the universe are what the aliens/angels are here to provide humankind, just as they provided illicit knowledge from heaven to the descendants of Cain. All of this, of course, is affirmed in a very polite and politically correct environment, but understand this is still the dissonant doctrine of the Antichrist, sponsored by fallen angels, that denies Jesus is the Christ.

Another underlying message resonating from our future, alien-filled destiny is the Babel syndrome, which his yet another method to globalize disparate peoples into one entity. This is a future that's prophesying humankind will be united, speaking with one voice, living under one government and one religion, centered in a universal life force, all in the tradition of Star Wars and the Tower of Babel, which will ultimately be replaced with the Luciferian religion once the Antichrist takes power. The end-time religion will be split into two distinct segments,[3] just as the tribulation is split into two. First there will be the false religion of Babylon that unites the world. In the last half, it will then be replaced by the Antichrist, who will be revealed to the people as the messiah. Meanwhile, Lucifer will be unveiled to be an emancipating god of light and knowledge.

All this will be an opportunistic venue for the modern Nimrod to wave his fist at God in complete rebellion, to climb the ziggurat of technology and knowledge to wage battle with the oppressive Adonai, just as Nimrod of Babel had threatened to do. Scripture says, “It [Antichrist] grew until it reached the host of the heavens and it threw some of the starry host down to the earth and trampled on them” (Dan 8:10). The world will be led into a galactic war through this alien deception.

Disturbing tales from the abduction phenomena echo ancient encounters with fallen angels, demons, and forms of Nephilim. The victims in the abductions are usually paralyzed at the start of the encounter. Aliens are generally described as rough-skinned, thin-lipped, long-necked, viper-like beings, similar to Nephilim but smaller. Remember, angels possess changeling qualities in our earthly realm; angels could easily alter their size and appearance at will. All these descriptions, common in most abductions, neatly parallel records of ancient encounters with fallen angels, complete with those fallen angels promising knowledge and power. It must be noted, as well, these ancient fallen angels also promised godhood, as witnessed by what took place in Eden with Eve and Adam and Satan. One further wonders, are changelings attempting to create Nephilim hybrids through DNA to skirt around creation laws?

Not only do contemporary alien encounters echo ancient encounters with demons, Nephilim, and fallen angels, but also they reflect a commonality and an inexplicable kinship with fairy folk, according to Eason. Author W. Y. Evans-Wentz notes the ancients named the inhabitants of the otherworld: gods (fallen angels); genies (Jinn); daemons (demons); shades; and spirits, which the ancient and modern Celts referred to as gods and fairies.[4] Many of the less benign aliens of today, according to Eason, portray an eerie kinship to the likeness of goblins and gnomes of fairy mythology. Goblins and trolls were described with eyes like glowing coals, with withered crones. Only in Nordic legends were some fairy folk known to be tall and noble; in most other legends, fairy folk were small beings of mischief and evil. Trolls, goblins, gnomes, and other similar creatures come in many different sizes; they have grotesque, fleshy faces and are very hairy.

In the 1954 alien abduction that transpired in Chic-Cerro de las Tres Torres, Venezuela, witnesses described the aliens as dwarf-like, hairy beings. In 1955, in Hopkinsville, Kentucky, five tiny, goblin-like beings with wrinkled skins and large eyes and ears were witnessed.[5] Most documented accounts describe famous aliens known today as "the grays." Fairies that kidnapped children were known as the "grey [sic] neighbors" by the Shetlanders; these fairies were small, gray, goblin-and-troll-like creatures.[6] These mythological fairies were a Celtic conception to describe small people who can become invisible and who were feared abductors of children.[7] Just read a description of a fairy abduction: "And many have been taken away by the said spirits, for a fortnight or month together, being carried with them in chariots through the air, over hills and dales, rocks and precipices, till at last they have been found lying in some meadow or mountain bereaved of their senses." Another encounter from more than a hundred years ago, witnessed by David Williams of North Wales, included a brilliant, meteor-like vehicle that flew and was followed by a ring of fire, small, fairy-like beings that danced to music, all the while surrounded by brilliant lights.[8] Sounds very much like UFOs and alien encounters to me.

Alien abductions hold familiar kinship with fairy folk and fairy abductions. For example, Cassandra Eason notes fairies have a need to reproduce with humans,[9] ostensibly like aliens. Fairies never abduct old people—only babies, young men, and young women, much like aliens. In a similar fashion to alien abductions, the victims' minds remain blank of what was done and said to them in fairy abductions.[10]

Goblins, elves, trolls, and gnomes are known in mythology as beings that are described as "grays." They are gray-skinned have huge, oval heads; small, almond-like eyes; and spindly limbs. And they are eager to breed with humans to modify and refresh their genetic makeup so that they might continue to survive.[11] Again, this is an eerily accurate description of the modern alien descriptions, as well as modern Hollywood creations such as the Asgarde from the Star Gate series.

Janet Bord concludes fairy abductions utilized the very same claim staked by aliens today, whereby they need to mate with humans because they need an injection of new genes to bolster their weakened genetic makeup.[12] Gene manipulation through eugenics was the same apostasy endeavored by the Nazis and the New Man project, as well as the far-left movement of liberals, the Progressives, whose doctrines dominated the first four decades of the twentieth century but died a sudden death after World War II, the fall of Nazism, and the rise of Communism. Beware of the resurgence of the contemporary Progressive movement of modern, liberal political parties, for Progressives are still married to the old doctrines of the New Man, the New World Order, and Babylon. Remember, too, this is how at least one race of Nephilim was created in ancient times.

In fairy lore, fairies possess changeling qualities. As per W. B. Yeats, fairies are not always little and take the size or shape of their choosing.[13] This ability is not a coincidence. Cahill noted the Tuatha Denaan devolved in mythology from a race of giants to the Little People, fairies, and leprechauns as some form of euphemism and disguise for their true nature.[14]

It is my contention that these modern alien encounters are nothing more than demonic and/or angelic encounters, crafted to reflect the modern attitudes of humankind as we endeavor to interpret our place in the universe. Although modified for technology and its rapid advancements, they are a finely sculptured, self-glorified image of delusion that fallen angels are delivering, deceiving the modern mind through its own aspirations, just as they did with fairies and goblins with our ancestors.

The advanced technology of alien encounters, along with all of its other alluring mythos, has been uniquely brewed to deceive contemporary humans. This magical and mysterious deception is an enticing and intoxicating cocktail for the modern mindset which is designed to lead our world astray; further away from God and Jesus; and into the universal world of Babel and false light, heralded by eastern religions, New Age, and Masonic fraternities, inclusive of the ultra-diabolical Illuminati. Therefore, expect that alien encounters will continue to increase until the momentum dictates a wondrous day when humankind is greeted with a formal first encounter of the fourth kind.

CHAPTER 49

THE MOTHER OF ALL SORCERIES

Many casualties, piles of dead, bodies without number, people stumbling over corpses—all because of the wanton lust of a harlot, alluring, the mistress of sorceries who enslaved the nations by her prostitution and peoples by her witchcraft.

—Nahum 3:3–4

Since alien encounters are anticipated to intensify at a mind-melting pace, what other forms of finely tuned delusions will rise, all designed to prepare humankind for the end times?

Expect to witness ever more spiritual guides and spiritual encounters. Demons and fallen angels masquerading as angels of light will continue to deceive at an increasing rate through visions and contacts. They will pass on more and more spiritual enlightenment as humankind draws closer to its destined ascension to a higher plane. Anticipate more and more New Age and Eastern spiritual leaders taking center stage; all will be guided by their spiritual guides, the ill-famed Avatars of Theosophy and Rosicrucianism. We are about to embark on a great evangelistic quest into Spiritualism that will grip the world unlike anything ever witnessed before. This will be an evangelistic movement of tremendous spiritual fervor that will unite the people of this earth. The people of the world have been well prepared; the false prophets are poised to seize center stage.

Christianity will not escape the never-ending waves of skillful false prophets, superbly crafted counterfeit visions, and the seductive lure of the harlot religion. Look for increasing visions of Mary, beckoning the Mary cult to explode within Catholicism first and then in the balance of Christianity before crossing over to join the spurious religions. The Mary apparitions of Lourdes; Fatima; Medjugorje; and the countless minor Mary apparitions, such as Rwanda and those of Joan of Arc, all preach a familiar and common doctrine rooted in the Revelation prophecy.[1] All Mary apparitions tout Mary (Babylon) to be the queen of kingdoms, the queen of all the people of the earth, and the bringer of peace (through the Covenant of Death).[2]

Mary apparitions trumpet varieties of expressions on the same theme: "I am the queen of peace. I am the mother of God, I am the mother of all people on earth,"[3] just as she was described by the prophets Isaiah and John. She is also described regularly as "Our Lady" and "Our Lady of Peace." She preaches a doctrine of peace and cooperation and uniting under one true religion. And she says that if the world does not repent, it will destroy itself from the face of the earth: "You cannot imagine what is going to happen, nor what the Eternal Father will send to the earth. That is why you must be converted! Renounce everything. Do penance…. Persevere and help me convert the world."[4] Again, does this not ring familiar? This is the doctrine of Babylon, the objective of the Masonic fraternities, and the teaching of all spurious religions since Babel. The Mary deception, in my opinion, is merely an end-time apparition sponsored by the dark angels.

The true identity of the apparition is not Mary but Ishtar or Isis. She is the feminine side to God in the trinity of spurious religions. Remember, Isis was wife to Osiris and mother to Horus, the pantheistic son of God. Mary will be the one described in Revelation 12:1–3 as the woman wearing a crown of twelve stars and clothed with the sun, with the moon under her feet, just as she already has adopted this allegorical appellation: "They say she appears standing on a cloud wearing a gray dress, a white veil, and a crown of twelve stars. The cloud is significant in that never have the visionaries seen her feet or shoes." And: "The visionaries at Medjugorje unhesitatingly refer to her as a great and mysterious sign, and a woman possessed of inordinate beauty. This lady and queen comes in such light, they say, that she seems to be actually clothed with the sun. She has a crown of twelve stars and she stands on a cloud, as she is described in Apocalypse 12:1."[5]

The woman in Revelation will be falsely described as the allegorical Isis (Mary). As we will explore later, Mary Magdalene, the alleged wife of Jesus according to Gnostics, is also known in Gnosticism as Sophia (Isis), the female equal to God. Gnostic doctrine also describes Sophia as surrounded by the sun, moon, and stars, exactly like what occurs in the Mary apparitions. Sophia, Isis, and Mary Magdalene are all mystical and figurative mothers to gods, just as this Mary describes herself as the mother of God. Mary Magdalene is further renowned in Gnosticism as "Our Lady," just as the Virgin Mary in Catholicism (and the Mary apparitions). Note also that the great Gnostic- and Templar-built, Gothic cathedrals in Europe, like Notre Dame, were all originally and surreptitiously dedicated to "Our Lady," Mary Magdalene,[6] and not to the Virgin Mary as most of Christendom believes.

The sun that clothes the Mary apparitions is Osiris (Lucifer), and the moon at her feet is Horus, forming the Masonic trinity. The twelve stars crowning her head will be avowed to represent the zodiac or the universe, while the baby that will be born is the Antichrist, Lord Maitreya/Horus—the antediluvian Orion. Remember, signs in astrology are an essential doctrine to spurious religions and end-time deceptions. This apparition is not the sign described in Revelation, and it is not the intended biblical application. Use of cleverly manipulated Scripture is yet another trait of the spurious religions.

It is through the Mary cult that I expect that Christianity will be tamed, first in Catholicism and then in the balance of Christianity. The apparitions preach a consistent message that is, at first glance, consistent with Christianity, but upon closer scrutiny, one finds the apparitions profess a most concerning doctrine. This cult-like religion preying upon devoted Catholics has continued to, and is continuing to, preach a disingenuous message of repentance, peace, and conversion. The apparition says, "Be converted! It will be too late when the sign comes. Beforehand, several warnings will be given to the world. Have people hurry to be converted." And: "Hurry to be converted. Do not wait for the great sign. For unbelievers, it will be too late to be converted."[7]

The misleading messages consistently preach repentance from sin, world unity, and peaceful coexistence—or unprecedented calamities will come to pass. We must unite under one religious banner in peace, or we will destroy ourselves from the face of the earth.[8] In future years, as time runs out, these keepers of the Mary cult will leap forward, proclaiming fantastic prophecies of doom unless the world repents, converts, and lives under one unified banner. No doubt, several cataclysmic prophecies and breathtaking, cosmic signs will be ignored and then fulfilled before Catholics, and then the world will take heed and convert out of fear. Do not be surprised if aliens are woven into these mysterious signs and disasters.

Again, do these predictions not ring familiar? The world must unite under one religion or be lost from the face of the earth. This is the same battle song trumpeted by environmentalists, peace groups, and globalists. This is the same subversive nightmare envisioned by Masonic fraternities; it is being deceitfully waged under the banner of peaceful coexistence to funnel the masses into a universal religion and government out of fear. The true and pure spirit of monotheism does not function this way; the true faith is centered in free choice, not fear.

Let us now consider the prophet Daniel: “When they feel secure, he [the Antichrist], will destroy many and take his stand against the Prince of princes” (Dan. 8:25). Peace is a wonderful thing, but peace under the banner of human-led world government and religion is not; this is why God confused the languages and dispersed the people at Babel.

Whether or not the delusion is the Virgin Mary, Mary Magdalene, spirit guides, any other form of false gods or angels, or even alien encounters, one must recognize the consistent nature of all these delusions. All cling to the doctrine of peaceful coexistence through unity under a new, enlightened, universal religion, and they all possess identical doctrines in their basic spurious forms. One must learn to understand that these delusions are real and are taking place at ever-increasing rates. All is currently being played out to predispose people to accept the ultimate deception that the apostle Paul warns will bring about the great rebellion in the last days:

> Don’t let anyone deceive you in any way, for that day will not come until the rebellion occurs and the man of lawlessness is revealed, the man doomed to destruction. He will oppose and will exalt himself over everything that is worshipped, so that he sets himself up in God’s temple, proclaiming himself to be God.
> —2 Thessalonians 2:3–4

The rebellion will be the people of the earth falling away from God into apostasy, through the end-time religion of Babylon, to follow the Antichrist. The False Prophet will stage the rebellion to clear the way for the Antichrist, the messiah of the New Age millennium. The people of the world will be required to come together, to unite under one banner, one government, just as the people of the plain did at Babel. Expect this attitude will manifest itself through any number of calamities: nuclear or chemical war, pollution, global warming, famines, aliens, or any form apocalyptic destruction. The delusion will become stronger in the face of recognizing that humankind is just another life form in the universe. Expect that language will become even less of a barrier, with universal translators who will adopt one international language, likely English, so as to once again be analogous with one language like Babel. Once more, nothing humankind plans will be impossible for them.

Babylon will sponsor a global peace treaty, uniting all the nations under one world government as part of its promised utopia; the treaty will be confirmed by the future Antichrist.[9] This infamous treaty is known in prophecy as the "Covenant of Death."[10] It is for this reason Revelation described the prostitute as sitting on many waters and riding the Beast with seven heads and ten horns.[11] The seven heads are the seven great empires of history: Egypt; Assyria; Babylon; Persia; Greece; Rome; and the revived, future Roman Empire. The prostitute rides this beast, for she was the religion for all these great empires past and will be once more in the great empire of the last days. The ten horns represent the leaders of the end time ten great divisions, zones, and/or kingdoms of the world, which are now being assembled through trading zones and spheres of influence. Unger's notes the sprouting of horns to be "imagery, signaling the revival of a nation or a power."[12]

North America will be one of these zones. Europe will be another, and so on, just as we see coming to pass today with NAFTA and the EEC. These ten zones will form the future world government, under the spiritual guidance of Babylon and the False Prophet. The power and influence of the opulent, harlot religion will bind the world together beneath one banner, just as in the time of Babel. Remember, future Babylon City will be the lavish centerpiece for global unification, global government, global religion, and global commerce.

Global unity is necessary to maximize the proper free flow of the universal god force, or life force. Once humankind achieves global unity, pantheistic doctrine dictates the proper free flow of the universal life force will permit humankind, en masse, to make a quantum leap to a higher plane of existence, or godhood, which the aliens are now secretly promising. Babylon will be a form of government, with all its power and influence, rather like the Catholic Church in Europe, but it is not and will not be the global government. This becomes very clear in Revelation, when the ten horns and the Antichrist plot against Babylon to bring her to her destruction.[13] Therefore, Babylon cannot be the world government.

CHAPTER 50

SPIRIT OF THE ANTICHRIST, THE BEAST

> This is how you can recognize the Spirit of God: Every spirit that acknowledges that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh is from God. Every spirit that does not acknowledge Jesus is not from God. This is the spirit of the antichrist.
> —1 John 4:2–3

In the antediluvian epoch, first there was Enoch and the spurious religion, and then came the evil potentates led by hordes of Nephilim and likely Orion the Hunter, who enslaved the people. In Babel we found a similar scenario, with Hermes arriving first to discover the remnant of the Sacred Sciences, followed by Nimrod and his tyrannical empire.

So, how will the end times, parallel the times of Nephilim, Nimrod, mysticism, and rebellion?

Just as in ages past, the deceptive temperament for the harlot religion will be to prepare the way for the Antichrist or false messiah. Therefore, it must take root first.

Although the true Antichrist has been reserved specifically for the preordained times by the true God, the last three-and-one-half years of the seven-year tribulation,[1] this has not prevented the forces of evil from endeavoring to introduce the false messiah from the beginning. Since Adam and Eve's fall from grace, forces within the rebellious and independent lineage of humankind have toiled tirelessly throughout the generations to introduce the false messiah. The ultimate objective for spurious forces is to steadfastly introduce the false messiah at a time conflicting with the divinely destined time laid down by the true God of the universe. As students of history, we have been witnesses to many such past, mutinous endeavors, where the spirit of the spurious religion gained control over world government and placed into position its likely candidate for world dictator.

We must remember the spirit of the Antichrist[2] is like a living being; it continually lurks, patiently awaiting its opportunity to seize its prey at a time of its own choosing, like a beast, but it will accept the preordained times if necessary. "For the secret power of lawlessness is already at work; but the one who holds him back will continue to do so until he is taken out of the way. And then the lawless one will be revealed" (2 Thess. 2:7–8).

Only the Holy Spirit prevents the spirit of the Antichrist from seizing a powerful-hungry potentate, holding world power, or ascending to world power. Only the Holy Spirit prevents the spirit of the Antichrist from completing the end-time abomination that will cause desolation until its prophesied time. Only the Holy Spirit prevents the forces of evil from fulfilling the spirit of the Antichrist revealing himself to the world by taking his stand, backed by the people of the earth against the true God. Without the power of the Holy Spirit, such would have taken place already under Nimrod or any of the six great world powers past.

Great historical kings, such as Nebuchadnezzar, Alexander, and Julius Caesar represent three of the most noteworthy examples of the spurious religion forging itself with powerful world empires to present a plausible Antichrist. Nebuchadnezzar had his reign interrupted for seven years,[3] until he acknowledged the true God of the universe, after he had all but completed the abomination in the temple but had not yet declared himself to be God from his throne in the temple; this has been reserved for the future Antichrist to do.[4] Alexander and Julius Caesar were slain before completing their unholy tasks but were already considered deities before their deaths; neither, however, ruled over the entire world. But Alexander was regarded by the Iranians of that period to be the accursed, hostile spirit relating to the end-time showdown between the forces of good and evil.[5]

Since the Roman Empire, other worthy procurers of evil have presented themselves, offering plausible opportunity for the spirit of the Antichrist. The post-Roman Empire candidates, however, generally constrained themselves to the fulfillment of end-time prophecy with respect to the rebirth of the Roman Empire as a requisite and the platform to seize absolute power. Although from the spurious perspective, this is not required, biblical prophecy demands the Roman Empire must be both the preparatory platform and the epicenter for the last world empire of this age.

Mussolini was one such candidate. Even if he was not a serious candidate for Antichrist, he did possess the spirit of the Antichrist and would have, if permitted, fulfilled the biblical requirements. Mussolini, like Hitler, also believed in the New Man doctrine: the fascists of the New Age were to be fashioned after an Italian redeemer who saw himself as a prophet. Mussolini envisioned Rome would be the center and the symbol to his new, political religion and capital of his new empire. This delusion required a superman, for Mussolini saw himself as a Caesar and a Savior, the Redeemer. All pronouns referring to Mussolini were capitalized during his reign of terror, while his close followers claimed his infallibility as a superman. Mussolini created in Italy the cult of Duce's divinity.[6]

Seizing absolute power and doing so illegally are two of the principal traits of the Antichrist. Other, more notable, and serious candidates of whom Nostradamas prophesied were Adolf Hitler and Napoleon. Both were brutal dictators who seized absolute power illegally and toiled relentlessly to reunite the Roman Empire. Both held an unexplained hatred of Christianity and, in particular, Catholicism.

We've discussed Hitler in a previous chapter, so let us now look at Napoleon, who usurped the Revolutionary government to become dictator of France. What is not generally known is that the religion of Babylon had already established itself within the rebellion and was in control, waiting for a possible Antichrist. Robespierre established the Cult of the Supreme Being, also known as the Cult of Reason, as the official religion of France in 1793–1794 C.E. Robespierre converted all Christian churches through tyranny to temples of the new cult, violently forcing them to worship the Supreme Being. This included Notre Dame and Abbey St. Germaine cathedrals that were then rededicated to the goddess Isis. The new religion of the rebellion was the same religion of Languedoc, the same religion as the heretical Cathars (and Templars) of some 600 years previous,[7] who were persecuted to the verge of extinction by the Catholic Inquisition.

The objective for the French Revolution was to overthrow the monarchy that supported Roman Catholicism (since the overthrow of the Merovingians) and to eradicate Christianity from France, according to Hancock and Bauval. Christian eradication was accepted as official doctrine in 1793 and then set in motion as a systematic campaign, according to French historian Michel Vovelle in his opus La Revolution Contre l'Eglise. This systematic eradication was efficiently carried out through state-sponsored enterprises, brusquely imposed through methodical intimidation and violence.[8] All this was in place when Napoleon seized power; Napoleon, too, was thought to be a Freemason.[9]

The future Fuehrer will be a great war leader in the spirit of Napoleon and Hitler at the start of their reigns; the Antichrist will be unstoppable, even though he will ascend to power on a pastoral platform of peace. In the same way that Nimrod, Alexander, Napoleon, and Hitler bent the world to their will for a short time, so will the future Antichrist. Once this Antichrist has seized absolute power, he will display all the terrible attributes that Hitler bludgeoned the world with. He will then transform into a warrior in the same scurrilous spirit as the Nephilim, Nimrod, Nebuchadnezzar, Alexander, Caesar, Napoleon, and Hitler.

Becoming a deity is a prerequisite for the Antichrist, just as Nebuchadnezzar, Alexander, and Julius Caesar endeavored to bring about. We know that Hitler and Mussolini had already considered themselves in messianic terms. In fact, Hitler considered himself second in his Aryan pantheon, behind only Nazism's perverted characterization of Jesus as a Nordic, Aryan leader. Hitler had already portrayed himself as a prophet of his new doctrines pertaining to his New Testament. Hitler, according to Peter Godman, declared himself to be the messiah of his political religion and heroized himself as a savior and redeemer of Aryan blood, a Christ-like figure.[10]

Alexander, too, was completely immersed in the bull cult and Antichrist-like Mysteries. In many of the birth legends of Alexander, his bloodlines were always traced back through his mother, Olympias, and through unexplained Egyptian bloodlines to a divine lineage of pharaohs, which is why Alexander eventually had himself crowned pharaoh in

Thebes, home to Amun.[11] Darius III previously claimed the crown of Egypt; Egypt had become a vassal province to Persia. Thus, Alexander was the rightful successor to the Egyptian throne after defeating Darius three times in battle.[12] Plutarch noted that all agreed Alexander had descended down from Hercules; from Caranus; and from Aeucus, by Neoptolemus, on his mother's side.[13] While in Egypt, Alexander completed a pilgrimage to the temple of Amun, where the high priest greeted him at once: "Welcome, from his father, Amun." While there, Alexander was rebuked and told to address his true father (Amun) with more respect, because Amun was no mortal parent.[14]

Olympias was Phillip's third wife. She was startlingly beautiful but was prone to terrible storms of temper, was wildly eccentric, and possessed a frightening obsession with snakes.[15] Plutarch additionally wrote that Philip discovered Olympias (curiously) sleeping with a serpent. King Philip of Macedonia, and father to Alexander, in this legend then received a terrifying vision of Olympias's body being sealed and a vision of a lion because of this encounter, whereby Philip then went to the Charron of Megalopolis to consult the oracle of Apollo at Delphi. Consequently, Philip was then ordered to sacrifice to and honor above all the god of Amun. Philip was further told that he would lose one eye for spying through a chink in the door on Olympias and the god, Amun, who had taken the form of a serpent (dark angel) to sleep with Olympias[16] (a recurring Nephilim creation theme). Alexander was reared in the ancient Egyptian religion of Amun; it made no pretensions to be any other religion than that of Egypt.[17] Aristotle was later sent to instruct Alexander,[18] for Aristotle was a pupil of Plato and Egyptian mysticism. Aristotle then raised Alexander with the philosophy of Egypt.[19]

After Alexander was initiated in the Amun temple, he crowned himself from that point on with his new Horns of Kingship,[20] once more connecting Alexander back to the Atlantean and Nephilim kingships. Alexander was documented as Dhu 'l-Qarnayn in the Qur'an, meaning the "Two Horned-One," a king, who, for a short time, was given the means to achieve anything.[21] All Antichrist figures unexplainably possess the power to bend the world to their will for a short while. And seemingly authentic Antichrist figures unexplainably commit to death marches. Napoleon and Hitler marked their death marches by invading Russia; King Sennacherib of

Assyria lost 185,000 outside of Jerusalem;[22] and Alexander inexplicably set out on his death march when returning from India, slaughtering 145,000 men; 30,000 survived the march.[23]

While discussing the spirit of the Antichrist, we ought to spend time on the Beast that Scripture identifies the future Antichrist with.[24] The Psalmist says, “When my heart was grieved and my spirit embittered, I was senseless and ignorant; I was a brute beast before you” (Psalm 73:22). God defines a spiritual beast to be one with an embittered spirit, unaccountably ignorant of God’s love, goodness, and authority. A spiritual beast is incapable of either understanding or appreciating God’s omnipotent love or is quite simply too callous to learn about Him.

Consider the book of Jude:

> In the very same way, these dreamers pollute their own bodies, reject authority and slander celestial beings. But even the archangel Michael, when he was disputing with the devil about the body of Moses, did not dare to bring a slanderous accusation against him, but said, “The Lord rebuke you!” Yet these men speak abusively against whatever they do not understand; and what things they do not understand by instinct, like unreasoning animals [beasts]—these are the very things that destroy them. Woe to them! They have taken the way of Cain.
> —Jude 1:8–10

Jude completes the allegorical definition of beasts as those who slander celestial beings, along with rejecting God’s authority. Spiritual beasts speak abusively against whatever they do not understand; it is their instinct to do so, like unreasoning animals, like beasts. They are similar to their antediluvian counterparts, who followed in the ways of Cain (and Nephilim). What an extraordinarily pertinent parallel!

Satan and his angels manipulate these vulgar and ignorant spiritual beasts to slander God in heaven and all who dwell in heaven with God, just as Satan and his cohorts utilized Cain and his descendants, as well as Nimrod and Hermes. Dark angels engage ignorant humans to do their slanderous handiwork through the spurious religion. Rebellious angels know all too well the power of the true God and do not wish to bring His wrath down upon themselves before the great judgment. The disfiguring doctrines and slander will be clear and identifiable signatures of the future Antichrist, after he has seized power. The future Antichrist will be a true scriptural beast.

CHAPTER 51

THE NEW NIMROD

In the latter part of their reign, when rebels have become completely wicked, a stern-faced king, a master of intrigue, will arise. He will become very strong, but not by his own power. He will cause astounding devastation and will succeed in whatever he does. He will destroy the mighty men and the holy people.

—Daniel 8:23–24

The pace of thought and change is so quick now that most should not ask if world government will come, but rather, when it will come. The world seems to be almost ready for such an institution to take shape, requiring only time, a great war or catastrophe, a religious revival under one religious banner, or the introduction of the alien deception made real to bring this grandiose scheme about.

One of the conditions above or a combination of some of them is all that will be required to drive the people of the earth into the welcoming arms of the globalists, who are now perfectly poised, ready to impose world government. World government is not a mythical, unattainable goal, but rather an attainable, plausible option for the world, a world that is currently spiritually adrift, looking for answers. World government will be achieved in this generation—let this clearly be understood. What treasonous traits must we inquire about to identify the formation of world government?

Let us turn to Daniel and Revelation for guidance:

> The fourth beast is a fourth kingdom that will appear on earth. It will be different from all the other kingdoms and will devour the whole earth, trampling it down and crushing it. The ten horns are ten kings who will come from this kingdom. After them another king will arise.
> —Daniel 7:23–24

> Finally there will be a fourth kingdom, strong as iron—for iron breaks and smashes everything—and as iron breaks things into pieces, so it will crush and break all the others. Just as you saw that the feet and toes were partly of baked clay and partly of iron, so this will be a divided kingdom; yet it will have some of the strength of iron in it, even as you saw iron mixed with clay.
> —Daniel 2:39–42

> I will explain to you the mystery of the woman and of the beast she rides, which has seven heads and ten horns…. This calls for a mind with wisdom. The seven heads are seven hills on which the woman sits. They are also seven kings. Five have fallen, one is, the other has not yet come, but when he does come, he must remain for a little while. The beast who once was, and now is not, is an eighth king. He belongs to the seven and is going to his destruction. The ten horns you saw are ten kings who have not yet received a kingdom, but who for one hour will receive authority as kings along with the beast.
> —Revelation 17:7, 9–12

First, the seven kingdoms mentioned in Revelation are world empires: Egypt, Assyria, Babylon, Persia, Greece, Rome of that period, and the revived Roman Empire of the future. The four beasts of Daniel’s prophecy, because Daniel was writing at the time of Babylon, exclude Egypt and Assyria but include the four empires of Babylon, Persia, Greece, and Rome, inclusive of the seventh, future empire that is to come; it will rise out of the old Roman Empire. The woman who rides the seven world empires is the harlot or spurious religion; she is an integral part of all world empires, dominating them from within with her destructive and deceptive doctrines of Lucifer, just as she will dominate the future empire.

Daniel recorded the last great empire will rise from the ashes of the old Roman Empire, just as Hitler and Napoleon endeavored to make happen. Out of the old Roman Empire will come forth ten toes or ten horns or ten kings—the allegories are the same, just as we covered previously, regarding the figurative meaning of the sprouting of horns. The three allegories dictate the future world empire will be made up of ten separate kingdoms banding together to form a world empire. Because it will be Roman rooted, it will be Roman inspired and centered, just as the harlot sits enthroned upon the seven hills of Rome. Because of this, expect the European Economic Community will be the womb from where world government will be born, with Rome as its embryo, just as the Treaty of Rome and then the Mastrich Treaty proclaimed, promising to unite Europe with one common cause. Expect the world will unite under ten distinct trading groups, just as Europe and North America are now united as distinct trading blocks.

One cannot deny the forces already at work that are bringing this about. Free trade is the promised idol of prosperity for the world. Every year the world moves closer together economically. One can already identify many of the trading blocks already being assembled: the EEC, NAFTA, the Pacific Rim, and parts of the previous Soviet bloc. These are four of the ten already realized. It will not take much more to add (and this is only my speculation) Middle Europa dominated by Germany (remember Germany was not part of the Holy Roman Empire), South and Central America, Africa, Middle Eastern countries, an India-dominated group, and a China-dominated group—separate from the other Pacific Rim nations.

The requirements of the Antichrist prophecies demand this last-day, ten-horned empire united under one religion must be fully entrenched before the true Antichrist will be permitted.

> The ten horns are ten kings who will come from this kingdom. After them another king will arise, different from the earlier ones; he will subdue three kings. He will speak against the Most High and oppress the saints and try to change the set times and laws.
> —Daniel 7:24–25

> The beast who once was, and now is not, is an eighth king. He belongs to the seven and is going to his destruction. The ten horns you saw are ten kings who have not yet received a kingdom, but who for one hour will receive authority as kings along with the beast. They have one purpose and will give their power and authority to the beast.
> —Revelation 17:11–13

The formation of the ten-horned empire first requires the formation of the spurious world religion, just as the Antichrist requires that the revived Roman Empire be entrenched before he will be permitted to make his fateful entrance. All the last day prerequisites are neatly tied together. Thus, the elemental doctrine for the seditious Rex Deus conspiracy is to unite governments of the world.[1] Without the empire, the Antichrist will not possess the global platform to seize absolute authority over the people of the world. Therefore, the Antichrist requires world government as a compulsory prerequisite, just as world government requires the spurious world religion.

Attaining world government through war would take too much time and too many resources, all the while inspiring too much resistance. We need only to take note of Hitler, Napoleon, and Stalin to underscore this point. What is required is for world government to take root first, thereby enabling the spurious forces to engineer a relatively peaceful and bloodless coup, only being required to forcibly subdue three of the ten trading blocks.[2]

In fact: “After coming to an agreement with them the [ten kingdoms], he [Antichrist] will act deceitfully, and with only a few people will rise to power” (Dan. 11:23). The future Antichrist will ascend to power on a peaceful platform of deception as the messiah of peace, not war; he will return to war only after he has usurped absolute power. “When the richest provinces feel secure, he will invade them and will achieve what neither his fathers nor his forefathers did. He will distribute plunder, loot, and wealth, amongst his followers. He will plot the overthrow of fortresses—but only for a time” (Dan. 11:24).

Anticipate that democracies of North America and Europe will be the three richest provinces/blocks overthrown. Their wealth will be ceremoniously redistributed around the world in a socialist, global gambit that will make Obama’s redistribution of wealth appear pale by comparison.

These passages, then, elucidate why Revelation states the Antichrist belongs to the seven great world empires. All have attempted to bring about the false messiah but have failed, except for the seventh, future world empire that will eventually succeed by virtue of the Holy Spirit being removed. The whole purpose, as witnessed by Revelation, for all the world empires is for them to hand authority over to the false messiah. Progressive liberalism, globalization, and world government all lead to the Antichrist; this doctrine is simple, straightforward, and startling.

The Antichrist will form what is prophesied to be the eighth empire on the back of the seventh empire.[3] The Antichrist will illegally seize power from the ten-horned empire, establishing a new and succinctly different empire. The empire of the false messiah, of the false Zion, will be established through a skillful coup d’état, which will destroy nationalism, borders, and all currencies; most of the world will unanimously celebrate this covert triumph, intoxicated by Socialist, false hopes and utopian expectations for the future. The people will cheer the false messiah, crowning him The Sovereign Lord of All.[4] What will seem so right under the righteous cause of peace and prosperity will be so wrong. Centralizing so much power into so few hands will provide the opportunity required for a new Nimrod, an absolute dictator of war, to seize absolute power almost uncontested.

The Antichrist will first appear to be the answer to the world's prayers, the long-awaited, divine hope of the world, while all the time relentlessly campaigning for power. The Antichrist will "succeed in whatever he does" (Dan. 8:24). He will then transform acutely once the world government has given power to him.

Meanwhile, Babylon will be enforcing a tribute from all the free trade flowing around the world. Babylon will become so opulent, so powerful, and so influential over the people of the world that the greedy, global government will become deliriously jealous of her. This lavish tribute, as described in the conspirator's seditious doctrines, will be a "progressive" tax on all transfer documents of all business transactions, which will have to be submitted and paid weekly. These conspirators will believe that all established capitalist and business oligopolies will gladly pay this tribute in return for the peace and safety guaranteed by the state.[5]

The glorious Babylonian age of peace will only last three-and-one-half years from the signing of the Covenant of Death that brings it about[6] to the time it is annulled. The global leaders will conspire with Babylon's rising star, the false messiah, to overthrow Babylon and remove her from power over the people:

> The beast and the ten horns you saw will hate the prostitute. They will bring her to her ruin and leave her naked; they will eat her flesh and burn her with fire. For God has put it in their hearts to accomplish his purpose by agreeing to give the beast their power to rule.
> —Revelation 17:16–17

Babylon will be completely and utterly destroyed by nuclear weapons, destroying the ancient city where she will reign, Rome.[7]

The beast will move swiftly to fill the spiritual void he created with himself and his sponsor, Satan: "The coming of the lawless one will be in accordance with the work of Satan displayed in all kinds of counterfeit miracles, signs and wonders, and in every sort of evil that deceives those who are perishing" (2 Thess. 2:9). "He will become very strong but not by his own power" (Dan. 8:24). Remember, this will be the long-awaited, false messiah. He will be most impressive and most powerful, for he shall have the full backing of his sponsor, Satan. The Antichrist will substitute himself for Babylon; the world will worship both him and Satan openly and not in secret, as observed today. Again, it is the doctrine of The Genesis 6 Conspiracy to eliminate all religions except for third, secret, unknown religion led by the false messiah, once he seizes power.[8]

The Antichrist will become his own religion, the new religion of his sponsor. “He will oppose and will exalt himself over everything that is called God or is worshipped, so that he sets himself up in God’s temple, proclaiming himself to be God” (2 Thess. 2:4).

> The beast was given a mouth to utter proud words and blasphemes and to exercise his authority for forty-two months. He opened his mouth to blaspheme God, and to slander his name and his dwelling place and those who live in heaven. He was given power to make war with the saints and to conquer them. And he was given authority over every tribe, people, language and nation. All inhabitants of the earth will worship the beast.
> —Revelation 13:5–8

And, as per the documents of these end-time conspirators: “The King of the Jews will be the real pope of the universe, the patriarch of the international church.” All international rights, human rights, and constitutional rights will be ripped away once the Antichrist seizes power. Expect that this bold action will be justified as only temporary, but the rights will never be returned.[9] Freedom will cease to exist once the Antichrist sequesters power.[10]

“He will speak against the Most High and oppress his saints and try to change the set times and the laws. The saints will be handed over to him for a time, times and half a time” (Dan. 7:25). Additionally, as per the doctrines of the Antediluvian conspirators, the reign of the Antichrist will be a brutal dictatorship enforced by violence and tyranny. Furthermore, the Rex Deus conspirators will completely usurp and censor the media, promoting only the positive values and attributes of the new regime.[11]

> He will exalt and magnify himself above every god and will say unheard of things against the God of gods. He will be successful until the time of the wrath is completed, for what has been determined must take place. He will show no regard for the gods of his fathers or the one desired by women, nor will he regard any god, but will exalt himself above them all.
> —Daniel 11:36–38

The Antichrist will be a spiritual beast, Satan’s own, used to slander God at every opportunity. “Men worshipped the dragon because he had given authority to the beast, and they also worshipped the beast” (Rev. 13:4).[12] In the words of Rex Deus: “Then it will be possible for us to say to the peoples of the world: ‘Give thanks to God [Satan] and bow the knee before him who bears on his front the seal of the predestination of man, to which God himself has led his star that none other but Him might free us from all the before-mentioned forces and evils.’”[13]

The Bible records the words of the Antichrist: “I will ascend above the tops of the clouds; I will make myself like the Most High” (Isa. 14:14). “He will oppose and will exalt himself over everything that is called God or is worshipped, so that he sets himself up in God’s temple, proclaiming himself to be God” (2 Thess. 2:4). He will take his stand against God and the saints, just as Nimrod had threatened to do and the antediluvian Titans did; only this time, the Antichrist will war with God and the entire heavenly host. Satan will have engineered his grand scheme, but the loyal saints will remain faithful and boisterous, proclaiming their witness of the true God of the universe.

This time, the future Nimrod will emphatically attempt to defeat the Lord of Hosts. “It grew until it reached the host of heaven, and it threw some of the starry host down to the earth and trampled on them. It set itself up as the great Prince of the host” (Dan. 8:10–11). The empire of the Antichrist may very well be filled with the delusionary ideal that it will be part of galactic government, a member of a select group of beings who govern a universe teeming with intelligent life forms, many who are at war with the forces of evil led by the Lord of Hosts, Adonai. We will witness visible and physical galactic, warlike encounters, just as Daniel stated that the Antichrist and fallen angels would capture some of the heavenly host in the last three-and-one-half years. Remember, the dark angels of the Abyss will have already have been released to haunt the earth, starting at the beginning of the seven-year tribulation period. One should expect some of the heavenly beings loyal to God will be tortured and humiliated in a public spectacle, but not killed, for they are immortal beings.

The world and the universe will appear to be in open, galactic warfare, with the earthly saints who stand forever loyal to God and to Jesus being slaughtered as traitors of the earth and a galactic battle being waged in the heavens for all to observe. A deluded sense of sacrifice will be the price paid by humans to earn seats at the galactic table as revolutionaries of light. Understand clearly that this galactic war will indeed reach into the heavens:

> And there was war in heaven. Michael and his angels fought against the dragon, and the dragon and his angels fought back. But he was not strong enough, and they lost their place in > heaven. The great Dragon was hurled down—that ancient Serpent called the devil or Satan, who leads the whole world astray. He was hurled to the earth, and his angels with him.

> —Revelation 12:7–9

However long or brief this galactic encounter will be, the result of the skirmish will be the banning of Satan and his fallen angels to the earth for the last part of the last three-and-one-half years of this age. All this will take place so that all those who are destined to be deceived will be deceived and that all that must take place will take place.[14] The Antichrist will make his stand and try to change the set times and events,[15] but in the end, he will fail, for his reign will only be a short but destructive three-and-one-half years.[16]

The Antichrist likely will declare his rebellious empire to be some form of a heavenly/galactic government: "You said in your heart, 'I will ascend to heaven; I will raise my throne above the stars of God; I will sit enthroned on the mounts of the assembly, on the utmost heights of the sacred mountain'" (Isa. 14:13). Lord Maitreya, the name Theosophists give the Antichrist, will achieve what Nimrod did not. The empire of the Antichrist will achieve enough power and strength to create a plausible delusion. And in fact, the Antichrist and Satan do have the power to stand and make war with the Lord of Hosts. Those who are not solid in their faith and sound in their scriptural knowledge will find it impossible to sift through such a powerful delusion.

The Antichrist and his delirious disciples will not only promote their cause to be the truth and the light, but also they will engage in the most negative advertising campaign the world has ever witnessed, slandering their rivals, Jesus, God, and monotheism, doggedly determined to trample the truth.[17] Just as they believe the followers of Adonai have slandered them, so will they slander God, Jesus, and the saints through unheard-of and unimagined ways. Scripture says, "The beast was given a mouth to utter proud words and blasphemies and to exercise his authority for forty-two months. He opened his mouth to blaspheme God, and to slander his name and his dwelling place and those who live in heaven" (Rev. 13:5–6). "The king will do as he pleases. He will exalt himself and magnify himself above every god and will say unheard-of things against the God of gods" (Dan. 11:36). What will be said and done, we do not know, but the slander will be poured out in unimaginable proportions; the smear will make the petty insults cast by Nimrod seem like mere child's play!

The rebellion will be the ultimate battle of our age, where the Antichrist will make his stand, supported by Satan, the fallen angels, demons, Jinn, and the deluded people of the earth, against God and Jesus. The galactic war will have come down to the earth. “He will pitch his tents between the seas at the holy mountain. Yet he will come to his end, and no one will help him” (Dan. 11:45).

> Then they gathered the kings together to the place that in Hebrew is called Armageddon…. Then I saw the beast and the kings of the earth and their armies gathered together to make war against the rider on the white horse and his army. But the beast was captured and with him the false prophet who had performed the miracles on his behalf.
> —Revelation 16:16; 19:19–20

Jesus will intercede just before the world is utterly destroyed by the Antichrist, defeating his armies and capturing the Antichrist, the false prophet, and all the fallen immortals, banishing them to eternal torment in the lake of fire.[18]

What the Antichrist will attempt to bring about is the same rebellion Nimrod plotted so many years ago at Babel. If God had permitted events to unfold in ages past, we would have witnessed quite a number of deluded but qualified and willing candidates who would have gladly been king (the beast). Perhaps a Nephilim name would be infamous today as the Antichrist of the antediluvian epoch, just as the future Antichrist will be infamous. Perhaps Nimrod might have been the Antichrist, or Menes from Egypt. Notorious men such as Ashurbanipal, Sennacherib, Tiglath-Pileser, or Shalmaneser of Assyria; Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon; Cyrus of Persia; Alexander of Macedonia; Julius Caesar of Rome; Napoleon of France; Hitler of Germany; Stalin of Russia; or Mao Tse-tung of China could have achieved absolute rule of the earth and accepted the role as Antichrist if God had chosen their time to fulfill the prophecy. The spirit of the plan has been put in play many times, for the spirit of the Antichrist is never at rest. Only the Holy Spirit, by the command of God, has prevented the spirit of the Antichrist from coming about fully.

The Antichrist will come equipped with superhuman skills. One should expect the disguise of a peacemaker.[19] His political and negotiating expertise will be unmatched, again supported by the successful negotiation of the Covenant of Death.[20] His mind will compute at a genius level, particularly with respect to spiritual matters. The Antichrist will be preselected from superior Rex Deus stock, tested, and prepared to know how to use his genius brain and its apparently unlimited capacity.[21]

The Antichrist will be viewed as the ultimate spiritual guide sent to humankind to lead them into the next plane of existence. He will appear to solve most, if not all, the world's problems, and he will sell these ideas like no other. One can expect oratory skills that will hypnotize the masses, similar to what Hitler did, but in this case, all will have a peaceful, positive demeanor—at first. The future, false messiah will seduce the world; its people will love him like no other.

The people of the world will wonder after him, asking, "Who is like the beast?" The whole world will be astonished and follow the beast (Rev. 13:3–4). "He will invade the kingdom when its people feel secure, and he will seize it through intrigue" (Dan. 11:21). The people will acknowledge the autocracy of the false messiah, but they will acquiesce, unexplainably glorifying him with a devotion bordering on insanity. The aura of the Antichrist's authority will inspire an unsurpassed, mystical bowing of the knee before him, a reverent fear before him of all peoples.[22]

The Antichrist will both intrigue and astonish the world because he will do what is continually unexpected and unanticipated. Just as Napoleon astonished the world of his day, so will the Antichrist. Napoleon introduced new and controversial strategies and tactics to war and to government. He mystified other nations and armies, hypnotizing them through his intrigue, unanticipated moves, and the risks he often gambled on and won. The Antichrist, like Hitler, Napoleon, and Alexander, will for a brief and bloody period appear to be the master of intrigue and chaos.

The new Nimrod will be possessed by the spirit of the Antichrist, according to Scripture, likely by Abaddon/Apollyon. Revelation 17:8 clearly states this:

> The beast, which you saw, once was, now is not, and will come out of the Abyss and go to his destruction. The inhabitants of the earth whose names have not been written in the book of life from the creation of the world will be astonished when they see the beast, because he once was, now is not, and yet will come.

Expect that Abaddon/Apollyon of Revelations will actually be identified as Azazel, the destroyer from the antediluvian world. Remember, Azazel and all rebellious angels will once more be released from the Abyss in the last days.

Nimrod endeavored to convert the entire world to the religion of Babel, along with his partner Hermes. Nimrod forced all the peoples of the world to come and pay him divine homage; he established himself as a god, according to Jewish legend, and erected an imitation seat he called "the Throne of God," just as the Antichrist will do. Nimrod made war against the Host of Heaven, shooting arrows into the heavens and endeavoring to slay the heavenly Host, just as the Antichrist will. The future Nimrod's promised age of peace will fade away to war, violence, and murder. Nimrod rose to power through his cunning, seizing absolute power as the singular sovereign and first mortal to hold universal sway; Nimrod, according to Ginzberg, possessed for a short time the power of the (false) messianic blessing. All the people followed Nimrod in a hypnotic allegiance, proclaiming, "Since the creation of the world there has been none like Nimrod, a mighty hunter of men and beasts,"[23] just as the people will chant regarding the future Antichrist. All will inexplicably follow after the Antichrist like lemmings, in hypnotic wonderment, asking: "Who is like the beast?" Truly, there is nothing new under the sun; what was will be again!

CHAPTER 52

THE RAPTURE TRAGEDY

We believe that Jesus died and rose again and so we believe that God will bring with Jesus those who have fallen asleep. According to the Lord’s own word, we who are still alive, who are left for the coming of the Lord, will certainly not precede those who have fallen asleep. For the Lord himself will come down from heaven, with a loud command, with the voice of an archangel and with a trumpet call of God, and the dead in Christ will rise first. After that, we who are still alive will be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air. And so we will be with the Lord forever.

—1 Thessalonians 4:14–17

This will be a generation in which all things previously deemed impossible by past generations will appear possible. But how in the world will monotheists be duped when they know what is coming? And how will the saints be hoodwinked into shame and then genocide?

God will permit Satan to reach deep into his mystical bag of magic so he can delude those who are perishing through all kinds of counterfeit miracles, signs, and wonders, which will be accompanied by every sort of evil and diabolical scheme, all designed to delude this generation into destruction.[1] Satan and his multitudes of manipulated minions wage perpetual war against truth[2] so that very soon, everything will be turned inside out and upside down. What will seem to be right will be wrong, and what will be portrayed as the truth and the Way[3] will actually be an array of subtle lies and ploys. Truth will be trampled in ways unlike anything the seeds of Adam have ever witnessed.

One cannot begin to imagine what all this will imply; only that it will be a continual onslaught of belief modification heretofore unseen. Matthew prophetically describes this clever crusade of thought modification: “For false Christs and false prophets will appear and perform great signs and miracles to deceive even the elect—if that were possible” (Matt. 24:24). We will not even be able to rely on the shepherds of righteousness that have always guided our Judeo/Christian world in the coming, perilous times (2 Cor. 11:13–14), for they, too, will be deceived, if that were possible (Matt. 24:23–25). Remember, the leaders of the “new Christianity” will all be apostates.

Most who consider end-time prophecy to be biblical certainty conclude the perilous end-times will be colored with overt evil, sprinkled with terrible displays of gore and horrific events, and flavored with the tainted taste of tyrannical deception in every form, which will include horrendous displays of demonology. Such horrors will be part of the diabolical deception.

The saints must take more care in their witnessing or risk being a pawn in the deception of the Terminal Generation. They must communicate the warnings with quiet determination, humility, tolerance, and respect for all others, thus testifying to the sanctity of the message. The true message of the Apocalypse cannot be credibly delivered through the fire and brimstone rhetoric of a legalistic minister. Louder cries will only serve spurious forces in painting the saints to be fanatical, ultra-right-wing bigots who nurture intolerance. This characterization will continue to discredit the divine message. Saints must deliver their message through truth and grace, just as Jesus did.

Unfortunately, I do not believe the saints will temper their approach. As the last years draw nigh, saints screaming for due consideration will all be cast as inferior fanatics, who ought to be ostracized from the modern utopia. The saints ultimately will be manipulated by the spurious forces, driving the balance of the unenlightened into the deceptive hands of the so-called enlightened and into “the Way” to godhood. Ultimately, this shame of the future will reach its deceptive apex at the most important threshold of the last days. Just when the spiritually uneducated of the world will require the voice of truth and grace from the saints the most, the saints will fail them.

The spiritual watershed will come about at the introduction of the false messiah. The spectacle of innocent righteousness shamed of the saints loyal to the God Most High, before a polytheist world gone mad will come about when the saints unanimously stand up, labeling the false messiah as the Antichrist once this enigmatic leader makes his future credentials known through negotiating the Covenant of Death.[4] Until this event comes to pass, the identity of the false messiah will be kept secret, known only by three very senior elders of Rex Deus, who will know the terror that is coming.[5]

The Antichrist will negotiate a worldwide peace treaty,[6] coronating the spurious dream. The covenant will enshrine the safety of Israel as a cornerstone to its doctrine.[7] The world has already been well prepared by war and by those who continually and seditiously promote war to turn eagerly to the prophesied despot king of Zion, for the people will soon clamor for one king over all the earth. He will unite them, promising freedom from war, borders, nationalism, religious strife, and state debt; he will guarantee peace! The world will seek, accept, and adore patriarchal, paternal guardianship of the coming false messiah.[8]

The Antichrist’s authority will be extraordinary, accented with the astonishment of new, unanticipated, and unheard-of solutions for the problems of the world and for the Middle East in particular. The Antichrist will bully the Western democracies but will pander to the rest of the world. Moreover, the Antichrist will secretly advance his aureole of wonderment in the back rooms of government through tyranny and intimidation. We can take the lead from recent history that records every leader who sought compromise with the Fuehrer came out with the short end of the stick. Hitler’s idea of negotiation was to dictate terms. Those who yearned for compromises were worn down by threats and bullying, relinquishing more than they ever imagined. They naively mistook Hitler's charisma for integrity.[9]

The signing of the Covenant of Death for seven years begins the seven year tribulation that is marked by the abomination in the temple at the three and one half year point.[10] The covenant signing will be the dawn of the New Age, ingeniously plotted and negotiated by a relatively unknown politician (by design) of that time. Scripture foretells that he will possess purported but false royal bloodlines.[11] He will profess to possess royal blood descending back through Jesus and David, launching the dynasty of destiny to be inherited by his progeny.[12] This unanticipated pedigree of mystique will catapult this unknown politician to prominence. Remember, neither Napoleon nor Hitler possessed royal bloodlines; the future, false messiah will be the same sort of serpent. This individual will be clearly identified by the saints at this point; they will speak out against him with such fury that they will become enemies of the state.

The future, false messiah will then begin an unanticipated populace movement that will help him ascend to power. He will stroll confidently among the masses, seemingly fearless of assault or of being slain. He will truly seem to be the Messiah, mixing with and followed by massive numbers in very public spectacles. The Antichrist will surround and protect himself with multitudes of supporting men and women, preventing anyone from attempting to get close to him, to talk to him, or to harm him.[13]

The saints will speak voraciously against this individual, causing an overwhelming portion of the people to wish the saints away at any price. The global bias set adroitly against the saints will be the catalyst to the first of two genocides; it will be inspired by the spurious religion that will pull the strings of its puppet world government.

The saints will slander the New World Order and Babylon along with the future Antichrist, without restriction or reservation, because they will believe earnestly that they will be spared from retribution. They will declare loudly and clearly that the Covenant of Death event will trigger the rapture:

> Listen, I tell you a mystery: We will not all sleep, but we will all be changed—in a flash, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trumpet. For the trumpet will sound, the dead will be raised imperishable, and we will be changed.
> —1 Corinthians 15:51–52

> Those who survive all these things I have predicted will be rescued when I bring an end to this world that I have created. They will see those who never died but were taken up alive into heaven.[14]

The rapture doctrine essentially states that a select elect will be transformed instantaneously, without dying, directly into heaven at the advent of the Antichrist and before the coming wrath of God. The saints will be expecting to be whisked away to heaven, saving them from the wrath of the Antichrist and the tribulation, just as the Bible states: “There will be a time of great distress such has never happened from the beginning of nations until then. But at that time your people—everyone whose name is written in the book—will be delivered” (Dan. 12:1). “They tell you how you turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God, and to wait for his Son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead—Jesus, who rescues us from the coming wrath” (1 Thess. 1:9–10). Note how Paul connected the return of Jesus to the time of the wrath, which is generally understood to be in the end time and the last seven years. However, the question is simply this: is this doctrine’s timing correct?

All will be wagered on the introduction of the Antichrist, who will arrive on the world stage with adulating prominence at the signing of the covenant, which then will trigger the last seven years of this age, the tribulation.[14] The seven-year tribulation period is generally believed to be the period known as “the wrath of God” and “the time of Jacob’s trouble.” This doctrine seems biblically supportable and accurate; but a comprehensive study of all applicable prophecy relating to the rapture suggests a different timeframe for the rapture. The “pre-trib” rapture doctrine, I believe, is in grievous and disastrous error.

The problem with the “pre-trib” doctrine is that it relies too heavily on the “being saved from the wrath”[16] and the “introduction of the Antichrist”[17] prophecies without giving due consideration to the scores of the companion prophecies. Combine this with a misunderstanding of the timing of the wrath of God, the defining event that decisively declares the Antichrist to the world, and we end up with an exceedingly embarrassing, excruciating, and reprehensible discrediting of the saints en masse at what will be the most crucial apex in the 6,000 year mandate of Adam’s seed.

The time of the wrath does not begin until the midpoint of the seven-year tribulation period, when the Antichrist seizes absolute power from the world government and destroys Babylon. The wrath of God is poured out of the Bowl Judgments of Revelation 16:1–21, which commence at the midpoint of the tribulation, when the Antichrist comes to power.[18] Secondly, it is not the introduction of the Antichrist at the signing of the Covenant of Death that triggers the rapture. Rather, it is when the individual who aspires after the spirit of the Antichrist achieves his status as world dictator by completing the abomination that causes desolation[19] in the temple that triggers the rapture.

Let us defer to the apostle Paul’s words in Thessalonians 1:8 with regard to this matter:

> Concerning the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ and our being gathered to him, we ask you brothers, not to easily become unsettled or alarmed by some prophecy, report or letter supposed to have come from us saying, that the day of the Lord has already come. Don’t let anyone deceive you in any way, for that day will not come until the rebellion occurs and the man of lawlessness is revealed, the man doomed to destruction. He will oppose and will exalt himself over everything that is called or is worshipped, so that he sets himself up in God’s temple, proclaiming himself to be God. Don’t you remember that when I was with you I used to tell you these things? And now you know what is holding him back, so that he may be revealed at the proper time. For the secret power of lawlessness is already at work; but the one who now holds him back will continue to do so till he is taken out of the way. And then the lawless one will be revealed.

The covenant signing at the beginning of the seven year tribulation does not reveal the Antichrist. This is only the introduction to the future Antichrist, a sure sign that the end times are here. Rather, the Antichrist will truly be revealed to the world when the Restrainer (Holy Spirit) is removed from the world, permitting the prospective, previously introduced Antichrist candidate to complete his mid-trib revelation with the abomination that causes desolation.[20] Paul wrote 2 Thessalonians precisely, connecting the gathering of God’s people, the rapture miracle, with the Abomination in the holy temple, which all takes place at the midpoint of the seven-year tribulation period.

Note, finally, that the literal “wrath of God” in Revelation 16 begins with the plague of sores breaking out on the people who have taken the mark of the Beast.[21] The people will not be forced to take the mark of the Beast until after the abomination of the image being erected in the holy temple; all this takes place after the coronation of the Antichrist at the midpoint of the tribulation.[22]

This abomination that causes desolation is the establishment and the crowning of the lawless one as god in the temple of Jerusalem, which is yet to be built. This is clear in 2 Thessalonians, Daniel, and Revelation.[23] Clearly, the abomination is the revelation of the Antichrist, not the negotiation and signing of the covenant that will bind together the New World Order. The verses in 2 Thessalonians clearly underscore that the rapture will not occur until the Antichrist is revealed, but this revelation, according to 2 Thessalonians, will occur after the rebellion. The rebellion is the coronation of the Antichrist that causes the abomination. It is the spurious symbol for complete rebellion, which unites the inhabitants of the earth against God. The consummation sign for this rebellion will be the populace en masse accepting the mark of the Beast as a symbol of their covenant of allegiance, just as Nimrod attempted to do.

The book of 2 Thessalonians records, defines, and reveals what will happen. The passage cannot be separated for convenient interpretation, just as the Nephilim narrative cannot be separated from the flood narrative. The revealing of the Antichrist clearly includes the rebellion, the abomination, and the mark of the Beast. It is not the signing of the covenant. I clearly understand that my position is contentious among Christians, but this is also the point! Mainstream Christendom believes in “pre-trib” rapture, and if a pre-trib rapture does not come about, they will witness a spectacle of immense and tragic proportions. In addition, achieving the covenant may take a series of accords, the first of which may not be negotiated by the Antichrist. This would cause even more humiliation of the saints, if so.

The saints will slander the person who negotiates the Covenant of Death with unrestrained veracity in the face of world opinion, just when the people of the world at that time will be uplifting this individual as the greatest person of our time and any time. The saints will slander the Antichrist in a Kamikaze fashion, for they will expect to be safeguarded from incrimination by virtue of what they will incorrectly believe to be imminent rapture. The future Antichrist, however, will be portrayed as the greatest hero in the world at that time, untouchable as far as the masses will be concerned. And yet, the saints will be attacking him unceasingly as the evil, false messiah of prophecy.

The saints will be perceived as religious fanatics, intolerant to change and to other races and religions. They will be declared relics who fanatically hold on to the so-called barbaric and primitive past. Others will label them enemies of the New Age; the new, universal religion; and the New World Order, who are ferociously attacking the alleged savior of humankind. The saints will be in their most vulnerable state and poised for genocide from the New World Order and Babylon.

The saints will wait patiently and hopefully to be rescued from the coming genocide, but the rapture will not come for another three-and-one-half years. The saints will be humiliated and discredited beyond understanding because of this. All will be just as prophesied:

> First of all, you must understand that in the last days scoffers will come, scoffing and following their own evil desires. They will say, "Where is this 'coming' he promised? Ever since our fathers died, everything goes on as it has since the beginning of creation."
> —2 Peter 3:3–4

The world will scoff at the saints, their holy promise of rapture, and at the second coming of Jesus. The saints will be utterly betrayed by the so-called moderates of Christianity, seditious and evil churchgoing liberals, and Gnostics, who have methodically worked their spurious ways into Christianity. These vitriolic moles will then side with the New World Order and the Babylonian religion of mysticism in a schism of Christianity that will make Martin Luther's Protestant movement pale by comparison.

The world will be delirious with delight at the prospects of a utopian, unified world, where "heaven on earth" will be achieved. The people of the earth will be drunk with the exhilarating excitement from the ascending, false messiah. Only monotheistic saints will be the "party poopers" set steadfastly against this upside-down world. The people of the earth will have no patience for the negative, nay-saying monotheists. The saints will be vermin that must be exterminated. This state of affairs will be the catalyst to the Babylonian genocide referred to in Revelation (see Rev. 17:6; 17:18; and 18:24). This will be the first of two genocides waged in the last days against Christians and all faithful monotheists.

Such is the diabolical genius of deception. The world will not run into the open arms of a self-declared madman of mayhem or a demonic dictator. The world will not suddenly go brain dead and embrace the spurious religions of Satan. The world's people will not suddenly become bloodthirsty bandits out to murder and torture the innocent, who clearly shout the truth in the face of blatant evil. Instead, the world will be deluded through the cleverest of deceptions, and people will climb all over themselves with misplaced delight and fervent optimism in the pursuit of creating heaven on earth.

ADONAI

"I AM WHO I AM. This is what you are to say to the Israelites: 'I AM has sent me to you.'" God said to Moses, "Say to the Israelites, 'The Lord, the God of your Fathers—the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, the God of Jacob—has sent me to you.' This is my name forever, the name by which I am to be remembered from generation to generation."

—Exodus 3:14–15

Saints will be classified as a fanatical, evil cult that follows the devil god, Adonai. So, who is this Adonai? And how will this Adonai be drafted to bring about the shaming of the saints?

The appellation Adonai, utilized for God Most High, has quite a spurious, historical definition. YHWH or Yahweh or Jehovah did not permit His name to be pronounced, nor written, for it was too holy.[1] In truth, God's name is unknown to humans, and we would not be able to understand or pronounce His omnipotent name if we did know it. However, some in the great tribulation will have God's true name written upon them.[2] The name Yahweh is derived from the Old Testament,[3] where God stated to Moses, "I AM WHO I AM," or YHWH in Hebrew.[4] Yahweh was a name unique to Israel and has not been discovered to be a name for a deity outside Israel.[5]

Cahill sets forth other possible definitions for YHWH, which he believes may be a little more accurate: "I am He who causes things to be."[6] Unger's notes that W. F. Albright concluded Yahweh originated from the northwest Semitic verb hwy, meaning "to be or to come into being," suggesting that the true name for the Creator ought to be "He causes to be," or "He creates." Amorite personal names after 2000 B.C.E. reflected this verb as being in vogue during that period.[7]

As legend goes, the Adonai appellation was given to God in order to circumvent the sin of writing or saying God's name, this from before the time of Moses.[8] Certainly, the Jewish people did not speak the name YHWH after 70 C.E., for the Jews only spoke his name once a year, in the Holy of Holies, in the temple, on the Day of Atonement. Therefore, according to Cahill, Israelites always substituted Adonai, even when reading the Holy Scriptures.[9] Nelson's states that because Yahweh was too holy for human lips, the Jews adopted Adonai, or Lord, which was later reflected in Greek translations as "Lord."[10] Adonai translates into English from Greek as "Lord, meaning God."[11] Adon is translated as "Lord," while ai translates as "my," forming my Lord.[12] Originally, according Gardner, Adon derived from a Phoenician title meaning "my Lord."[13] This accounts for Exodus permitting "I AM" or "Lord" as interchangeable in the text.

The Hebrew letter d is the counterpart to the Egyptian letter t, while the Hebrew letter o is the counterpart to the Egyptian letter e, thereby establishing Adon as the Egyptian version of the god Aten.[14] Adon/Aten is said by some authors to be the same god.[15] Coincidentally, Aten, a god of monotheism, reigned supreme under Pharaoh Akenhaten, a heretical pharaoh according to the spurious religions of Egypt.[16] Akenhaten was also known in history as Amenhotep IV, and likely Tutmosis IV, translated as "glorious spirit of the Aten."[17] Akenhaten obviously reversed his religious beliefs at some point in time, represented by his new name, Akenhaten, which honored his new god. Akenhaten obviously was reared to worship Amun; his original name was Amenhotep IV. Amen is variantly spelled as Amon and Amun, the alleged father of Alexander. Amun was the masculine god of fertility and counterpart to Isis,[18] known variantly as the god Ra, and/or Marduk, from the Akkadian pantheon.[19] Amun was always depicted wearing a ram's head,[20] just as the Atlantean, Nephilim kings and queens of the bull cult wore ram headbands. Akenhaten closed all the other temples of the Egyptian pantheon, making him most unpopular among the followers of the pantheon and, in particular, the followers of Amun, for Akenhaten did not permit Amun worship in his reign.[21] Oddly enough, Akenhaten reigned around the same period as Moses. I believe Aten's fame has been contrived by Theosophists and has elemental ties to The Genesis 6 Conspiracy.

Aten did not possess an image,[22] just as the Hebrew God has no image. This concept was established in Egypt well before the birth of Akenhaten.[23] Aten was the omnipotent god introduced by Akenhaten[24] to be the only God worth worshipping. Egyptians of that period additionally believed Aten was the god of all mankind and every creature, the unseen god that created the universe, and who also sustains creation.[25] However, Aten and God are not the same. Aten is a sun god in the spirit of all polytheistic religions and is a force similar to the universal life force. Susan Wise Bauer notes God is never identified with either sun or moon and is so far beyond the disk of the sun that it could not begin to represent Him. Both monotheistic movements were close in time but in no other way.[26]

Remember that Adonai was associated with the evil El and Baal—both sun gods like Aten. Similarly, the Semitic title Adonai (Lord) morphed into Adonis during the reign of Alexander.[27] During this period, the Adon appellation was widely applied to the vegetation god Tammuz in the Adonis Mysteries of Phoenicia.[28] In the same way, Ahura was the title that meant "Lord" for the Avestan god of the Aryans, Ahura Mazda of Zoroastrianism.[29] Even though factions of monotheism use the name Adonai for God, do not transpose the polytheistic incantations of Adonis onto God, as the disingenuous, spurious forces do.

Akenhaten was succeeded by his brother, Smenkhare, and then by Tutankhamun, the son of Akenhaten. The followers of the ancient, spurious religions, relegating Aten back among the pantheon of gods, later overthrew Akenhaten. At the coronation of Tutankhamun, the boy pharaoh reverted back to the pantheon of gods headed by the god Amun. The Aten cult continued until the death of Tutankhamun, when the kingship of Egypt transferred to Aye, the last of the famous Amarna kings. As for Akenhaten, he completely disappeared from history, with no record of his death, when Smenkhare died.[30] These details will be important parts of the discussion in later chapters of this book.

Ergo, in the end time scenario, god (Adonai) will be the devil, and the saints will be the evil ones who must be separated from the enlightened ones. Everything will be turned upside down and inside out. The holocaust against the saints will be just as Matthew 13:37–43 describes (italics added):

> He answered, “The one who sowed the good seed is the Son of Man. The field is the world, and the good seed stands for the sons of the kingdom. The weeds are the sons of the evil one, and the enemy who sows them is the devil. The harvest is the end of the age, and the harvesters are angels. As the weeds are pulled up and burnt in the fire, so it will be at the end of this age. The Son of Man will send out his angels, and they will weed out his kingdom everything that causes sin and all who do evil. They will throw them into the fiery furnace, where there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth. Then the righteous will shine like the sun in the kingdom of their father. He who has ears let him hear.”

This will be the prophecy that both Babylon and the New World Order will manipulate for their own cause. This prophecy will be applied once more in the last half of the tribulation by the Antichrist, as well. Essentially, what will transpire will be the rationalization and the justification to the slaughter of the saints. The saints will be cast into the role of the evil weeds that were led astray through the purported heretical Pauline doctrine. People will assert that the Christians were deceived and that, in reality, Jesus was just a man, one of many enlightened prophets who came to help humankind find the enlightenment of the Way. This was the whole point of the famous Jesus Seminars of the nineties, which were maliciously made up of Gnostics and liberals.

God will be depicted to be the evil Adonai, the devil that planted the weeds. Lucifer will be masked as the god of light, the god of knowledge, who frees humankind from the bonds of slavery (ignorance) imposed by Adonai. Babylon will be the blood-soaked institution that sends out its dark angels to harvest the weeds from the kingdom. The harvest will accurately be identified as the end of this age; however, the New Hermetic Age of heaven on earth, the promised end of the age of Pisces and the dawn of the Age of Aquarius, is not the true millennium.

The alleged evil ones will be considered inferior, incapable of evolving into gods—first the Christians, then all the monotheists. The weeds will be harvested and burned in a holocaust that will make the Jewish Holocaust of World War II pale by comparison; this will be a global holocaust on an unthinkable scale. Once more, the fiery furnaces employed by Hitler will be brought back to burn the alleged evil ones. This fiery holocaust will be in the same spirit that Nimrod barbarically destroyed those who upheld the ways of God at Babel, through fiery furnaces. Nothing is new under the sun!

All this was prophesied more than 2,000 years ago. We are now privileged to perceive its probability and its plausibility unfolding before our eyes. The subversive infrastructure to The Genesis 6 Conspiracy is both muscular and insidious. Today, it is less reticent than in decades past; more and more, it is visibly poised for global occupation. Let us now reconsider the renaissance to this age-old Leviathan by peering at its alarming, seditious reach and its omnipresent tentacles.

SECTION V: Rex Deus

BLOODLINES OF THE GRAIL

CHAPTER 54

THE JERUSALEM CHURCH

On the contrary, they saw that I had been entrusted with the task of preaching the gospel to the Gentiles, just as Peter had been to the Jews. For God, who was at work in the ministry of Peter as an apostle to the Jews, was also at work in my ministry to the Gentiles. James, Peter, and John, those reputed to be pillars, gave me and Barnabas the right hand of fellowship when they recognized the grace given to me. They agreed that we should go to the Gentiles, and they to the Jews.

—Galatians 2:7–10

How will the spurious religion swing about? This will not be a violent mutiny; surprisingly, it will be a bloodless coup.

One must reflect on the extraordinary role the mystical faction concealed within monotheism will play in the conversion. The numinous and explicitly Gnostic deviants of these polytheistic religions are, in fact, spurious moles long buried within monotheism and part of the veiled operatives of Rex Deus. The contemporary Genesis 6 Conspiracy sprang from within the early schisms of the Jerusalem church into Judaic, Pauline, and Gnostic/Essene Christianity.

The strategy to devalue Jesus will be simple and systematic. It will be led by the Gnostics and liberals within Christianity and by such clandestine groups as the Freemasons, the Illuminati, Rex Deus, the Rosicrucians, and the Priory of Sion. The devaluing of Jesus will be escorted by academic discovery and critical thought. Critics have already set the groundwork, even within the church, by denying the virgin birth and godliness of Jesus, that He did great miracles, or that He rose from the grave. This propaganda has been liberally distributed throughout the media, schools, and even the churches, particularly with regard to the repugnant Jesus Seminars held in the nineties.

Incredibly, even within the church itself, proponents have denied the accuracy and reliability of the New Testament and have stated it should be interpreted allegorically, for it is inaccurate. All that is needed now is for the other foot to come down, for the world has been well prepared for deception. The other foot will drop in the form of discoveries that will suggest Jesus could not be God, the Son of God, or the Messiah but rather an enlightened prophet.

The ground for such deceptive revelations is already being tilled. Books abound with such titles such as Holy Blood, Holy Grail, and The Da Vinci Code and are covering such subjects as the Dead Sea Scrolls, Mary Magdalene, the Cathars, and the Essenes. All weave a consistent conspiracy formatted in a literary detective manner, as all search for the meaning of the secrets of history. They almost always are inclusive of the Knights Templar, the Merovingians, the Priory of Sion, Rex Deus, the Essenes, and Masonic connections. In all cases, the unaccountably identical conclusion is that these seemingly disconnected groups conceal shattering secrets for Christianity, as well as secrets from the seven spurious sciences. These organizations are not what they seem. In each of these historical detective adventures, a little more is revealed about the burden of evidence required to substantiate their heretical allegations. We will see more and more of these books published, each revealing a little more, thus preparing the public for what will ultimately shatter Christianity as we understand it today.

The first line of attack is always against segments of the New Testament. The literal application is always denied in favor of an allegorical interpretation, ranging from the New Testament actually being a book centered on astrology to Jesus being a zealot at the heart of the Jewish rebellion. Additionally, the New Testament is transformed into a radical vehicle to communicate Jesus' rebellious conspiracies through the code of Peshur (occultist Legominism). Jesus is summarily relegated to a prominent member of the Essene segment of Jewish society, with Essenes viewed as the forbearers of Christianity, who surreptitiously protected the dynastic ancestors of the Royal Davidic Bloodline.

The Qumran community was the radical segment of the Essene sect; they lived a puritan, monastic lifestyle on the edges of the Dead Sea.[1] This radical Essene sect was led by the Teacher of Righteousness, who allegedly received revelations of hidden things encrypted into Scripture that could only be deciphered through a special Peshur.[2]

Essenes were generally assumed by these revisionist authors to be indigenous, Judaic Gnostics and Theosophists and the alleged controlling authority over the early church centered in Jerusalem, which was led by James the Just, brother of Jesus. Theosophists, too, falsely claim James was an Essene. The larger Essene community was generally perceived to be a sizeable religious sect of Judea that lived in communal villages and were heavily influenced by apocalyptic inspiration. What is not commonly known or understood is that the Essenes are revered by the Christian Gnostics as a mystical branch of Judaism. They are considered inheritors to the Davidic dynasty, complete with the ancient knowledge of Solomon and Moses brought out of Egypt, wisdom that was memorialized as mysticism, or the Mysteries of Hermes. Gnostics believe Moses and Solomon were important historical Adepts of the Mysteries. Freemasons and Gnostic sects consider Solomon to be the mightiest magician of his age; these surreptitious skills complimented his wisdom and judgment. Mystic sects conclude Solomon was a significant sorcerer king in the Ring Lord tradition,[3] and in Arthurian/Merlin literature, Solomon was regarded as the wisest sage of all time.[4]

The Testament of Solomon from the Dead Sea Scrolls claims Solomon knew how to control demons and forced demons into helping construct the first temple. The scrolls further testify that plagues caused by demons, jackals, owls, and Liliths could be lifted by invoking the names of David or Solomon.[5] Josephus, too, noted of Solomon:

> God granted him knowledge of the art used against demons for the benefit and healing of men. Solomon additionally composed incantations by which illnesses were relieved; he left behind forms of exorcisms with which those possessed by demons were driven out, never to return.[6]

Arabian poets named Solomon “Suleiman,”[7] a great king and wise judge, along with David, who carried out the ways of Allah. The great Ottoman conqueror and lawgiver Suleiman the Magnificent saw himself as the second Solomon.[8] But what does the Qur’an say about Solomon, the alleged sorcerer and magician? Solomon was tested greatly as to his faith with a degenerative disease that reduced him to a skeleton on the throne.[9] Solomon then prayed to be granted more power and more wisdom than any man ever had before. Solomon’s prayer was answered, and he received great wisdom, great knowledge, and power over the wind; power over every kind of builder; and power over beings recorded as the Jinn.[10] The Jinn worked under Solomon’s control to build anything he chose;[11] one concludes that his building projects included the temple.

Because of all this, the Qur’an notes that many of Israel followed the evil ones (the polytheist Essenes of Enochian mysticism), who fabricated lies about Solomon and his purported mastery over black magic. The revelations of Gabriel go on to say that the evil ones who fabricated lies about Solomon were the evil ones who also taught witchcraft from Babylon.[12]

The second line of slander usually attacks Jesus and segments of the New Testament accredited to Paul’s authorship, from which the Christian church takes most of its new covenant doctrine. Paul is classified as the Evil Liar or the Heretic, stemming from the Dead Sea Scrolls concerning the Essenes and the Teacher of Righteousness, described as the “Spouter of Lies” and the “Unscrupulous Liar”[13] of the early church. Paul is described as the one who corrupted the religion of the early church centered in Jerusalem, along with doctrines taught by the Gnostic Teacher of Righteousness. In fact, Mandaeans and Manicheans believed Paul was a false prophet, who led his disciples away from the true religion; they believed Paul’s false religion was not based on the true teachings of John the Baptist (and the mentor of Jesus), who they believed.[14]

The Jerusalem church led by James is portrayed to be the mystical Essene religion. Gnostics assert that it was Paul who besmirched the teachings of Jesus with his so-called heretical doctrines, which took root after the demise of the Jerusalem church in 70 C.E., when the church center was transferred to Rome, under Roman influence and Pauline doctrine. In fact, in 318 C.E., according to Gnostic sources, a delegation of Jesus' immediate descendants, the Desposyni, traveled to Rome to argue the church should be transferred back to Jerusalem, back to its mystic roots, but Constantine refused. So, too, do Gnostic writers remember Mary Magdalene and her heirs opposing the Roman apostolic succession of Peter, in favor of James and the Jerusalem church.[15] In this tradition, Mary Magdalene was an Essene priestess who married Jesus.

Under this guise, Masonic and Gnostic writers refer to Paul as the Liar; the Heretic; and the enemy of Jesus' brother, James the Just, who supposedly was one of the Teachers of Righteousness portrayed in the Dead Sea Scrolls. What the Gnostics are endeavoring to accomplish is to ascertain that it was Paul who proclaimed the divinity of Jesus and not Jesus or any of the disciples who formed the early Jerusalem church, that Paul stood alone in this assertion. Gnostics believe that the deviant Pauline sect maliciously elevated Jesus to deity status and that those who are loyal to the Vatican are heretics.[16] The elevation of Jesus to deity is said to have taken place after the crucifixion by his corrupted followers from the Pauline sect. The Gnostics believe Jesus did not come to sacrifice Himself as the Lamb of God for the sins of the world. They assert that Jesus was sent to humankind as an enlightened, spiritual guide, in the same ideology as Buddha and Mohammed, to teach humankind enlightened secrets, aiding us in our evolution to godhood.

These Gnostic teachings of enlightenment are referred to as “the Way,” just as Jesus said he was the way and the truth.[17] Gnostics believe Jesus possessed the spark of the divine that permitted him to instruct others on the path to enlightenment (the Way).[18] This is a devious doctrine, just as Daoism/Taoism means “the Way” and the teaching of Hermes and Sabaism is “the Way of Hermes.”[19] Be careful, though. The Way of Jesus is diametrically opposite to the Way of Tao or of Hermes or of Theosophy or of Freemasonry. The Way of Jesus leads you to God, while the spurious way is the way of Cain, that of alchemy, Rosicrucianism, and Freemasonry, and the way of the future Antichrist.

Alchemy first surfaced in China, India, and Egypt.[20] Taoism is the oldest form of philosophy in China,[21] neatly knitting together mystical threads gathered from primeval epochs. Alchemy developed Taoist meditation, Chinese medicine, and internal martial arts like Tai Chi.[22] Taoism is one of China's three great religions, along with Confucianism and Buddhism,[23] to which Daoism has fused more and more since the fifteenth century C.E.[24] Lu Xun, a modern literary giant in China, views Daoism as the source to Chinese culture, while Chinese historians regard Daoism as the only religion indigenous to China that developed out of early traditions.[25] However, Tao/ Dao is conceded by Western historians to be Babylonian mysticism and Brahmanism, in which it is rooted.[26]

Dao doctrine is anchored in the writings from the many celestial books of the immortals Ying and Yang and the ancient, mystic sages with their occultic techniques and practices, including astrology, medicine, numerology, logicianism, metallurgy, astronomy, philosophy, and of course, alchemy.[27] The Hsin-Hsin Ming describes a perfect essence, the Tao, which is the matrix/ blueprint of all creation.[28] Ancient Taoist tradition holds that a very tall (giant) and learned race, the Sons of Reflected Light, arrived in China from across the sea and taught arts and crafts.[29] Tribes were organized under powerful heroes who continued to worship their dead spirits and heroes alongside the immortals.[30] Three sage kings were established, who introduced a philosophy later written down into the Tao-The-Ching.[31]

This learned race likely dispatched the famous seven sages of Egypt, Central America, and India, who were believed to have come from Mu and Atlantis. This knowledge and philosophy was passed down through selected erudite families, until it was united with the Taoists,[32] just as we will learn that Rex Deus did the same. In the late Han Dynasty, and by the third century C.E., the Five Bushels sect became the official lineage of the celestial masters and was passed down through specific families until 1969.[33] Taoism is another religion of Enoch; it will be reunited with its religious kin in the last days.

Continuing, Gnostics assert the Jerusalem church was merely an offshoot of Judaism, not a new, Christian religion as Pauline disciples allegedly assert, and that the Jerusalem church taught and celebrated Jesus as an enlightened prophet/master, not God or the Christ or the Messiah.

Gnostics believe Jesus and the Jerusalem church were fixated with the pursuit of enlightened knowledge, gnosis, or the Way. Gnostics contend this mystic derivative of Judaism was, in truth, the Gnostic Order of the Essenes.

The fact of the matter is, however, that James and the early Jerusalem church promoted a sectarian form of Judaism that was not unlike the Essenes, who were also Ascetics and Nazrites in their approach.[34] But Christians and Essenes were, of course, separate and distinct movements. Gnosticism of this era was believed developed through a Coptic Christian tradition in Egypt, which saw it descending from early Jewish Christianity, where James was a very important figure.[35] In fact, the most important Gnostic sect was the Basilidians of Egypt that adopted the Pythagorean philosophy and its unique doctrine of numerology. Remember, Freemasonry and Templarism also adopted Pythagorean philosophy and the Basilidian system of religion as their moral and philosophical bases.[36]

The Judaism of the Essenes, the rabbis (Pharisees and Sadducees), and James all overlapped in their Judaic religious circles, but the centers of those circles certainly never overlapped, for each sects had separate and distinct spiritual centers.[37] Even so, the Sanhedrin was made up of seventy of the Princes of Priests, the heads of the twenty-four lines descended from Aaron and Moses, which presumably included all three Judaic factions,[38] but excluded the newly formed Christian movement.

The Pharisees were akin to the Greek Stoics in many aspects. They believed the soul was part of the Divine Spirit, which was released from its bodily prison upon death to rejoin the Divine Spirit; whereas impious souls went directly to a dark and terrifying cave for everlasting punishment. Pharisees did not believe in the judgment or the last days but were followers of fate, where all things occurred by God’s Providence, and thus faith dictated all actions. Pharisees were more concerned with teaching the Torah in the synagogues than making the daily sacrifices. Josephus and the Pharisees viewed the Sadducees as lacking in true faith and as traitors who welcomed the Romans.[39]

Nonetheless, the Sadducees were priests who committed to the daily sacrifices. Josephus rejected the approach of the Sadducees, who concentrated on a spartan observance of the Law and who had little consideration for fate and afterlife, for they did not believe in a heaven or hell. They did not believe that God was interested in whether humans did evil or good, nor were they receptive to the notion of a coming Messiah to overturn their comfortable world. The Sadducees, according to Josephus, viewed the Pharisees as religious maniacs, even though the distinctions between the two factions were blurred.[40] The main difference in the sects seems to have been the question of whether there is to be a physical resurrection or not.

Conversely, the Jerusalem church members did not view themselves as Christians but rather as Jews who followed in the footsteps of the Jewish Messiah, according to Hershel Shanks. They did, however, follow a strict Judaic code when it came to the Law and the manner in which they lived their daily lives. The Jerusalem church was regarded as the Nazarene sect of Judaism,[41] but in the spirit of biblical application and not the mystic application the Essenes followed.

On the other hand, the Essenes were Jewish monks who rejoiced in the arid dwellings of the desert. They shunned women, gave up wine, shared their possessions, and were a faction that Josephus admired in many ways. Essenes, according to Josephus, were gifted in prophecy and subsequently were big believers in fate—that fate governed all things. However, Josephus concluded the Essene sect was distorted with apocalyptic machinations; nor did he share the Essene fascination with angels and demons.[42] I agree with Hershel Shanks, who states that the importance of Jesus' family and their early church leadership has been incredibly overshadowed, along with Christianity's important, originating Jewish roots, by the Gentile branch of Pauline and Peterine Christianity, which inherited the transplanted Roman Christian church. Even today, the Armenian church recognizes James as the patron of their Christian sect.[43]

Gnostics contend vehemently that Paul's heretical doctrines gained in prominence only after the downfall of the Jerusalem church, when the Romans destroyed Jerusalem in 70 C.E., culminating in the institutionalization of Pauline Christianity through the Roman church and Constantine just after 300 C.E. Christians tend to view their church as descending from the Gentile branch of the church that included Paul and Peter as their main patriarchs and not from the Jerusalem church led by James, which withered after the destruction of Jerusalem. The Roman church became primarily the church of Peter and Paul, even though John and James were constitutive players, along with Peter and Paul, in the early Jerusalem church.[44] Gnostics contend then, the Roman church in an endeavor to suppress the truth has persecuted Gnostics and the truth ever since.

James, the first bishop of the early Jerusalem church, however, was not an enemy of Paul, or vice versa; Paul's Gentile doctrines worked in harmony with the Jerusalem church. Paul and James and their sects of Gentiles and Jews were not adversaries, as Gnostics would claim; James effectively mediated the two sects of Christianity, which had an everlasting effect.[45]

The Oxford Dictionary notes Gnostics were a heretical sect among early Christians that claimed to possess superior knowledge, interpreting sacred writings through mystical philosophy.[46] The Essenes were the mysterious Gnostic people and sect that wrote the Dead Sea Scrolls. They thought of themselves as the Sons of Zadok, also known as the Sons of Righteousness. Moreover, the Dead Sea Scrolls testify to the fact that the Sons of Zadok became the community at Qumran; they were also known by other appellations, including the Sons of the Dawn and the Righteous Seed. Masonic authors Richard Leigh and Michael Baigent brought forth these alternate names—after their writing of The Holy Blood and the Holy Grail and, as noted by Hopkins, Simmons, and Wallace-Murphy, then underscored by Knight and Lomas—from Rex Deus families preserving their bloodlines. The Sons of Zadok is a puzzling Hebrew/Aramaic title identifying the descendants of a priestly lineage, which later became branded as Rex Deus sometime after the fall of the temple in 70 C.E.[47] This of course, was the founding organization of the European Rex Deus bloodline.

There is always an underlying assertion that Jesus was at the center of the Jewish rebellion because he was the inheritor of the Davidic bloodline, possessing the righteous claim to the Judean throne. The demystification of Jesus is supported by a very elaborate conspiracy inserted into the Jerusalem church, which weaves its way throughout C.E. history, whereby the Keepers of the Secrets valiantly guard secrets and the evidence thereof for fear of the wrath of the Mother Church (Catholicism). Gnostics support their conspiracy for secrecy by recalling genocides the church waged upon the early Gnostic sects of Mandaleans, Cathars, Templars, and other Gnostic groups, particularly through the infamous Inquisition.

CHAPTER 55

SEX, LIES, AND FAIRY TALES

And if Christ has not been raised, our preaching is useless, and so is your faith. More than that, we are then found to be false witnesses about God, for we have testified that he raised Christ from the dead.

—1 Corinthians 15:14–15

What is the civilization-shattering secret Rex Deus apparently protects?

As Rex Deus's theory goes, Jesus was removed from the cross still alive. Gnostics proclaim that Jesus then married Mary Magdalene, and they begat at least two children.

Mary allegedly scuttled one child to France, and he settled in the area of Rennes Le Chateau, home of the Cathars, Merovingians, Essenes, Alains, Rex Deus, and Templars, the rebellious epicenter most of the heretical, investigative books mark as their start point. The other son was believed to have migrated to England, with Joseph of Arimathea. It is for these reasons the ultra-secret Priory of Sion then refers to Mary Magdalene by many pseudonyms, such as "the Chalice," "the Holy Grail," and "the Rose."[1]

In the 1890s, Father Sauniere purportedly discovered Cathar documents consecrated to Mary Magdalene in Visigoth ruins, encoded Priory of Sion secrets containing two astonishing genealogies chronicling the survival to the Merovingian bloodlines. Sauniere became unaccountably wealthy thereafter, inexplicably building the Tower of Magdalene and erecting a statue of Asmodeus, the demon custodian of secrets and guardian of hidden treasures.[2]

Jesus' two sons are thought to be the source bloodlines for the Arthurian kings and the Merovingian kings. All of these Gnostic groups, also known as the Albi-Gens, found imaginative methods within the innocent and pastoral confines of legend and mythological literature, including the fairy tale concept, to preserve the even more ancient Ring Lord culture and Grail bloodlines. The Roman Mother Church was perpetually allegorized as an evil stepmother, witch, or impious potentate. The estranged princes and princesses represented the Grail/Ring bloodlines, with the key message of appreciation for the perpetuity of the San Greal/Holy Grail.[3]

Secrets to the bloodlines have been kept alive in such classic writings and legends as Robin Hood, the Holy Grail, Arthurian legends, fairy tales, and of course, the popular Lord of the Rings legends. This chapter and the ones that follow will provide evidence revealing a seemingly unified and determined effort to encode the genealogy of the allegedly combined Jesus and Nephilim bloodlines within some of the most famous pieces of children's and adult literature as a testimony to the validity of those bloodlines and with the hopes that someday the alleged descendant of Jesus will eventually regain the crown of a major European nation, and later, all Europe.

As Laurence Gardner puts it, all Grail and Ring lore; Arthurian tales; Robin Hood; the mythology of Dracula; and fairy tales, including such tales as Cinderella, Sleeping Beauty, Peter Pan, and others, stem from a common historical base and are all ingrained in the culture of the Ring Lords.[4] Even the Grimm fairy tales, authored by Wilhelm Grimm and Jacob Ludwig, are pantheistic, antiquarian mythologies integrated into the German context and folklore, all designed to advance Volkishe ideology[5] that ultimately served the sinister objectives of Hitler and his pantheistic reign of terror.

Gardner goes on to write that Ring and Grail quests, in essence, are the same, and they include Tolkien's modern variation that includes fairies, elves, and magic. The Ring Quest is merely a parallel Grail quest. Tales of fairies, sprites, gnomes, elves, and all like beings questing for treasures at the foot of the rainbow and just as famous quests in antiquity for the Golden Fleece, the Emerald Tablets, and the Tables of Destiny are all the same figurative quest[6] or mythos.

Dan Brown writes that tales about Gawain, the Green Knight, King Arthur, and Sleeping Beauty are all Grail allegories.[7] He further notes that Victor Hugo's classic The Hunchback of Notre Dame and Mozart's Magic Flute are both Grail allegories brimming with Masonic and Egyptian symbols;[8] Magic Flute was a fairy tale plot.[9] Brown writes that Wagner's Parsifal was a tribute to Mary Magdalene and that Richard Wagner, Mozart, Beethoven, Shakespeare, Gershwin, Houdini, and Walt Disney were all Freemasons. In addition, Brown adds that Walt Disney and his corporation have endeavored to keep the Grail legends alive through animated productions such as Cinderella, Sleeping Beauty, Snow White, the Lion King, and The Little Mermaid, just to name a few. All are overflowing with mystical, religious allegories and imagery.[10] In addition, Mark Booth writes that Lewis's Narnia Tales are steeped in Rosicrucian lore, while works by Rebelais, Nostradamas, Shakespeare, Wagner, and Bach are saturated with green language (Legominism), encryptions, and wisdom.[11]

The renowned Merry Men of Sherwood Forest were symbolic of Mary's men (Magdalene), for they served as protectors of the bloodline and its conspiracy of secrecy, guarding the secrets of Jesus and His son's genealogy through Jesus' marriage to Mary. Robin, of course, represented the male inheritance of the royal bloodline in exile, while Maid Marion symbolized Mary Magdalene and their secret marriage. King John and the scurrilous sheriff of Nottingham symbolized the usurping of the holy throne by the Roman Church and its sanctioned monarchies from the rightful heirs. The throne of England in Rex Deus legend is the existing, reigning throne of David.[12]

The book Rosslyn documents that Gnostic Cathar refugees, gypsies, Rex Deus, and all Gnostic-based organizations were all linked and symbolized in the Robin Hood lore, represented by the varied Merry Men of Sherwood.[13] Robin Hood tales were originally banned in Europe, for they mocked the accepted theology for both church and state of that time, while secreting within their conspiratal allegories at their heart the so-called truth to the true, dynastic bloodline of Jesus. In fact, the Presbyterian parliament of Scotland in 1555 banned Robin Hood from being performed; it was particularly perplexed at the performing of Robin Hood at Rosslyn Castle.[14]

This is why Robin Hood tales found popularity among Rex Deus families of the Sinclairs and the Stuarts.[15] In fact, Templar historian Steven Sora notes the Sinclair clans were known protectors of the gypsies; the gypsies would migrate to Rosslyn and play out stories of Robin Hood and the May Queen.[16]

Similarly, Holy Grail legends contain the same secrets encrypted into their lore. Grail romances from the twelfth century were a product of the Crusades (the Templars and Rex Deus), where Judeo-Christian material was grafted onto paganistic/Gnostic Grail lore. Baigent and Leigh write that the Grail romances grafted primitive magic from Grail lore (that we will come to learn later as Dragon Sarmatian lore), alongside Hermetic themes and allegories, onto Christian material.[17] Grail legends do not hold the superficial meaning most have become accustomed to, where Joseph of Arimathea collected the holy blood of Jesus as He was being crucified into a chalice or goblet.

Some believe the Templar cult (Rex Deus) authored the Grail romances, because the Templars appear throughout the Grail legends.[18] In fact, in the version authored by Wolfram Eschenbach, the Grail is protected by Templars.[19] It is thought that Wolfram knew exactly who the Templars really were, as witnessed by his poem Titurel, The Keepers of the Message.[20] Certainly, the famous Grail author of the twelfth century, Chrétien Des Troyes, who wrote Le Conte Del Graal, wrote directly from Templar influence and from within the Templar environment, according to Gardner, for Chretien closely communicated with the Templars, sharing significant associations with the order.[21]

In its originating Gnostic tradition, the Holy Grail held two distinct allegories, but both mean quite the same thing. Masonic authors conclude the Grail was symbolic for Jesus' children, the royal bloodline.[22] The second allegory was a variation on the name Holy Grail, originally known as sangraal, or "holy or royal chalice." The variant spelling is sangreal, meaning "holy or royal blood." Later authors then split sangreal from its more ancient rendition into two words: San Greal.[23] According to Masonic writers, Grail legends were convenient vehicles of literature to conceal and keep the records of the separation of Jesus' sons, as well as the continuation of the bloodline. In this line of thought, Perceval, a descendant of Joseph of Arimathea,[24] was a priest king of an ideal kingdom (Atlantis), over which he reigned in secrecy. Perceval's son, Lohengrin, became the Swan Knight,[25] who was, and is, an important allegory in Grail, Templar, Gnostic, and pantheistic religious dogma.

The Holy Grail further represented an alternative apostolic succession to the pope of Rome. Joseph of Arimathea, according to Rex Deus lore, was the rightful successor to the Jerusalem church, not Peter, as asserted by Pauline Catholicism. Joseph was believed to be the guardian for the Grail children, as appointed by Jesus.[26] Now, understand that in Grail mythology, Joseph of Arimathea is thought to actually be "James the Just" in disguise.

Grail bloodlines seem to have been kept secret through two organizations elemental to the contemporary Genesis 6 Conspiracy: Rex Deus and the Priory of Sion. Both of these most secret of secretive organizations include members from many of the most famous families in Europe: the Hapsburgs, the Sinclairs, the Stuarts, and many more that are keys to Grail bloodlines. Gnostics, and in particular Rex Deus and their genitive groups, seem to be indicating they have so-called irrefutable evidence supporting their claims to the veracity of Grail bloodlines that would, if true and made public, depose Pauline Christianity, reinstating Essene (Gnostic) Christianity, just as they perceive the Jerusalem church practiced. This, then, sets up the end game to the spurious belief that true Christianity is a mystical religion rooted to Judaic mysticism, which, in turn, owes its beginning to Moses, who learned the secret arts in Egypt and exported these secrets and religious beliefs to Israel, which Judaism is founded upon. Therefore, if Judaism originated in mysticism, from the alleged mystical Adept Moses, then, Judaism's offshoot religions of Christianity and Islam originate in mystical doctrines too.

In Gnostic, revisionist history, Moses is the infamous Pharaoh Akenhaten, also known as Amenhotep IV. Akenhaten was acknowledged to have been born in 1396 B.C.E. He was the son of Amenhotep III, the Pharaoh who ordered the killing of all male children (perhaps the abomination that inspired Moses to do the same to Egypt).[27]

What seems more likely to me is that Akenhaten was the son of, or a descendant thereof, of the pharaoh who oversaw the Exodus, for this assertion aligns itself very well chronologically, when applying biblical chronology that dates the Exodus between 1450 and 1500 B.C.E. Further, the destruction of Santorini in the Mediterranean occurred circa 1450 B.C.E. and is readily drafted today as the genesis for the Exodus plagues levied against the Egyptians. But Akenhaten was not Moses, as the Gnostics proclaim.

Mystical legends propose that either Hermes or Abraham, or both, brought mysticism to Egypt, depending on which legend you prefer to put your faith in. Abraham supposedly learned mysticism from Nimrod and Melchizedek, and likely Hermes, as well.[28] This line of thought then links all the world religions neatly into one source, mysticism at Babel, and in particular links Christians, Muslims, and Judaism in to it, when Jesus has successfully been devalued to prophet status, all with the intent to reunite the world under the one so-called true religion of enlightenment.

All this will take place under the cover fire of many other deceptions. One can expect a convergence of signs and wonders displayed in all kinds of evil, all working with the same common goal. Expect the alien phenomena to be part of this conspiracy, supported by great astrological signs (warnings) of stars and planets,[29] for this is what the term signs actually refers to. Collectively with the Mary cult, which will soon explode with its signs and warnings onto the global stage, and the Gnostic exposition of Jesus faking the Resurrection, the world is already primed for the fall of Pauline Christianity and the rise of the spurious world religion of old.

This will be a transformation of positive enlightenment, not a tumultuous revolution entrenched in violence. All avenues of human thought will converge together when Pauline Christianity falls. This will not be a tortuous affair for the world, save for the nay-saying saints. It will be a process that will seem so right, so positive, so enlightened, and so futuristic that the world will willingly unite under one religion and one government, eager to enhance their role at the table of galactic species. The world will be delirious with the thought of creating heaven on earth.

Do not expect a violent coup d’état, enslaving the world under oppressive tyranny. The world’s population will herald the coming of the Antichrist with all the excitement for and hope of establishing heaven on earth. Remember as the false Christ, he will not be deemed to be pure evil but pure goodness. He will be, in the minds of the masses, the long-awaited Messiah, the hope of humankind. Eve did not reach to drink from the cup of Abominations from the evil hand of the Tree of Knowledge, but rather, she reached to eat the delicious fruit from the outstretched good hand, to learn knowledge and be like God. Evil comes with the good in all choices of independence.

Should all this not be enough, spurious forces will arrange the ultimate deception that will convince even the most cynical of the claims. The Antichrist, with the full support of Satan and all his powers, will recreate the resurrection from death of the Antichrist: "… one of the heads of the beast seemed to have a fatal wound, but the fatal wound had been healed" (Rev. 13:3). The false messiah will create the illusion of death; will be martyred like Jesus (which for my money is unlikely); or will fall to assassination by either a Christian zealot or a controlled, in-house conspiracy, and then he will be miraculously raised from the dead in a false resurrection. I would not be surprised if the horror-stricken Christians will be the ones who will endeavor to spare the world from the beast and his evil by engineering the assassination plot themselves. This, then, will resolutely convict the Christian zealots, in the popular view of world opinion, as fanatical foes of the World Order, incapable of ascending to a higher plane of existence.

It is under this veil of euphoric optimism that we must now look when we consider the diverse forces that are eagerly engineering an effective environment to assist humankind in its long-awaited, transitional leap into a higher plain of existence. Just as the forces of rebellion have always been at play, even since the dawn of the Adamites, so they are still at work today, with roots that clearly reach back to the Tree of Knowledge, Adam, and Eve. To this conclusion, then, we must diligently disassemble all the intricate geo-political knitting at work today, which is all neatly crocheted to the geo-economic organization and includes all of the handiwork the information age lends to this cause, while patching all the disparate, spurious branches together with one religious stitching.

CHAPTER 56

THE KNIGHTS TEMPLAR

The coming of the lawless one will be in accordance with the work of Satan displayed in all kinds of counterfeit miracles, signs and wonders, and in every sort of evil that deceives those who are perishing. They perish because they refused to love the truth and so be saved. For this reason God sends them a powerful delusion so that they will believe the lie and so that all will be condemned who have not believed the truth but have delighted in wickedness.

—2 Thessalonians 2:9–12

Masonic legacies have inseparably linked themselves to far-off times, without adequate explanation, through the Knights Templar and the shadowy Priory of Sion.

How were Masons and Templars linked to the deviant Gnostic Christian offshoot?

How was the disingenuous Templar founding connected to the little known Masons, who predate Freemasonry?

Mason enclaves were nurturing havens for refugee Gnostics and Rex Deus. Craft legends recorded Masons participating disproportionately in the Crusades[1] compared to other European aristocracy. There can be little doubt Masonic agenda was quite different than the balance of participating Christendom. In 1096, Pope Urban II decreed the first Crusade because Muslims continually assaulted Christian pilgrims.[2] Masonic interests, though, were firmly focused on reclaiming Jerusalem for themselves and plundering away any temple treasure they could pillage.

Once the Christian Crusaders retook Jerusalem, an unanticipated, new order, sponsored by Mason/Rex Deus organizations, was unaccountably ordained by Papal Bull. This order was, of course, the Knights Templar, which originally consisted of nine founding members from European aristocracy; although, Rex Deus records indicate there were eleven. The original nine were not the poor, impoverished monks revisionist history would have us believe. All nine, or eleven, derived from important, royal Flemish and French families.[3]

Templar historians noted the order was opportunistically created as a ruse to protect Christian pilgrims as they journeyed to Jerusalem; this was an effective cover for the secretive Rex Deus (Masons/Essenes) and the Priory of Sion and their real mission at Jerusalem.[4] Note, however, the Priory of Sion was the true power behind the Templars[5] and their occultist agenda.

Rome had already charged another order, the Knights of St. John, with the responsibility for the protection of pilgrims.[6] Thus, the Templar order was cloaked under the guise of protecting pilgrims, allowing them to excavate without oversight for secret documents and knowledge hidden beneath the temple ruins.[7] With all this in mind, then, we are compelled to query: Who is this mysterious Masonic Order of Sion/Priory of Sion? What was their true agenda for creating the Knights Templar? In 1975, at Paris's Bibliotheque Nationale, parchments were discovered that became notorious as the Les Dossier Secrets that identified numerous members of an ultra-secret brotherhood, the Priory of Sion.[8]

The Priory of Sion, according Steven Sora, is a secret organization existing today that is over 1,000 years old; it has existed under several names during its life.[9] According to Templar author Jean Markale, the Priory of Sion is thought in many circles to be an ancient order that played a significant role in shaping history.[10] Brown notes the Priory of Sion was founded in 1099 as a secret society by King Godefrois de Bouillon after conquering Jerusalem. The Les Dossier Secrets listed many famous people from history as past Grand Masters leading this organization. These included such luminaries as Leonardo Da Vinci, Victor Hugo, Robert Fludd, Robert Boyle, and Isaac Newton, to name a few.[11] The Priory is thought to be a secret society protecting ancient, secret knowledge and documents, which they intend to reveal to the world at some specific point in the future. De Bouillon is thought to have created this secret brotherhood because he feared the powerful secret his family had held since the time of Jesus would be lost.[12] The Priory of Sion is believed to hold the genealogies of Jesus' descendants that would, if revealed to the world, threaten Christianity as we know it today.[13]

One must note for the record, though, to date, no so-called bona fide, historical evidence has surfaced to support the suspicion that the Priory of Sion ever existed, but this so-called lack of evidence seems to be misdirection to me by powerful Rex Deus families. Additionally, Plantard, the last known Grand Master of the Priory[14] has admitted to creating and planting the Les Dossier Secrets forgery. However, as noted by Gnostic writers (and seemingly from inside information), Plantard resigned from the Priory in 1984, due to the Les Dossier Secrets controversy, so his admission to creating forgeries was, in my opinion, misdirection and perhaps an endeavor to save his life. There appears to exist a disproportionate quantity of Masonic and Gnostic patronage endorsing the authenticity of the Priory of Sion and its history that make it difficult to discount its existence. To this end, Sylvia Browne also admits that there seem to be many accurate details and truths in the forgeries, leading one to ask: where did Plantard get his information?[15] One wonders whether or not disinformation is now at work with regard to Plantard and the Priory.

The objective of this secret society has been to nurture and protect these alleged bloodlines of Jesus, those few members of the Merovingian bloodline who have survived into our age.[16] Steven Sora believes the Knights Templar were organized to conceal the true motives of the Order of Sion, for their true motive was to reestablish the kingship of Jerusalem with French bloodlines descending from Jesus and Mary Magdalene.[17] The

Templars were, therefore, known as the Guardian Princes of the Royal Secret.[18]

Gardner further added that the main objective to the newly sanctioned Templar order was to excavate and retrieve the Templar Treasures,[19] the knowledge and treasures of the Essenes, Solomon, Moses, Egypt, Hermes, and the antediluvians. DeBouillon met with Calabrian monks to revive the ancient Order of Sion and plot the establishment of the Templars. Calabrian monks were initiated into Pythagorean philosophy (Gnosticism). Thereafter, a conclave of Calabrians arrived in Jerusalem around 1090 C.E.[20] Gardner goes on to note that the Templars discovered surviving books from the Library of Alexandria, Essene works predating the life of Jesus, and a wealth of other treasures and knowledge.[21]

Brown confirms that the objective for the Templar order was to excavate the Jewish temple, all to find corroborating evidence from (Essene) documents confirming Godefrois's family secret,[22] reuniting this lost treasure with the Visigoth treasure already located in Languedoc.[23] Excavation discoveries purportedly contained secret documents hidden during the Jewish revolt of 66–70 C.E., which challenged both the Roman Church and the New Testament doctrines.[24] The location to these dissident documents was likely referred to in the copper scroll from the Visigoth king Alaric and his plunder of Rome in 410 C.E.[25]

According to Priory of Sion records, the temple organization was reestablished in 1099 C.E., in Jerusalem, and not necessarily created then. The elder organization was known as the Brothers of the Red Cross, which was the same emblem adopted by the Knights Templar, who then passed on this legacy to the Rosicrucians. The Brothers of the Red Cross was, of course, a Gnostic order originally established as the Sages of Light in Egypt by Ormus, known also as Ormessus, an Alexandrian allegedly converted by St. Mark. The Essenes were also supposedly connected with Ormus and his disciples until 1181 C.E. Markale testifies that the Brotherhood of the Red Cross was a fusion of the Essenes; the Johanites/Nazorenes; and Godfrois' group, the Priory of Sion.[26]

The Priory of Sion then established the Knights Templar as its own private and subversive military arm, under a veil of legitimacy and integrity, through an official Catholic-sponsored organization (with the help of St. Bernard), which became fully accepted and integrated into mainstream

Christianity. The Knights Templar, then, according to Markale, became an exoteric creation of an esoteric order, which was employed as a militia organization, subject in all respects to the Priory of Sion.[27] Note also that the Templar Knights wore white garments, like those worn by the Essenes, until 1146 C.E., when St. Bernard authorized Templars to don the Red Cross, as well.[28]

After the formation of the Templars, the Priory of Sion was thought to have merged into the Knights Templar, until the two orders split at the Cutting of the Elm in Gisors.[29] Even though the founding Templars, were considered Rex Deus, the guiding force behind the Templar creation, according to Marr, was sponsored by the shadowy Priory of Sion organization.[30] Through the Priory of Sion, the Templars were formidably funded in complete secrecy by various royal families of Europe, Rex Deus families. The Knights Templar, after all, were believed to be the official guardians of the Holy Grail,[31] the Shroud of Turin, and the Ark of the Covenant. Templars, according to Marshal, always crop up in Grail literature[32] and are believed by others to have been originally founded in the era of Arthur and Perceval as a cryptic Order of Grail Keepers.[33] Gardner wrote that the Templars were directly linked back to the Knights of the Round Table, the Sangreal Order of guardians for the Grail treasure and secrets.[34] This was the mystical Brotherhood of Great Heroes[35] that I will return to later. Lancelot of the Lake's heroic legacy later served as the archetype for the Knights Templar.[36]

I find it both intriguing and troubling to note that the origins of the Knights Templar lie with Arthur, Perceval, and the Holy Grail over 600 years before their order came to public view in the twelfth century, which, in turn, connects back even further to the Brotherhood of the Red Cross. Paul Naudon wrote that the early Templar order abided by the rule of the Celtic Christian and Benedictine bishop from England, the famous St. Augustine, until 1128 C.E., when St. Bernard instituted an indelible new rule for the Templar order.[37]

Craft legends recorded the Templars from their beginning ventured into ongoing communications with other secret societies from the Middle East, from which they adopted many of their doctrines. Of these secret societies, the Druids, the Gnostic Essenes, and the Islamic Gnostic Assassins held the closest ties to the Freemasons,[38] all organizations that held inexplicable ties to the Templars. In fact, as early as 1129, Hugh De Payen, first Grandmaster of the Knights Templar, led 300 knights allied with the Assassins of Persia on a siege of the city of Damascus. David Hatcher Childress wrote that the Assassins had formal ties to the Templars and almost joined the order, but the Templars did not meet their objectives, whatever those objectives were. Furthermore, many of the latter Knights Templar were, in truth, Palestinian by birth, totally fluent in Arabic and thoroughly familiar with the Assassins.[39]

Assassin derived from the Arab word asas, meaning “guardians or guardian brothers.”[40] Almost all mystical groups ostensibly have an ancient name signifying either a watcher or a guardian of ancient knowledge. Assassins paid a tribute to the Templars through the twelfth century; although, the reasons for this are unknown today.[41] In 1198, Bernard the Treasurer recorded the leader of the Assassins inexplicably treated the Templars as if they were royalty,[42] but again, without explanation. Assassins served the Templars loyally as translators, interpreters, spies, ambassadors, and contract killers.[43]

Assassins were additionally remembered as great builders, adopting their organizational structure from the Pythagoreans and the Egyptians. Assassins wore white robes and practiced a form of solar worship just as the Essenes,[44] the Great White Brotherhood, and the Templars did.

The Assassins were part of a mystical, Muslim sect, the Ishmaelites, whose founding leader was the famous Aga Khan, descendant of Mohammed; modern-day followers of this sect reside in Pakistan, India, and East Africa.[45] Ishmaelites are made up of three sects: Karmates, Ismailis, and Assassins. The Karmates focused on reform, which eventually shook the Muslim, world, including Syria, Egypt, Persia, and India, leading to the Fatimid dynasty.[46] Previous to this, the Muslim prophet Mohammed’s daughter, Fatima, married Mohammed’s brother-in-law, Ali, which later established the Fatimid dynasty,[47] which dreamt of creating peaceful universalism in the world, under the doctrines of Amenhotep IV of the Armana dynasty,[48] who was known variantly as the infamous Pharaoh Akenhaten. The Fatimid dynasty also intentionally established a House of Wisdom that produced the initiate Hassan-I-Sabbah, who founded Hashishim, the Assassins.[49] Karmates thereafter organized themselves into professional guilds all containing hierarchal degrees and apprenticeship.

Karmates also introduced Hellenic, Neoplatonic, Hermetic, and Sabian dogma into Islam through esoteric initiations.[50]

The Templars appear to have adopted almost all of their organizational structure from the mystical Assassins, Karmates, and Ismailis. The Templars and the Benedictines also adopted much of the Arabic Mysteries and ancient knowledge. Arabs and mystical Muslims over centuries had developed alchemy into a synthesis of Egyptian, Chaldean, Jewish, and Hellenic practices before teaching this knowledge to the Europeans. According to Naudon, all this cryptic and ancient knowledge was then distributed throughout Europe via the Benedictine and Templar orders.[51]

It is from the Essenes Mackey believes the Templars adopted their heretical religion.[52] The Templars were not the Catholic Christian order they portrayed themselves to be. They were, in truth, a secret order of Gnostics, who based their religion on mysticism in the tradition of the mystic Assassins and Essenes. Templars placed their beliefs in what they viewed was the true church that taught mysticism and reincarnation, the church that was suppressed and persecuted by the Roman Catholic Church,[53] the religion known as Gnosticism.

From the mystic Assassins, the Templars modeled their own organization, even to the extent that the Islamic Assassins were a secret society outwardly practicing Islam but inwardly practicing mysticism and renouncing Islam. Templars also outwardly practiced Christianity but inwardly denounced it, preferring to worship the global pantheon under the religion of the Gnostics. According to Geoffrey Higgins, the Assassins and the Templars were identical.[54] The Assassins organization, then, was the clandestine, mystical organization brought back to Europe, which flourished under its new Christian disguise and in the protection of the Roman Church; these founding seeds eventually led to the Templar’s downfall as heretics.

In 1128, at the Council of Troyes, the Templars were granted the status of a Sovereign Order[55] and were adopted as the Holy Warriors of the Catholic Church,[56] whence they received enormous gifts from the great lords of Europe.[57] Templars were granted the right to retain all plunder pillaged from the Muslims under this edict, and they confiscated vast tracts of lands in Syria and Palestine until 1239 C.E.[58] Templar rise to power and prominence was swift; in 1139 C.E., Pope Innocent II granted the Templars international independence from any obligation to any authority other than himself.[59] This Papal Bull was prominently known as Omne Datum Optimim; it granted the Templar Order the unprecedented right to administer the law as the high justice in all the lands under its control. Templars were a law unto their own in the nations in which they resided. Templars subsequently administered high justice in Paris, under a great and legendary elm tree.[60] Elm trees are sacred in Gnosticism.

Omne Datum Optimum further enhanced Templar power through granting the Templar Order the ability to appoint its own priests and establish its own churches. This Papal Bull was reconfirmed in 1162 by Pope Alexander III. In 1188, Pope Gregory VIII declared the Templars did not have to bow to any bishop other than the pope; the Templars were then completely free from bishop oversight, authority, and inspections.[61] Because of the support from St. Bernard and the Papal blessings, which brought forth the generosity of the European royalty, Templar wealth overflowed, which then transformed the Templars into one of the greatest military, political, economic, and religious forces the world has ever known, and it happened in less than fifty years. Omne Datum Optimum granted the Templar Order extravagant privileges that modified and expanded the Council of Troyes edict in uncontrollable ways. From this point on, the order became an official initiatory entity, according to Markale.[62]

The Templars then converted their generous gifts by selling and exchanging them to acquire lands and buildings of their own choosing, which were strategically located near all the main arteries of commerce, thus making them necessary conduits between far-flung regions of Europe. These new lands were all located at strategic points, governing the economic, social, and political livelihood of all Europe.[63]

Within a decade of their return from Jerusalem, Templars became the most influential body the world has ever known. They established the first international banking network and became the financiers for most of the thrones of Europe.[64] At the pinnacle of Templar power, at the close of the thirteenth century, Templars owned more than one-third of Paris, according to Paul Naudon.[65] The central Templar bank was situated in the Paris Templar Temple, which became the center for French finances.[66]

By the middle of the twelfth century, the Templars had assembled considerable holdings in the Iberian Peninsula.[67] They established castles outside of Barcelona, at a place known as Montserrat, where legend has it that the Templars originally hid away the Holy Grail and the Ark of the Covenant. Interestingly enough, Montserrat was the location where the Gnostic Essenes/ Rex Deus settled in the early centuries before Christ, along with settling in yet another enigmatic area of southern France known as Catalunya. Catalunya was the district the Templars migrated to after they were outlawed from Portugal,[68] a region known as “the Razes” around Rennes Le Chateau. Not coincidentally, this region was in Septmania that was not subject to direct French sovereignty.[69] This was also the mythical and mysterious region settled in by Mary Magdalene and her Grail progeny.

The Gnostic Cathars, too, were strongly allied with the Knights Templar. Cathars resided in southern France around Catalunya, the very same region that the pre-Christian Essenes and the Knights Templar later settled. All were Gnostics who were united in common cause. Catharism was a blend of ancient earth worship, eastern mysticism, Gnosticism, and aspects of Christianity. Some refer to Catharism as “western Buddhism,” a powerful religion that would have spread to all of Europe if not for the Albigensian Crusade in 1209 sponsored by the Roman Church. And what should not come as any surprise is that Catalunya was the region where the mythical Merovingian Fisher Kings reigned.[70]

The Templars chose for their official emblem the Red Cross from the Gnostic/Essene Brotherhood of the Red Cross, the Order of Ormus, and the Sages of Light; whereas their sister order, the Gnostic Order of St. John, the Hospitallers, accepted the white cross as their emblem. The Templar Red Cross boldly flew as the official flag for Christopher Columbus’s first two vessels,[71] suggesting the Templars somehow helped fund Columbus’s historic discovery of the Americas, furthering the Templar agenda at the same time.

When Jerusalem fell back into the hands of Islam in 1188, the Priory of Sion officially split away from the Knights Templar at a famous, legendary event recorded as The Cutting of the Elm at Gisors in Normandy. The Priory held the Templars responsible for the loss of Jerusalem and further accused the Templars of falling into disfavor through greed, which the Priory charged was a complete betrayal of their mission laid out by Hugh De Payen at the creation of the Knights Templar. From this point on, the Priory of Sion and the Knights Templar separated into divergent organizations. The Cutting of the Elm was symbolic, for this official separation signified that each organization henceforth had distinct and independent agendas to pursue. The Priory then scurried underground and into complete secrecy. It is thought that it was because of this strained separation the Priory of Sion stood by in silence at the dismantling of the Knights Templar in 1307.[72]

Gisor, until that time, possessed a great elm tree that was famous for its size, age, and magnificence. The elm is of great allegorical significance in the Gnostic web of religious allegories, doctrines, and organizations, to which both the Priory of Sion and Knights Templar belonged. The French word for elm is orme, as in the Gnostic Ormus of Egypt. Ormus was tthe Gnostic St. Mark supposedly converted in Alexandria at the turn of the millennium. This was the Gnostic sect known variantly as Ormuzd, and Ahura-Mazda, of the ancient Persian Mazdean tradition[73] and Zoroastrianism, which all modern Gnostic, New Age, and Theosophist religions connect themselves back to in history. The Cutting of the Elm was just another unexplained event along the long road of The Genesis 6 Conspiracy.

In the early days after the suppression of the Knights Templar, any connection to the Templars would have been met with severe reprisals from all forces loyal to the Roman Catholic Church in all European nations, save one. Some surviving Templars sought refuge in sister organizations, such as the Knights of St. John, the Teutonic Knights, and others, but the powerful, along with the Templar wealth, all stowed away to Scotland, under the protection of the Sinclair family and Robert the Bruce.[74] Bruce was excommunicated by that time for murdering his rival to the throne in a Catholic Church.[75] Because of Bruce’s excommunication, his official recognition as King of Scotland by Rome did not come until pope John XXII lifted the excommunication in 1323,[76] long after the reestablishment in Scotland of the new Templar order, which was done in secrecy, under Scottish protection.

The Bruce clan was originally French, being known as “De Bruce.”[77] Lomas and Knight recorded that the Bruces were a Norman clan that was also Rex Deus.[78] Remember, as well, that Robert’s descendant James Bruce claimed to be a descendant of the Essenes, which were the originating Rex Deus cult. Through marriage, the Bruce clan gained a direct lineage from the McAlpin dynasty of kings that originated with the tribe of Scota and the kings of Dalriada and Tara of Ireland. This is why Bruce tried to unite the old kingdom of Ireland with Scotland when Bruce revolted against England.[79]

According to Steven Sora, both the Bruce and Sinclair families had Norse roots before becoming French,[80] having arrived in Normandy with the Norse incursions. The Bruce clan, according to Naudon, was indeed a Flemish family from Normandy, whose family maintained Templar membership throughout the generations.[81] Rollo was the Norseman who vanquished Normandy; William the Conqueror was his great, great, great grandson. The successful battle of Hastings by William the Conqueror put William's Rex Deus bloodline back on the English throne,[82] which his Norse brethren had lost about thirty years before.

The De Bruce family also had long and strong ties to the powerful Sinclair clan. Both were Norman families that gained large English tracts of land for supporting William the Conqueror in 1066.[83] In 1062, before the famous battle at Hastings, Norman knights first arrived in Scotland and Ireland; these knights included William the Seemley St. Clair, whose descendant Henri St. Clair was a battle partner with Hugh De Payen, one of the founders of the Knights Templar.[84] Norse invaders had previously signed a treaty in 911 C.E. with the French that ceded Normandy to the Norse—this agreement, the Treaty of Saint-Claire-Sur-Epte[85] is the origin of the Sinclairs' adopted name.

Both the Sinclairs and the Bruces later had a falling out with William the Conqueror and migrated north to Scotland, where they allied themselves to Malcolm III. Henri St. Clair became the first Earl of Rosslyn and founder of the Sinclair family dynasty that eventually built Rosslyn Chapel. The Sinclair clan later became the Grand Masters of the Freemasons of Scotland.[86] King Malcolm III of Scotland granted William St. Clair the lands at Rosslin and then made William's son, Henri, the Earl of Rosslin. Henri St. Clair took an active part in the first Crusades as part of the originating and founding Knights Templar.[87]

William Sinclair exemplified the power of his family through his deeds and titles. He was renowned as the Earl of Caithness, the last St. Claire Earl of Orkney, the Baron of Rosslyn, Chancellor and High Admiral of Scotland and Lord Sinclair.[88] The Sinclairs were remembered fondly as the last of the Norwegian Jarls.[89] William Sinclair of Rosslyn, Scotland, was believed, according to Templar authors, to have been a member of a secret society

(Rex Deus) that preserved important, ancient knowledge and also knowledge concerning the Holy Grail, the Holy Blood of the Merovingian dynasty, and information on the undiscovered continent across the Atlantic.[90] William Sinclair was both Rex Deus and a member of the Knights Templar.

CHAPTER 57

THE PRIORY OF SION

They make their tongues as sharp as a serpents; the poison of vipers is on their lips. Keep me O Lord, from the hands of the wicked; protect me from men of violence who plan to trip my feet. Proud men have hidden a snare for me; they have spread out the cords of their net and set up traps for me along my path…. do not grant the wicked their desires, O Lord, do not let their plans succeed or they will become proud.

—Psalm 140:2–8

Why were the Templars part of a greater secret society and movement that held wistful ambitions to restore the Merovingian dynasty to power?[1] Merovingians were legendary kings whose bloodlines (allegedly) originated back to Jesus.[2]

Who and what was the ultra-secret Priory of Sion?

David Hatcher Childress notes that the Sinclair clan became the Scottish guardians for the preservation of the Templar/Rex Deus/Priory of Sion/Gnostic dreams. The Scottish/Templar alliance began in 1128, when

Templar founder Hugh De Payen met with King David I of Scotland (no doubt at the instigation of one of the founding Templar Knights, Henri Sinclair) after the Council of Troyes and after which St. Bernard De Clairveaux (curiously and suspiciously) integrated Scotland’s Celtic Christian Church within the opulent (but secret) Gnostic Cistercian Order,[3] which also hid itself within Catholicism. When King David I ascended to the throne, the Celtic Christian Church was ailing financially, and the elders felt that it could best survive inside the protective wrap of St. Bernard’s wealthy, influential, and powerful Cistercian Order. The Cistercian Order was not attached to Rome, and for some reason, it was permitted by Rome to operate almost as a separate and autonomous arm at that time. Thus, all the abbeys of Scotland then became Cistercian Abbeys.[4]

Both King David I and his sister subsequently married into the Flemish House of Boulogne, the variant spelling used by authors denoting the House of Godefrois de Bouillon, the other driving founder of the Templars.[5] The David I family made further marriage covenants later with the Hughes De Payen family and other Crusader kings of Jerusalem.[6] More specifically, the Sinclairs held membership in both the Templar and Priory of Sion organizations; they were the inheritors of both treasures that included the genealogies that allegedly substantiated their clandestine kingship claims,[7] the San Greal.

One must peruse and investigate the curious list of Grand Masters, the leaders of the Priory brotherhood are listed below by descending dates as to their tenure, and as recorded in Les Dossier Secrets, to fully comprehend the unanticipated connections surreptitiously linking the Templars, Rex Deus, Priory of Sion, the Sinclairs, and the famous people of history who fostered the underground Gnostic movement:

Jean Gisors (1188–1220)
Marie De Saint-Claire (1220–1266)
Guillaume De Gisors (1266–1307)
Edouard De Bar (1307–1336)
Jeanne De Bar (1336–1351)
Jean De Saint-Claire (1352–1366)
Blance D’ Evereaux (1366–1398)
Nicolas Flamel (1398–1418)
J. Valentin Andrea (1637–1654)
Robert Boyle (1654–1691)
Rene D’Anjou (1418–1480)
Iolande De Bar (1480–1483)
Sandro Botticelli 1483–1510)
Leonardo Da Vinci (1510–1519)
Connetable De Bourbon (1519–1527)
Ferdinand De Gonzaque (1527–1575)
Louis De Nevers (1575–1595)
Robert Fludd (1595–1637)

Isaac Newton (1691–1727)
Charles Radclyffe (1727–1746)
Charles De Lorraine (1746–1780)
Maximillian De Lorraine (1780–1801)
Charles Nodier (1801–1844)
Victor Hugo (1844–1885)
Claude Debussy (1885–1918)
Jean Cocteau (1918–1963)

Pierre Plantard is thought to be the last known reigning Grand Master.[8] Note that this list of Grand Masters oddly does not date back to its founding in 1099.

The Gisors are the prominent Rex Deus clan from Normandy, where the Gnostic Cutting of the Elm ceremony occurred, which severed the direct ties between the Priory of Sion and the Templar Order in 1188. Jean De Gisor was likely present at the Cutting of the Elm as Lord of the Normandy fortress of Gisor,[9] and then he likely accepted his position at the head of the separated Priory at that point in time. The Templar Order then elected its own independent Grand Masters from that point forward. Jean was the grandfather to a later Priory Grand Master, Guillaume De Gisor, who was noted for transforming the Priory of Sion into Hermetic Freemasonry.[10] Jean also married into the Saint-Claire family, marrying the next Priory Grand Master, Marie De Saint-Claire.[11]

Edouard De Bar was the grandson of Edward II, king of England; he also married into the House of Lorraine. Edouarde was the grand nephew of Guillam De Gisor’s wife, Iolande De Bar. The De Bars are thought to have held high levels of Merovingian bloodlines. Jeanne De Bar was the elder sister to Edouarde and was regent of the Comte of Bar.[12] Iolande De Bar was the daughter to Rene D’Anjou and the first knight of Rene’s Order of the Crescent. Iolande was recognized as the Protectress of Lorraine, with her son, also named Rene, becoming the Duke of Lorraine, who was tutored by Georges Antoine Vespucci, a chief patron and sponsor of the painter Botticelli.[13]

Blanche D’ Evereaux was the daughter of King Navarre, who inherited the Comptes of Longueville and Evereaux located immediately adjacent to Gisors. Blanche later became the Countess of Gisors in 1359 C.E. She was a noted alchemist and worked extensively on alchemy in Languedoc during the fourteenth century. She was also thought to be a large patron of Nicolas Flamel.[14]

Nicolas Flamel was a writer, as well as a trader and copyist of rare books, whereby he acquired a high level of skill in mathematics, alchemy, the Kabbalah, and Hermetic thought. Nicolas became tremendously wealthy, gaining the respect of future generations, including that of Isaac Newton, who is affirmed to have read every one of Nicolas's works.[15]

Rene D' Anjou, celebrated as "Good King Rene," was one of the more important kings in European culture immediately preceding the Renaissance. Rene held many royal titles, including the Count of Bar, Duke of Lorraine, King of Aragon, King of Jerusalem, and many more. Rene's Uncle Louis was Cardinal De Bar. Rene was the grandfather of the Rene D'Anjou who accompanied Joan of Arc and who was the son of Iolande De Bar. Rene was also father to Iolande De Bar.[16] Note Rene's King of Jerusalem title.

Sando Botticelli, also known as Sandro Filipepi, maintained the Medicis, the Estes, Gonzagas, and the Vespuccis as his patrons. Botticelli tutored under Filippo Lippi and Mantegna, who were both patronized by Rene D'Anjou. Sandro studied alchemy and Hermetic thought under Verrocchio, who also taught Leonardo Da Vinci.[17] Botticelli was heavily influenced by Ficini in his creations, as were many other Neo-Platonist artists of the Renaissance, who blindly trusted in their pursuit of rediscovering ancient secrets.[18] One of the earliest known decks of tarot cards was ascribed to Botticelli and Mantegna.[19]

Da Vinci was well acquainted with Botticelli through their joint apprenticeship to Verrocchio, while the Medicis, Estes, and Gonzagas also patronized Da Vinci.[20] Da Vinci was a known alchemist, homosexual, and a worshipper of nature's divine order. Da Vinci was known to encrypt Gnostic and pagan symbolism into his paintings; he was recognized as the Keeper of Secrets, ingeniously concealing clues to those secrets in his art.[21] Da Vinci, of course, was also a Rosicrucian.[22] Between 1515–1517, Da Vinci was attached as an engineer to the Viceroy of Languedoc and Milan, Charles De Monpensier, known also as Connetable De Bourbon.[23]

Connetable De Bourbon/Charles Montpensier was the single most powerful lord in France in the early sixteenth century. He was the son of Claire De Gonzaga, and his sister married the Duke of Lorraine, the grandson of Iolande De Bar and great grandson of Rene D'Anjou.[24]

Ferdinand De Gonzaque, variantly recorded as Ferrante De Gonzaga, was the son of Isabelle D'Este, one of Da Vinci's prominent patrons along with the Gonzaga family.

Louis De Nevers, the Duke of Nevers, was, in fact, Louis Gonzaga, the nephew of Ferrante De Gonzaga. Louis's brother married into the Hapsburg family, and his daughter married the Duke of Longueville, a title held by Blanche D'Evereaux. Louis maintained close relations with Robert Fludd and other esoterics, who enthusiastically anticipated the forming of the Rosicrucian order.[25]

Robert Fludd is said to have inherited John Dee's mantle as England's leading proponent for esoteric thought, writing and publishing prolifically on esoteric subjects and Hermeticism. Fludd was never confirmed as actually being a Rosicrucian (even though he likely was), but Fludd warmly endorsed the fledgling Rosicrucian orders, declaring that the highest good was the Magia, Kabbalah, and Alchymia of the Brothers of the Rosy Cross.[26] Fludd was a celebrated Kabbalist, according to Booth,[27] who steadily ascended the mystical pyramid and achieved an esteemed position in the London College of Physicians.[28]

Johan Valentin Andrea was the son of a Lutheran minister and a theologian. Andrea became a deacon of a small town near the Lorraine region but was also thought to have been a member of an ultra-secret society of Hermetic or esoteric initiates.[29]

Robert Boyle spent a considerable period of time in Florence, under the patronage of the Medicis, where he helped the Medicis to resist papal pressures and extended support for scientists and esoterics, who included Galileo. In Geneva, Boyle learned demonology and esoteric subjects. When Boyle returned to England, he offered his allegiance to the Stuarts and began to work towards the creation of the Royal Society/Invisible College. Boyle's closest associates in England were Isaac Newton and John Locke.[30]

Boyle frequently sojourned to southern France, spending substantial time in Toulouse, Narbonne, Carcassonne, and Rennes-le-Chateau to examine Inquisition documents regarding the Cathars. Boyle was known to embark upon spiritual pilgrimages to honor the graves of Rene D'Anjou and Nostradamas, as well as pilgrimages to Marseilles, where Mary Magdalene allegedly had taken the Holy Grail.[31] Boyle published manuscripts regarding alchemical treatises and was thought to be a member of a secret Hermetic society,[32] while others confirmed Boyle was a Rosicrucian.[33]

Isaac Newton descended from Scottish nobility and was educated at Cambridge; he was elected to the Royal Society/Invisible College in 1672 C.E., where he met and maintained ties with Robert Boyle and John Locke. In 1703 C.E., Newton was elected as the president of the Royal Society, where he fostered close relationships with Charles Radclyffe and Jean Desaguliers, one of the leading figures in the astonishing proliferation of Freemasonry across Europe.[34]

Newton was a practicing alchemist and a fan of the Rosicrucian Manifestos, as well as alchemical writings authored by Nicolas Flamel. Newton believed Judaism was an ancient repository for divine knowledge that was largely corrupted and lost; he also believed some of this lost knowledge had filtered down through Pythagoras. Newton was known to publicly question the authenticity of the New Testament and the divinity of Jesus, believing certain passages had been corrupted in the fifth century C.E.; meanwhile, he was an occultic aficionado, avidly studying Gnostic heresies.[35] It should not be surprising to learn Newton was also a Rosicrucian.[36]

Charles Radclyffe came from an influential Northumbrian family. His mother was an illegitimate daughter of Charles II via his mistress Molly Davis. Radclyffe, then, was of royal blood and was the cousin to “Bonnie” Prince Charlie Stuart. Radclyffe was a staunch supporter of the Stuart causes his entire life.[37]

Charles De Loraine was indoctrinated in the Jacobite cause from childhood. His father had offered refuge to the exiled Stuarts at Bar-le-Duc. Charles’s brother, Francois Lorraine, married an Austrian princess, Maria Theresa, and Charles later married Maria Theresa’s sister Maria Anne,[38] both of the Hapsburg dynasty. In 1761, Charles became the Grand Master of the Teutonic Order, a latter-day, chivalric, Germanic version of the Knights Templar and Hospitallers.[39]

Prussia was included among the Ordensland, the home of the Teutonic Knights, an organization that operated out of the reach of the pope and Catholicism, as a nation state headed by a Grand Master and which included unexplained members such as Henry Sinclair of Rosslin; Henry II of England; and two Stauffenbergs, who further boasted two family members listed as Hospitallers.[40]

The Teutonic Knights were a very powerful organization that enjoyed the same privileges and powers possessed by the Knights Templar and the Knights of St. John, supported by papal and emperor charters. It was an order that garnered white mantles and black crosses, an order where all had to be German, and an order that owned a large part of Prussia.[41] The Teutonic Knights peaked in power and influence by the end of the fourteenth century. They faded from view in 1525 C.E., during the rise of Martin Luther and under the guidance of Grand Master Hollenzollern, the ancestor of Fredrich I of Prussia, circa 1701.

The Teutonic Knights, according to Baigent and Leigh, were an ascetic order of warrior monks, who were documented by author Heinrich Von Treitschtke as highly pan-Aryan, racist, and of Volkishe ideology.[42] This was the indelible, clandestine order that Hitler established the SS upon. Moreover, they were an order that endorsed Augustine's "rule of life," in addition to the ordinary monastic vows, which included special obligations to fight against Christian enemies and to help the sick and injured.[43] Augustine was a murky bishop with an equally dubious order we will cover shortly.

In 1770, the nephew of Charles De Lorraine, Maximillian Lorraine, was appointed the coadjutor of the Teutonic Order and became its Grand Master, after the death of Charles in 1780 C.E.. He was variantly known as Maximillian Von Hapsburg and was the son of Maria Theresa Hapsburg and Francois Lorraine. Maximillian was a staunch supporter of the arts, who patronized both Beethoven and Mozart and to whom Beethoven dedicated his first symphony. Maximillian's sister was the famous Maria Antoinette Hapsburg/Lorraine. Maximillian was widely suspected to be a member of an ultra-secret society and was known to have consorted openly with the members of the Craft (Freemasonry), including Mozart.[44]

Charles Nodier's father was a very highly esteemed Freemason and a member of the Jacobites. After the French Revolution, Charles's father was the mayor of Besancon and the president of the town's revolutionary tribunal. Besancon was famous as a hotbed for subversion for many years. Charles was a voracious writer of books, with a wide range of subjects. He eventually turned against the French Rebellion and was also known to be an adversary against Napoleon.[45]

Victor Hugo’s aristocratic family was from Lorraine; he was born in Besancon in 1802. By age seventeen, Hugo was already a fervent disciple of Charles Nodier, from whom Hugo acquired knowledge about Gothic architecture that figured prominently in The Hunchback of Notre Dame. Nodier and Hugo, along with his brother, established a publishing house in conjunction with Nodier’s editorial direction. Hugo was known to be deeply spiritual but was publicly and militantly anti-Trinitarian and also repudiated the divinity of Jesus. Hugo, because of Nodier’s influence, was deeply immersed all his life in Gnostic, Kabbalistic, esoteric, and Hermetic thought, and he also was a Rosicrucian.[46]

Claude Debussy came to know Victor Hugo through the poet Paul Verlaine. Claude later set a number of Hugo’s compositions to music. Debussy cryptically penned a world-famous opera from a popular Rosicrucian play entitled Axel. Debussy’s circles were known to be deeply anchored in esoterica, and they consorted with all the prominent names in the French Occult Revival.[47]

Jean Cocteau was raised in an environment close to the corridors of power, in a politically prominent family. Cocteau always had access to powerful political leaders, as witnessed by his considerable currency with De Gaulle. Cocteau was also active in the redecoration of the Gothic cathedrals, such as Notre Dame, and did some writing regarding historical Rex Deus figures.[48]

All the Grand Masters of the Priory of Sion, including the Sinclair family members, were powerful European nobility or powerful elitists of academia. All were occultists, Rex Deus, Rosicrucians, or Gnostics; all toiled dutifully in their tasks for the Genesis 6 Conspiracy and were connectable to an obscure, universal organization—the hidden hand of history. The Priory of Sion Grand Masters were the architects for the Templar Order, the Freemasonry movement, the Rosicrucian orders, and the Illuminati, all of whom they control and lead to this very day.

This ultra-secret organization, in all likelihood, is the very same vicious and diabolical cult at the root of the Jewish conspiracies. Even though these powerful groups have alleged Jewish genealogies connecting them back to King David, they are not the true, dynastic descendants of Judah, David, and Jesus. Rex Deus and its puppet organizations are a dangerous rogue cult loyal to Lucifer and dark angels; they are mystics and pagans.

Rex Deus authors are likely the reticent scribes of the evil and covert Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion, from which most of the misunderstood and misguided Jewish conspiracies originate. This subversive document first came to public light towards the end of the nineteenth century.[49] It first surfaced in Russia in 1895[50] and then was published in newspapers twice at later dates. The Russian secret police published it in 1903, claiming that an ultra-secret group led by Jews and Freemasons controlled most of the world's international banking, judiciary, and media and were bent on establishing world government.[51] The Protocols were further published in 1905–1906, in pamphlets from a press controlled by a right-wing secret society called the Black Hundreds.[52]

The first known mention of the Protocols came about by a daughter of a Russian general, Justine Glinka, who resided in Paris and purportedly purchased the documents for the Czar in 1884; although, the documents are believed to be much, much older.[53] Glinka, according to Greer, was a Theosophist and spy for the Russian police.[54]

The Protocols document was first published in book format in 1897, by Philipanov, and again in 1901, by Professor Sergius Nilus in his book The Great within the Small, which was then put on display in the British Museum (August 10, 1905).[55] A second publication of Nilus's book was destroyed by the Russian Kerensky regime in 1917.[56] During the Russian rebellion, the Protocols were standard reading among conservative opponents of the Bolsheviks.[57] All other copies were further destroyed by the Kerensky regime, which shot on sight anyone who possessed a copy.[58] A reporter posted in Moscow for the Morning Post, a Mr. Marsden, translated the Protocols into English in 1920, and that translation is the standard copy now available.[59]

The Protocols of Zion were then adopted by Hitler's National Socialism after World War I. Hitler often quoted from the Protocols in his writings and speeches, and they were inserted into German text books in school.[60] No doubt the future Antichrist will also rely upon and quote from these abominations.

CHAPTER 58

THE SINCLAIRS

For God has put it into their hearts to accomplish his purpose by agreeing to give the Beast their power to rule, until God’s words are fulfilled.

—Revelation 17:17

What can we learn about the infamous Sinclairs of Scotland? What is their hidden connection to Templarism’s evolution into Freemasonry?

The Saint-Claire Grandmasters of the Priory of Sion were, of course, the Sinclairs of Freemasonry and Scotland. Marie was descended from Henry De Saint-Claire, who accompanied Godefrois de Bouillon on the First Crusade.[1] Marie Sinclair married Hugh De Payan, also of Templar fame.[2] Jean De Saint- Claire, of the Sainte-Claire Sur Epte, was additionally descended from the Houses of Chaumont and Gisor, just as the De Bar family was.[3] According to Robert Lomas, the Sinclairs were the famous founders of Freemasonry,[4] to whom the Scottish Freemasonry branch is fiercely loyal.

William Sinclair was the Grand Master to whom a great and ancient lineage is attributed.[5] The Sinclairs adopted the Gaelic title “Earls of Rosslyn,” after the name of the town, around 1100 C.E., when Henry St. Clair returned from the First Crusade; it’s a title that translates as “ancient knowledge passed down the generations."[6] Freemasons believe Rosslyn Chapel was built to be a memorial and a safe place for the excavated Jerusalem scrolls[7] and other ancient treasures and knowledge. Masonic historians hail Rosslyn Chapel as the missing link connecting the Knights Templar to Speculative Freemasonry.[8] William Sinclair built Rosslyn Chapel between 1441 and 1486 C.E.[9]

The Sinclair clan presided over the surviving Templar organization in Scotland, called The Order of Heredon. The Templars survived in Scotland under the guise of a trade organization (Masonry), while the Sinclair clan inherited the role as guardians for Freemasons, as well as concealers of the Knights Templar within those organizations. Sora notes the Sinclairs preserved the Templars as guardians to the Templar organization, hiding both the Templar and the Priory of Sion treasures at Rosslyn and later at Oak Island in Nova Scotia. As a reward for the protection of the Templars, Sora added that the Sinclair clan was granted guardianship of the newly Sinclair-founded and sponsored Freemasonry organization.[10] Even today, Freemasonry honors and preserves its Templar heritage with the honored Order within Freemasonry, the Masonic Knights Templar, or KTs.[11]

The underground Templars first set their ambitions on creating an independent Scotland, from which they then planned the creation of the United States and Brazil from secretive knowledge they had about the continents across the Atlantic.[12] This ambition came to fruition through the newly formed Freemason organizations and its genitive organizations. This, then, explains the Sinclair obsession with the then yet undiscovered continents and sheds light on the formidable influence Freemason organizations flexed and still flex over both Brazil and the United States. The Sinclair support of Columbus's mission also explains why the explorer's ships carried the Templar flag.

The United States was founded on the Templar belief of a New Atlantis and that a Golden Age had once existed in the ancient past and will rise once more in the New Age of light.[13] And to this end, Hancock and Bauval note that Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Jefferson, Thomas Paine, and George Washington collectively toiled to create a new utopian city (Washington City) for this New Atlantis, which contained esoteric allegories in its construction to Freemasonry and its ancient history. In fact, Marquis De Lafayette presented George Washington with a Masonic apron that contained the All-Seeing Eye in 1793, during the laying of the cornerstone ceremony for the future Washington City.[14]

King Robert the Bruce was rewarded with his Templar patronage at Bannockburn in 1314.[15] Templars trained the Scots in preparation for the inevitable war against the English King Edward II. Templar gold exported from France was utilized to purchase arms from Ireland and the Dalriada kingships of Tara. Remember, from 1314 to 1319, Robert the Bruce's brother was the king of Ireland.[16] The Knights Templar saved the day by rushing the battlefield, totally surprising the English, late in the day, when the English were exhausted. They slaughtered the vulnerable English army. The Knights Templar were the best-trained militia in Europe at that time. The fresh force of knights flooded the battlefield with banners waving, clearly identifying who they were.[17]

History, however, has naively recorded this turning point in history as untrained Scottish servants valiantly taking up the cause with the arms of their masters, rushing the battlefield and saving the day for the Scots. Freemasonry legends like The Legend of Bruce support this alternative line of Scottish history. Bannockburn, in other legends, was believed secured by the Templars and led by the famous Sir William Sinclair,[18] credited with sponsoring refugee Templars.

The Templars then began their transformation into newly accepted Freemasonry organizations that were based out of Rosslyn Castle, under the protection of William Sinclair.[19] Under King Bruce, the Templar Order restructured into a kind of secret church that was, of course, completely independent of Rome; it contained abbots and bishops, but no pope,[20] and that structure no doubt influences the religious and esoteric parts of Freemasonry to this day.

Bruce constituted another new order for Templar Knights, the Rosy Cross, after the Roman excommunication was lifted in 1323, to ensure secrecy and to camouflage the order for all those knights who were particularly valiant at Bannockburn.[21] This order was likely awarded to ensure the legacy of the Knights Templar and the ancient Gnostic/Essene/Priory organization of the Brotherhood of the Red Cross. All this encourages one to speculate about what influence this genitive order had, or has, on the highly elevated and esteemed Masonic Order of the Rosicrucians; they are all likely one and the same order.

Bruce additionally promoted the Templar Knights to the positions and authority of the official guardians and bodyguards for Scottish kings. This order was further supported and promoted by the subsequent Stuart kings.[22] The Order of the Rosy Cross combined with the Heredon of Kilwinning Order to form the Royal Order of Scotland, which was to always have the king of Scotland as the head of the order. The Heredon Order was originally formed in the twelfth century by David I,[23] the same Scottish king that began official ties to the Knights Templar from their inception. Greer notes that the Golden and Rosy Cross order was an ancient and important German Rosicrucian order that boasted they entered Britain during the days of King Arthur.[24]

Wolfram Von Eshenbach cryptically affirmed the Templars were Grail guardians from a Hermetic, secret society, that was complete with reticent rituals, initiation, and an agenda to attain world domination.[25] The Templars believed they were the inheritors of secret, ancient knowledge that dated all the way back to Atlantis,[26] as well as preservers of knowledge dating back to the Great Pyramid and Solomon.[27] Templars believed that they were the Elect, the “Fate Darlings” of Wolfram’s poem Titurel; they believed they were the Keepers of the Message that will eventually dominate the world.[28]

CHAPTER 59

ST. BERNARD AND THE BENEDICTINE MONKS

Hiram king of Tyre replied by letter to Solomon: "Because the Lord loves his people, he has made you their king…. I am sending you Huram Abi, a man of great skill, whose father was from Tyre. He is trained to work in gold and silver, bronze and iron, stone and wood, and with purple and blue and crimson yarn and fine linen."

—2 Chronicles 2:11–14

According to Markale, the Templar Order was an initiatory order, elitist, and double-faced.[1] It was a hypocritical order that secreted another secret order, which was completely different than what was on display for the world.[2]

So how and why were Templars permitted to become a powerful, Christian-endorsed order when they believed Jesus was not God?

Templars believed Jesus was just another prophet, like Mohammed and Buddha. Initiates were expected to spit upon the cross, denying Jesus as the Christ. Article 4 from The Secret Rule of the Order states that no prince or high priest knew the truth, for if they had, they would not have worshipped the cross of Christ. The Secret Rule of the Order of the Templars made a distinction between the regular (lower) members and the Consoled Brothers (the Adepts), who were the Keepers of the Message. The Secret Rule of the Order was set down in The Book of Baptism of Fire and the Secrets Set Down by the Master Roncelin. Consoled Brothers derive not by coincidence from the Gnostic Cathars, the Perfecti, meaning those who have received the Consolamentum. The Consoled Brothers were the “Pure Ones” who were already in contact with the divine, ready to rejoin the kingdom of light from where they were driven during the revolt of the [fallen] angels; only the Consoled Brothers knew the Secret Rule of the Order.[3]

The Templars formally recognized Article 5, which declared Christians, Saracens, Jews, Greeks, Romans, French, and Bulgarians as equals; whereas Bulgarians were the Bogamils, the ancestors of the Cathars. In addition, Article 4 of the Roncelin Document details the secret that only Consoled Brothers know, the secret that remains hidden from the children of the “New Babylon” (as in end-time Babylon), that the purpose to the Templar Order was not to protect pilgrims but rather to conquer the world and establish a united kingdom (world government), which the grand monarch (Antichrist) will reign over.[4] These beliefs remain alive and well in the contemporary Genesis 6 Conspiracy.

By 1127, the Templar excavations in Jerusalem were completed.[5] They were believed in legends to have retrieved the Ark of the Covenant, treasures of gold, the vast knowledge of Solomon,[6] and other knowledge from the ancients and the Essenes. Again, according to Knight and Lomas, authentic Enochian literature and knowledge that contained the ancient, antediluvian knowledge hidden in the temple’s secret vaults by Solomon and again later by the Essenes was also thought to be obtained by the Templars.[7]

Thus, the Templars believed they were the angels designated to guard the Stone (of heaven), the Holy Grail. The Templar Order was created to protect the allegorical Grail; antediluvian secrets; and illicit, heavenly knowledge. According to Wolfram and reaffirmed by Markale, once Templar descendants determine the destined individual, the authentic king of the San Greal, the New Kingdom (the new Atlantis) will be reborn and reigned over by this great monarch. It is at Gisors Castle (where the Cutting of the Elm occurred), at the Governors Tower that forms the main entrance to the town on a street called the Grande Monarque, where this grand monarch will make his grand appearance before unifying the brotherhood of all men.[8]

The end of the eleventh century marked the arrival of Gothic architecture.[9] The builders of these "New Gothic" cathedrals thereafter, and without explanation, utilized triangles and snakes for their primary decorative motifs to inscribe upon their works.[10] This New Gothic art replaced the Old Gothic art known variantly as Romanesque architecture.[11] Because the vaults were so high in Gothic designs, flying buttresses were essential.[12] The New Gothic architecture was thus distinguished by its cutting-edge technology for magnificent ribs and flying, intercrossed buttresses. The New Gothic style solved the weight issues of ceilings with vaults, which disguised the weight[13] by transmitting the pressure from the half arches of stone laterally to the outside of the church.[14] Flying buttresses were projecting structures built on the outside of the building, which countered gravitational forces from the roof. These external supports eliminated the necessity for bulky, stone pillars inside the building. Thus the New Gothic style facilitated marvelous stained glass windows.[15]

Conversely, limited pointed arches characterized Romanesque architecture.[16] Romanesque displayed half-barreled, vaulted ceilings with a humble set of ribs and arches.[17] Romanesque technology hemmed its buildings into underwhelming proportions by comparison because of ceiling weight concerns.[18] In addition, this architecture did not permit windows to pierce the sides; light only penetrated through the aisles.[19] Hence, straight lines dominated Romanesque architecture, while curved domes distinguished the New Gothic art.[20]

Theosophist writers think that the Mason guilds of Rex Deus were the source and founding spirit for the Freemason movements.[21] These roots were the practical/operative application of Freemasonry that was maintained within the stonemason guilds of Europe.[22] These (Snake) builder guilds of Masons emerged from remnants of the Roman Collegia guilds and brotherhoods that survived the fall of the Roman Empire.[23]

According to Plutarch, in 715 B.C.E., King Pompilius founded artisan guilds in Rome.[24] In the second century B.C.E., the knowledge of the ancient Dionysian Artificers of Tyre was passed down to the Roman Collegia through Pythagoras, or Pythagorean Mystery Schools. After the fall of the Roman Empire in the fifth century C.E., the barbarians reduced the Collegia to rubble[25] and caused its virtual extinction. The refugee Masons from the Roman Collegia survived among the Benedictine monks of the Cistercian Order; the Knights Templar; and the operative, trade-based Masons and guilds that had coalesced into (Snake) Brotherhoods. Monastic organizations within the Roman Church endeavored to both preserve the secrets of the Collegia and take control of those building secrets for their own purposes. Essentially, this was accomplished by two (heretical) orders, the Benedictines and then the Templars. The Benedictines consisted of two different persuasions: the French monks of Citeaux, known as the Cistercians, from which St. Bernard derived, and the English monks of Cluny, also chronicled as the Celtic Christian Church.[26]

Builder knowledge from the Collegia was preserved in England after the fall of the Roman Empire, through an obscure sect identified as Culdees, or Colidees.[27] The Culdees were a rogue, monastic movement in Ireland, Wales, England, and Scotland[28] within the Celtic Christian Church that retained Celtic dogma and traditions.[29] They were underground Druids who deceptively preserved their ancient Mysteries.[30] The Culdees were known variantly as Cluny monks and were followers of the Abbey of Cluny. Cluny monks were staunch proponents of Romanesque art and unquestionably its (spiritual) center.[31]

The Cluny Order and the Cistercians were the source for the Old Gothic art that stemmed out of Romanesque art, until the arrival of the Jerusalem knowledge from Solomon's Masons, which then produced the revolutionary New Gothic art. The Cluny did for Romanesque art what the Cistercians did later for the New Gothic art, spreading this technology throughout Europe, according to Naudon. Hence, St. Bernard later reformed Romanesque with new and revolutionary kinds of mathematical beauty and proportions.[32]

Additionally, the Celtic Christian Church launched the second evangelization of England, spreading the (rogue) Benedictine movement throughout all of Great Britain, essentially through the efforts of St. Augustine, the priest who became the bishop of Canterbury in 596 C.E.[33] Surprisingly, St. Augustine is well known in occultist circles as an initiate of a Manichaeism mystery school.[34] Even though Augustine seemingly rejected Manichaeism at some point and converted to Christianity, historians note that Augustine's doctrines emphasized the mystical body of Christ, while his Platonic and Neo-platonic variety of philosophy influenced many Middle Age teachers, such as St. Thomas Aquinas.[35]

St. Augustine nourished the Roman Collegia, building many monasteries and churches, including Canterbury, of which St. Augustine was the architect. Roman Catholicism naively accepted the Roman Collegia, complete with its cultic practices of initiations, because the church required their building skills and knowledge. It is for these reasons that the refugee Gnostic Manicheans from Rome likely worked their way secretly into the Collegia.[36] The new Roman Catholic Church persecuted the Manicheans into secrecy.

Many think the early Roman Church was installed by Constantine, who influenced it and altered it from the original form of the Jerusalem church. I believe Constantine viewed Christianity in geopolitical terms as a conveniently powerful force to harness future hope for his floundering empire, in a similar manner that King Shappur had previously inflicted Zoroastrianism on Parthia. Constantine conceived one identity for all countries of the empire, not as Roman but as a new brand of an altered Christianity. Gnostics, in particular, believe that in an effort to further unite and solidity his grip on the Roman Empire, Constantine fused the sun worshipping pagans of the empire into the new, state-sponsored Roman Catholicism in the year 325. After all, Constantine was originally the high priest of the cult of the sun known as Sol Invictus.[37] Further, Catholicism, particularly after the fall of the Roman Empire, readily adopted pagan rituals, symbols, and even some gods, which were transformed into legendary saints—a practice that seems to have occurred more often in England than elsewhere.[38] Constantine further fused Sol Invictus with Catholicism by introducing pantheistic symbols, religious dates, and rituals[39] into Catholicism that remain as part of Christianity to this very day.

We celebrate Christmas on December 25, but this date was not the birth of Jesus, for Jesus was likely born in the fall. Jesus was born six months after John the Baptist,[40] and it is thought by some that John was born around March, placing the birth of Jesus around September or October. Furthermore, Luke recorded the shepherds were living in the fields nearby at the time of Christ’s birth, keeping watch over their flocks at night,[41] suggesting that Christ’s birth likely took place during the dry periods of the year that would likely have been sometime between June and the end of October and not during the rainy season of winter or early spring, when the flocks would have been penned up in the stables. This also lends credibility to the notion that a stable was available for Mary and Joseph,[42] as it was not the rainy season of December and winter.

December 25 was, however, a popular pagan period for the celebrating of the winter solstice and for sun worship. December 25 was the celebrated date of the birth of the sun gods known as Osiris, Adonis/Baal, and Dionysus. It was also the celebrated birthdate of the god Mithras, who was curiously recorded as a son of god and the light of the world, a god who was also supposedly resurrected three days after his death.[43] Moving the celebration of the birth of Christ to December 25 was likely a politically motivated homogenization of the Roman Empire under one, new, Catholic religion by Emperor Constantine.

Constantine advanced this homogenization further by moving the Sabbath from the seventh day,[44] Saturday, as instructed by the Ten Commandments,[45] to Sunday, all to venerate what Brown describes as the pagan day of the sun, which was rationalized to Christians as honoring the day that Christ was resurrected. Other sun worshipping imagery was subsequently adopted into Christianity at this time, according to Brown, such as the Egyptian sun discs transformed into halos for the Catholic saints, along with the imagery of Isis nursing her miraculous and divinely conceived son, Horus, which allegedly became the accepted motif for images of Mary and baby Jesus.[46]

A later pope, Sylvester, born Gerbert d’Aurillac, known also as the Benedictine monk, was a Gnostic and heretic who encouraged and brought about great strides in science, mathematics, and architecture through his own broad-based knowledge he obtained from Arabs in Spain.[47] Pope Sylvester was famous for his knowledge of Oriental studies, the Hermetic sciences, and of course, magic.[48] Sylvester lived one hundred years before the Crusades, but he secretly hoped Europeans would one day regain Jerusalem to retake the temple treasures holding universal understanding that were hidden there.[49] This certainly testifies to the accuracy and validity of Gnostics and Manicheans successfully working their way into the Roman Church and into the Collegia to destroy Catholicism from within.

Builder guilds, then, after the fall of the Roman Empire, descended from the Roman Collegia through to the Benedictine monks, to the mystical brotherhoods formed in the twelfth century that built Chartres. In fact, the Templars were initially students of the Benedictine monks, who taught the Templars the building skills, and both (Snake) Orders, of course, always kept very close ties to each other.[50] Templars reorganized the Mason guilds in the twelfth century[51] and became patrons for the first trade guilds, which were wholly independent of the church.[52] From the twelfth century forward, Templars were heavily involved in all of the Free Craftsman trades and their organizations.[53]

These specialized Masons reorganized by the Templars, who became known as the Children of Solomon,[54] were secretly instructed by St. Bernard's Cistercian Order in the knowledge of Solomon.[55] This Jerusalem-based knowledge was brought to the Cistercians for both safekeeping and translation by the founding Templars.[56] St. Bernard's Cistercian Order was the very same Benedictine Order that adopted the Celtic Christian Church of Scotland and Ireland, thus reuniting the parallel Benedictine Orders. Masons, builders of any sort, and clerics that belonged to the Benedictine or Templar Guilds were free to move in any country, all under the protection and laws of the Templar Order.[57]

The European Notre Dame Cathedrals were all designed in the Gothic tradition, the art Gothique, or Argot, from the Langue Argot, the guardian language of the Golden Fleece, from the mystical, Greek legend of Jason and the Argonauts. The great Notre Dame Cathedrals that included Reims, Amiens, Bayeux, Abbeville, Rouen, Laon, Evreux, Etampes, Notre Dame, and Chartres were strategically built and aligned in Europe as the reflection of the minor image of Virgo.[58]

Prince Guilhelm (Guilhelm de Toulouse de Gellone), an apparent, acknowledged prince from the House of Judah at that time, instituted his famous Judaic academy of St. Guilhelm at Gellone in the south of France in 791. It was there that the Templar knowledge and treasures were brought after the Jerusalem excavations that ended in 1127. Gellone was just north of the infamous Rennes-le-Chateau of the Catalunya region, and this whole region was renowned as the constituency of Languedoc. It was at this Gellone Judaic academy that the derivative Cistern Order was founded under St. Bernard solely to translate the newly found Templar knowledge. St. Bernard then translated the Secret Geometry of Solomon's Masons.[59] It was the combination of Collegia knowledge, the Jerusalem knowledge of architecture, and other secrets that St. Bernard and his Benedictine Cistercians taught to the Knights Templar, which then sponsored the European building revolution, producing the great cathedrals.

Let us inspect one of the eminent Gothic cathedrals of Europe to diagnostically evaluate the end product when powerful, ancient knowledge intersects with a rogue cult. Louis Charpentier, author of The Mysteries of Chartres Cathedral, claims the Templars built Chartres to be a taciturn repository for ancient wisdom equal to Stonehenge, the Temple of Solomon, and the Great Pyramid.[60] He further notes Chartres was an ancient, holy site dedicated to the Mother Goddess (Isis) and that its altar was erected above the Grotte des Druides, which apparently marked the Womb of the Earth,[61] which figuratively produced the Nephilim. Both Chartres and Notre Dame Cathedrals are believed to have been built on sacred ground, where the Telluric earth currents are at their highest levels.[62]

The Abbot de Fleury, Fulbert, was the founder of the school of Chartres. Fulbert continued Gerbert d'Aurillac's (Pope Sylvester's) work, teaching Aristotle's metaphysics brought back from Spain by Gerbert, as well as initiating Christians into the Pythagorean numerology.[63] Chartres was renowned as a place of great learning, teaching aspects of ancient thinking unknown to the rest of Europe. Chartres, like the pyramids in the world of mysticism, represents the Hermetic doctrine of heaven on earth, or "As Above So Below."[64]

This iconic expression is manifested in mysticism as a holographic projection of the physical universe, where what occurs in a higher level of creation/dimension plays out in our universe. This projection, our physical universe, emanates from the geometric matrix of space, forming the illusion of time and distance; this matrix is the vessel holding the universe and then connecting everything with and into the universal life force, known variantly as the Brahman and Tao.[65] This is the doctrine, imagery, and religion portrayed in the Matrix trilogy, where humankind is trapped in the physical matrix world and awaiting a (false) messiah to free humankind from a world of evil machines (God and his angels).

Chartres displays a statuette of the Black Madonna, also acknowledged as Isis, which represents the "Great Work." Surrounding the Black Madonna are carvings of the Seven Sacred Sciences from the antediluvian epoch and their seven postdiluvian, mystical mentors and/or guardians: geometry/ Euclid, rhetoric/Cicero, Dialectic/Aristotle, arithmetic/Boethus, astronomy/ Ptolemy, grammar/Dunatus, and music/Pythagorus. These seven sorcerers are Keepers we spoke of in previous chapters; they will be portrayed in the end times as great spiritual guides/prophets who astonishingly preserved the ancient knowledge for the Terminal Generation.

The north porch, where the Door of the Initiates is located, portrays a Templar returning from Jerusalem with a sacred object, in addition to portraying Melchizedek, the teacher of Abraham. Chartres also portrays Aaron as the Egyptian Magus, along with David, Solomon, and Moses, full of the wisdom of Egypt.[66] The depiction of Melchizedek additionally portrays him bearing the Grail.[67] Thus, the Chartres labyrinth is believed to be a journey from the darkness to light; it constitutes the route to the light according to Rosicrucian tradition.[68] The labyrinth was originally built with a plaque depicting Theseus, Ariaddne, and the Minotaur.[69] God appears as The Great Architect of the cosmos (and Freemasons), demonstrating the world is a work of architecture.[70]

Chartres is one of the great modern shrines to mysticism that is encoded with sacred geometry for personal transformation of the soul (reincarnation), including imagery defining the quest of the Holy Grail, just as Sinclair built Rosslyn Chapel with the same encoded, mystical secrets. Similarly, all Gothic cathedrals inspired by Templar knowledge were built to transmit alchemical knowledge and are therefore inundated with alchemical symbols and allegories, just as they contain many statues and representations of devils, griffins (sphinxes), golems, and gargoyles. According to Peter Marshall, there is even one statue at Notre Dame Cathedral that looks like an alien.[71]

Bernard of Chartres once said, “We are dwarfs sitting on the shoulders of giants, the ancients.” Bernard of Chartres was a brilliant Gnostic scholar of his time, and I take his words literally. His younger brother, Thierry of Chartres, compiled an encyclopedia of the Seven Liberal Arts (sciences).[72] But what is even more intriguing is that another Bernard of Gnostic infamy was kept a secret in his lifetime, for St. Bernard was a powerful potentate of the Catholic Church and the most influential sponsor for the Knights Templar within the Church.

So, then, who was Bernard de Clairveaux? St. Bernard of Clairveaux lived circa 1090–1153 C.E.[73] He was the son of a Burgundy lord. At the age of twenty, Bernard enrolled in the Abbey of Citeaux, where he later became the Abbot of Clairveaux, with the aid of Etienne Harding, which by no coincidence was sponsored by the Cistercians. Both St. Bernard and Etienne Harding were the masterminds behind the subversive Cistercian movement, according to Jean Markale.[74]

St. Bernard believed in the ideal of one church, one faith, one people, and one leader and believed the Templars could be employed to establish this Cistercian dream.[75] St. Bernard, according to Rene Guernon, who wrote Le Christianisme Celtique Et Ses Survivances Populaires, held to beliefs of the Celtic Christian Church,[76] which Roman Catholicism had crushed in the seventh century, the same underground Celtic Christian Scottish Church that St. Bernard welcomed into the Gnostic Cistercian Order. Guernon noted that St. Bernard was the last of the Druids and the heir to Western traditions.[77] He was credited with giving life to the philosophies and teachings of Aristotle.[78] St. Bernard, like the mystic Gerber D'Aurillac, was obsessed with finding the authentic Tablets of the Law in Jerusalem, along with their accompanying secrets, and shrewdly did what was necessary in this cause.[79]

To some historians, St. Bernard was one of the heads of Christianity in the twelfth century. Others say that St. Bernard de Clairveaux became the master of Christianity in the first half of the twelfth century, for countless high dignitaries of the church sponsored him.[80] Armstrong noted St. Bernard dominated both Pope Eugene II and King Louis VII.[81] St. Bernard became so powerful that all Christianity awaited his enlightened words before making a decision; his words were regarded as coming from God.[82] It is this power and his Gnostic/Celtic beliefs that coalesced into his seditious actions with respect to the Knights Templar, the Jerusalem treasures, and the antediluvian knowledge.

Hugh De Payan of Templar fame was related to St. Bernard's family, the Montbard family, by marriage.[83] In addition, St. Bernard was in service to the Count of Champagne.[84] St. Bernard's uncle, Andre De Montbard,[85] was one of the founding knights of the order[86] and a vassal to the Count of Champagne.[87] De Payen formerly appealed to his in-law, St. Bernard, to support his new order,[88] which comprised at least two knights, Rosel and Gondemare, who were Cistercian monks.[89] St. Bernard used his influence to do so in a famous letter.[90]

Hughes, the Count of Champagne, another originating member of the Templar Order, was a large donor to Clairveaux and the Benedictines.[91] All the originating knights were related by close family ties, inexplicably direct connections to the Cistercian monks, and royal Flemish Cathar membership.[92] In 1128, St. Bernard was part of the clergy that met in Troyes to formerly recreate the Knights Templar. He wrote the famous letter "In Praise of the New Knighthood," which provided for his full, unconditional support, backing the formation of the order and thus easily carried the debate.[93]

Thus, the Knights Templar were formerly cast into a Catholic order sanctioned by Rome in 1128 at the Council of Troyes, and they were fully backed by the powerful Gnostic heretic Bernard de Clairveaux.[94] It was at Troyes where this Catholic Templar Order officially became a Cistercian Order, under the complete authority of St. Bernard.[95] In fact, the original statutes of the Templars were even thought penned by St. Bernard and thought that St. Bernard and the Cistercians formally fashioned the Templar Order.[96] From 1128 forward, St. Bernard was declared the Patron and Protector of the Templar Order. Templars from that point on then swore an oath of obedience to St. Bernard, according to Gardner. St. Bernard further mandated that the entire Templar Order was to be obedient to Mary Magdalene, and they then proceeded to consecrate all the Notre Dame Cathedrals to her.[97]

Hence, Markale notes St. Bernard (but it was, in my opinion, likely Etienne Harding, since St. Bernard was born in 1090) was one of the main proponents for sending Templars to Jerusalem to retrieve early Christian (Essene) documents and Judaic treasures, which, of course, St. Bernard and Harding had extensive knowledge of.[98] St. Bernard wrote to the returning Templars to journey carefully through France with the Jerusalem treasures, avoiding Vatican authorities at all cost.[99] The Templar gambit was then afoot.

The reign of the Templars halted suddenly on Friday, October 13, 1307, when King Phillip the Fair and the Roman Church came down upon the Templars. Pope Clement V ordered all Catholic nations to seize Templar possessions.[100] At the demise of the Templar Order, five charges were levied by the Inquisition: the denial of Jesus; obscene kisses and homosexuality; idolatry; and non-consecration, i.e., the omitting of the words of Consecration from their Mass. Many Templars were punished and executed for those transgressions. Strangely, though, the Papal Bull of 1312 officially abolished the order but did not condemn the Templars.[101] In fact, in 2007, Vatican archivists unearthed startling documents revealing Clement V had actually declared the Templar Order to be innocent of all charges and pardoned the order shortly before he died.[102]

CHAPTER 60

THE INVISIBLE COLLEGE

Above all, my brothers, do not swear—not by heaven or by earth or by anything. Let your “Yes” be yes, and your “No” no, or you will be condemned.

—James 5:12

How did Templar secrets and objectives evolve through Freemasonry? And what effect does the resurrection of those ideals have on this generation?

The Legend of d’Aumont maintains that d’Aumont sailed the surviving Templars to Scotland.[1] Templar refugees landed with about fifty Templar Knights and settled at the Mull of Kintyre. They were disguised as mechanics/ operative Masons, and they founded a new order, the “Franc Masons.”[2]

Pierre d’Aumont was appointed the Grand Master in 1313, after the death of Jacque de Molay at the hands of the Catholic Church and the French monarchy.[3] Molay had previously arranged for the nonvisible and secret Templar treasures to be removed and then loaded onto eighteen ships of the Templar fleet from La Rochelle in Brittany, which then sailed to Scotland, while some stowed away to Portugal,[4] all which d’Aumont led.

The Templars then renamed themselves Franc Masons, because Franc means both “French” and “free” in French. However, another version suggests Freemason derived from the French words frere (brother) and macon (knight). When Templars exported their secret society to England, they chose the name Freemasons, for obvious reasons.[5] Freemasons protected the discovery of their Templar pedigree through adopting symbols of architecture and adopting the organization title of Freemasonry, which it later spread to England and all Europe. Freemasons then built all of their temples consecrated to virtue, truth, and light, in honor of the “Grand Architect of the Universe.”[6]

Templars were, indeed, a secret society, according to Craft legends, complete with a secret doctrine and a secret ceremony of initiation into their ranks,[7] like all organizations of Enochian mysticism. From surviving aristocratic Adepts, remnant Templars spawned through new secret societies many of the famous and powerful political organizations of early modern Europe. Freemasons, in fact, believe themselves to be heirs to secrets held by the Knights Templar, who created other organizations, such as Rosicrucianism and the Invisible College, also celebrated as the Royal Society of England, for the twofold purposes of preserving and perpetuating those inherited secrets, the gnosis of the ages.[8]

Freemason Robert Boyle first called the Royal Society “the Invisible College.”[9] Boyle, as you will recall, was a Stuart loyalist and a Grand Master of the Priory of Sion. The Royal Society is the oldest and most respected scientific society in the world, according to author and Freemason Robert Lomas. Lomas goes on to note the Royal Society founders were the first scientists and the last of the sorcerers.[10] The founders of modern science were all occultists practicing magic, alchemy, and astrology.[11] According to Freemasonry records, The Royal Society was organized to be a society or club to cultivate the science. They sought to advance the experimental philosophy introduced by Sir Francis Bacon.[12] The Invisible College/Royal Society is the founding cornerstone for modern science; all its genitive, scientific organizations pay tribute to the Royal Society. The term Invisible College was first made famous by the Rosicrucian Manifestos.[13] Because of the Royal Society’s mystical and anti-Christian beginnings, and anti-Christian beginnings, the Royal Society’s ongoing opposition to Christian positions such as Intelligent Design, and noting that the science community pays tribute even to this day to the Royal Society Fellowship (Fellowship generally denotes a secret society) that includes 1400 of the world's most eminent scientists, I conclude science communities are still governed by doctrines emanating out of the founding Royal Society occultism, which took instructions from ancient Snake Societies and the Seven Liberal Sciences.

Modern science became prominent in Europe during the seventeenth century; its doctrines tussled with Christianity and the Mother Church for centuries before its ideas took root, for the Royal Society's scientific theories seemed to explain the world better than any other form of thought at that time. The new scientists forged an unspoken agreement with the Church to avoid ongoing confrontations; they determinedly avoided for several centuries issues, which called Christian doctrine into question. For the Church, this agreement drew a distinction between science and magic.[14] The agreement was shattered in the nineteenth century, with the advent of the degrading Darwin doctrine of evolution, reigniting open war between the two factions.

The Royal Society was originally created as a secret society in the same spirit as Freemasonry, Rosicrucianism, and Templarism and is, according to Lomas, considered a child of Freemasonry.[15] In fact, according to Gardner, Rosicrucianism and Freemasonry were considered synonymous at that time, as testified to by Metrical Account of Perth, published in 1638.[16] Albert Mackey writes the Royal Society was first organized by Oliver Cromwell's learned brother-in-law Dr. John Wilkins as a club dedicated to the cultivating of the sciences.[17]

The first meetings were staged at the House of Dr. Goddard and then transferred to Gresham College.[18] A mysterious group, all with Freemasonic links and recognized as "the Gresham 12," officially organized the Royal Society. The founders included Lord Brouencker, Robert Boyle, Alexander Bruce, Sir Robert Moray, Sir Paul Neile, Dr. Wilkins, Dr. Goddard, Dr. Petty, Mr. Ball, Mr. Rooke, Mr. Christopher Wren, and Mr. Hill.[19] Robert Moray and Elias Ashmole were considered the Royal Society's Foundation Fellows, and both were Rosicrucians and Freemasons. Ashmole was initiated into Freemasonry in 1646; he was the first English-born Freemason.[20]

Charles I of the House of Stuart was defeated in 1647 by Cromwell, who executed him in 1649, afterwards becoming the Lord Protector.[21] According to Nicholas de Bonneville, author of Jesuits Chased out of Freemasonry, Rosicrucians had formed the Royal Society in London in 1646, under Charles I, where they regularly met in Masonic temples. They modeled this society after the ideas of the New Atlantis expressed by Francis Bacon.[22] Royal Society meetings were suspended during Cromwell's reign but resumed in 1660, after the fall of Cromwell's government, in what is known as "the Restoration." The Royal Society continues to convene to this day.[23]

The Royal Society subsequently issued its first charter under Charles II in 1662 and then the second charter in 1663.[24] According to Gardner, it was no coincidence that the first two known, prominent Masonic initiates to England, Moray and Ashmole, were both Foundation Fellows for the Royal Society and Rosicrucians, for in proclaiming the charter of the Royal Society, King Charles II effectively reconstituted the Brethren of the Rosy Cross, seizing Grand Mastership of his family's traditional order.[25]

One of the founding twelve was Alexander Bruce, a wealthy Freemason and a direct descendant of Robert the Bruce. The Bruce family had supported the Stuarts during the civil war with Cromwell.[26] The Stuarts were descending monarchs from Robert the Bruce, and it was Charles II Stuart who succeeded the short-lived English Republic after the fall of Cromwell. Charles II supported the newly established, secret society with funding and a royal charter. All this is not a coincidence.

Now, Robert Moray was the driving force behind the successful launch of the Invisible College and considered the true founder; he was a Rosicrucian,[27] knighted by Charles I in 1641.[28] According to Gardner, Moray was the first imported English Freemason; he was a Scottish statesman and the London attaché for Cardinal Richelieu of France. William Viscount Brouencker was Gresham College's president, while Elias Ashmole was the founder of Oxford's Ashmolean Museum.[29] Ashmole was an accredited historian, astrologer, chemist, and a Freemason.[30] All were brought together to form the Royal Society with other Rosy Cross Adepts: Robert Boyle, William Petty, and Christopher Wren.[31] All belonged to the same descending Templar Rosy Cross Order established by Bruce.

Lord Bacon (1560–61–1626) was a renowned patriarch of renaissance alchemy; he was attributed thirty alchemical works.[32] Bacon was born near the Strand (theater) in London. Bacon was educated at Oxford, becoming the “Lord Keeper” under Elizabeth I.[33] He was the Lord Chancellor to King James I, the second most powerful position in England at that time.[34] The realm of both Shakespeare and Bacon was the Globe Theater, which was variantly known in some circles as the “Rosicrucian Theater”; it was established by and contained the private principles of Rosicrucianism and Freemasonry. Shakespeare’s literature is overflowing and intimately connected to Masonic ritual and allegory, according to Gardner.[35]

One of the first forty founders of the Royal Society, Abraham Cowley, penned a poem called “Spratt’s History,” in which he compared Bacon to Moses. According to Lomas, Bacon is considered to be a past Master of the Royal Society in honor of his literary inspiration that sponsored the Royal Society/Invisible College. Bacon’s portrait rests prominently alongside that of King Charles II, who authorized the charter of the founding, and the portrait of William Brouencker, the first president of the Royal Society. Under Bacon’s portrait is an inscription, describing him as the “Inspirational Source” of the society, for the idea derived in Bacon’s The New Atlantis and specifically with his indelible idea to create a research establishment for science, a “Solomon’s House” or a “College of Six Days.”[36] The New Atlantis was to be a place where mystical faith and reason coexist in perfect harmony through the religion of mysticism. Bacon was profoundly influenced by the Rosicrucian movement.[37]

Bacon cultivated views of advanced learning in De Augmentis Scientiarum, in which he craftily combined his collective beliefs with the Rosicrucian philosophy. It was from this belief that Bacon authored The New Atlantis. Bacon’s Renaissance system of philosophy was believed enough in these erudite, esoteric circles to awaken the intellects of all thinking men.[38] Bacon’s renaissance Rosicrucian philosophy will be the end-time unification of religion and science that we will soon witness.

CHAPTER 61

LEGENDS OF THE HOLY GRAIL

You are a lion's cub, O Judah; you return from the prey, my son. Like a lion he crouches and lies down, like a lioness—who dares to rouse him? The scepter will not depart from Judah, nor the ruler's staff from beneath his feet, until he comes to whom it belongs and the obedience of the nations is his.

—Genesis 49:9–10

The Genesis 6 Conspiracy is as old as the Adamites; ergo, the infrastructure is just as old, deeply rooted, and battle hearty.

In its contemporaneous incantation, Freemasons believe they descended from the Templars, who, in turn, derived from furtive Rex Deus families, who, in turn, were rooted in Essene beginnings.

How was the contemporary Genesis 6 Conspiracy reborn through the crucifixion of Jesus? And how are the crucifixion and the rebirth of the Genesis 6 Conspiracy connected to the modern, misconstrued conception of the Essenes?

It is important to appreciate that this spurious conspiracy has been planned for the last 6,000 years. It has simmered with unimagined generational patience and been salted with admirable diligence. The founding members of the contemporary conspiracy confess in their writings that they have diligently and patiently plotted their improbable conspiracy over many centuries, and it is, in truth, twenty centuries old. It has been their evil practice to establish kingships and government leaders who have been indoctrinated with the Most Secret Mysteries, but who have had the True Knowledge withheld, as it is known only to the elite of the Adepts of Rex Deus. Rex Deus believes they are descendants from the dynasty of King David and are predestined by their god, Lucifer, to rule the world. Contemporary conspiracy advocates merely inherited the deep-rooted infrastructure from the old worlds we discussed in the first half of this book. The Learned Elders of Zion boldly acknowledge their true inheritance dates back to the ancient epochs.[1]

Linking Rex Deus dynastic lines from the last 2,000 years to the 6,000-year-old coup lends another fascinating if not sinister twist to the power and plausibility of forces loyal to world government. When we speak of Rex Deus, we are speaking about families that dominated the royal houses of Europe, including Britain and Scotland, through conspiring coup d'états to seize power since shortly after the death of Jesus. The murky appellation adopted by this secretive, subversive society translates as "Kings of God."[2] If Rex Deus families did not hold power through kingships, they were generally the rival alternative, causing political upheaval, whether they were part of dethroning their rivals or instigating rebellions, such as the American, French, and Russian rebellions. Absolute power is the true narcotic for Rex Deus.

Rex Deus dynastic lines generally flow through two or three source individuals, grafting into each other at particularly important intersections of history, together with other legendary, royal bloodlines from ancient Judah and the lost tribes of Israel. From whichever bloodlines one examines, essentially, Rex Deus objectives are to preserve two sacred bloodlines that are inclusive of all the other branches: the first from Moses and Aaron and then through David and Jesus, whose alleged descendants will establish the imposter kingdom of god on earth.[3] Rex Deus subsequently traces their bloodlines further back into antiquity, with even more startling bloodlines that I have reserved for the latter chapters.

The first of these astonishing and controversial bloodlines begins with the blasphemous doctrine that Jesus spawned a dynastic bloodline, even though Christianity teaches Jesus did not produce any heirs. As this common Gnostic doctrine goes, Jesus bore at least two sons by his alleged wife, Mary Magdalene, and perhaps one daughter. One son was transplanted to Britain with Joseph of Arimathea (the man who collected the dead body of Jesus and provided a tomb for him),[4] while the other immigrated to southern France with Mary Magdalene.

According to Scripture, Mary Magdalene is first introduced in Luke as one of the women Jesus cured from diseases or evil spirits; she then ministered to the needs of Jesus out of gratitude from her own private means,[5] suggesting Mary's family must have held some wealth. It was to Mary Magdalene that Jesus appeared first on the Sunday of His resurrection.[6] Mary was also one of the women who patiently and faithfully waited until the dead body of Jesus was removed from the cross and taken to the tomb owned by Joseph of Arimathea.[7] The unexplained title "Magdalene" is not defined, but according to Unger's, "Magdalene" was (curiously) chosen by biblical authors to distinguish Mary Magdalene from the other Marys recorded.[8] Magdalene suggests Mary came from a city on the southwest coast of Galilee.[9]

According to Frank Joseph, Magdalene may also be a nomative derivative directly linked to an antediluvian people who coexisted with the Atlanteans in a civilization known as Magdalenians.[10] The Magdelenians crossed the land bridge to Europe circa 14,000 B.C.E., where they became known as the Magdalenian culture, famous for its colorful Ice Age cave paintings located in France and Spain. Theosophist and occultist Lewis Spence, a prominent fellow of the Royal Anthropological Institute, a vice president of the Scottish Anthropological and Folklore Society, author of a respected translation of the Popol Vuh, and the author of The Dictionary of Mythology, and contemporary author Mary Settegast have both additionally identified the Magdalenian culture of prehistoric France with that of the Atlanteans.[11] One wonders as to the coincidence and the connections.

Gnostic writers always list Mary Magdalene first among the other Marys in the New Testament as a sign of her rank as the First Lady, the Messianic Queen.[12] Mary is also thought by Gnostics to be the alleged and unnamed disciple recorded in the book of John as "the disciple Jesus loved."[13] Gnostics believe Mary was Jesus' secret wife, the one who anointed Jesus at Bethany[14] and one who possessed secret knowledge that exceeded Peter.

It is no mystery, then, why Mary Magdalene is held in such high regard by Rex Deus and Gnostics and why she so perfectly slides into their revisionist history. Evidently, it was to this revisionist Mary Magdalene that the Templar Order secretly swore its oath, along with Bethany[15] and the anointing, where Jesus was believed in Gnostic lore to have married Mary. As the dissonant Gnostic legends indicate, the supposed sons produced from the marriage with Mary and Jesus were separated to secure their safety, ensuring the continuation of the Grail bloodline.[16] The first son of Mary Magdalene was avowed to be Jesus II. Mary and Jesus were reunited after years of separation in 36 C.E whereby Jesus II [17] was born in 37 C. E (Gardner, Bloodline, 103, 109, 115), before separating and reuniting once more in 43 C.E. leading to the birth of Josephes in 44 C.E. (Gardner, Bloodline, 115). Mary Magdalene and Jesus' sister Mary Jacob were recorded in The Acts of Magdalenas as traveling to Gaul in 44 C.E.;[18] Mary then died in 63 C.E.[19]

In 53 C.E., Jesus II was proclaimed Crown Prince in Corinth, where he received the Davidic crown,[20] the Davidum. Jesus II later traveled to Britain with Joseph of Arimathea, where, for a time, he made the mysterious Glastonbury of lore his home.[21] Joseph arrived at Glastonbury with his (adopted) Grail son in 73 C.E.[22] Likely, this was where Jesus II was indoctrinated into the Druidic Mysteries. Jesus II was believed to have remained celibate (in Essene tradition); he did not continue the Sangreal because of his celibacy.[23]

The second son, Josephes, then inherited the Grail heritage, becoming the new Davidum and dropping the "Joseph" title. He was educated in a Druidic college, settling eventually in Gaul.[24] James, a third son, was entrusted to Judas Thomas Didymus, the so-called twin brother of Jesus, while Jesus II was temporarily entrusted to Mary Magdalene, both who fled in opposite directions. Authors Tim Wallace-Murphy, Marilyn Hopkins, and Graham Simmons record that Joseph of Arimathea funded the escape from the Middle East; he accompanied one of the children of the Grail, likely to England. The child under Joseph's care, in the beginning, must have been Josephes by virtue of simple deduction, even though Joseph later traveled in England with Jesus II.[25]

The Priory of Sion insists the Holy Grail is not a cup or a chalice but rather an allegory encrypted with Rex Deus secrets,[26] a Legominism. The Grail was originally identified as sangraal, meaning "holy chalice." Gra-al is a perplexing, ancient Mesopotamian word meaning "nectar of supreme excellence" (blood), which was consumed by antediluvian gods and kings. San Greal was a premeditated perversion of sangreal, shaped as a deliberate misdirection and diabolical allegory from which Grail legends were then authored.[27] Most lay people naively believe the Grail was the chalice containing Jesus' blood collected by Joseph of Arimathea at the crucifixion, whereas in Gnosticism, Joseph collected the Messianic bloodline from the cross.

However, in Rex Deus tradition, the pure form of Grail is San Greal, or Royal Blood,[28] meaning "royal bloodline," and to others, Sang Real, again meaning "royal blood."[29] And, according to Rex Deus chronologist Laurence Gardner, the Grail always secretly represented the royal bloodline, the Messianic Sang Real of Judah,[30] and not the chalice we are all familiar with. The Priory of Sion further insists that Grail and Arthurian tales encrypt the chronology to the royal bloodline, which specifically carries the Mary Magdalene and Jesus bloodline, descending down through the Merovingian dynasty.[31]

In Priory of Sion symbolism, the Rose and Grail are synonymous. The Grail was represented in antiquity with the glyph ∨, which represented a cup, a chalice, or a vessel, which was an allegory for the woman's womb of the sacred goddess,[32] the matriarchal bloodlines of Nephilim descended from antediluvian Owl/Dragon queens. This is the same ∨ was figuratively fashioned to encode the Gnostic Grail mystery into the Last Supper painting, with the separation of John (Mary Magdalene) and Jesus in Da Vinci's apostate painting. Note, the painting does not contain a chalice of any sort, thereby dismissing its significance.

Grail legends encoded many prominent names from Judaic history, such as Lot, Elinant, Bron, Urien, Hebron, Pelles, Joseus, Jonas, Bran, Josephes, and of course, Galahad (which derived from Gilead,[33] the land of Og).[34] The largest portion of these Old Testament names eerily link directly back to Nephilim. In this new Grail line of thinking, Perceval, a direct descendant of Joseph of Arimathea, held and/or protected the Grail, or the secret of the royal bloodline,[35] at the time of Arthur. Grail literature, then, was conceived to safeguard all the secret bloodlines/descendants of Jesus, which was encoded within the literature in a form of Essene Peshur, or Legominism, and which eerily harbors disturbing metaphors connecting the Grail bloodline back to the Dragon Court and Nephilim.

Other legends hold that Alain le Gross, nephew to Joseph of Arimathea, brought the Grail to Wales, while Alain's brother, Josue, married into the Welsh kingship, spawning a new dynasty. Alain was known alternatively as Alans, Alains, Elains, and Elian; he was believed to be the first Grail guardian to Britain after Joseph of Arimathea, according to Reid. Alain became associated with a special lake, attaining a title known in Grail lore as the Rich Fisher, or Fisher King, from a dubious, ancient tradition entailing blood consumption from chalices[36] in the abominable tradition of Nephilim and Atlantis. This originated with the Mesopotamian Grail root word gra-al, which translated as "nectar of supreme excellence."

According to the legends, Alain's brother, Josue, inherited the Grail guardianship upon Alain's death. Alain's name pops up often as both male and female names in Grail legends such as Helain the White, a Grail hero; as Elian, prince of Ireland, who takes Lancelot's place at the Round Table; or as Elaines, the Lady of the Lake, lover to Lancelot and mother to Galahad, as well as many other nomative variations. Even the name Lancelot, according to Reid, derived from L'Alan de Lot, Alan from the Lot Valley of southwest France.[37] The Lot Valley is the same region that the Essenes, Templars, Rex Deus, Cathars, and Merovingians settled in. Lot derives from Lot, the nephew of Abraham, recorded in the Nephilim-infested Sodom and Gomorrah narrative. Lot also inexplicably shows up in the original Camu-lot. One wonders, were Camulot and the Lot region of France thus considered by Gnostics as the new Sodom and Gomorrah cities of light?

The Alain family, then, must have been an important bloodline of Rex Deus. Reid notes Franco Roman aristocracy mysteriously treated the families in France known as "Alains" as equals. The Alains garnered an unexplained curiosity and a dubious respect from the elite European society in the early centuries after Christ. The Alains held curious positions of great power throughout medieval Britain and France, just as the Merovingians did. However, Reid records the Alain originally migrated from Asia, noting Alain is a variation of Aryan, meaning "noble."[38] Cahill adds that the Alains were considered part of a barbarian race that overran the Roman borders, crossing the banks of the Rhine River, along with the hordes of other vandals and barbarians at the close of the fifth century,[39] suggesting the Alains were Nordic Celts/Aryans who likely first originated from Scythia.

Reid confirms the Alain people were believed descended from the Massagette region of Scythia.[40] Scythia is a region and a nation that played an ominous role in the Rex Deus chronology, the Ring Lord culture, the Grail culture, and the Dragon Court. The ancient Scythian nation included the lands south of the Danube River, by the Black Sea, and north to Transylvania and the Upper Dnieper, occupying Walachia, Moldavia, Crimea, Bessarabia, and the Russian provinces of Kherson and Podolia. Scythians lived next to the famous Sarmatians.[41]

With the forced departure of the Visigoths in southern France, the Alain clan was mysteriously granted lands in southwest Gaul, between Toulouse and the Mediterranean, the region renowned as Languedoc,[42] the Lot Valley, also home to the infamous Rennes le Chateau. The mystery does, however, resolve itself when one considers the Alain's Scythian heritage and the Rex Deus heritage were both heavily rooted in the Scythian Royal Court. The Alains must have carried an ominous (Dragon) bloodline with them from Scythia.

Even more to the point, Alaric of the Visigoths sacked Rome in 410 C.E., pillaging the treasure of Solomon not hidden by the Essenes. Otto Rahn, the Nazi occult researcher and author of the book Crusade against the Grail, contended that Alaric's plunder was hidden in the Cathar stronghold of Montsegur and Renne Les Chateau. Rahn believed aristocratic Cathars inherited this treasure, which included a copper scroll detailing the location of the balance of Solomon's treasure hidden by the Essenes before the temple destruction.[43] The Alains, as Fisher Kings, then inherited Alaric's part of the Solomon treasure. It is likely the Templars utilized this map in their excavations of the temple to locate the hidden Essene treasure and documents.

The marriage of Josue, brother of Alain, in Britain, did, in fact, start a new Grail/Rex Deus dynasty[44] that Grail legends sprang from and that are an integral part of the Grail legends surrounding Joseph of Arimathea and King Arthur. Josue's marriage into the Welsh dynasty supports the royal-bloodline hypothesis about the Scythian-based Alain family. The details begin to make sense once one considers the Alain family partnered as an older but equal royal bloodline with the birth of a newer, more pristine pedigree, allegedly descended from Jesus. Rex Deus and the Holy Grail represent the Royal bloodline of Jesus; the Scythian Royal Court; and also an alternate line of apostolic succession, with Joseph of Arimathea being the so-called legitimate successor to Jesus. Both the Rex Deus and the Grail traditions in the book Rex Deus record Joseph as the Gnostic apostolic successor to Jesus and the guardian of the Grail children,[45] which Alain then, in turn, inherited from Joseph.

With Joseph being the Grail guardian and the alternative apostolic successor, as recognized by the Celtic Christian Church, it was believed Joseph held secret knowledge the Roman Church did not.[46] This obviously included the supposed secret of Jesus' descendants and the unfounded and alleged falsehood that the Universal Church of Rome was built on the Resurrection and the divinity of Christ.

Moving on to James, a possible third son of Jesus, we learn James traveled to the historical and mystical city of Edessa with his Uncle Judas. Ian Wilson writes that Edessa was the location the historical King Lucius of Grail kingship and lore resided in and where he was likely known historically as Lucius Aelius Abgar VIII of Edessa,[47] guardian of the Edessa Shroud (Shroud of Turin). Edessa, too, was located at the home of Hermetic thought, home of the Gnostic Sabians. Note, as well, Baudoin de Bouillon, brother of Godfrois de Bouillon, one of the founders of the Knights Templar and the crowned King of Jerusalem, was appointed the Count of Edessa.[48] Baldwin le Bourg, cousin to Godfrey of Bouillon, succeeded Baldwin of Boulogne (Bouillon) as the Count of Edessa.[49] According to Baigent and Leigh, Edessa was also the home of Bogamils, the precursors to the Gnostic Cathars in France[50] that the Templars, Merovingians, Alains, Essenes, and Scythians were all closely tied to.

James was recorded as dying in Spain without a successor.[51] This, then, leaves us with Josephes to carry on the alleged royal bloodline as the Davidum. Josephes was supposedly born in 44 C.E.[52]; he grew up in southwest Gaul. Through Josephes, most royal Grail bloodlines anchor themselves. Josephes inherited the San Greal because Jesus II remained celibate and because Josephes was the second-born son. Josephes married and then begat a son named Josue, through whom the Grail line passed down.

Was this Josue brother to Alain of France? Did Josephes strategically marry into a royal Alain/Scythian house? Certainly, both were second generation after Jesus, both were inheritors to the Grail guardianship, and both begat dynastic Rex Deus kingships that appear to be the same. Was Alain then known alternatively as Josephes? Certainly, this deduction would account for the Merovingian Grail/Rex Deus connection. The famous Fisher Kings, the Merovingians, claim Josue as an important part of their priestly and royal descent.[53] Remember, Josue's brother, Alain, was the first modern Fisher King, the very same title that the Merovingians later held. The Merovingians further claimed descent from James, Joseph of Arimathea, the supposed brother of Jesus. But remember, Alain, likely son of Josephes and brother of Josue, was Joseph of Arimathea's nephew, thereby keeping both versions identical. Therefore, if Alain was indeed the son of Josephes, who was the son of Jesus, and Joseph of Arimathea was actually James, the brother of Jesus, Alain would have, in truth, been the nephew of Joseph of Arimathea and/or James, no matter how you construct the genealogy, making both Josues the same person, just as I have asserted.

This dynastic, Davidic bloodline begat by Josue from Celtic Britain was believed passed down, according to Rex Deus chronology, through King Lucius, via his daughter and sister,[54] which later helped to found the Merovingian dynasty. Even so, Merovingians claim even greater heights to their priestly and royal heritage, all designed to support their alleged rightful claims to rule.

CHAPTER 62

JOSEPH OF ARIMATHEA

> So as evening approached, Joseph of Arimathea, a prominent member of the Council, who himself was waiting for the kingdom of God, went boldly to Pilate and asked for Jesus' body. Pilate was surprised to hear that he was already dead. Summoning the centurion, he asked him if Jesus had already died. When he learned from the centurion that it was so, he gave the body to Joseph.
> —Mark 15:42–45

How did it come to pass that both the British and Scottish kingships owe their intrigue and secretive inheritance to baffling legends surrounding Joseph of Arimathea? How is Joseph related to the Essenes, Merovingians, and the secret bloodline in these legends?

Rex Deus chronologist Laurence Gardner notes that the Celtic kings claim their legendary origins came from the bloodline of Jesus,[1] just as Rex Deus has determined their ancestry derives out of Celtic Christianity.[2] The Celtic Christian Church did not accept the doctrines of the virgin birth, the Resurrection, or the divinity of Christ.[3] Celtic Christianity was Druidism and Gnosticism at the core, hidden beneath its Christian veneer, just as the Templars and Ishmaelites were. Remember, also, that St. Bernard formally integrated the Scottish Celtic Church into his surreptitious Cistercian Gnostic Order.[4]

The most famous of the upstart Celtic Christian kings is King Arthur. Arthur and Grail legends were all commissioned by Priory of Sion families, according to Templar historians.[5] It is most likely that Grail and other Rex Deus literature of the twelfth century forward was anchored in troubadour poetry, which was invented in Gnostic/Cathar Occitania. Troubadour literature began with returning Crusaders, of which Richard the Lionheart is regarded as one of the first. Provençal poets perpetuated this particular form of poetry. It promoted wisdom and was full of initiation symbolisms and trials and tests inspired by their erotic éclat adapted from Arabic-Andalusian poetic forms and originating from Sufism, according to Booth.[6] The rose was the most popular symbol for troubadours, echoing esoteric, alchemical teachings, and of course, the symbol for the Priory of Sion and the Grail.

According to Hancock and Bauval, troubadour poetry of Occitania heavily influenced all European lyrical literature with its emphasis on exalting women to a saintly status (Isis) and on promulgating courtly love.[7] According to Dan Brown, troubadours were, in fact, servants of the Church of Mary Magdalene; they persistently sang renditions of songs to the virtue of "Our Lady," a mysterious and beautiful woman they pledged their allegiance to.[8] In this troubadour spirit, then, Joseph, Jesus, and Arthur are critically connected through alleged Rex Deus bloodlines recorded in Grail literature and songs.

Some Gnostic legends say that Joseph of Arimathea was a disciple of Jesus;[9] Scripture does the same.[10] The Gnostic gospel of Peter further states Joseph was a very close friend of Pontius Pilate.[11] Gnostic legends recant that Joseph chose to become an Essene over the two other dominant sects of Judaism of that time, the Pharisees and the Sadducees. Joseph was additionally known to be a wealthy merchant and a noble senator with an inordinate degree of power within the Jerusalem community.[12] Other accounts note Joseph was a member of the Jewish elders, the very same people who judged and sentenced Jesus to death. So, too, do supplementary, non-biblical sources record Joseph/ James as a Master Craftsman like his father and an artificer of metals[13] after the same reprobate spirit as Tubal-Cain and Cain. And it is from all these close Essene relationships with Jesus that Joseph of Arimathea transforms in troubadour, Theosophist, Gnostic, and Rex Deus lore into James the brother of Jesus and the purported true apostolic successor to Jesus.

Again, Gnostics doggedly dismiss they were merely a weird offshoot of early Christianity, but they insist that they were the foremost faction at the center of the original and pure mainstream of early Christianity before the literalists purged their interpretive factions. Gnostics contend they were the fundamental faction guiding early Christianity, where two competing factions formed early Christianity in parallel and where both claimed primacy, seeking to reinforce their poles-apart positions.[14] Even though the literalists prevailed and endeavored to wipe out the interpretive factions, one must appreciate the Gnostics would have fanatically persecuted Catholicism if they had the opportunity, for two primary religious variants cannot coexist in harmony; this will be the spark igniting the end-time genocides. Both Catholicism and Gnosticism believe the other was, and is, the imposter church of Satan! Let us then look at Gnostic apostolic succession and to James, the brother of Jesus, under this new light.

James is mentioned as a brother of Jesus in Matthew and Mark and is generally assumed to be the eldest by virtue of being listed first (Matt 13:55 and Mark 6:3). Initially, Scripture records James and his siblings as skeptics of Jesus,[15] but by the time of the Resurrection, one concludes that James was converted as a disciple, for Jesus appeared to James on the third day, immediately after appearing to the twelve disciples and the 500 followers (1 Cor 15:5–7). Certainly, John did not record James as a disciple of Jesus before the crucifixion, citing that James and his other brothers were not yet believers and followers of Jesus (John 7:2–5). However, James, his mother, and his brothers were there to choose Matthias as a replacement for Judas (Acts 1:14) after the crucifixion. This suggests James converted either just before the crucifixion or, what is more likely, after Jesus visited James after the crucifixion.

Paul considered James a disciple on a visit to Jerusalem to see Peter (Gal. 1:19). James, by that time, was considered to be one of the three pillars of the Jerusalem Church: James, Peter, and John (Gal 2:9). Most conclude that it was Jesus’ vision to James that began the motions to promote James to becoming the first church leader.[16] Eusebius quoted Clement of Alexandria when he wrote that Peter, James, and John chose James to be the first bishop of Jerusalem after the ascension of Jesus.[17] Eusebius went onto write that James became bishop sometime shortly after the death of Stephen.[18] James was also recognized by the zealots of the Law as their leader.[19] James held high distinction as the leader of the Jerusalem church when he spoke to the all the apostles and elders, receiving Paul and his Gentile beliefs (Acts 15:13–21).

Later in the book of Acts, James appears to be the church leader: “When we arrived in Jerusalem, the brothers received us warmly. The next day Paul and the rest of us went to see James and all the elders were present” (Acts 21:18–19). The book of Galatians recognized James as a pillar of the early church, as did Peter and Paul, who submitted to James’s authority.[20] James was the author of the epistle bearing his name in the New Testament,[21] again demonstrating the importance of James to the early church. Additionally, it was James who endeavored to ensure Gentile Christianity would not overwhelm Judaic Christianity with their numbers but failed due to his death and the fall of Jerusalem in 70 C.E. to the Romans.[22]

It was James the church leader who healed the wounds between the Jewish Nazorean sect and the Gentile sect of Paul, with his compromise approach recorded in the book of Acts. James ruled and entrenched the doctrine that the Gentile Christians were not bound to the host Judaic dietary laws, that Gentiles needed only to conform to abstaining from immoral sexual behavior, the consumption of meat either sacrificed to idols or strangled, and the consumption of blood.[23] Others conferred, according to Hershel Shanks, but James decided.[24]

According to Eusebius, James was surnamed “the Just” by the ancients, due to his eminent virtue.[25] James was titled “the Just” also in the Gnostic gospel of Thomas. Church writer Hegesippus wrote that James was celebrated as “the Just” because of his “Excessive Righteousness,” for he spent so much of his time praying on his knees that his knees became hard like those of camels.[26] Even Josephus called James a “just and pious” Jew,[27] and defacto denotes James as the leader of the Jerusalem church at the time when Ananus, the Sadducee high priest of Judah, exercised his authority and brought James before the Sanhedrin judges for breaking the Law. James was then sentenced to be stoned,[28] dying in 62 C.E. by most accounts.[29]

What is most interesting, however, is that Josephus did not record James's death, only that James was sentenced to die of stoning.[30] In fact, other historical sources suggest that James did not die until much later, a contention that is at the heart of Gnostic and Theosophist lore, with James escaping Jerusalem and changing his identity to Joseph of Arimathea. Note two in the Josephus account, in truth, provides further support for this notion by acknowledging that the Sanhedrin did not have the authority to complete the sentence to execution, because they did not have the support of Albinus, the Roman curator, in the same manner that the Sanhedrin required Pontius Pilate's approval to crucify Jesus.[31]

Church records do, however, record the death of James, thus nullifying the alleged survival and escape of James from Jerusalem to resurface in England as Joseph of Arimathea. The book of Acts recorded the final meeting between James and Paul that took place in the late 50s and likely as late as 59 C.E., which placed James still in Jerusalem at this juncture and not in England as Grail legends go. Hegesippus recorded that James was martyred by being stoned to death and then thrown from the top of the temple,[32] ending this controversy.

James the Just in Gnostic and Theosophist lore survived his condemnation to spawn the Grail legends that portray him as Joseph of Arimathea. Gnostics have also recorded James holding the Essene community distinction of the title of "Joseph," as the second born of the dynastic succession, while Jesus held the Judaic and dynastic Essene title of the "David" (or Davidum). The "Joseph" was James's inherited distinction, where he became the "Divine Highness," the equivalent to the crown prince, the "Royal Highness" of today. James, then, was known within the Nazarene/Essene community as Joseph Ha Rama-Theo, which became known later in its phonetic translation as "Joseph of Arimathea."[33]

Other Gnostic lore records the apostle Peter as having recruited Joseph and sent him to Rome after the crucifixion, where he was able to free Christians held in bondage by the Romans. He was rewarded for those deeds by being honored and appointed to preach the Gospels in England.[34] While in Britain, Joseph/James was granted a wealth of tax-free land at Glastonbury by King Arviragus, brother to King Caractacus, the Pendragon of the Isle, whose dynasty was called the House of Camu-Lot.[35] What is more likely is that this non-biblical Joseph of Grail lore fled to England and away from Peter and Pauline Christianity for reasons we will discuss later. Joseph was then believed to have traveled to Marseilles in 35 C.E. and later to Britain and Glastonbury in 45 C.E., where he lived until he died at the age of eighty-six.[36]

According to these same legends, just before the crucifixion, Joseph used his friendship with Pilate and his influence on the Jewish elder council to broker a deal to the Jesus problem.[37] Luke backs up the assertion that Joseph was a prominent member of the Jewish council.[38] These alternative Gnostic legends suggest, as does Scripture, that Joseph owned the tomb that Jesus was buried in, but Gnostic records indicate the crucifixion took place in the garden of Gethsemane[39] and not at Golgotha, the place of the skull, as Scripture records.[40] Scripture does record that Jesus was buried in a garden beside Golgotha, but it does not record that the garden was Gethsemane.[41] Gethsemane was recorded in Scripture as the garden where Jesus was arrested.[42] The Gnostic legends also record that Joseph owned the garden of Gethsemane, as well as the tomb Jesus was buried in;[43] although Scripture only recorded that Joseph owned the tomb and not the garden.

It was in this garden allegedly owned by Joseph in Gethsemane and away from close public scrutiny that unconventional Gnostic lore recants the accepted doctrines of Jesus being crucified to His death. Joseph purportedly arranged to fake the death of Jesus and to remove him from the cross before he died.[44] Both Gnostic lore and Scripture record that Pilate was surprised at the quick death of Jesus when Joseph went to gain permission to take the body.[45] According to Gnostic lore, Jesus was healed and nursed back to health by Joseph and his followers. Then He later rejoined Mary Magdalene in France.[46] It is from Jesus' alleged survival of the crucifixion and Jesus' alleged marriage to Mary that spurious forces hope to claim world government, through His alleged descendant, the spurious, false messiah.

CHAPTER 63

SCOTA AND TEMAR

See, today I appoint you over nations and kingdoms to uproot and tear down, to destroy and overthrow, to build and to plant.

—Jeremiah 1:10

Wildly eccentric ancestral claims from the various royal houses of Europe are commonplace. Are these eccentric claims in any way connected back to the older aspects of The Genesis 6 Conspiracy? Why do these seemingly eccentric claims unaccountably meld together under Rex Deus/Grail tradition and shadowy Irish mythology? Why do Scottish kings link their history back to the Irish through the tribe of Scota?

Scota's legendary beginnings originated with her marriage to a mysterious person and into people thought to be of Israeli descent. Scota was believed to be the daughter of the famous Akenhaten, the converted, monotheistic pharaoh, father of Tutankhamun. Some traditions, however, trace Scota back to be the daughter of Smenkhare (Achencheres), brother of Akenhaten. Akenhaten was further mythologized to be either the pharaoh or the son of the pharaoh, who purportedly presided over Moses and the Israelites, thus defining his unexplained conversion to monotheism under Aten. Akenhaten was forced to abdicate his throne in favor of his cousin/brother Smenkhare; Smenkhare was later succeeded by

Tutankhamun, the famous boy pharaoh and son of Akenhaten, who changed his name from Tutankhaten at his coronation, symbolizing his renewed allegiance to the god Amun and his defacto denouncement of Aten.[1]

Akenhaten begat six daughters and one son through his wife, Nefertiti.[2] One of those daughters was named Scota. She married a man named Mils Espain,[3] also named as Gaytheius in other legends[4] and Niul in still other Rex Deus legends. Mils Espain/Gaytheius/Niul was a Black Sea prince and later the governor of Capacyront, located by the Red Sea. He was a royal Scythian, like the Alains, and his people were of some form of Israelite descent. Scota and Mils Espain bore a son in Egypt named Goidel, known variantly in legend as Gaedheal and Gael.[5]

Scota and her husband either knew Moses and the Israelites or were a lost tribe from the Exodus in some traditions, but whichever the case may be, they were forced to flee Egypt at around the same time as the Exodus, likely because of their monotheistic belief in Aten. In fact, they were noted to have fled in fear and terror from the old gods of Egypt that Akenhaten had previously suppressed.[6] All this likely suggests they fled from the oppression of Horemheb and Amun worship. Horemheb as you might recall, usurped the throne from the Armana dynasty and reestablished pantheism with Amun at the head of the pantheon, while completely banishing and outlawing any form of Aten worship.

Scota and Mils Espain fled Egypt to Scythia, then Africa, before finally settling in Spain; they were known in this particular legend at that time as Milesians. The Milesian descendant, Breogan, later traversed to Egypt, fought the Ethiopians, and married Scota, daughter of Pharaoh. Mils Espain variantly known also as Millessius died in Spain, but his Scythian/Egyptian descendants later conquered Ireland, offering sacrifices, and again, and not without coincidence, to Atlantis and the god Poseidon for their victory.[7] It was Scota's sons or descendants, Hyber and Hymec, that later migrated to Ireland, claiming the land for themselves, renaming the island the land of Scota.[8]

The paradox in these various legends is that the time between when Scota left Egypt and went to Spain and then went from Spain to Ireland spans about 800 years. Gardner explains this mystery by announcing that there were two different Scythian/Egyptian marriages with two different Scotas. The first marriage took place circa 1360 b.c.e with Scota and Niul, the prince of Scythia and governor of Capacyront of the Red Sea. The second Princess Scota, with the Irish connection, also married a Scythian prince, Galamh, and bore a son named Eire-Ahmon, who became the ancestral forbearer of the Scott kings of Ireland. It is this second and/or third Scota, daughter of Pharaoh Nekau,[9] who somehow interwove with Milesian descendants in Spain through Breogen, which begat the Irish kingdoms of Tara.

Hyber was one of the source names for Ireland, as "Ireland" was derived from Hyber land, which in Latin was Hibernia and in old English was Iberland, which eventually changed to Iverland and then Ireland. Hyber and his people brought with them the throne/stone of Akenhaten that all subsequent Irish kings were crowned upon; the Akenhaten stone (throne) became synonymous with all the Irish kings of Dalriada.[10]

The Irish heritage of Scota eventually migrated to Scotland, with Mor McErc of Dalriada as their leader in the fifth century C.E. Thirteen kings of Argyle held both the Bethel Stone and the Stone of Destiny until 843 C.E., when Kenneth McAlpin won and united the Scots with the Picts.[11] All this did was merely reunite two related but separate strains of bloodlines, as the Picts, too, were in fairy and Theosophical legend one of three branches of the mysterious Tuatha Denaan we will cover later; the Picts migrated to Scotland in 600 B.C.E.[12] The Stone of Destiny, then, is the Stone of Akenhaten's throne. It was during the Scottish migration when the two legendary stones were moved to the Scone of Abbey in 844 C.E.[13]

Ireland is additionally the land where the lost eleven tribes of Israel were whispered to have migrated after their defeat at the hands of the Assyrians around 721 B.C.E. Ireland, too, was the land that Baruch, scribe to Jeremiah, took Temar, also called Tamar, Teamhair, Tara, and Tamar-Tephi, the very famous daughter of Zedekiah, last king of Judah, after Judah's defeat and exile at the hands of the Babylonians around 589 B.C.E. It would have been logical for Jeremiah to replant the surviving direct matriarchy of the Davidic dynasty of Judah with their kin, the lost tribes of the northern kingdom of Israel.

All of Zedekiah's sons were murdered by King Nebuchadnezzar,[14] leaving only daughters to carry on the royal bloodline of David and the Messianic promise through Zedekiah. As the legends go and as Scripture records, God promised to always have someone sitting on the royal throne of the Messianic kingship spawned by David.[15] Temar, a daughter of Zedekiah, according to various legends, was transplanted to Ireland to maintain the everlasting, pure, dynastic, royal bloodline of the Messiah by intermarrying with descendants from the lost tribes of Israel that had migrated there after 721 B.C.E. and also into the bloodlines of descendants of Scota, who also claim Israelite and Scythian descent. This, then, fulfilled the promise to always maintain a seed of David on the throne of David, albeit a transplanted throne, in the exact manner that the prophet Jeremiah had prophesied in the passage introducing this chapter.[16] The daughters of Zedekiah were recorded as surviving the Babylonian genocide via Ishmael, who was also of royal blood.[17]

Jeremiah dictated God's prophesy to uproot and replant the throne of Judah in another country, along with guaranteeing that wherever Baruch escaped to, he would survive to carry out his commission (Jer. 45:4–5). What is also interesting is that Jeremiah's daughter, Hamutal, was the mother of Zedekiah,[18] meaning that Temar was the great granddaughter of Jeremiah, which would have provided even more incentive for Jeremiah to rescue the daughters of Zedekiah.

In 586 B.C.E., or shortly thereafter, Temar and the scribe of Jeremiah, Baruch, stole the Bethel Stone and took it to Ireland. Thereafter, all kings in the ancient Irish bloodline would be anointed under it. The Bethel stone is the mythic Stone of Jacob that Genesis recorded Jacob selecting to sleep upon. During Jacob's slumber, he dreamt of a ladder to heaven, from which God blessed Jacob with Abraham's Covenant. When Jacob awoke, he blessed the stone, establishing it to be a holy pillar of God's house, thus naming it Bethel, which means "God's house."[19] This is the place where Jacob changed his name to Israel at God's instruction (Gen. 35:9–10).

The stone now rests under the throne of England, since the English defeated the Scots in the twelfth century C.E.. In Grail allegory, the English throne is the authentic Davidic throne, where the Bethel Stone now rightfully rests. The Stone of Destiny is still held secretively in Scotland and is Akenhaten's throne/stone imported by Scota.

Temar was regarded in another legend to have married a high king of Ireland named Ard Ri Eochaid, ancestor of Ugaine Mar The Great. He was also recorded as Eochaid I of Tara, known to have married the daughter of Zedekiah in 586 B.C.E.[20] Keith Laidler noted from various legends that Temar-Tephi fled Jerusalem in 586 B.C.E. with the Bethel Stone. She was believed to have traveled the same route as her distant ancestors, the Scota of Israeli descent, did many centuries before, to Ireland, where she married an Irish king of Israeli descent. This king was believed to have been known variantly as Eochaid The Heremon, the high king of Ardath. Teamar Breagh's dynasty then kept the Bethel Stone for fifty-six kings, 1,000 years, before it went to Scotland with Mor McErc of Daldriada.[21]

The name Tara, as we have already noted, is anchored in a number of variants of Temar of Judah that include Temair, Teamhair, and Temuir, but its true genitive, according to the Celtic expert James Mackillop, appears to have been from Reamhrach, meaning "the dark one." The Milesians would appear to have renamed the site of Tara after King Eremon's (Eochaid the Heremon) queen, Tea (Temar), for it was known mysteriously as Druim Cain before Tara. Druim is defined as a prefix for "a high and narrow place," while Cain in ancient Irish was defined as "fine, good, beautiful and fair"[22] (as in "the Fair Celtic" or "the Fair Tuatha Denaan"). When the sons of Mils invaded and defeated the inhabitants, the Tuatha Denaan, the sons of Mils then combined with the Tuatha to become the modern fairy folk, the Sidhes,[23] and/or the Celts.

Tara was actually referred to as Druim Cain in the famous and definitive Lebor Gabala, The Book of Invasions. The biblical Cain was recorded to be the first to see Ireland in the Lebor Gabala, likely after he was banished from Eden and then wandered in the wilderness. The Lebor Gabala, for the most part, begins with the flood story at 2900 B.C.E., in the (Masonic) year of the world 1104, Anno Mundi,[24] as it was recorded in legend. All this is an uncanny coincidence in relation to the life of the biblical Cain and the fall of Satan, known as the year of light, the Anno Lucis, circa 4000 B.C.E., that we have already discussed.

The Irish hold that they were Israelite descendants through immigration of Israelites at the Exodus and the immigration of Israelites at the Diaspora at the hands of the Assyrians, and they claim the right to the Davidic Covenant through Temar, daughter of Zedekiah, who married into the royal bloodline of the Irish, which also claimed Israeli descent. The Irish further claim Israelite descent from Scota and Israelite descent through Scota's Scythian husband, Mils Espain. It is these ancient Grail bloodlines that the alleged son of Jesus, Josephes and then Josue, via Joseph of Arimathea, grafted into, which created the dynastic line of Arthur and later grafted into the Merovingian dynasty.

CHAPTER 64

THE KINGS OF CAMELOT

Your house and your kingdom will endure forever before me, your throne will be established forever.

—2 Samuel 7:16

Above all European royal houses of conspiracy in the early common era were the Merovingians. But how were the Merovingians linked to British Grail dynasties? And why is the connection significant?

The father of Lucius, King Coel, had a daughter, Athildes. Athildes married the French King Marcomir IV and gave birth to Clodomir IV of the Merovingian Dynasty.[1] Thus, the lineage of Anna and Joseph of Arimathea is directly linked to the Merovingian dynasty,[2] for the lineage of Lucius and Coel both descends back to Joseph of Arimathea through both Anna and Joseph of Arimathea. Additionally, this genealogy connects Merovingians to the alleged Davidic bloodlines of Israel and the Irish bloodlines of Tara.

Gilbert, Wilson, and Blackett write that Anna was the purported daughter of yet another Mary and a Joseph Barsabas known variantly as Barabbas, and or Mary was the wife of Clopas in other legends, and or Mary was also married (possibly a third time) to a Alpheus that is somehow identified with Joseph of Arimathea.[3] Anna was the wife of Beli, son of Llud. Gardner writes alternatively that Anna was the daughter of Joseph of Arimathea and that Anna then married into the Camulot dynasty (via Beli) and began a new, great Celtic Christian dynasty,[4] which, of course, eventually produced King Arthur. Anna variantly married Gweirydd (Arviragus) and/or Llud, depending on the legend, producing Beli (Heli). These linkages spawned two Welsh kingships: Aballach and Baalad with the Avalon dynasty of Arthur and Bran The Blessed and Caradoc of the Welsh dynasty that produced King Lucius.[5] King Arviragus/Gweirydd/Llud was the brother of King Caractacus. He was the Pendragon (king) of the Isle who unexplainably granted Joseph of Arimathea the land at Glastonbury. Arviragus's dynasty became famous as the House of Camulot, meaning "curved light"; it was later romantically corrupted to "Camelot."[6]

Bran Llyr, from the Lucius dynasty, was the brother-in-law to Joseph of Arimathea. Bran became the first Fisher King of Wales before Alain.[7] Bran led his clan with the aid of the mysterious Alain and Petrus families, which is why Alain likely inherited the Fisher King title. All the Grail knights, then, descended from Bran, Alain, and the Petrus families.[8]

The brother to Bran the Blessed was King Leir or Llyr, the father of Branwen;[9] although, other legends cite Manwydan as brother to Bran, with Branwen being sister to Bran. Other legends cite Bran Llyr to be the (Nephilim) son of Llyr, the supernatural king of the sea (Atlantis) and the son of a mortal woman named Penaardun. Bran was not a normal mortal, according to legend, just as his mythical father, Llyr, was not a normal mortal. Bran was a supernatural giant of such immense proportions that normal humans appeared as dwarfs alongside him, which somehow connects through legends Arthur, the Grail, and Rex Deus back to giants/Nephilim and Atlantis. Connecting the Grail, Arthur, and Rex Deus back to Nephilim and Atlantis is not a coincidence. Rather, this is a direct metaphorical reference to their ancestors. Hence, Bran's alternative names were Bron and Hebron,[10] home of the Anakite/Nephilim giants that Israel eradicated from the Promised Land.

The House of Leir (Llyr), of the famous King Lear of Shakespeare, made up the second and third branches of the Welsh dynastic kingships. The name Llyr derived from the sea god Llyr (Poseidon). Wales was divided into the three kingdoms of Gwynedd, Dyfedd, and Powys, with Gwynedd being the land of magic[11] and fairies, which I will return to later.

Arthur and his Merovingian, royal cousins who ruled France constituted the famous Sangreal Order of the Round Table. This order was dedicated as Guardians to the Grail Secrets.[12] The Grail kingship of the Briton bloodline remained loyal and respectful to the French Merovingian dynasty until the Merovingian dynasty collapsed around 751 C.E. This was most evident in Brittany, the land conquered by Arthur, when the British Dragon Court fell to the Saxons in England after 650 C.E. The descendants and subjects of Arthur in Brittany felt obliged to accept the overlordship of the Frankish descendants of Clovis, the Merovingians, because of their joint, royal lineage with the Briton Dragon Court.[13] They later did the same through the invasion by the Norse Rex Deus that we covered previously.

CHAPTER 65

THE MEROVINGIANS

Command certain men not to teach false doctrines any longer, nor devote themselves to myths and endless genealogies.

—1 Timothy 1:3

Why is the Merovingian dynasty held up to be the most important Dark Age dynasty to The Genesis 6 Conspiracy? What made the Merovingian dynasty so mysterious?

Merovingians not only derive from the alleged descendants of Jesus but also celebrate their royal bloodlines as a marriage of the Davidic/Jesus dynasty with another branch of royal Israelite blood, connecting them to Saul of the Benjamites. Priory of Sion records noted Merovingian origins connect back to a lost tribe of Benjamin that migrated to Greece and then to Germany. Priory records indicate this lost tribe from Benjamin intermarried with a descendant of Jesus and Mary Magdalene, intentionally creating the royal Merovingian dynasty.[1] Merovingians believed they were the ordained unification of two houses of royal bloodlines descending from Israel. These Israelite houses would then be the house of Benjamin (Saul) and the house of Judah (David).

Another genealogical source for the Merovingians has them descending not from Jesus, but from James, the brother of Jesus. The mystery is not significant, except that both are descendants in the royal bloodline of David, serving the same purpose for Rex Deus and their heretical conspiracy. And, just as I covered previously, James was thought to be Joseph of Arimathea in some traditions.[2]

The genesis of the joint Grail and Merovingian dynasties began with King Lucius Siluria; he was king of the Britons beginning in 180 C.E. Britain was largely evangelized with Celtic Christianity under the reign of Lucius, after he was baptized a Christian under Pope Eleuthenus.[3] King Lucius's genealogy descends back to King Llud of 72 B.C.E., the last king of the British Celts before the Romans.[4] So, then, Llud and Anna begat Beli, which, in turn, produced Bran Llyr, who became Joseph of Arimathea's brother-in-law through King Cole that produced King Lucius in 180 C.E. This was the parallel Grail dynasty to that of Arthur. King Lucius's daughter, Eurgen, then married two distinct Davidic successions through James (Joseph of Arimathea).

Gardner recorded the second Davidic succession derived through Jesus when Eurgen married Aminadab, the great grandson of Jesus and Mary Magdalene through Josue. Faramund, of the Merovingian dynasty, was documented as a direct Messianic successor descended from Jesus through Aminadab, who married Eurgen. They begat Catheloys, who begat Manael, who begat Titurel, who begat Boaz, who begat Frotmond, who begat Faramund,[5] which produced the Merovingian dynasty. One wonders, did this Merovingian Titurel hold any significance chronologically or figuratively with Wolfram Eshenbach's work Titurel, The Keepers of the Message?

This enigmatic dynasty is believed to have adopted its appellation from Morovech/Merovech, son of King Clodiu, who was also recorded as Moroveus, father of Childeric I, ruler of the Salian Franks.[6] Meroveus was proclaimed the guardian of the Franks in 448 C.E. at Tournai. Clovis, who became king in 481 C.E., was the most prominent of the Merovingian kings and thus reckoned to be the founder of the united French monarchy.[7] The Franks resided south of the Rhine River, and the Salians dwelled north of the Rhine. Clovis became king of the Salian Franks in 481 C.E.,[8] uniting all of the Franks in 496 C.E., which likely is why Clovis was reckoned as the founder of the Merovingian dynasty.[9] In 507 C.E., Clovis and the Bergundians conquered Aquitaine and Languedoc, but Clovis and his Salian Franks were unable to acquire Septmania or Narbonne from the Visigoths for two more centuries.[10]

Morovech's mother was mythologized to have been impregnated by a Quinataur, a mythical creature possessing characteristics like a bull. According to Laidler, the Quinataur was a similar mythological being to the Minotaur, both of which were monsters that possessed the head of a bull,[11] which suggests connections to the cult of the bull, the sacred animal and religion of Poseidon,[12] and to the bull cult of Canaan, which is also connected to the Minotaur. Morovech's mother was believed impregnated by King Clodiu simultaneously with the Quinataur.

Matriarchal bloodlines are quintessential in Grail, Rex Deus, Ring, Fairy, and Dragon bloodlines. All the female heirs were very carefully selected from the true Albi-Gens/Grail bloodline.[13] The Quinataur was merely Legomin language concealing the truth.

The bull holds an indelible significance to the Benjamites, perhaps suggesting Morovech bound two bloodlines through his veins,[14] with the Quinataur representing the bull cult bloodlines of Atlantis, Nephilim, fairies, and the Ring Lords, along with Benjamite traditions. This additionally confirms that the rebellious Benjamites of Scripture,[15] who were driven from Israel, were, in fact, dominated by the rebellious counter cult and religion of the bull, the Minotaur cult of Molech, Atlantis, and Nephilim. Clearly, though, the allegory was suggesting two distinct bloodlines. Likely both joint Israelite origins were at play in Morovech's bloodline, but one of the bloodlines was felt necessary to conceal, through allegory, things concerning the Dragon Court. The Quinataur was variantly known as a sea serpent or dragon, which also somehow ties this guarded bloodline back to Atlantis and Nephilim.

The royal, matriarchal lineage of the Merovingians, as noted by Gardner, descended not coincidently from the Sicambriums through Queen Cambra. The Sicambriums were originally from the mysterious nation of Scythia, north of the Black Sea,[16] just as the Alains were from the Black Sea area. The Sicambriums were a Celtic/Teutonic/Aryan tribe that was also believed to have carried high concentrations of Israelite bloodlines stemming from wandering Benjamites.[17] These details mesh neatly with the

Priory's belief that a branch of the Merovingian dynasty originated with a lost tribe from Benjamin that first migrated to Greece and then Germany, becoming the people identified as the Sicambrium Franks, the people that later intermarried with a descendant of Mary Magdalene and Jesus.[18] The Sicambrium queen who married the descendant was Argotta of the Sicambriums; she married the Fisher King Faramond, who reigned from 419–430 C.E.[19]

According to Keith Laidler, the Merovingians seem to have appeared royally mature before the Sicambrium Franks crossed the Rhine, because their legacy almost came about suddenly, fully formed, and widely accepted as royal; they were almost instantaneously exalted with a most mysterious pedigree.[20] No doubt this mysterious pedigree derived from all their diverse and alleged Messianic and royal bloodlines. At that time, there would not have been any kingships that held a competitive pedigree other than the Grail kingships of England.

As we have already noted, Faramund was the grandson of Boaz Anfortas, a direct descendant of Aminadbad, who was the son of Josue, son of Josephes, son of Jesus. It was Faramund and Argotta that begat Clodiu, who begat Meroveus, who begat Childeric, who begat Clovus, the founder of the official Merovingian dynasty.[21] This background lends itself harmoniously with the Merovingians' belief they were descended from Jesus, as well as others holding royal pedigrees of the highest and most royal orders.

The Fisher Kings, the Merovingians, were a numinous dynasty mythologized to have possessed mystical power to communicate with animals, manipulate the weather, and heal the sick by the touching of hands, just as Jesus did.[22] They wore their hair very long, never cutting it, in the tradition of the scriptural Israeli Nazarites,[23] the most famous of whom was Samson,[24] who the Merovingians and Gnostics held in curiously high esteem. Laidler further notes that all of the Merovingians possessed a curious red, cross-shaped birthmark located either above the heart or between the shoulder blades,[25] representing their true heritage. Merovingians were sorcerer kings in the same spirit as King Solomon, with his judgment and wisdom, as well as his (alleged) prowess as a (Masonic) mystical magician in the Ring Lord tradition.[26] The Merovingian kings were extravagant polygamists after the spirit of the pharaohs, David, the Nephilim, Lamech, and of course, Solomon.[27]

The Roman Church overlooked all of those violations and numinous powers, according to Laidler, for the Merovingians were held in such high regard (fear) by the Mother Church that the Merovingians became known to be "mysterious."[28] The violations also were ostensibly overlooked because of (alleged, false) knowledge of Jesus' survival from the crucifixion and of the (alleged) heirs Jesus spawned thereof, which produced the various Grail kingships.

Between the fifth and eighth centuries C.E., Gardner notes the Merovingian kings regarded their bloodlines as being so pure that they could not be ennobled by any match. Understandably, the Catholic Church despised the Merovingians and perpetually plotted in secrecy to overthrow them, finally succeeding in 750 C.E. It also explains the Inquisitions, wars, and persecutions of the Cathars and other Gnostics, who also held many of these so-called truths, as well as the Templars, whom the Catholic Church subsequently destroyed. The Cathars were fully conversant with the Grail and Ring culture, fondly referring to the false messianic bloodline as "the Shining Ones of the Elven Race."[29]

The mysterious Merovingian kings were exalted as Priest Kings or Shepherd Kings (Fisher Kings), servants of the people[30] in the Gnostic tradition; they obviously inherited the title from the Alain family. To this day, they have many modern heirs who claim royal descent from the Merovingians, including the Hapsburg/Lorraine family, the Plantards, the Luxembourgs, the Sinclairs,[31] and Plantagenets, all of whom are Rex Deus. To this end, the Plantards received their surname that means "ardently flowering shoot" while they were settling in the Rennes-le-Chateau district of southern France.[32]

Many French and English monarchies carried the Plantagenet name between 1100 and 1600. None of them are more pertinent to this cause than the Plantagents of Normandy. In fact, the Plantards secretly descended from the last surviving Merovingian son of Dagobert, Sigisbert IV; he was safely housed away from the reach of the Roman Catholic Church in southern France. Sigisbert's son, Theoderic, married Alda, producing the famous Guillen Gellone.[33]

In 1151 the empress widow Mathilda of Germany, married the Count of Anjou, Geoffrey Plantagenet. King Louis VII of France, under the watchful eye of his wife, Eleanor of Aquitaine, gifted the Duchy of Normandy to Henry Plantagenet, the son of Mathilda and Geoffrey, as an act of diplomacy. In 1152, the Council of Beaugency annulled the marriage between King Louis and Eleanor, and Eleanor then married Henry Tudor, bringing with her a dowry of almost half the territory of what is France today. (Keep in mind that Henry held legitimate rights to the throne of England through his mother.) By 1154, Henry Plantagenet inherited the throne of England. Eleanor then had her two daughters engaged to Henry's two sons, Henry the Younger and Richard the Lionheart.[34]

The English dynasty descending from the Rex Deus Normans William the Conqueror and Henry Plantagenet ultimately then produced King Edward II of England, who fought Bruce at Bannockburn. Edward's surname was also Plantagenet,[35] of Anjou. The Norman kings gave way to the Plantagenet dynasty during the reign of Richard the Lionheart. Richard was very likely a member of the Templars, if not a Templar Master. He never hesitated to don the Templar uniform and was known to regularly wear Templar garments.[36]

The Plantagenet of Anjou was a junior offshoot of the Royal Picte, the Sidhe of Anjou;[37] the Picts of Scotland were the infamous third race of the Tuatha Denaan. Both Henry Anjou and Henry II superseded the Norman line in 1154, for Henry's mother had married Count Geoffrey Plantagenet of Anjou.[38] The latter part of the English Plantagenet dynasty and its reigning king of that time, Richard III, were usurped from power in 1485 by Henry VII, which then established the (non Rex Deus) house of Tudor.[39] Richard III, not coincidently, was another king portrayed by Shakespeare in the play of the same name.

Shakespeare's tragedy Henry VII (Plantagenet) contained the Hebrew-based Grail legend that Cain was slain (possibly by Lamech) at Damascus.[40] This location derives from Genesis, where Cain migrated to live in the land of Nod, East of Eden.[41] This is the Damascus described by the prophet Amos, where the king of wickedness (Cain) reigned in Beth Eden.[42] All this was known in Rex Deus lore, which Shakespeare obviously was conversant with.[43] "East of Eden" remains to this day an allegory of rebellion and things done contrary to God's ways. Add to this Legominism spirit the fact that Francis Bacon was a generous patron of Shakespeare and that Shakespeare's literature is inexplicably saturated with troubadour themes, imageries, and characters. Indeed, according to Booth, Hamlet and Ophelia descended from the troubadours.[44] Shakespeare had extensive knowledge about ancient poets and authors and was intimate with the antediluvian epoch and all its secrets. In fact, Shakespeare considered the works of Plutarch his "storehouse of learned knowledge." Shakespeare owes his outlook on classical history and many of his most famous characters and plots to Plutarch.[45]

Shakespeare was influenced by Ovid, the opulent Roman poet, circa 42 B.C.E. to 16 C.E. Ovid was the author of 250 stories of Greek and Roman mythology that included these Nephilim: Deucalion and Pyrrha, Phaethon, Theseus, Hercules, Adonis, and Orpheus. Ovid further authored Heroides, the love letters of the women of the Heroic Age to their (Nephilim) lovers/husbands.[46] Augustus expelled Ovid from Rome after he completed his opus, Metamorphoses, a collection of stories that knitted together tales of the beginning with the Primeval Chaos; early, prehistoric life; the Titan rebellion; and Caesar transforming into a star,[47] just as Osiris did. None of this is coincidence.

Swinging back around to older Frankish genealogy, the first king of Septmania was Theoderic, known in Grail lore as Aymery. He was a Jew recognized as a seed of David and was believed a Merovingian.[48] The Carolingian, King Pepin the Short, in 768 C.E., permitted the Septimanian Jewish kingdom established within the territory of Burgundy. This Jewish state was created, no doubt, to encourage the succeeding heir to the Merovingian dynasty that was toppled in 751 C.E. Septmania functioned as a semi-autonomous state, and even though it was geographically part of France, it was politically aligned with northern Spain, with the Count of Toulouse as its overlord. This kingdom included the constituency of Languedoc[49] and was home to the Templars, Essenes, Cathars, Alains, Gnostics, and Rex Deus.

Theodoric's son, the famous Guillen de Gellone, rose to prominence as both a Jew and a Merovingian of royal blood.[50] As discussed previously, this lineage became recognized as the Plantard family. During this period, Pope Stephan and the Caliph of Baghdad allegedly acknowledged Prince Guillen De Gellone as a true bloodline successor from the Royal House of Judah, King David. This is the famous Guillen, ancestor of Godfrois the Templar, who established the Judaic Academy at Gellone, known as St. Guilhelm at Gellone,[51] where St. Bernard studied the Jerusalem scrolls.

We have already learned that the Dossier Secrets of the Priory of Sion refers to the Merovingians descending from Benjamite blood. Adding to this unexplained connection is the date December 23, for it was sacred to both the tribe of Benjamin and the Merovingians; it was the feast day of Dagobert.[52] After the Benjamite/Israeli war over Belial worship (Satan),[53] many Benjamites escaped into exile in Greece[54] (Scythia). This connects well with another tradition citing Merovingian descent from the mixing of Trojan blood with that of Israelite exiles, for it certainly places them in the correct geographical location for such a thing to occur.[55] Benjamite exiles migrated to Greece/Scythia, then up the Danube River and Rhine River, where they intermarried with Sicambrium Franks,[56] neatly wrapping all these assorted Merovingian legends into a cohesive legacy.

Godfrois VI of Templar fame was also from Merovingian descent,[57] and therefore of Benjaminite descent, along with his other disparate pedigrees. Joshua allocated Jerusalem to be a Benjaminite birthright,[58] which is why Templar founders, descendants of the Merovingians, positioned themselves to become the kings of Jerusalem after the Crusade liberated the city.

Capping all this off is the tradition that according to Gnostic writers, Mary Magdalene was also of Benjamite, royal descent.[59] Paul Blezard and Peter Blake write that Mary Magdalene was born to Syrus the Jairus, chief priest at Capernaum, while her mother, Eucharias, was related to the Hasmonians, the descendants of the Maccabees, the royalty of Israel of that time.[60] The Maccabees/Hasmonians reigned from 165 to 37 B.C.E., when they were overthrown by Herod and the Romans. It was the Maccabees who ousted the Zadokite/Essene priests and Davidic lineage from Jerusalem and the temple, preventing the Zadokites from succeeding to the high priesthood of the temple.[61] No doubt the Maccabees saw the Zadokite priesthood as a possible threat and alternative to the Jerusalem monarchy.

Gardner writes that Mary, indeed, was of high Hasmonian stock and was designated the Magdal-eder, the Watch Tower of the flock,[62] which no doubt answers the mystery from the spurious perspective about her last name. Gardner goes on to write that Mary the Magdal-eder, the guardian of the flock, was represented in tarot cards by the tower known as “the Mary

Arcana."[63] Gardner believes Mary was a Gnostic Essene priestess who anointed Jesus as Messiah in 33 C.E. at Bethany.[64] Gardner also believes that Jesus and Mary were married at Bethany.[65] Scripture does not specifically record Mary Magdalene anointing Jesus at Bethany. Matthew and Mark do not provide any names for this woman, while John does cite Mary, but not "Mary Magdalene," as she is generally distinguished in Scripture. (See Matt. 26:6; Mark 14:1; and John 12:1–3.)

Gardner also states that Mary was always associated with wisdom (Sophia) and symbolized by the sun, moon, and a halo of stars,[66] just as the Mary apparition of Medjugoria is depicted, in the forged image of the woman of Revelation 12. The point to all this is simply that through the genealogy of Jesus and the purported royal priestess Mary Magdalene, the royal Benjamite bloodline was allegedly also inserted into the Merovingian bloodline.

Pope Zachary toppled the Merovingian dynasty in 751 C.E. and replaced it with his own chosen alternative dynasty[67] that was designed to be loyal to Catholicism and not Gnosticism. Childeric III was to succeed Charles Martel, but Childeric was thrown into jail and died there four years later, Charles's illegitimate son, Pepin the Short, succeeded to the French throne.[68]

After the fall of the Merovingian dynasty, no heirs were believed to have survived. However, Priory records indicate that there was a surviving heir saved from papal assassination named Sigisbert, son of Dagobert, who intermingled through marriage with other surviving Merovingian bloodlines and the Frankish Royal Lineage descending from Guillem de Gellone, the grandfather of Godfrois de Bouillon,[69] founder of the Knights Templar. Not only was Godfrois a Merovingian descendant through these bloodlines, but also he was a descendant of Lonhengrin, the famous Swan Knight and son of Parzival from Arthurian and Grail lore,[70] connecting the Grail bloodline back into the modern Templar and Merovingian mix.

Godfrois was a founder of the Templars, the Priory of Sion, and a member of Rex Deus, specifically of Merovingian descent. He was, therefore, not coincidentally crowned, but he was crowned with what was believed due biblical Benjamite inheritance, as recorded in Joshua, as the king of Jerusalem when the Crusaders retook Jerusalem in the name of Christianity,[71] all because of Godfrois's purported Merovingian and Benjamite bloodlines through Guillem de Gellone. Other Templar writers noted that Godfrois accepted the title of Champion of the Holy Sepulcher in 1099 C.E., but turned down the title of King of Jerusalem. Godefrois died one year later, but his brother, Baudoin, the Count of Edessa (the ancient home of the Cathars), was later crowned King of Jerusalem in 1118 C.E. The title later fell to another Rex Deus member, the Count Foulques of Anjou (Plantagenet), after Baudoin.[72]

The title “King of Jerusalem” is an ancient Rex Deus title of legacy and inheritance that claims the physical and literal rights to Jerusalem. The king of Spain currently holds this title. This Rex Deus title will once more be claimed in the last days of this age by the Rex Deus Antichrist, when he establishes himself as god in the holy temple of Jerusalem, the abomination that causes desolation.

CHAPTER 66

THE TROJANS

> The sons of Japheth: Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Tubal, Meshech and Tiras.
> —Genesis 10:2 and 1 Chronicles 1:5

Does the house of Camelot and Morovech make any eccentric ancestral claims that link them back to prehistory and the Nephilim?

The Merovingians were considered successors from the first race of kings of France. The name France originated with the first king of the Franks, Francio, a king mythologized as descending from Noah.[1]

Francio's race was believed to have migrated from Troy, in northwest Turkey, bringing their branch of royal blood to Gaul. The Trojans settled in the districts that are now called Troyes and Paris, naming these cities after their home and their Greek hero who started the famous Trojan War over Helen.[2] One wonders whether or not the story of Helen of Troy was an ancient form of Rex Deus/Dragon literature in the same spirit as Grail and Shakespearian literature and Ovid's Heroides.[3]

Not coincidently, the British, too, believe in ancient legends linking their heritage back to Troy. These legends indicate that ancient Britons migrated from Troy, from tribes led by a Trojan hero named Britu,[4] one of the many nomatives from which Britain derived. Furthermore, other legends suggest London's Celtic name from antiquity was Lloegress, which owned an even more mystical name dating even further back into antiquity, documented as Troja Newydd, or New Troy.[5]

According to the medieval historian and Grail author/chronologist Geoffrey of Monmouth, Brutus of Troy was the grandson of Aeneus, founder of the Romans in Greek mythology. Brutus was the hero of legend who rebelled against the Greeks three generations after the fall of Troy, escaping the wrath of the Greeks by sailing with his people past the Pillars of Hercules to an island known today as Britain.[6] They freed Britain from a race of giants led by Gog, Magog, and Albion, who were identified and linked back to the Greek Titans by Geoffrey Monmouth.[7] Gog is known to many as a translation or synonym for “giant.”

Brutus and his victorious followers settled along the banks of the Thames River, naming it Troia Nova (New Troy), or Trinovantum.[8] Brutus’s ancient kingdom of Britain became identified as Albion,[9] likely in honor of the giant/ Nephilim king. Albion is the earliest name by which Britain was known, and the name was used by Aristotle.[10] It is likely that refugee British giants married into Brutus’s Celtic progeny, which helps to answer Neneneius’s claims. Nenneius concluded Britains were descended from Brutus, citing a genealogy that traced back through Aeneus; to Javan; and to his father, Japheth,[11] son of Noah.

Ancient Welsh legends also record three waves of Trojan Khymry immigration that were made up first of the tribe of Cymrey. The second invasion came from the tribe of the Lloegrians, and the third invasion derived from the Brython tribe of Llydaw. All three were of the same language, culture, and race. Lloegres was the ancient appellation for southern and central England, while Cymrey was the name given for Wales, northern England, Cornwall, and the Scottish border region. After the death of Brutus, Britain split into three kingdoms under the rule of his three sons. The names of those three kingdoms became known as Lloegres, Cymry, and Albyne.[12]

Connecting all this together, then, we understand that the area of northwest Turkey, the region of Troy, was known in antiquity as Galatia.[13] Note additionally that the Black Sea region is the originating home of the Celts, according to historians, and home of the Scythians and Sarmatians. The Greeks knew the Celts as Keltoi or Galatia, while the Romans knew the Celts as a tall, “fair-skinned” (fairy) people.[14] The Romans, in a similar manner as with the Greeks, also knew the Celts as the Celtae and Galatai. Julius Caesar, in De Bello Gallico, referred to the Celts first as Gauls.[15]

Celt appears to have originated with the Celts, for they referred to themselves in their own language as Celts. Some scholars think Celt derived from the root kel, the Old Irish celim, meaning "hidden," suggesting they were the hidden people or people that concealed things. Celt, in another version, is thought to have derived from the European root quel, meaning "elevated," which then evolved to Old Irish as Celthe. The Celts regarded themselves as the elevated or noble race.[16]

The noble Celt was a blond, blue-eyed warrior (from the Norse stock), while the Irish, British, Welsh, and Scottish noble Celt had red hair and pale green eyes from Scythian descent. Both possessed strikingly similar characteristics to the Tuatha Denaan and fairies[17] and identical descriptions to those provided for Atlanteans in the first half of this book.

Galatea translates as "milky white," just as Nephilim had milky white, rough skin. In truth, Greek writers often commented on the milky white skin of the Celts.[18] Thus the noble Celts were fair-skinned, with blond or red hair and blue or green eyes, characteristics that Hitler and the Nazis would later ascribe to their new master race of Nordic Aryans, the New Man.

The Celts occupied Ireland, Scotland, England, France, Germany, Spain, and other parts of Europe during the empire of Rome. The Celts of Britain, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales, in part, all descended from Galatia, the Trojans, just as the Franks of Gaul did. The Celts of Galatia were the very same people to whom Paul preached.[19] Both the Grail kingships of England and France were mysteriously embedded in Celtic, Scythian, and Trojan mythology and ancestry.

Even more intriguing is that Berosus cited a giant named Celtes (Celt), who fathered a giantess daughter named Galtea, who mothered a giant son named Gelathes.[20] Appianos of Alexandria, circa 160 C.E., wrote regarding two kings, Keltos and Galas, the founders of the Celts, who were the progeny of the cyclopes, Polyphemus and his wife, Galatea. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, circa first century B.C.E., recorded the story of Keltos being the son of Hercules and his consort, Asterope, the daughter of Atlas, which is very similar to Diodorus Siculus's account, circa 60–30 B.C.E., where the

Celts originated with Galates, whose parents were Hercules and a daughter of the king of Gaul.[21]

Scythia, too, has it name linked in lore with giants. Again, let us not forget that King Og, according to Josephus and Scripture, was the king of Gilead and Gaulantis,[22] which sets one to wondering about the connections between Og and Celts. All this Legomin mythology is just too coincidental not to be connected chronologically with Nephilim and Aryans, including the Rex Deus bloodlines of the Grail kingships.

Did the Celts (Trojans) that settled Britain merely follow in the footsteps of their forefathers, giants who settled in Britain led by Albion, Gog, and Magog? Did other refugee Nephilim also escape to Britain when they were pushed out of the Mediterranean? Gog, Magog, and their counterparts— were they the giants of English legend that were likely the Gyges of Greek mythology? The answers are probably "yes," according to The Encyclopedia Americana. Titans were famous as the Gyges, which we discussed in the first half of this book and which were typical names for kings in northwest Assyria,[23] the Black Sea region of the Trojans.

Moreover, Magog, Gog, and Javan were all sons of Japheth (Greece/ Iapeth) who settled Turkey and Greece, according to the Bible.[24] Also understand that the Scythians of Greece and the Black Sea region, according to Scripture, descended from Magog and Gog, giants. Remember, too, the Greeks descended from Japheth and Javan, the patriarchs that Nenneius cited, whereby British genealogical origins ran through Brutus to Javan and Japheth. Finally, consider that the Benjamites, after the Belial (Satan) war, migrated to Scythia and formed part of the Merovingian bloodline, which grafted itself into the Celtic/British/Welsh Grail dynasties.

Therefore, appreciate that tantalizing French claims to the same Rex Deus/Dragon Court heritage are not so fantastic when considered alongside the British claims, for they are likely one and the same claim. In fact, an Italian monk and chronologist, Annius of Viterbo (1432–1502 C.E.), as fantastic as it might first sound, asserted that Noah was a giant. Annius further created a complete genealogy from Noah, Japheth, Ham, and Shem, linking them with the first kings of the Celtic/Frankish Gauls, which founded most of the French nobility.[25]

All this genealogical voodoo has been cleverly encoded into all forms of Rex Deus cultural arts and literature of every form, including operas, fairy tales, Shakespearean literature, and Grail and Ring legends to delude a future generation.

CHAPTER 67

THE HOUSE OF STUART

> Have nothing to do with godless myths and old wives tales, rather train yourself to be godly.
> —1 Timothy 4:7

All this Celtic Christian, royal mythology comprising French, British, Welsh, Scottish, and Irish genealogies eventually came together in one famous royal house, the Stuart dynasty.[1] Therefore, what is the undisclosed importance of the connection of all these mythical bloodlines within the House of Stuart to The Genesis 6 Conspiracy?

The Stuart dynasty descends back to 1296, to the crowning of Robert the Bruce, the famous Rex Deus[2] protectorate of the refugee Knights Templar. When Robert the Bruce failed to produce a son, his daughter’s son founded the Stuart dynasty, naming no less than eight kings after James the brother of Jesus.[3]

The Rex Deus House of Stuart holds a very special place in Rex Deus history, as well as in the future plans of Rex Deus. The Stuart dynasty was one of the longest-reigning European dynasties, nearly 300 years. It emerged as the primary successor to the Grail/Ring Lord culture and was the most prominent and influential dynasty subsequent to the Merovingians.[4]

According to Baigent and Leigh, the Stuart designation derived from the Shenk, the family name of the Stauffenbergs that descended from the German Hohenstauffen dynasty, evolving from a court title, steward, meaning "Cup-Bearer" (Grail) in one variant of its application,[5] all in the spirit of Baal, the Cup-Bearer for the god El.[6] The Stauffenberg clans were cup-bearers for the Counts of Zollen.[7] One further wonders at the relationship between Sargon the Great of Kish and descendant of Nimrod, who was the Cup-Bearer from 2300 B.C.E.[8] Cup-bearers are kings in waiting.[9] One wonders, could this be Legominism for the Antichrist in waiting? It was the mystique of the Hohenstauffen emperors and, in particular, Fredrich II and the thirteenth-century C.E. epic Nibelungenlied that sprang the foundation for Wolfram Von Eschenbach's Grail enterprises and Wagner's Ring.[10]

The Stuarts united the Scottish and English crowns in 1603, after the death of Elizabeth I, inheriting the former, parallel Norman and Plantagenet Rex Deus/Dragon Court crown derived from William the Conqueror in 1066. Remember, the alleged Rex Deus crown was usurped by the Tudors and Henry VII. Elizabeth I never married; she did not produce an heir, so the crown passed to the son of her archrival, Mary Queen of Scots. This was James VI, king of Scotland since 1567; he became renowned as James I of England. Now, James I of England was a Freemason,[11] just as all the Scottish kings after Bruce were likely Freemasons.

James II inherited the throne from Charles II in 1680. He was Charles's Catholic brother, who was driven from the throne in 1688 by Parliament and replaced by the Protestant William and Mary of Orange. Mary, and then Anne, were Protestant Stuarts. James II then courted King Louis XIV of France, raising an army of Irish Catholics, which was soundly defeated at the Battle of Boyne in 1690. This was the beginning of the Jacobite movement. Continental Masonry denoting European, Central American, and South American Freemasonry then arrived in France in 1688, with James II and the Jacobites. Freemasonry consequently expanded rapidly within France until 1789 and the French Revolution.[12] Queen Anne of Orange was the last of the Stuarts to reign over England and Scotland. She bore no heirs and, therefore, was replaced in 1714 by Parliament with her German cousin, The Elector, George of Hanover,[13] simply because he was Protestant. The Hanovers were not considered Stuarts or Rex Deus.

The year 1707 brought forth the famous treaty that created a new entity, the United Kingdom of Great Britain. The entity was conceived in part because England believed a United Kingdom would prevent Scotland from being employed as a base for future Stuart countercoups. This was thought about in Catholic terms, but after 1714, with the death of Queen Anne, it served as an endeavor to prevent or crush any Stuart countercoups, Catholic or Protestant. Scotland’s last parliamentary sitting indelibly marked the end of the Scottish Feudal Order, the “Bodie Politicke” that began with Robert the Bruce.[14]

Catholic Jacobite support passed on to James the Pretender when George became King of England. James was supported by the Earl of Mar, with a 10,000-man army. The Duke of Argyle defeated James the Pretender and the Earl of Mar at Sheriffmuir in 1715, sending James back into exile in France in 1716. There he remained until his death.

In 1742, England found herself at war again with France and Spain. Bonnie Prince Charlie, son of James the Pretender, was then activated by France, for the French saw a rare opportunity to deliver her ancient rival a crushing blow, once and for all times, by defeating England through Charlie and reinstating the Stuarts onto the English throne. Unfortunately for Bonnie Prince Charlie, French support stalled after the French fleet was lost off the English coast due to a storm, but Bonnie Prince Charlie pressed on and was soundly defeated in 1745.[15]

The establishment of the Royal House of Stuart thereby unified two distinct Rex Deus bloodlines containing Davidic and Jesus bloodlines in marriage, through reuniting the Celtic kings of Britain with Merovingian descendants. The dynastic avenue enabling Merovingian dynastic survival in Scotland came about just after the fall of the Merovingian dynasty, with the binding treaty struck between King Eochaid IV of the Scotts, sixth generation descendant of Arthur’s brother and dynastic successors of Tara, and with Emperor Charlemagne of the Franks in 807 C.E. Charlemagne, interestingly enough, was the very same king who reconfirmed the independence of the Jewish kingdom of Septmania, the other surviving Merovingian bloodline, which his father, King Pepin, had originally permitted to be established in 768 C.E.[16]

Pope Zachary replaced the Merovingians, and specifically Childeric III, with a family of mayors, the Carolingians, beginning with Pepin the Short. The legendary Charlemagne was coronated the Holy Roman Emperor by the pope in a surprise gambit on Christmas day, 800 C.E. Charlemagne then presided over the first European Renaissance, referred to as the "Carolingian Renaissance." Charlemagne is famous for pushing back Muslim incursions, saving all Europe for the Christians.[17] Because Pope Leo III crowned Charlemagne the first Holy Roman Emperor, all subsequent kings of France were thus regarded to be the Protectors of the Roman Church.[18] This loyalty to Catholicism by the French kings helps us to understand their part in the Inquisitions and the toppling of the Templars, as well as the French Revolution's Gnostic desire to eradicate both Christianity and the monarchy loyal to Christianity.

Charlemagne's dream of a united Europe lives on today within the Priory of Sion and other spurious organizations. In fact, Charlemagne's empire included Germany, Austria, Switzerland, the Low Countries, France, Czechoslovakia, and parts of Italy—regions known in history as the First Reich of the Holy Roman Empire ruled by Caesars/Kaisers, while Otto Von Bismarck's empire of the nineteenth century was the Second Reich.[19]

Charlemagne eventually, in a surprising move, began to distance himself from Rome. He then further distanced himself by marrying back into the Merovingian bloodline through wedding the Elf Princess Frastrada.[20] All this is not so surprising when you learn about the true beliefs and allegiances that Charlemagne likely inherited from his family.

Pepin was the illegitimate son of Charles Martel, known also as Carolus Martel, from which the Carolingian name originated.[21] Martel has been noted by some Freemasonry writers as playing a prominent role in reestablishing Masonry in France.[22] Charles Martel was an erudite Mason in the Sacred Sciences (and thus a Gnostic); Namus Graecus taught him. Martel continually patronized the Masons with support and charters permitting the Masons to flourish.[23] According to Paul Naudon, Martel employed the knowledge he gained from Namus Graecus to teach France the Mysteries. Thus, Martel was credited with introducing the originating Old Gothic style of architecture into France.[24] Charlemagne was a great supporter and contributor to the Sacred Sciences and Arts,[25] thereby identifying Charlemagne as both a Mason and a Gnostic in secret. Charlemagne is believed by some to have been secretly initiated into the Mysteries.[26] All this supports French kings protecting Septmania and Guilhelm's university.

After considering all this, one then begins to postulate about the possible and plausible connection between Charlemagne and the Benedictine/ Cistercian monk Rabanus Maurus, the Abbey of Faulda (the mole), who was regarded as the greatest and most learned Sage in the Frankish Empire during Charlemagne's reign and of whom it was said there was no equal in the matters of Scripture, Cannon Law, and liturgy. It was Rabanus who in 819 C.E., individually defined each of the Seven Liberal Sciences for his generation and also wrote the controversial book Life of Mary Magdalene.[27] The Carolingian dynasty reigned until 987 C.E.; then it was once more replaced by the Vatican-controlled Carpetian dynasty.[28]

The 807 C.E. Scottish and Merovingian alliance was renewed and then reconsummated through the Rex Deus Bruces of Normandy, with their (opportunistic) marriage into the McAlpin dynasty (that descended from King Eochaid IV).[29] This marriage united the Dalriada Kingship of Tara and Ireland with the Merovingians,[30] the Celtic Dalriada dynasty of the Grail and Arthur, and the Rex Deus Norse bloodlines of Rollo. The Celtic kingship rooted in the Dalriada bloodline of Tara included King Arthur's bloodline; his full title was King Arthur Mac Aedian of Dalriada.[31] This explains why the Stuarts are celebrated as the House of Unicorn,[32] because the Stuart dynasty united all the Rex Deus royal bloodlines.

The Stuarts believed in Hermetic principles (Gnosticism). They manipulated these beliefs to justify James I's Divine Right of Kings, whereby the king was God's representative on earth, answerable only to God, and in truth, a little god.[33] This doctrine was fully implemented by James I of England[34] and, therefore, was most instrumental in causing the English civil war led by Cromwell, which temporarily interrupted the Stuart guardianship of the English crown. The Scotts believe that one day a hero will return to restore them to their rightful position; they believed Bonnie Prince Charlie was at one time that deliverer.[35]

This further explicates one of the enigmatic, legendary beginnings to and survival of Freemasonry. One of its legends wraps itself around the restoration of the Stuart House to the throne of England,[36] replacing the Protestant Hanoverian dynasty, all en route to the New Atlantis. Supporters of the Stuart restoration became known in history as Jacobites, both inside and outside the Craft.

In Aramaic, "James" is spelled as Ya'akov and was generally translated as "Jacob."[37] In the same manner, "James" was originally known in Hebrew as Ya'akov and was translated into Greek as "Jacobus."[38] It was then rendered as Jacomus in Latin and then in Spanish as Jaime. The 1611 translation of the King James Version of the Bible employed "James" in place of "Jacob," causing Jacob to be recognized as James ever since.[39] Jacobism, then, derived from the Latin (and Greek) Jacobus (Jacomus) for "James," as in James the Pretender.[40]

Consider, as well, that this unifying House of Stuart additionally united the Benjamite Royal House stemming from Mary Magdalene and the Sicambrium Franks, along with the royal houses of the Israelites, who were separated at the Exodus via the Akenhaten. The Scota connection, along with the surviving remnant of the royal line of the northern nation of Israel after the Assyrian Diaspora, salted with the Davidic union of bloodlines through Temar at the first Judean Diaspora, were all part of the Unicorn mystique. The House of Stuart additionally reunited all relevant Scythian, Sarmatian, and Trojan bloodlines through Arthur.

The symbolic importance of Rex Deus concealed within the House of Stuart is staggering. The House of Stuart deliberately chose the family colors of green and gold, the official colors of both the House of David and Rex Deus;[41] the Stuarts are the contemporary House of Gold. The Stuart bloodline is one of the most plausible bloodlines to produce the Antichrist.

CHAPTER 68

GUARDIANS OF THE ANTICHRIST

> He will oppose and will exalt himself over everything that is called God or is worshipped, so that he sets himself up in God’s temple, proclaiming himself to be God.
> —2 Thessalonians 2:4

All we have learned thus far regarding the House of Stuart demonstrates a frightening importance Rex Deus places upon the continuity and purity of those bloodlines. Therefore, are Rex Deus and Priory of Sion organizations the true guardians protecting the bloodlines of the Antichrist?

That Rex Deus should document so thoroughly and with such dedicated determination that they can trace the genealogy of their royal progeny, even though history has recorded an end to the Stuart dynastic and the Merovingian dynastic succession, is a disturbing testimony to their fanaticism and dedication.

Expect that Rex Deus records will produce documented support for surviving Stuart heirs, just as they recorded the surviving heirs to the Merovingian dynasty, which secular historians have overlooked. We should anticipate the unveiling of these bloodlines to support the future Antichrist's pedigree in his astonishing ascent to power.

The future Antichrist will step out of the secretive and reticent Rex Deus shadows and into the public light to reclaim the mythologized city of Jerusalem and the Rex Deus, dissonant title the King of Jerusalem, just as the Antichrist is prophesied to fulfill the infamous abomination in the holy temple of Jerusalem.[1] We should also expect that Rex Deus Houses will play indelible roles to usher in world government. However, the broader and coveted agenda of the hidden hand will be to put their Merovingian messiah descending from their alleged holy bloodlines on the world throne.

Rex Deus will submit documented claims as official proof the future, false messiah will be of indisputable royal blood, a pedigree of all the important royal houses that ever laid claim to the thrones of Israel and Europe and residual Nephilim bloodlines. Who will be able to dispute such forgeries? And who will be able to refute the Antichrist's denial of Jesus as the Christ? Remember, these claims will be false, just as this individual will be the false messiah: "He will be succeeded by a contemptible person who has not been given the honor of royalty" (Dan. 11:21). The Antichrist will not be of royal bloodlines, according to Scripture, even though Rex Deus will assert otherwise. The throne the impostor will temporarily seize is the throne promised to Jesus. The Rex Deus assertions are based in mythology and lies, not in fact. Jesus will take possession of his rightful inheritance after the three-and-onehalf ordained years of the Antichrist have come to pass, but all the prophesied miseries and calamities must first take place during the reign of the Beast.

Let us go back to the Freemasons, the heirs to the Templar knowledge and treasures and the heirs to the Rex Deus knowledge and legacy. In general, those at the inner circle of Freemasonry believe the world will soon knock at Freemasonry's door for their sovereigns and pontiffs; they believe that soon Freemasons will rule the world.[2] The globalist forces have shown remarkable patience over the millennia, but this is not a testament to their discipline of awaiting the right opportunity. Rather, they are working diligently on a fantastic scheme that has its own preordained schedule[3] that Freemasons are well aware of and that I believe will be completely carried out in this inclement generation. This preordained schedule is confirmed within the Priory of Sion, for they also have a specific day set aside in the future when they will scandalously reveal their secret documents to the world regarding the genealogy of Jesus and Mary Magdalene.[4] They will do this as part of their organized conspiracy to devalue Jesus and destroy Christianity as part of their march to global occupation and world government.

Let us now bring the conspiracy full circle by examining the connections of Rex Deus to Freemasonry and Templarism. The most obvious connection derives from the founding of Freemasonry in Scotland, shortly after the breakup of the Knights Templar. The most famous of families, with respect to the founding and nurturing of modern Freemasonry throughout the centuries, was the House of Sinclair. William Sinclair was an Adept of the Templar hierarchy, who also claimed Merovingian descent. The Sinclairs begat, nurtured, protected, and funded Freemasonry in Scotland, along with the Bruce and Stuart families. The Sinclairs are among the royalty of Masonry, and it should come as no surprise to learn the Sinclair bloodline originated in France as Rex Deus, under the appellation of “Saint Clair.” They are and were Rex Deus[5] from Brittany, the land conquered and settled by Arthur, which volunteered its allegiance to the Merovingian dynasty after the fall of the Grail dynasties in England and Wales to the Saxons.

We already have identified Freemasons as the inheritors to the Knights Templar, but were the Knights Templar actually Rex Deus, other than the Sinclair and Merovingian guardianship? The answer, once again, is “yes.” The founding Templar families, all nine, plus the two secret families, were all Rex Deus; they all stemmed from Royal French and Flemish families. The first Grand Master of the Knights Templar was Hughes De Payen; he was, according to authors Knight and Lomas, Rex Deus, just as Godefrois de Bouillon was the accepted Fisher King of that time and was one of two unlisted founders of the Templars. They were listed only in Rex Deus and Priory of Sion records.[6]

Rex Deus records suggest eleven founding knights, not nine. They include: Hughes De Payen, Geoffrey De St. Omer, Payen De Montifier, Archambaud De St-Amand, Andre De Montbard, Gondemare, Rosal, Geofrey Bisol, Godefroy (de Bouillon), Fulk Of Anjou, and Hugh Of Champagne.[7] Hughes De Payen was not the minor nobleman history records him as, for he married into the powerful Sinclair/St. Clair family; he married Marie St. Clair, who was the ancestor of second Grandmaster of the Priory Of Sion.[8] Meanwhile, Godefrois is recognized to be a surviving descendant from the Merovingian dynasty,[9] the alleged Benjamite heir and King of Jerusalem recorded in Joshua: “Jerusalem, Gibeah, and Kiriath—this was the inheritance of Benjamin for his clans” (Josh. 18:27). The amazing fact eluding historians is that the Templars were an overt arm doing the beckoning of Rex Deus for the fallen Grail kingships of Avalon and of the Merovingians, all while under the blessing of the Mother Church of Rome, albeit the Church did not know the true nature of the Templars.[10]

As partners with Rex Deus, the Priory of Sion recognizes Rex Deus as being the other driving force behind the creation of the Templars. Rex Deus and the Priory seem to be separate arms of the same cause, with the Priory focused more upon the French relationship than the other Celtic families. Freemasonry writers list Godfrey de Bouillon as the leader of the first Crusade and founder of the Priory, who supported this partnership between Rex Deus and the Priory[11] for an obvious reason: both were Essene organizations. It was Godfrey who founded the Templar Order of Sion, as it was originally known at its founding circa 1090 to 1099.[12] The Order of Sion, was not coincidently the alternative name for the Priory of Sion.

Continuing with the Rex Deus conspiracy, we know that Sinclair founded Freemasonry as the progeny of Templarism, just as Templarism was the progeny of Rex Deus; the Merovingian and Grail kingships; and before that, the Gnostics Essenes that supposedly included Joseph of Arimathea, Mary Magdalene, and Jesus. Therefore, Freemasonry is Rex Deus/Priory of Sion, just as it was founded, nurtured, and dominated by the Sinclairs, the House of Stuart, and other Rex Deus families.

Freemason Adepts and Gnostics believe the Knights Templar and Freemasonry were created as a repository for nurturing, maintaining, and secreting Rex Deus and its causes.[13] Rex Deus, Freemasonry, and the House of Stuart, according to Tim Wallace-Murphy, Marilyn Simmons, and Graham Simmons are inseparable from each other,[14] just as I believe their cause is uniform in fulfilling The Genesis 6 Conspiracy, the recreation of the New Age of Atlantis ruled by the posterity of Nephilim, all worshipping fallen angels and their false religion.

The underground enclaves of powerful Rex Deus Adepts are the guardians for the bloodlines of the Antichrist. These potentates secretly protect the unholy heirs, patiently enduring, awaiting the forthcoming date with destiny, when they will introduce the Antichrist to the world. Rex Deus are the puppet masters controlling the strings of Freemasonry and uncountable other genitive, spurious organizations dedicated to the enslavement of the saints.

SECTION VI: Rendezvous with Destiny

ANATOMY OF A GLOBAL CONSPIRACY

CHAPTER 69

NOVUS ORDO SECLORUM

The ten horns you saw are ten kings who have not yet received a kingdom, but who for one hour will receive authority as kings along with the Beast. They have one purpose and will give their power and authority to the Beast.

—Revelation 17:12–13

All this genealogical voodoo is interesting, but how will veiled Rex Deus organizations install this false messiah onto the world throne?

Freemasons, Illuminati, and Rosicrucians are the key. Mackey describes Ishmaelism, Templarism, and Freemasonry as all being identified with each other, with Freemasonry springing from both Ishmaelism and Templarism.[1] What is thought to be held secret by these and other secret societies are the Seven Sacred Sciences, linking the Freemasons once more back to the spurious knowledge of Cain and Hermes, and they are guarding the San Greal. Hence, mystic Adepts were immortalized at Chartres and Rosslyn Cathedrals for their Masonic links and arcane contributions to the preservation of and communication to Europe of the Seven Sacred Sciences of Cain and the illicit knowledge from heaven.

Within the famous sciences no doubt lies knowledge that will overwhelm even our knowledge-based society, but the sciences are not all the secrets Freemasonry holds. Indeed, they cling to all kinds of corrupted truths, information, history, and future plans. These are all encoded into their temples, rituals, allegories, and literature. Nothing new is under the sun; modern Masonic disciplines and dreams are the same as their ancestors', whether they are antediluvian or postdiluvian. Freemasons believe in their hearts that there's a determined, manifest destiny to bring full about a united, global empire dominated by Luciferian religions, a renewed Genesis 6 Conspiracy.

The first Freemasonry lodge, the Scottish Rite, originated in Scotland. James III of Scotland left the Sinclairs with the title of Grand Master Mason, which they kept until 1736, when they gave it up so that Freemasonry could be led by democratically elected leadership. According to Masonic writers, Freemasonry then spread to England with James VI Stuart, who became James I of England in 1603.[2] James II then renewed it in 1660, whereby Freemasonry then spread to other European countries and later to America. Freemasonry expanded rapidly throughout the eighteenth century, alongside the rapid expansion of the British Empire[3] and the exiled Jacobite movement in France.

Freemasonry was established by Rex Deus organizations to be legions of blind agents released into the world as canker worms, creating and exporting rebellion and chaos through "Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity." Rex Deus refers to these subservient orders as "Gentile Masonry" that blindly serves them in furthering their seditious objectives while keeping true Rex Deus objectives hidden from most Freemasons. Liberalism and its Legomin green language of Liberty, Equality and Fraternity are Masonic words, notions reserved for the manipulated, lower brethren. The Learned Elders, the true enlightened Adepts, refer to their manipulated moles as "liberal utopian dreamers" that will be revealed as such once world government has been achieved. These naive dreamers will be arrested and then executed by the Antichrist, when he seizes power, as enemies of the new state,[4] in a manner similar to the way the Nazis moved against the communists, pacifists, and democrats in 1933 C.E..[5] Even though the Nazis only slaughtered Jews en masse, many communists, pacifists, and democrats died in concentration camps and likely would have been slaughtered by the Nazis given time, just as the Nazis would have turned on Christians.

Rex Deus established an army of Masonic lodges around the world that were/are led by Adepts of the Elders bent on establishing world government. Business people and important leaders were recruited en masse and rewarded from the public trough for their participation.[6] To this end, Freemasonry played an active role in each of the American and French rebellions, for both nations played an important, early role in Freemasonry's ultimate goal. In truth, the French Revolution was thought by many historians, according to Wilson, to have been an Illuminati conspiracy to place Duc d'Orleon, an Illuminati member, on the throne of France,[7] while America was created as a model to the world of world government. According to Historian Bernard Fay, the French rebellion was both funded and led by a subversive class of French nobility that included Duc d'Orleans, Mirabeau, Noailles, le Rochefoucauld, the famous Bouillon (of Templar and Rex Deus), and the Lafayette families.[8] Documents discovered in France in 1897, The Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion, purportedly published by the Learned Elders of Zion, took credit for starting the French Revolution: "Remember the French Revolution, the secrets of its preparation are well known to us for it was entirely the work of our hands."[9]

The thesis that the American Revolution was heavily influenced by Freemasonry is a well-accepted theory, according to Bauval and Hancock, but what is not so well known is that the American lodges held very close ties to the French lodges.[10] In both nations, clandestine Freemasonry organizations kindled the ideal of world government through rebellion, thus endeavoring to bring their subversive government, bloodlines, and religion to absolute power. One must understand that from the inception, Freemasonry vowed to bring about the New World Order[11] in the spirit of the dreams of their founders, the Knights Templar. The Famous Scottish American patriarch Andrew Carnegie noted America was "Scotland realized beyond the seas."[12]

An early organization of Freemasonry in America was the Quest, which was formed sometime between 1625 and 1675. Benjamin Franklin was a member and a self-professed Freemason, just as numerous Freemasons contributed significantly in the American Revolution.[13] The Grand Lodge was established in 1717, but the earliest surviving records are from the Philadelphia and New York lodges of the 1730s.[14] According to Freemason and author Ian Gittins, the first official charter was issued in 1733 to the St. John's Lodge of Boston that met at the Green Dragon Tavern.[15] Freemasonry spread in America mostly through the military lodges, and by 1775, it held a large sway over the ranking gentry and officers,[16] including George Washington.

In the midst of the rising, rebellious tides were two influential secret societies, both with direct ties to Freemasonry: the Sons of Liberty and the Committee on Correspondence, who organized unrest among the thirteen colonies. Both organizations were well represented at the Continental Congress during the war, the Constitutional Convention that followed, and the fledgling government thereafter.[17]

Knowing these facts helps in understanding why America is inundated with Masonic icons and is structured as a model for world government. America is a microcosm for the structure of the New World Order, with one federal government speaking for many independent states that are united in free trade and crowned with one leader. The federal government is assigned the role of foreign affairs, the military, and matters that affect all citizens, such as the environment, healthcare, welfare, and more—all with appropriate taxation levies to fund these portfolios.

Franklin was initiated in February of 1731, becoming the Master of the St. John Lodge located in Philadelphia. At that time, American Freemasonry was regulated by the United Grand Lodge in London, which also appointed Provincial Grandmasters in North America and appointed Franklin Grand Master of Pennsylvania in 1749.[18] Franklin was the publisher for Dr. Anderson's Book of Constitutions in America.[19] Franklin spent two lengthy sojourns in England for the American cause, 1757–1762 and 1765–1775,[20] when he was initiated into the Royal Society.[21] In 1775, Franklin returned to America, where he was immediately appointed to the Second Congress. Other Freemasons in the Second Congress included George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, and John Hancock. The Second Congress made Washington the Commander-in-Chief as one of its first decisions.[22] Many Masonic historians believe more than fifty Freemasons signed the Declaration of Independence, while more than one-third of the thirty-nine signatures on the United States Constitution were fellows of the Craft.[23]

Washington was initiated into Freemasonry in 1752, at Fredericksburg.[24] He became honorary Grand Master of the Alexandria Lodge in Washington, DC in 1788. In 1793, Washington wore his Masonic apron, along with other prominent Masons, to lay the cornerstone for the construction of the Capitol building. Washington was sworn in to office April 30, 1789, utilizing a Masonic Bible supplied by the St. John's Lodge No. 1 for the inauguration. Eisenhower; Carter; and George Bush, Sr. used this very same Masonic Bible for their inaugurations. George Bush, Jr. requested it but was unable to use it because of rain.[25] Washington planted thirty-two Masonic generals within his army, while sustaining eight Masonic generals on his personal staff.[26]

In the autumn of 1776, the Congress sent a commission first of three masons, including Franklin, to France to seek military and financial support for the war against Britain, where Franklin enlisted friendships and relationships among the French elite, who were essentially all Freemasons.[27] Some suggest that at that time, France fostered 70,000 Freemasons.[28] Franklin's drudgery bore fruit in 1778, when France pledged official support to America through economic and militaristic avenues.[29]

Franklin achieved this miraculous feat by joining the Nine Sisters Lodge in Paris, founded in 1776 by Joseph Lalonde and l'Abbe Cordier de Saint-Fermin, the godfather to Voltaire. Franklin regularly visited the Catherine Helvetius Salon with the Marquis De Lafayette, another Freemason who belonged to the Le Contrat Social Lodge, which was linked to other important French lodges. The most notable of these lodges was La Societe Olympique that held within its membership famous French officers such as Count de Chambrun, Count-Admiral de Grasse, Count-Admiral d'Estaing, and the buccaneer John Paul Jones, all who later fought in the American cause.[30] Lafayette was recruited and dispatched to America to serve directly under Washington.[31]

In 1779, Franklin became the Venerable Master of the Nine Sisters Lodge, and in 1778, he actually helped initiate the eighty-four-year-old Voltaire. The Nine Sisters Lodge succeeded an older lodge, Les Sciences, created in 1766 by Leland and Claude Helvetius, whose wife was Catherine Helvetius. After Claude Helvetius died, his wife joined Leland and Saint-

Fermin in the creation of the Nine Sisters Lodge. Catherine's Salon, Rue Sainte Anne in Paris, became widely recognized as the headquarters for European philosophy. French Historian Bernard Fay cites the Nine Sisters Lodge as the hub for revolutionary activities during the early years of the French rebellion. In fact, Georges Danton, one of the three triumvirs of the French Revolution, was a member of the Nine Sisters Lodge.[32]

The other important lodge before 1789 was La Loge Contrat Social, which later acted as the mother lodge and was a forerunner for the Elite Order of Freemasonry's Scottish Rite, the Supreme Council of the Thirty-Third Degree. Contrat Social was as popular as the Nine Sisters Lodge. It recruited from the elite of the liberal French nobility, adopting Rousseau's Contrat Social as its Bible as well as the name of their lodge, similar to the way the Nine Sisters Lodge accepted the doctrines of Voltaire. Rousseau and Voltaire provided the intellectual dynamite and the moral framework for the French Revolution.[33] The rebellion adopted Freemasonry's motto, "Libertie! Egalitie! Fraternitie!" as its rallying cry.[34]

Danton, Robespierre, and Marat were the triumvirs of the French rebellion. All were Freemasons. Rousseau's Contrat Social, which set forth the foundation for the Declaration of the Rights of Man, the successor to the American Declaration of Independence, heavily influenced Robespierre. Robespierre exhumed Rousseau's body and reburied him in Paris at the Pantheon, next to other national heroes. Robespierre took most of his ideals from Freemasonry, including the introduction of his cult of the Supreme Being, a state-sponsored religion introduced in 1793–1794 and celebrated vicariously as the Cult of Reason. Statues were erected to represent the female goddess of reason, which modeled the soft, conical Phrygian Cap (signifying the pursuit of liberty in antiquity) upon the goddess Cybele, renowned variantly as Isis, and the male god Mithras. Notre Dame was converted to the Temple of Reason, all in the honor of the new religion. Robespierre further ordered the oldest cathedral in Paris, where all the ancient kings of France were baptized, the Abbey St. Germaine, rededicated to Isis.[35]

According to historian Michel Vovelle, the Supreme Being of the French rebellion was the identical god worshipped as the Great Architect of the Universe in Freemasonry. Robespierre converted all the Christian churches to temples of the new cult, where all the people of France recognized the Supreme Being as god of a new, natural religion based on nature, liberty, equality, truth, and reason. Robespierre converted the calendar to the ancient Egyptian calendar that consisted of 360 days, plus five special days dedicated to the virtues of Osiris and Isis. During the French rebellion, France was completely de-Christianized.[36]

Architects set out to refashion Paris into a utopian city through geometric shapes such as pyramids and spheres; it was to be a New Age city.[37] Paris, like Washington, was to be a symbolic utopian city, a beacon for the world. Both the French and American Revolutions were inexplicitly interwoven and completely influenced by Freemasonry. Both rebellions were to produce utopian republics that would, in time, bring about world government and the abolishment of Christianity.

Take a moment to peruse some of the Masonic icons shadowing the so-called American symbols of freedom. The eagle is a symbol of mystical initiation, a great emblem of antiquity, and was regarded as a symbol of the sun, of wisdom attained through reason. The eagle in mysticism is the symbol of the supreme reason of intelligence and represents a polytheist foundation stone doctrine: reason over faith. The eagle was also considered by the ancient Egyptians, Persians, Greeks, and Romans as sacred to the sun, a bird consecrated to the sun in Egypt, a living symbol of Menes. The eagle is the lone bird that is capable symbolically of looking into the sun.[38]

The eagle in the official seal of the United States has nine tail feathers, representing the nine beings in the innermost circle of enlightenment in the Great White Brotherhood, also known as the Illuminati, a most secret and powerful organization within the Masonic maze of secret societies. There are also nine degrees in the York Rite of Freemasonry. The eagle’s right wing contains thirty-two feathers, representing the thirty-two degrees of the Scottish Rite of Freemasonry. And there are thirty-three feathers on the left wing, symbolizing the honorary, infamous Thirty-Third Degree of Enlightenment and holder of all secrets. The designers of the seal were all Masons and members of the Quest.[39]

The Seal of the United States was originally designed by Franklin and Jefferson, according to Bauval and Hancock, to contain inscriptions of the Supreme Being, showing a “Glowing Pyramid” and the “All-Seeing Eye.”[40] The Seal was officially accepted by the prominent Freemason President Franklin Roosevelt. The Freemason Adept and likely Illuminati fellow Vice President Wallace sold the notion to him.[41]

Iconography from the French Revolution also maintained the All-Seeing Eye as the Tree of Liberty, while at other times, it was symbolized by a glowing triangle or a shimmering pyramid hovering above the scene, much like the symbol on the American dollar bill. This symbol appeared on the Declaration of the Rights of Man that was drafted by Lafayette.[42] The American dollar, containing an unfinished pyramid with an All-Seeing Eye adorning it on top, is an obvious symbol of the Masons, representing their ties to the great stone builders of antiquity and the knowledge of geometry, arithmetic, and other sciences required to build such monuments, which all stem from the Seven Sacred Sciences. The pyramid is a symbolic link to the antediluvian epoch, when the great pyramids and ziggurats were built as monuments to the ancient knowledge corrupted by Cain and the heresy performed at Mount Hermon.

The unfinished pyramid holds even more enigmatic secrets in its allegory. It represents the New World Order, or world government, because just as the pyramid is unfinished, with work yet to be done, so is the state of the union both past and present in regard to the New World Order. It has not yet been finished and come of age; it is still a work in process by the various Masonic organizations.[43]

Finally, the pyramid is symbolic for the Grand Architect of the Universe.[44] The Grand Architect of the Universe is the god of the Freemasons that is also symbolized as a five-pointed star, a pentagram, and a blazing star— known as the "Glowing Pyramid" or "Triangle"; it has the All-Seeing Eye inscribed within this pyramid or triangle and is indistinguishable from the god identified as the Supreme Being. Similarly, the father of light, god of the Zoroastrians, which is also identified with the Iranian god Mithras, was also known vicariously as the Great Architect.[45] French Revolution posters depicted the All-Seeing Eye crowning the Supreme Being, thus connecting the two symbols.[46]

The United States Seal is engraved with the words Annuit Coeptis, which is Latin for "announcing the birth of." This phrase is followed by Novus Ordo Seclorum. The Latin Novus translates as "new"; Ordo translates as "order"; and Seclorum translates as "world,"[47] according to most lay people. However, the correct translation to some, such as Dan Brown, is "The New Secular Order."[48] However, Seclorum is the genitive, possessive plural form of saelculum, meaning ages, world, or generations, which then produces New (World) Order of the Ages. In my opinion, Novus Ordo Seclorum has been transliterated into the “New World Order.” Putting Annuit Coeptis together with Novus Ordo Seclorum yields roughly, “the birth of the New World Order” (era), which has incredibly been engraved into the official seal of the United States, the progeny of Freemason and Templar dreams!

Just as these secret fraternities of conspiracy were active 300 years ago, they are still active today in bringing about world government. Winston Churchill once remarked that the Illuminati, Karl Marx, and the 1917 Communist rebellion possessed the joint purpose of instituting the New World Order.[49] Churchill enjoyed inside information on this, for Churchill was a Freemason.[50] Globalists are now delirious with anticipation, for their age-long dream is soon to come about. Their activities are now ever so more intense. Globalists will not be denied, and it is ordained, for this is the Terminal Generation.

The globalist cause is not wrapped in religious tolerance, nor is it clothed in cold, secular objectivity. Rather, globalism is a heavy trench coat that is concealing its discriminating religious body devoted to rebellion and genocide.

CHAPTER 70

INSIDE FREEMASONRY

> If a person thoughtlessly takes an oath to do anything, whether good or evil—in any matter one might carelessly swear about—even though he is unaware of it, in any case when he learns of it he will be guilty.
>
> —Leviticus 5:4

Is Freemasonry really the primordial religion of Enoch the Evil?

Albert Pike attributes modern Masonry to being identical to the ancient Mysteries; he states that Freemasonry is the successor to mysticism.[1]

In an excerpt from New Age Magazine, Harold J. Bolen stated that the secret doctrine of Freemasonry flows through its symbols that have their source in three ancient, exalted orders, one being Dionysian Artificers.[2] The Greek Dionysus was an indistinguishable deity from Bacchus of the Romans, Tammuz or Utu of the Persians, and Osiris of the Egyptians. Likely the three great, ancient orders were the Egyptians, Greeks, and Babylonians.

In fact, the Philalethan Conference hosted in Paris from 1785–1787 brought together the most famous, distinguished, and important Freemasons from around the globe to clarify the origin and historical affiliations of

Masonic Science.[3] After two years of debate, this august assembly of Adepts concluded Freemasonry was the “Original Religion” handed down from King Arthur, Richard I, Ramon Lulle, Gnostics and the school of Alexandria, the Templars, Pythagoras, Plato, Jesus Christ, the Apostles, Each-Ben-Mohammed-Elanis, Ormus, the Egyptians, the Benedictines, the Rosicrucians, Zoroaster, Abbaris, Channondas, Eudoxus, Hermippis, Hermes Trismegistus, Porphyrus, Proclus, Jamblique, the priesthood schools of India, the Gauls, the Hebrews, the Essenes, and the Persian Magi.[4]

The Craft Legends believe Freemasonry derives from Babel and before. In 1754, this connection was underscored in the best-selling book of that time, The Free Mason Examin’d, which concluded the rituals of Freemasonry were entrenched in the building of the Tower of Babel[5] and in Nimrod. We know Hermes fled to Egypt, while Nimrod remained in Babylon, where the single entity of the postdiluvian Mysteries then split into two separate but similar sects. Nimrod’s constitution was posthumously reformed in Egypt, under the famous Great White Brotherhood organization. The indigenous duality of their deities was Ishtar/Innana and Tammuz/Utu of the Babylonians and Isis and Osiris of the Egyptians.[6] The female of the spurious trinity is analogous to the Holy Spirit of the Christian Holy Trinity concept whereby the spirit of life and also wisdom is provided.

Because Masonic obsession with its origins is ingrained with the Egyptian Mysteries, we will focus on the Egyptian pantheon. The Egyptian pantheon was centered on Osiris/male, Isis/female, and Horus/male son; they were celebrated as the “Masonic Trinity.”[7] Isis was widowed when the evil god Seth murdered Osiris. Horus was born after the death of Osiris, when Osiris was resurrected into godhood and lay with Isis, once more vulgarly and boorishly mimicking the Christian doctrine of the virgin birth and that of the immaculate, heavenly conception through sexual copulation.

According to Richard Noone, the word pyramid translated as “glorious light” in ancient Egyptian.[8] This translation connects allegories of the sun and light to the pyramids, to Osiris the sun god, and to the Masons. Quite simply, the All-Seeing Eye on the dollar represents Osiris, the omnipresent god, while the pyramid represents the glorious light of Osiris, which was an allegory representing both the sun and enlightenment of knowledge.[9] So, too, were the Mysteries of India, Persia, and Greece, according to Alan

Alford, founded in the same mythology of the sun god. The sun was a universally celebrated symbol for the great creator.[10]

The sun, or light, is deeply rooted in and critically important to all mystic organizations, for light is always figurative for knowledge and enlightenment, which all these furtive organizations are whispered to conceal at their center. Similarly, light is an imperative, allegorical doctrine slashing to the heart of Freemasonry.[11] Masonic initiates, as with all pagan religions, are escorted onto a Path, or Way, to enlightenment through knowledge (gnosis) as they naively quest through the various levels, degrees, or tests of initiation.

The three great lights of Freemasonry are the Sun/Osiris, the Moon/ Isis, and Mercury/Horus.[12] They were the holders of the great knowledge, or enlightenment, as it was provided to them by the primeval creator of the universe, which initiates seek to learn about as they climb the levels of the figurative pyramid. Freemasons believe that their members are the sons of light. In fact, Alford notes that the name freemasonry is variantly mythologized to have derived from ancient Egyptian phre, meaning sun, and mas, meaning child; thus, combined it means “child of light.”[13]

Freemasons garner another phrase dear to their beliefs known as Annu Lucis, which is their sacred calendar. Annu Lucis is translated as “Year of Light,” which some believe began in the year 4000 B.C.E.[14] Richard Noone writes that Anno Lucis is the legendary date memorializing the founding of the ancient Craft Masonry in and around 4000 B.C.E.,[15] a date that coincides chronologically with the life of Cain, the father of the corrupted Seven Sacred Sciences. More importantly, Anno Lucis is the Freemasonry calendar dating back to Freemasonry’s year zero, the year God expelled Lucifer from heaven, according to Epperson,[16] and the year when Satan deceived Adam and Eve. The Freemasons abbreviate this phrase as A.L., meaning “in the Year of Light.”

No one has satisfactorily explained why Freemasonry memorialized the year 4000 B.C.E., except for the expulsion of Satan from heaven, but the most palpable connection, according to Noone, is to the Great Pyramid Kufu, which was covered with polished limestone, reflecting glorious light when the sun struck its sides,[17] thus memorializing Satan’s banishment.

Freemasonry is merely a fraternity within a fraternity, an enigma wrapped within a riddle, utilizing an outer organization designed to conceal an inner brotherhood of powerful, modern potentates known as the Elect, or "Adepts." The outer fraternity, which includes the lower levels of initiation, is the visible fraternal society promoting business and good causes. The inner fraternity is the arcane (Snake) Brotherhood dedicated to the esoteric Mysteries of ancient Egypt and beyond.[18]

The humdrum members of the lower degrees are not taught the innermost secrets of the higher degrees. Only the Adepts comprehend the authentic connotation to the Legomin symbols according to Albert Pike. Freemasonry's true secrets are kept from all except the Adepts, Sages, and Elect through employing false explanations for symbols to mislead those who deserve to be misled, including the lower level Freemasons. Adept Masons purposefully lie to lower Freemasons through false interpretations, reserving the authentic translations for the Adepts and other princes of Masonry.[19] In this way, Freemasonry operates free from the charges of sedition, even though sedition on a grand scale is its true cause.

The Masonic Order, at its core, can best be described as occultist. Webster's New Compact Format Dictionary defines occult as "hidden, beyond the range of sense, mysterious, magical, supernatural," while occultism is "the doctrine or study of things hidden or mysterious, Theosophy," while occult sciences are "alchemy, astrology, magic, et cetera." I cannot perceive a better definition for Freemasonry than an organization that conceals secrets. It is an esoteric movement focusing on mysticism—a Theosophical movement concealing the seven occult sciences. Freemasonry occultism is undeniably steeped in Theosophy.

Alice Bailye, a renowned principal in the New Age movement, describes the Masonic fraternity as far more occultist than many realize; it is the furtive training school for advanced occultists.[20] Baily further notes the three foremost channels preparing for the New Age are the church, Freemasonry, and education.[21] Pike definitively refers to Freemasonry as the custodian or special guardian of the secret, occult history and knowledge.[22]

In their pursuit of world government, Freemasons will keep sacred, as key to their utopian doctrine, the notion of destroying both the right to own private property and the right to worship the true God. Furthermore, Freemasonry's end game is to prevent the right to set up a government based on the protection of man's God-given rights to life, liberty, and property.[23] Freemasonry will seek to obtain equality through community of all goods and the destruction of all rank and property[24] through Progressive socialism.

The coming world government will be characterized by tolerating only the future harlot religion of Babel. It will not be based on the rights of the individual, but rather on collective rights as defined by the harlot religion, and no one will have the right to own any form of property, in subordination of the many, to which all belongs. This coming utopian New World Order is indispensable for the harmonic convergence to collect the divine spark that is elemental for ascension into godhood for the purported chosen descendants of Nephilim. This is what is known as Collective Salvation in the end game of Liberation theology.

These precepts, of course, slash to the heart of all globalist doctrine, for they are all socialistic in nature as they pertain to the individual, but they are capitalistic in their approach to business, albeit a limited progressive oligopoly reserved only for rich and powerful Adepts of Illuminated Freemasonry, who believe religion (monotheism) must go first and then law and property will follow.[25] The New World Order will be a classic, mystical socialism designed after Bacon's dream and the greedy interests of the powerful elite, akin to the empire of George Soros. Progressive globalists will sedate the mundane masses with the opium of progressive socialism, while the state-sponsored family dealers will prosper from within their oligarchic territories.

Progressive socialism will merge with progressive capitalism. State-sponsored capitalism, akin to the contemporary Chinese oligarchy, is steadfastly being exported to the West as the new, efficient model for capitalism and its future. The progressive, euphemistic propaganda for this premeditated partnership plans to topple free enterprise as we recognize it and is presently hailed as "state capitalism." In state-sponsored capitalism, selected private companies and corporations, i.e., oligarchies, will finance, manufacture, and equally with the state, drive the agenda of progressive, national socialism. You may recognize some of these public private partnerships now being organized as "P3 ventures": public, partnership, partnerships.

Consider this: The word nation is an accepted expression analogous to state. One could easily substitute state with national to form "national capitalism" and not adjust the meaning or intent in any way. Hitler's fascist Nazi regime was a totalitarian, state-sponsored capitalism that merged with national socialism, which sustained an unaccountable blood oath against monotheism and inexplicable blood fever to create the New Man. I do not find this to be a coincidence. The end times will host a new, global Nazi regime, led by a new Fuehrer and promising a new utopian millennium, which will lead to a new world war and a new holocaust and end in a new Apocalypse.

CHAPTER 71

THE THIRTY-THIRD DEGREE

The god of this age has blinded the minds of unbelievers, so that they cannot see the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God.

—2 Corinthians 4:4

Epperson describes Freemasonry as a religion endeavoring to unite God and man, elevating (pre-selected) initiates to a level of consciousness so that they might behold the workings of the Great Architect.[1]

So who is this Great Architect?

The initiate is taught through the ascending levels of sacred knowledge, the occultist discipline of reason over knowledge, that he is achieving (immortality) wisdom as he ascends the (Lucifer's) pyramid of glorious light and is initiated into the Thirty-Third level. Reason disciplining knowledge from the Tree of Good and Evil is mysticism's way to immortality that Satan alluded to in the Garden of Eden. The Thirty-Third Degree believes wholeheartedly in the Mysteries, holding steadfastly to the doctrine of reincarnation, just as Osiris was resurrected or, more accurately, reincarnated as a full-fledged and evolved god in the heavens. The Thirty-

Third Degree is the uppermost level of the Scottish Rite; it is the innermost sanctuary of the Masonic temple, uncompromisingly dedicated to Masonic mysticism. The Thirty-Third Degree is the closed inner circle of the Masonic Snake Lodge, where the true power of Masonry is centered.

The Mother Council, or the Mother Jurisdiction, as the Thirty-Third Degree is known, resides in Washington, DC. The significance of this council, other than the power it possesses and the secret, sinister strategy of sedition it plots, is that it also possesses the three final secrets of the Freemasons. Initiates in the Thirty-Second Degree have these final, fateful secrets withheld from them. They are simply told, “He still has not reached the light.”[2] As the initiate ascends the ziggurat of enlightenment, he is introduced first to the Osiris allegories, defining him as the sun god, and then the initiate is introduced to the concept of the Great Architect of the Universe. In the beginning, God the Architect was believed to have sent Osiris and Isis, the male/female aspects of godhood, to humankind to help them.[3]

It will come as no surprise that this Grand Architect is not the true God of Christianity, Judaism, and Islam. The true god of mysticism and the Freemasons is Lucifer, and his unholy icons scurrilously adorn the American one-dollar bill, the All-Seeing Eye and the unfinished pyramid. But can we actually show beyond a shadow of doubt that Lucifer is the sun god, the All-Seeing Eye, and the Architect of the Universe? Yes, we can!

Demond Wilson’s inside information informs us that the Thirty-Third Degree formally teaches that Lucifer is the Architect of the Universe.[4] Freemasons teach Osiris is the god who is Lucifer, just as they teach that the All-Seeing Eye is also god, or Lucifer, and just as both these symbols represent the Great Architect of the Universe. Lucifer is called the Great Architect because the universe is his most significant work. Freemasons name their (Snake) god an architect because he is not a creator god, for Lucifer created the universe from existing material, just as architects do. The universe, then, is Lucifer’s lofty temple, and his greatest, most perfect work of architecture.[5] Hence, Gnostics shockingly established the Royal Society of England and the Invisible College to be the first assembly of scientists dedicated to the wonders created by the Great Architect of the Universe.[6] Marks scribed into or onto architecture by Freemasons are symbols that indicate they are mere instruments of the Great Architect.[7]

Wilson writes that the Thirty-Third level of initiation professes its Adepts to be soldiers for the new, true religion, where the true religion understands that Lucifer is god. Freemasons hold the very same beliefs as did the ancient Egyptians.[8] Alan Alford writes that the cryptic knowledge concealing who Lucifer is, along with the secrets to reincarnation and the secret knowledge of the seven spurious sciences are the three treasured "Secrets of Secrets" held by the Thirty-Third Degree, with the ultimate secret being Lucifer is God.[9]

The initiates of high degrees are maintained in the purity of Luciferian doctrine. Albert Pike wrote to the Supreme Councils that they were to know Lucifer was indeed the secret god of the Masons. Pike further wrote that the (glorious) "light" that all Masons seek is the knowledge of who god is, for they believe Lucifer is the real god of the universe.

In this book, I have danced all around the Satan scenario while dropping many hints and subtle conclusions. It is now time to nail down this notion. The Freemasons and all their genitive and associated organizations believe the real god of the universe is Lucifer.[10] Freemasonry and all their associate organizations are ultimately preparing to bring about the New World Order under the New Babel that worships Lucifer.

The teachings of all the diverse forms of mysticism preach the same doctrine, all declaring Lucifer to be the fallen seraphim angel. This is certainly witnessed by the Freemasons; the New Age movement; and particularly, the reticent organization at the center of the Freemasonry, the Illuminati. They all are on record as worshipping the fallen angel of mysticism, which views Lucifer as a good god to whom a great wrong has been done. Lucifer, as this deluded idea goes, is the good god, while the true God of the universe is evil, and the devil.[11]

Lucifer masquerades as an angel of light. Light is the Masonic symbol for intelligence, information, knowledge, and truth; darkness is ignorance and evil[12] and the followers of Adonai: Jews, Muslims, and Christians. Lucifer is the god of light and the god of good—the god who struggles against darkness and evil for humankind.[13] Lucifer is actually a derivative of the Latin lucidus or lux, meaning light.[14] One ought to be wary of any genitive words deriving from lux, such as lucis (of light), as in the Theosophist organization Lucis Trust. The organization that bears that name is a New Age publisher of books supporting the New Age movement and world government.[15]

Another corporate name to be wary of is Lucent Technologies, one of the spin-off corporations from the dismembering of AT&T, which at one time purchased a franchise for Mondex, thought to be the smart card of the future for the United States. Lucent is compounded from "Lucifer," of course, but what is most interesting is that the company's corporate logo was the symbol of the solar Serpent, or Red Dragon, which is known biblically as Satan and to the mystics as Lucifer. Lucent Technologies chose to move their offices to 666 Fifth Avenue in Manhattan. Lucent later merged with Alcatel in 2006.[16] I'm not sure if this is the kind of company Christians would choose to have control of the coming smart cards that will herald the cashless society, particularly when Mondex is thought to have already concluded that the chip in the smart card will have to be replaced with a chip inserted into either the right hand or the forehead, all for security reasons[17] (see the book of Revelation, the mark of the Beast).[18]

Today, MasterCard holds controlling interest in Mondex and its technologies; Mondex technology is now also offered by Visa.[19] Remember, it is the doctrine of The Genesis 6 Conspiracy to eliminate all currencies and all paper money once power has been usurped by their false messiah from Zion.[20] Be wary of all organizantions bearing derivatives of light or Lucifer. The secret to their cause will lie beneath the allegory of their name. This is their nature and their arrogance.

Continuing along this line of New Age delusion, we find that Lucifer is the rival of Adonai, the evil Christian God. Lucifer is good, while Adonai is intermittently evil.[21] Just as in the Sumerian flood narrative of the Epic of Gilgamesh, Enki/Satan was the good god who warned of the coming deluge and who berated Enlil/Adonai for bringing about the deluge without first consulting the other gods, thereby destroying the innocent with the iniquitous.[22] In the same manner, Greek and Atlantean mythology maintained Zeus as the god of the sky that brought forward the flood, while Poseidon was god of the sea, with both holding dominion over the earth.[23]

Masonry regards Lucifer as an intellectual spirit of intelligence; he is the great agent of universal magnetism. Lucifer is regarded to be the god that struggles for humanity against the oppressive Adonai, the God who slanders Lucifer, as do Adonai's priests. Freemasonry believes that if

Lucifer were not, in truth, god, Adonai and his priests would not slander Lucifer so. Lucifer is worshipped as the first free thinker, the emancipator of worlds.[24] Satan, then, frees worlds in our universe, in this galactic war of aliens coming to our world soon!

Freemasons and the New Age movement unyieldingly judge Christianity to be darkness and evil.[25] They believe that Adonai wishes to keep humankind in darkness through ignorance, that He is the enemy of knowledge and science. They point to God prohibiting Adam and Eve from eating from the Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil in Eden as the example of God as one of ignorance and bondage.

According to Epperson, Freemasonry cites Adonai's recorded deeds such as the deluge, the conquest of the Promised Land, and Sodom and Gomorrah, as proof of Adonai's cruelty. Freemasons and Lucifer wish to free and enlighten humankind with all kinds of knowledge, including that of good and evil, which will encourage humankind's ascension into godhood. Finally, Freemasonry believes Lucifer will vanquish God in the not-so-distant future,[26] in this galactic war among powerful aliens.

The eagle is the symbol for reason, and wisdom is achieved through reason. A cornerstone doctrine of mysticism and Freemasonry determines that all knowledge is good and that reason disciplines knowledge for the good of humankind. Hence, it is this mastery of reason over knowledge that is essential to the evolutionary process into godhood, but only those determined worthy and capable of learning, and then maintaining the disciplines of reason and wisdom over raw knowledge, the illuminated Thirty-Third Degree Adepts, will be permitted the opportunity to evolve into gods.

Christians who place faith over reason automatically will not qualify; they will be considered obsolete and not worthy of godhood. True Christians and those who are loyal to the true God Most High will not be welcomed into the New World Order of Enlightenment. Thus, well-planned, secular constitutions set in motion by Freemason canker worms hundreds of years ago will soon isolate literalist Christians and monotheists as intolerant, ignorant, and immaterial zealots who are obeying the evil Adonai. Soon the saints will be hunted, imprisoned, enslaved, and then slaughtered by the so-called disciples of light. What is astonishing is that the new Christian religion rising out of the ashes of the old Christian religion will easily slide into the new world and its ethnic-cleansing constitutions.

CHAPTER 72

THE ROTHSCHILD-ROCKEFELLER-MORGAN AXIS

> Now listen, you rich people, weep and wail because of the misery that is coming upon you. Your wealth has rotted and moths have eaten your clothes. Your gold and silver are corroded. Their corrosion will testify against you and eat your flesh like fire. You have hoarded your wealth in the last days … You have lived on earth in luxury and self-indulgence. You have fattened yourselves in the day of slaughter. You have condemned and murdered innocent men, who were opposing you.
> —James 5:1–6

The subversive network assembled by Rex Deus and its conscription of the powerful elite has been impressive, even from our limited perspective. How wide, how far, and how deep do the terrifying tentacles of this Leviathan stretch to?

Let us glimpse into this alarming juggernaut, beginning with the “Royal House of Money,” a family synonymous with international banking,[1] the Rothschilds. The Rothschild family was, and is, the central bank funding the Freemasonry movement. The Rothschilds have been members of the Craft since 1700.[2] They grew rich on European wars, but they were inconsequential until they partnered with the Masonic movement.

The Rothschild empire was the quasi-legitimate response by Rex Deus to the breakup of the Knights Templar. Templars were the first modern bankers of Europe, who funded European wars with loans, controlling vast amounts of money. Therefore this powerful authority needed to be replaced. Banking funded the Knights Templar with most of the order's wealth; just the visible Templar fortune was estimated at $20 billion.[3] Banking became the primary objective that then overshadowed the Priory agenda and Hugh De Payen, which supports the reasons cited at the Cutting of the Elm for splitting of the order—Templar greed and a difference of opinion about the agenda.

Markale notes that one of the primary functions of the Knights Templar was to facilitate the transfer of funds from Europe to the Holy Land for the Crusaders and pilgrims; thus, they became a bank and the greatest money institution ever created until that time. To these financial imperatives, the Knights Templar then invented exchange notes, the check, and various creative forms of credit.[4] Marrs describes the Templars as a Rex Deus/Priory of Sion puppet organization, which pioneered the concepts of credit facilities and the allocation of credit for commercial developments in the West;[5] they were undeniably the first modern banks. Gardner writes that the Templars established the first international banking network and became the financiers for almost all the thrones of Europe.[6] Thus, Rex Deus organizations were determined to replace the covert banking arm of the Templar empire, just as Freemasonry replaced the arcane, esoteric, and political arm of Templarism.

The Rothschilds replaced the Templars as the first corporate financial giant of medieval Europe. They funded the Rex Deus agenda, just as the Templars did. The Rothschilds grew opulent just as the Templars did by funding European wars, likely instigated by Rex Deus, and by using loans to manipulate monarchs for their own agenda. By the time the Rothschild juggernaut got rolling, the Rothschilds had managed to indebt all the royal houses of Europe to them, including the famous Hapsburg dynasty.[7] Security for the secret end time agenda of Rex Deus was thus assured, for Rothschild bloodlines are also Rex Deus, as testified to by London Banker

David Rothschild; he also claims to be a descendant of Jesus, according to Hancock.[8]

The Rothschild family originated with Mayer Amschel Bauer, a Jewish/German individual, born February 23, 1744, in Frankfurt. Mayer was the court financial agent to William IX, the royal administrator for the Hesse-Kassel province, a prominent Freemason. Later, Mayer added the royal German family of Thurn and Taxis,[9] the powerful family that established the first commercial post and courier companies in Europe as their clientele before entering into banking.[10] Through these first innocuous entries into the royal houses of Europe, Bauer prospered because of the inside information he received from his well-connected patrons with regard to market trends, futures in commodity prices, and forthcoming political events.[11]

Bauer opened his first bank in Frankfurt. His son Nathan established the London bank, and the youngest son, Jakob, established the Paris bank by 1811. The Bauer family formally changed its name to Rothschild (meaning “red shield” and likely the insignia for the Rosicrucian cause) upon Nathan’s arrival in London to distance itself from anti-Semitism. While in London, Nathan purposefully established a stable of (wealthy, covert) agents to operate their far-reaching operations.[12]

This diabolical concept establishing strategic stables of wealthy agents by the Learned Elders has many covert tentacles into all aspects of life. Freemasonry acts to ensure all governments perform as puppets to install its secret plans, appointing only fellows to government agencies and departments; this includes presidents. They ruthlessly blackmail all those who do not respond as puppets. Freemasonry further ensures that their agents control all police agencies of the world. Other agents utilize liberalism, liberty, freedom, and covert fraternities to blind society. They diligently degrade society with degenerate doctrines, various immoralities, alcohol, and other vices.[13]

The far-reaching operations began with strategic alliances with influential families that exist to this day. In 1814, the Rothschilds established formative business ties with the Warburgs of Hamburg, Germany. In 1785, they established close ties with the Schiff family. Jacob Henry Schiff immigrated to America in 1865, joining Abraham Khun’s investment firm. Jacob married the daughter of Solomon Loeb, the head of Khun Loeb and Company of New York, in 1875. Jacob Schiff was promoted to the head of Khun Loeb in 1885, with the death of Solomon Loeb.[14] Solomon Loeb and Abraham Khun married each other's sisters. Felix Warburg married Jacob Schiff's daughter, Frieda. Paul, Felix Warburg's brother, married Solomon Loeb's daughter, Nina, from Loeb's second wife. Otto Kahn, another partner in Khun and Loeb, married one of the original investors at Goldman Sachs and Company. Two of Sach's sons married two Goldman daughters.[15]

These families were, and still are, prominent in American finances. It is important to appreciate the great lengths these families went to in order to keep the wealth and control within a close circle of strategically aligned families, all in the Rex Deus and Gnostic spirit of genealogies, which all operated as extended arms for the Rothschild empire, the covert stable of agents we discussed.

The power of the Rothschild empire continued to reach across the Atlantic and into America, where the Rothschilds funded a company in its infancy, Standard Oil. The family that owned and still maintains controlling interests in Standard Oil is the American powerhouse of Rockefeller. The Rockefeller empire, because of this, according to Gary Kah, owes its wealth, loyalty, and power to the Rothschilds.[16] Working through Wall Street and their strategic partners of Khun Loeb and Company, along with JP Morgan, the Rothschilds financed JD Rockefeller through the City Bank of Cleveland, a branch of the Rothschild empire, so that he could create Standard Oil.[17] The Rockefellers are renowned globalists and Masons. Today, the Rockefellers control four of the top seven of the world's largest oil companies that include Exxon, Standard Oil, Chevron, Mobil, Phillips 66, Marathon, and Texaco; and they further control 321 other oil companies.[18]

Similarly, the Rothschilds financed Edward Harriman (Union Pacific Railroad) and Andrew Carnegie (US Steel).[19] Carnegie, a Scot, made his first fortune in partnership with George Pullman (Pullman cars), who sold railroad cars to the railroad companies. One wonders, then, about the connection at this juncture to Edward Harriman of Union Pacific with Carnegie's first enterprise. Carnegie then collected a consortium of Scots in Pittsburg that bought up most of the existing steel companies, forming Carnegie Steel, which later became US Steel,[20] and all was funded by the Rothschilds and their stable of agents.

Carnegie Steel, then (and not coincidently), became the quintessential prototype for the modern industrial corporation, controlling every aspect of production as a completely and fully integrated, or “Vertically Integrated,” business. Carnegie Steel also introduced the concept of economies of scale in production. John Rockefeller learned, adopted, and applied these concepts with Standard Oil. Carnegie Steel was sold in 1901 to none other than the famous JP Morgan, and Carnegie’s proceeds were 300 million tax-free dollars.[21]

The JP Morgan Company, too, held an important partnership with the Rothschild empire. The Morgan family held great ties to the British Rothschilds and, therefore, became covert agents for them. The Rothschilds preferred to operate anonymously through the JP Morgan Company in America, as well as through Khun and Loeb and the Goldman Sachs Company. Even today, the Morgan legacy has tentacles holding enormous sway in both business and political theaters. Morgan employees hold large memberships in the diverse collection of secret societies of today. As Morgan leadership swayed, they were replaced by the Rockefeller family as the dominant financial and political force.[22]

The Rothschilds, working through the Rockefellers and Morgans, have gained a stranglehold on American corporations and power, all who wield this power for globalist purposes, just as the Rothschilds were able to do in Europe. The Rockefeller-Morgan-Rothschild axis has created a powerful corporate juggernaut that is unrivaled in the world today, all working resolutely for the Rex Deus agenda. Let us now briefly explore the globalist agenda funded and nurtured by the Rockefellers, Morgans, and Rothschilds.

Taking the control out of the hands of the people and their governments so that an elite group of potentates can perpetuate power through a manageable decade of puppet governments is a cornerstone of globalist doctrine. Globalists intend to provide a thin veneer of democracy, under which a privileged core of potentates will dictate world policy, just as they intend to provide a similar thin veneer of global free-market capitalism, where another predetermined core group of corporations controlled by Adepts will flourish as oligopolies within the varied industries (Progressive, state-sponsored, and corporate-partnered socialism: Hitler’s reincarnated left-wing, fascist socialism—Nazism). This is why we see democracies espousing poorly applied physical conservatism, partnered with public socialism on social issues. The New Atlantis will be a world designed to reflect the antediluvian organizational model, whereby the rich, powerful elites of society, the Adepts, will guard and hold most of the wealth, power, and knowledge through control of both powerful oligarchies and governments for their own self-interests. These greedy, power-hungry Adepts cloak their agenda under a veil of religious allegories and economic socialism that they distribute as opium for the mundane, ignorant, and unworthy masses.

Masonic/Rex Deus forces do not care whether the government is democratic or a dictatorship, for they will and do control both, generally through economic power levers in the form of money lent to disparate governments. Rex Deus then imposes their own unique form of social engineering, partnered with physical conservatism, designed to enhance and further their ultimate goals of free trade and globalism. The disparate globalist groups operate collectively from a predetermined vision, diligently dictated from a cohesive assembly of Adepts, which has been identified with many powerful organizations, including the New World Order, the Committee of Three Hundred, the Illuminati, and the Secret Brotherhood.[23]

Some believe this powerful, occultist assembly of Adepts is guided by nonhuman intelligences, described as prison wardens or custodians[24] (spiritual guides, demons, and/or fallen angels, and/or aliens). All this is consistent with the testimony from the Rosicrucians, the most illuminated of Freemasonry, and the Illuminati, who secretly plot and coordinate all this sedition, for they also converse regularly with spirit guides,[25] whom they secretly recognize as fallen angels and demons. And let us not forget the New Age and Theosophical religious leaders, who regularly converse with their superhuman spiritual guides, the Avatars.

The boldest gambit to date in the march to globalism has been the usurping of the power levers controlling economic prosperity. By this I mean the establishment of the Federal Reserve Banks/central banks of the great Western economies, in tandem with the World Bank, partnered with the International Monetary Fund (IMF). All are dominated, manipulated, and controlled by Masonic/Rex Deus/globalist forces. The central banks of the world, not the elected governments now control economic policy. One should note with particular relevance the first act of Tony Blair and his Labor government in Britain was to establish the Central Bank of England, thereby relinquishing Britain’s economic control levers, the last bastion of common sense among Western governments.

The IMF and the World Bank both perpetuate a sinister strategy over the poorer nations of the world. These organizations lend countries money until they have all but brought the poorer countries to economic ruin. Like drug dealers and pimps, first they irrevocably addict the victim on the credit narcotic, ensuring those nations are completely dependent for their survival upon the continuation of credit being granted, for they are no longer able to manage their debt or the enormous interest charges associated with it. Then these globalist pimps impose their will on the dependent victims, manipulating or coercing them into whatever globalist policies are in vogue at the time, for fear of being cut off from the supply of credit.

One might correctly surmise that the globalist money supply simultaneously addicted the great Western nations in a similar manner through the ill-advised deficit financing of their budgets in the 1970s and 1980s and once more in the wake of the 2008 global meltdown. Physical conservatism will once more be imposed alongside global socialism, for fear that the debt bonds will not be renewed unless the debt-ridden nations capitulate to the globalist agenda.

All this is yet another tentacle of the Rex Deus conspiracy. Rex Deus members surround themselves with the best-educated economists, bankers, industrialists, and capitalists—all educated at special, elitist universities—and have over many centuries gained control over most of the world's wealth. The money is then lent to governments and capitalists, who become their economic slaves, as they cannot pay it back, thereby bankrupting many nations, all to enforce their loyalty. All this was perfected in the twentieth century through covertly founded central banks that control the world's money supply.[26]

Does anyone really believe that any of their state/provincial or federal governments really have any say over their economic policies, including trade? The answer, of course, is "no." All such policy is dictated and controlled by the powerful globalists. This is why it matters not today what party or leader is in power, for their economic policies are identical for all practical applications. Because of their debts, governments take their marching and policy orders from those who control the money. If debt is not enough to control government policy, then the complete infiltration of governments at all levels by Masons and other globalists ensures the spurious will is carried out. The most powerful potentates, who include the Rothschilds, Morgans, and the Rockefellers, back the globalists. This is why politicians run on one set of pastoral principles in their platforms and adroitly implement different doctrines and policies as soon as they reach power. One only needs to look at Bill Clinton and Jean Chretien with respect to NAFTA and free trade as proof.

Among the first of these spurious, globalist institutions was the Federal Reserve in America. This most important bastion of Western economic leadership was established through persistent efforts by Illuminated Freemasonry in partnership with the Rothschild-Rockefeller-Morgan axis. The Morgans worked closely with the Rockefellers to conceive the founding of a banking cartel. They did this in a secret meeting held in 1910 at JP Morgan's private resort, on an island off the coast of Georgia.[27] Their subversive efforts paid off, with the suspicious passing and enactment of the Federal Reserve Bank Act while opposing congressmen had already adjourned for the Christmas holiday season, ensuring European Illuminists a permanent role in America's finances and its defacto economic destiny.[28]

Not many know that the United States Federal Reserve Bank is privately owned, for this fact is kept in relative secrecy. Most believe the Federal Reserve is government owned and government directed, but it is not. It is a private corporation held by stockholders, whose names are kept secret through the Federal Reserve Act. However, it has come to light that the Rothschilds and the Rockefellers are the most important and influential stockholders of the Federal Reserve.[29]

The top eight shareholders of the Federal Reserve are an intriguing cluster of strategic, covert partners. First, there is the Rothschild's Bank of London and Berlin. Then there are the Lazard brothers, who own the Bank of Paris. Next, we have the Israel Moses Seif Banks of Italy, followed by the Warburg Bank of Hamburg and Amsterdam, whom the Rothschilds are partners with. We then have the Lehman Brothers (who used to own the Bank of New York), as well as the Kuhn/Loeb Banks of New York, who also have the Rothschilds as partners. And, of course, we must not overlook the Chase Manhattan Bank of New York, which is owned by the Rockefellers and has merged with Citi Bank. Finally, there is the Goldman Sachs Bank of New York. Expect that Lehman Brothers will emerge reorganized from bankruptcy as a powerful phoenix company or that they will remain in parts within one of these powerful, banks. One can only interpret this institution through the lens of its powerful, capitalistic shareholders, all strategically aligned for hundreds of years as a giant globalist Leviathan, bent on biased globalist policies. The other central banks of the world contain the same sorts of shareholders.

To this globalist end, governments have been coerced by the banking cartel into sheltering enormous wealth created by bank profits through the establishment of seditious, tax-exempt foundations. Profits from the globalist banks are laundered into them, where they are, in turn, invested into other corporations that will further influence the global economy. By this diabolical scheme, an elite few capitalistic potentates/Adepts increasingly influence and manipulate the global economy, just as the so-called think tanks, also created by the same globalist forces, influence the opinions of the general public. Private foundations, complete with requisite laws, serve as tax shelters for the enormous wealth of the international banking cartel[30] controlled by Rex Deus and the Rothschild family, all to fund world government. The power of the Rockefellers, Warburgs, Schiffs, and Morgans has now shifted to their giant global foundations.[31]

CHAPTER 73

SECRET SOCIETIES AND THE NEW AGE OF ATLANTIS

In later times some will abandon the faith and follow deceiving spirits and things taught by demons. Such teachings come through hypocritical liars, whose consciences have been seared as with a hot iron. They forbid people to marry and order them to abstain from certain foods.

—1 Timothy 4:1–3

The most important political organization spawned by the banking cartel and the globalist forces, according to Gary Kah, is the Council on Foreign Relations (CFR).[1] Who created the CFR? What makes it so powerful? What is its hidden agenda?

CFR propaganda now overwhelmingly influences globalist policy.[2] The CFR is the contemporaneous epicenter for the political world union. The CFR came about from a secretive meeting held during World War I. President Woodrow Wilson formed a group, The Inquiry, to plan postwar solutions that were globalist in nature and centered on the removal of national and economic barriers and opening and up free trade.[3] After the close of World War I, at the Paris peace negotiations, Wilson commissioned Edward House to organize a dinner party to broach the idea of forming an institute to guide foreign policy.[4] The Inquiry, the Fabian Society, and the Rhodes Round Table groups led by Lord Milner later formed the Institute of International Affairs in the United States and the Royal Institute of International Affairs in England.[5] On July 21, 1921, the American entity officially changed its name to the Council on Foreign Relations, complete with a building donated for their cause by the Pratt family of Rockefeller's Standard Oil.[6]

The founding CFR president was John Davis, personal attorney for JP Morgan; the vice president, Paul Cravath, was an attorney representing Morgan properties. CFR Funding derived from a clan of bankers consisting of JD Rockefeller, JP Morgan, Bernard Baruch, Jacob Schiff, Otto Kahn, and Paul Warburg. Today's funding derives mainly from the Rockefeller Brothers Fund, the Starr Foundation, Pew Charitable Trusts, the Ford Foundation, the German Marshall Fund, the McKnight Foundation, the Dillion Foundation, Xerox, GM, Texaco, and Bristol-Meyers Squibb;[7] these are all tax-exempt foundations funded by banks. David Rockefeller was intensely involved with the CFR, along with the Bilderbergers and Trilateral Commission.[8]

The CFR is the source organization steering most other powerful globalist organizations. It publishes Foreign Affairs, the most prestigious journal read in foreign policy. Greer calls it the major policy-making institution of the American upperclass.[9] The CFR includes 2,670 fellows of the top leaders in government, business, education, labor, the military, media, and banking. The CFR has thirty-eight affiliate organizations, together known as Committees on Foreign Relations. Admiral Chester Ward, a former member of the CFR, warns that the CFR's objective is to bring about the surrender of national sovereignty and the natural independence of the United States. Some believe the CFR and Trilateral organizations to be the current (Rex Deus) vehicle to bring about world government.[10]

Noteworthy individuals that have dominated past American governments have been on this committee.[11] The Clinton administration included more than one hundred members from the CFR from the outset and appointed as many CFR members as ambassadors as they possibly could.[12] Clinton was believed selected by secret societies, according to Marrs, as a nominee to run for the presidency. Clinton also has membership in both the CFR and the Trilateral Commission. In the 2000 presidential election, both Gore and Bush had strong family ties to the CFR through their respective fathers, and Gore is a CFR member.[13] The Bush administration was well represented with CFR fellows, judging from his cabinet,[14] just as the CFR now controls Obama's globalist-bent government. George W. Bush took much of his advice from his father, who served on the CFR, as did Vice President Richard Cheney and Secretary of State Colin Powel.

The Trilateral Commission specializes in promoting world government through encouraging economic interdependence among the superpowers. It is a derivative of the CFR that began with the CFR's and the Bilderberger's blessing at the Rockefeller estate in Tarrytown, New York, July 23, 1972.[15] The commission was formed by Rockefeller, along with Henry Kissinger and Carter's future National Security Adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski,[16] and it drew its inspiration from Brzezinski's book Between Two Ages.[17] Carter, according to Sylvia Browne, was an unknown governor until the Trilateral Commission funded and popularized him, ensuring Carter would become president.[18] The CFR usually leads this organization;[19] members must, however, derive from the three economic superpowers—North America, Europe, and Japan—to foster better cooperation.[20]

According to Kah, the Trilateral Commission believes in a global government, a global monetary system, and a global tax policy.[21] It stands for global socialism built upon those who have subsidized these tenets. Expect that Western nations in the future will be enslaved to support have-not nations of the world.

The Bilderberger organization of Europe is yet another highly influential group of intrigue that is sponsored by the banks, the Rothschilds, and the Rockefellers, along with other globalist forces.[22] Some powerful Freemasons consider the Bilderbergers to be the most clandestine and sinister secret society of all.[23] It consists of approximately one hundred of the power elite from the NATO countries, maintaining its leadership from among CFR members. It was initially funded by National City Bank, the Morgan Trust, Standard Oil, Ford, and Dupont.[24]

In 1937, Prince Bernard married Princess Julianne of the Netherlands, becoming a major shareholder in Shell, along with Lord Victor Rothschild.[25] The Bilderbergers were founded in 1954 by Prince Bernard, at the urging of Lord Victor Rothschild, to bring together the world's most powerful figures once a year to meet on an agenda that is always kept secret.[26] The (tax-exempt) Rockefeller and Ford Foundations, in turn, fund this clandestine enclave of potentates.[27] Bilderbergers are nothing more than an unofficial CFR expanded for international scale, according to Neal Wilgus.[28] The European Economic Community (EEC) and its political confederation is the upshot of a well-planned plot by Bilderberger efforts.

The Bilderbergers Foundation was incorporated to bring about the union of all European nations into one economic, geopolitical, and militaristic entity. Their cause, according to Marr, just as it is the CFR's cause, is to bring about world government under the same model. Many of the Bilderbergers members include or have included the Who's Who of European royalty and the world's elite,[29] such as Nelson Rockefeller, Henry Kissinger, Cyrus Vance, Donald Rumsfeld, Gerald Ford, Helmut Schmidt, Giscard D'Estaing, Edmond De Rothschild, Prince Bernard, Henry Grunwald (Time Magazine), and Henry Heinz of HJ Heinz Company.[30] More recent attendees to these meeting have been George Bush, Sr. and Jr., Bill Clinton, Margaret Thatcher, John Major, Tony Blair, Bill Gates, David Rockefeller, Conrad Black, and Steven Spielberg.[31]

We must include into the mix the of elitist globalist organizations the renowned and infamous Club of Rome formed in 1968.[32] This organization contains less than one hundred members, whom are all CFR members.[33] The Club of Rome is alleged by some to report to the little-known (Snake) Committee of 300. It claims to understand the problematique of how the world will survive pollution, war, industrial development, over population, and similar problems.[34] They claim to hold the keys to world peace and global prosperity through world government.[35]

In 1973, the Club of Rome commissioned a report that was complete with contrived and anticipated apocalyptic problems and offered corresponding and supposedly ingenious resolution models for contrived future peak oil, population explosions, and the ever popular global-warming disasters.[36] This organization's stealthy purpose is to oversee the regionalization and then the unification of the entire world, which it has deviously divided into ten political and economic regions. Gary Kah rates the classification of this commission as one level higher than the Bilderbergers,[37] but it is still a Rex Deus-spawned organization.

One last secret organization of intrigue that demands notation is the ultra-secretive order George Bush, Sr. belongs to, the Skull and Bones. This is a secret fraternal order that only operates at Yale University. As per Marrs, its graduating members make up the cloak-and-dagger inner circle within the CFR that controls the CFR. Marrs notes that researchers point out that the order has been called the stepping stone to the CFR, Bilderbergers, and the Trilateral organizations. The emblem advertising the Skull and Bones is the crest for the Illuminati, while its insignia is the flag of the Knights Templar. Members are called "knights," fashioned after the Knights Templar. William Huntington Russell and Alphonso Taft, father to William Howard Taft, who later became President, imported the order out of Germany in 1832.[38]

Some prominent members of this secret society have been Henry Stimpson (Secretary of State under Roosevelt), Averill Harriman, Henry Luce (the publisher), and J. Richardson Dilworth (the longtime manager of the Rockefeller fortune). Others include Low, Taft, Forbes, Coolridge, and Delano. The Skull and Bones was a political recruiting agency that centered on the Harriman, Whitney, Vanderbilt, Lord, Taft, Bundy, Rockefeller,[39] Perkins, Stimson, Weyerhaeuser, Gilma, Wadsworth, Payne, Davidson, Pillsbury, Sloane, Phillips, and Brown families.[40] Both the Morgan and Rockefeller families and companies were, and are, well represented in this order.[41] George W. purportedly appointed eleven Skull and Bones members to his administration.[42]

Only fifteen members per year are initiated, limiting total active membership to 500 to 600 at a time.[43] All are political dynamos and corporate juggernauts; being Skull and Bones equates to socializing with the world's elite. With explicit emphasis on their family heritage and bloodlines, they arrange marriages to "protect and advance their genetic pseudo-blue bloods," while these intermingled families help and support each other in their quests for financial, political, and genetic dominance.[44]

What we must understand is that these spurious forces are indeed at work in all national governments, at all levels of the world, including the United Nations, which is one of the most successful globalist offshoots.

Following is a list of prominent American presidents and presidential candidates, along with their globalist connections, as a testimony to this conspiracy:[45]

Roosevelt/Mason
Truman/Mason
Kennedy/CFR
Johnson/Mason
Nixon/CFR
Ford/Mason, CFR
Carter/CFR, Trilateral
Reagan/Mason
Bush, Sr./CFR-Illuminati, Trilateral, Skull and Bones
Adlai Stevenson/CFR
Goldwater/Mason
McGovern/Mason, CFR, Trilateral
Dukakis/CFR
Bush, Jr./CFR, Skull and Bones,
Kerry/CFR, Skull and Bones

The following additional Presidents were all Freemasons:

George Washington
James Buchannon
James Garfield
Warren Harding
Andrew Jackson
Andrew Johnson
William McKinley
James Monroe
James Polk
Teddy Roosevelt[46]

The founding of geopolitical/economic organizations with Masonic pyramids of money is one aspect of globalism, but we ought not to forget their second pillar of influence: think tanks. It should come as no surprise that the Rockefeller Foundations are the sources for these North American think tanks, and they fund them to be propaganda divisions. The primary goals of these think tanks are to influence and manipulate education and public opinion through producing studies and reports that promote the globalist ideals. They further include a secondary sinister objective, the degradation of Christian credibility. According to Kah, think tanks are neither concerned with truth or fact, only their political ambitions to promote globalism in the face of their enemy, Christianity, is all-important.[47]

Kah states that the findings of these think tanks are usually concocted and unsupported theories of deception that the media then quotes as facts for the persuasion of public opinion. Education systems print these deceptions as facts in textbooks to diabolically deceive the young, preparing their naive minds for world union.[48] These conclusions are not the harsh delusions of a paranoid conspirator; the facts are available for all to peruse. Remember that the threefold strategy for world government is being waged through Freemasonry, education, and the infiltration of the Christian church. Rex Deus's stable-agents inspire these covert operations. Documented sedition by Rex Deus is to impose unproven scientific theory, through the schools, as fact and then to employ the press to maliciously brainwash the masses, skillfully backing up the lies. Rex Deus points to its two greatest achievements as Darwinism and Marxism,[49] likely followed by socialism, Nazism, and the upstart global warming and over-population deceptions. Hitler was a firm believer in Social Darwinism.

Darwin was not the objective, secular scholar he has been canonized to be; he was close friends with Max Muller, who translated the Rig Vedas. Darwin was profoundly influenced by mysticism, frequently attending séances with George Elliot.[50] Evolution likely emanated out of Darwin's hidden bias and devotion to mysticism and the Upanishad scripture, Samkhra. This is a material world prison philosophy of earthly atheism, a perennial philosophy, as Armstrong presents it, where humans are perpetually cursed to be born and die in nature, but the spirit evolves (to godhood) throughout the eternal process.[51] Thus, Darwin developed a derisive, degrading philosophy, funded by the Royal Society, to dismiss monotheism.

Education's task is to destroy Christianity and to prepare the world to accept world government without violence. Educators are succeeding in directing the minds of the masses to believe in vain conceptions, fantastic theories, and Progressive ideas manifested in all forms of literature and entertainment, which are, according to the Rex Deus writers The Elders of Zion, "senseless, abominable, and filth, all to obscure the real truth of the true objectives."

The press and media are further drafted in support of these causes. The media has been targeted by the liberals commissioned by Freemasonry. Media organizations are bound together with professional secrecy, a "Masonic solidarity" that acts as the watch guard over the greater ideals. Rex Deus and Freemasonry use the media so they can remain undiscovered, ensuring the media supports their grandiose, made-up theories, such as Darwinism[52] and global warming.

CFR people now dominate and control education worldwide. The first objective was to promote socialism and globalism within the education system, preparing the youth for the New Babel. The ever-growing Rockefeller Fund has a one-world strategy with an explicit global perspective and an emphasis on the convergence of national and international frameworks.[53] Educational institutions adopted the views of John Dewey, the father of Progressive education. Kah describes Dewey as a self-professed atheist who did not believe in moral absolutes (Christianity).[54] The second directive in the preparation for the New Babel is the de-Christianizing of the world's youth through the education system, as per Dewey's adopted views.

Once people reach adulthood, they have been completely indoctrinated against Christian thought, thereby embracing doctrines upheld by the spurious beliefs and religions, complete with the ideal of world unity at any cost! Our youth have been well prepared for Gnostic revelations that will break modern Christianity to pieces through the de-deifying of Jesus. The media is encouraged to discredit Christianity with the most disturbing and unprincipled expressions and allegations,[55] which would incite violence and revolution if expressed against any other religion. Christianity must be destroyed so that the entire world will accept the future Antichrist.

The Papacy is the only real force that Rex Deus recognizes as a legitimate threat. Rex Deus plans to destroy the Catholic clergy and priesthood, ruining the Catholic mission on earth, as well as the balance of Christianity, leaving only an unrecognizable remnant. Once the papal court and Christianity have been destroyed, Rex Deus will come rushing forth in their defense to prevent further bloodshed[56] and reshape the remnants into their new, universal religion.

Environmental organizations are also sponsored by sinister globalist forces pursuing globalist agendas. Globalists have targeted environmentalism, knowing it is the perfect platform to promote global doctrines because of the emotional and strong opinions people hold about the environment issue. The environmental question has the intriguing power to cross all national, political, and religious boundaries to unite people from one end of the earth to the other. The ultimate objective of all these green groups, other than the obvious environmental objectives, is to form a world organization to bind all nations, and all peoples, to global environmental policies and laws. One wonders about the accuracy of the statistics and the motives of people and groups, such as Al Gore, who have taken global warming as their agenda. Is global warming yet another fantastic theory unleashed to channel the world into accepting world government?

One such high profile San Francisco environmental agency, the Gorbachev Foundation, is a lightning rod for consolidating environmentalism with world government. Evidently, Gorbachev endeavored to bring about a figurative, global Perestroika. His organization, which has enormous global influence, is a partner of globalism with a blueprint for world takeover. The Gorbachev Foundation has also created the Earth Charter, a Ten Commandments for human behavior on the environment that is expected to be adopted in the near future.[57]

Globalist pantheism was reinvented as Theosophy by the legendary Helen Petrovina Blavatsky and Colonel Henry Steel Olcott on November 17, 1875, in New York.[58] Blavatsky was born a Russian aristocrat. She spent her childhood studying the occult in her great grandfather Prince Paul Dolgorouski's library. Dolgorouski was a high initiate in the Rite of Strict Observance Order. Helen joined the Egyptian Brotherhood of Luxor in Cairo, where she became an accomplished occultist with an encyclopedic knowledge. Blavatsky was in close contact with all the most influential occultists of her time, during which the Hermetic Brotherhood of Luxor and the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn were the most important Theosophical orders providing occult training.[59]

Blavatsky published an enormous opus on ancient mythology, Isis Unveiled. Her final work, The Secret Doctrine, is a commentary on the book of Dzyan, supposedly written in Atlantis. Blavatsky believed there have been five intelligent races to occupy the earth; we are the fifth, while the Atlanteans (giants) were the fourth.[60]

During the Middle Ages, Theosophist philosophy was housed in Masonry, medieval mysticism, and Rosicrucianism.[61] According to Peter Marshall, the Theosophical Society adopted alchemical and Hermetic traditions to build a bridge between science and religion, endeavoring to develop the spiritual powers of humanity.[62] Theosophy evolved to become the nucleus for a universal brotherhood[63] and is a definitive synthesis of all religions; it has declared itself to be the all-encompassing, universal ultra-religion of the future.[64]

Theosophy’s foundation was originally set in esoteric Buddhism and contained a hierarchy of Secret Masters, or Avatars.[65] Theosophist philosophy is conspicuous, according to the Encyclopedia Americana, among the religious systems of India, China, and Egypt. These Adepts, Sages, and Secret Masters are revered as “highly evolved men” who have acquired divine power[66] and who endeavor to develop the New Man on earth. Blavatsky conducted séances in which she revealed letters from this ascended Order of Masters, whom she referred to vicariously as the Great White Brotherhood.

Evolution of the soul (spirit) is at the heart of the Theosophist religion. Theosophists believe when the Spark of Life, the evolving soul, reincarnates into the highest life form in sufficient numbers, humankind will ascend to a higher plane of being. Theosophists further believe the human ethos first took human form on planets other than earth. The last planet was Mars, and the next planet will be Venus. At the end of this age, Theosophists believe worthy humans will ascend to become the “architects” of future universes,[67] like Lucifer. Untold numbers have carried the Theosophist torch over the last century, including many powerful dignitaries of our age. The New Age movement of today, according to John Michael Greer, is nothing more than “Theosophy plus,” drawing all of its inspiration from Theosophy’s occultism of the last century.[68]

Alice Bailey was a major supporter of the Theosophical Society. Bailey founded the Lucis Trust, originally known as Lucifer’s Press, an offshoot of the Theosophical Society[69] designed to publish the teachings from her spirit guides. She also founded the Theosophical Network in 1961, which has established arcane schools and organizations such as World Goodwill, which formed another occultist organization called World Union, all dedicated to implementing world government. Bailey’s arcane schools teach occult philosophy received by Bailey from her purported Tibetan spirit guides, Kuthumi and Djwal Khul, to initiate a “New Group of World Servers” to assist the Masters of the Great White Lodge.[70] The White Lodge in Theosophist and occultic systems is a Secret (Snake) Brotherhood of Advanced Souls that forms the hidden government of the world. This alleged and extremely powerful organization is further known in occultism to be the Great White Brotherhood. Kah has found that all these groups are directly linked to the World Constitution Parliament Association.[71]

Bailey stated Freemasonry is the training school for advanced occultists.[72] The Lucis Trust and its derivative organizations are plugged into the highest levels of Freemasonry. Past members of the Lucis Trust disquietingly include David Rockefeller, Robert McNamara, Donald Regan, Henry Kissinger, Paul Volcker, and George Shultz—all members of the CFR and Trilateral Commission.[73] All globalist organizations link directly back to both pantheistic and Masonic organizations that report to the Great White Lodge. All are the fanatical foes of the true faith.[74]

CHAPTER 74

THE ILLUMINATI

Again, you have heard it said to the people long ago, "Do not break your oath, but keep the oaths you have made to the Lord." But I tell you, Do not swear at all; either by heaven, for it is God's throne; or by the earth, for it is his footstool; or by Jerusalem, for it is the city of the Great King. And do not swear by your head, for you cannot make one hair white or black. Simply let your "Yes" be "Yes," and your "No" be "No"; anything beyond this comes from the evil one.

—Matthew 5:33–37

Who is the small clandestine circle renowned as the Illuminati, the infamous 300 of the New World Order and the commission that controls the CFR through the Skull and Bones?

The Illuminati is a surreptitious Luciferic organization founded on May 1, 1776, in Ingolstadt, Bavaria, by the rebel professor of canon Adam Weishaupt, a prominent Mason.[1] Weishaupt was a dedicated student of the liberal philosophy proposed by Voltaire and others[2] that opposed Roman Catholic tyranny and its puppet governments.[3] The originating founders were upper-class intellectuals, all with the yearning to be freed from government and religious oppression. Hence, Illuminati defined itself as “the enlightened ones; those initiated into the secret teachings of Lucifer the light bearer.” The term Adept identified the august members to the Order of the Illuminati.[4]

Brown cites an earlier genesis to the Illuminati that blends into other sources. Brown suggests the Illuminati was formed in the 1500s, in Rome, by an enlightened group of mathematicians, astronomers, and physicists to oppose the narrow-minded views of the Roman Church. Brown asserts that Galileo formed the first think tank and referred to this committee as the Enlightened Ones, the “Illuminati,” who led this noble group of intellects. The Roman Church ruthlessly hunted this elitist organization. After Galileo was placed under house arrest, the Roman Illuminati degraded into complete upheaval, fleeing Italy and vanishing into a deep, underground guise. This underground group later resurfaced among the Bavarian Stonemasons that included the Rothschilds and the Bilderbergers. Freemasons subsequently adopted the Illuminati as a Bavarian Brotherhood.[5]

The primary goal of the Illuminati is to bring about the New World Order.[6] The second goal is to utterly destroy Christianity via their own religion of mysticism,[7] likely through Gnostic infiltration of Christian churches. The Illuminati realizes Christianity must be reeled in before world government and the universal religion can take hold. More succinctly stated, the true purpose to the Illuminati is to destroy all religions that are not pantheistic, overthrow all national governments, and abolish all private poverty.[8] The Bavarian government concluded the Illuminati plotted to overthrow governments and abolish Christianity. Wilson wrote that the Illuminati guard closely one of their innermost secrets: their surreptitious schema to obliterate Christianity, for they pretend to have the sole true religion of Lucifer.[9] Even more concerning is that the Illuminati have purportedly adopted the philosophy of Machiavelli (1469–1527), who taught that “the end justifies the means.” Nazis implemented this philosophy—with horrific results.[10]

The Illuminati infiltrated Freemasonry in 1782;[11] although some sources backdate this to 1777.[12] Weishaupt is touted as a Masonic reformer.

This was a marriage made in spurious heaven, for the goal from Freemasonry's inception was to bring about the New World Order. The Rex Deus-sponsored Freemasonry fraternity welcomed its spurious and mystic cousins of Luciferian devotion while savoring Weishaupt's belief that the Illuminati were created to rule the world.[13]

Brown writes that the Illuminati grew rapidly within the friendly confines of Freemasonry, evolving into a secret society within a secret society, and then eventually taking complete control of the organization. The Illuminati exploited Freemasonry's worldwide network for their own New World Order agenda. They further utilized Freemasonry's far-flung network to infiltrate all elitist organizations around the world, which included Masonry organizations of every kind, the major banks, and governments. Brown goes on to note that the Illuminati, through Freemasonry (canker worm) organizations, founded and funded the major banks, industries, and universities around the world to further propagate their (radical) agenda.[14]

One who rises to the Level of Perfection, complete enlightenment, is recognized as an Adept. This title is awarded to fellows of the secret order within the innermost circles of Masonic hierarchy, the Illuminati. Only Adepts, Illuminated Masons, know the true secrets; they belong to both Freemasonry and Illuminati organizations.[15] Remember, the enlightened ones, the Adepts, have been completely initiated into the secret teachings of the light bearer, Lucifer.[16] Early twentieth-century writers such as Nesta Webster and Augustin de Barruel, a Jesuit priest, argued the Illuminati were merely pawns in a larger game manipulated by Jewish Satanists.[17] The Illuminated, then, report directly to the authentic Princes of Masonry, the Jewish Satanists of Rex Deus.

Hence, the Princes of Masonry comprise the foremost inner circle of the Illuminati and Rosicrucianism. Hereditary Rex Deus Adepts are purposefully selected from within the dynastic inheritance (bloodlines) passed down the generations from father to son. The chosen are brainwashed from childhood to ensure full comprehension of the secret knowledge, religion, and seditious objectives. The true knowledge and doctrines are kept from all outside the chosen bloodlines, no matter how talented, how rich, or how powerful, for they are considered unfit to receive this knowledge.[18]

Conspiracy theorists claim the order's secret Adepts are funded by thirteen families, including the Rothschilds, all who are regarded as human gods plotting world government for thousands of years. This plot is scheduled to culminate in the next few decades.[19] The alleged Rex Deus genius Adepts are mentored from childhood to rule the world, utilizing Masonic soldiers and other organizations.[20] Thus, Freemasonry was coopted to bring about the Illuminati agenda. Kah describes Freemasons as soldiers of the New Religion,[21] led by Adepts, who are led by the bona fide super Adepts of Rex Deus. Only Rex Deus Adepts will be permitted to reign, because only they have the true understanding and wisdom.[22]

Below the thirteen families is their representative Council of Thirty-Three, The Great Druid Council, followed by The Committee of Three Hundred consisting of Illuminated Freemasons. All were linked to the Elders of Zion in the assassinated German Jewish industrialist Walter Rathenau's book Kriegsfuhrung Und Politik and to other modern conspiracy advocates. Rathenau is thought to have defected from Elders of Zion.[23]

Common propaganda promoted by governments, universities, and elitist organizations is that the Illuminati became extinct within the confines of Freemasonry, but this is not true, for the Illuminati is thriving at the innermost center,[24] just as it is in the CFR and in Skull and Bones. The BBC reported on November 16, 1984 that the famous British philanthropist and financier Cecil Rhodes was a member of the Illuminati. His famous trust established the Rhodes Scholarships funded by Nathan Rothschild and designed to recruit the brightest young minds into the Illuminati, of which Bill Clinton was one.[25] When the famous Thirty-third Degree Adept and Illuminati fellow George Bush, Sr. was the head of the CIA, he determinedly and officially closed down the investigation into the Illuminati for all time—due to lack of evidence![26]

Dr. Carroll Quigley, mentor to Clinton, admits Rhodes, a gold and diamond baron, formed a Society of the Elect in 1891 to absorb wealth and to establish world government. He formed Round Table groups with help from the Fabian Society and Woodrow Wilson's The Inquiry to accomplish these goals,[27] which, as you will recall, led to the CFR. The Fabian Society was the British and European face for socialism. It was founded in 1884 by a coterie of Progressive intellectuals, such as Bernard Shaw and Anne

Besant, the successor to Blavatsky in the Theosophy Society. It further founded the English Labor Party to further its socialistic agenda.[28] Quigley maintains Rhodes Scholarships are merely a facade to conceal the secret society that drafts elite minds to attain world government.[29]

Let us not forget the influence the Illuminati has wielded in the last 300 years. They manifested the Templar dream, the American Revolution, as the model for the coming United States. Soon after, the Illuminati instigated the French Revolution that endeavored to install Duc D'Orleans, Illuminati, on the French throne. A BBC historical piece on Churchill's life noted that the London Herald published a statement by Churchill in the February 8, 1920 edition condemning the Illuminati and warning the British people of its worldwide conspiracy. Furthermore, according to Dan Brown, Churchill once lectured reporters that if English spies infiltrated the Nazis to the scale the Illuminati infiltrated Parliament, the war would have been over in one month.[30]

Churchill believed the Illuminati were responsible for Karl Marx and the Communist Revolution, both for the purpose of bringing about the New World Order.[31] Brown writes that Illuminati support for both Marx and the Russian Revolution has been well documented.[32] Epperson notes Communists merely perpetuate the ideas of the Illuminati.[33] All this suspicion connects back to Rex Deus, the elemental Illuminati, who inconceivably take credit for being the authors of Marxism and Communism, labeling them "Social Masonry."[34] The global elite created and financed Communism but later lost control of it.

Before the revolution, Trotsky lived rent-free, care of Standard Oil; he was financed by Jacob Schiff, Rockefeller Banks, Paul Warburg, and Kuhn & Loeb. Woodrow Wilson forced the Canadian government to free Trotsky after he was arrested in Halifax en route to Russia, while Lenin was financed by Max Warburg.[35] Hence, Booth notes Marxism was merely materialistic reframing of Freemasonry ideology by Trotsky and Lenin; both were fervent Freemasons employed to launch an aggressive war against God.[36]

One then wonders about the philosophy of Pierre-Joseph Proudhon. Was fascist, left-wing anarchism advocating violent revolution sponsored by organized secret societies[37]—yet another Rex Dues plot? Was anarchism created, like the Muslim Brotherhood, to cattle-herd mundane masses into world government by utilizing polar opposites from the right and the left? Certainly, Fascist Islamists follow the Abd Al-Wahhab sect that later became a covert arm of Nazi intelligence in World War II. After the war, the Muslim Brotherhood fled Egypt to Saudi Arabia, a Wahhabi stronghold, care of the CIA Director and globalist Allen Dulles. One of the Brotherhood's favored students who taught the arts of Fascism and Nazism was Osama Bin Laden, whom the globalist CIA Director George Bush, Sr. drafted in 1979 C.E. to battle the Russians as the Mujahideen, which later morphed into Al-Qaeda.[38]

Similarly, Rex Deus financed the rise of Hitler to check the Communist mistake, through powerful German corporations and banks such IG Farben group of companies, UBC, Warburg's Deutsche Bank, and Schroroeder Rockefeller and Company. Farben, for example, was funded by the American government's Dawes Plan (1924, to restructure German war reparations, whereby Carroll Quigley called it largely a J. P. Morgan production to consolidate the German steel and chemical giants I. G. Farben and Vereinigre Stahlwerke that were major supporters of Hitler) and the Young Plan (1928, named for the J. P. Morgan agent D. Young that required burdensome monetary payments, which led to support within Germany for Hitler), which virtually guaranteed success for the fledgling Nazi companies.

The Schroeder Bank acted as financial agents for Germany in Britain and America, utilizing John Foster Dulles, while entering into a formal relationship with Schroeder Rockefeller and Company. Rockefeller owned 42 percent of Schroeder. One year after a meeting in 1924 at Schroeder's home to launch Hitler's career, Alfred Rosenberg met with English financiers, including Rothschild's Bank of England, solidifying finances through the Bank of International Settlements (BIS). It was managed, as per Quigley, by the bank cartel to secretly manage the coming war. By World War II, the Nazis controlled the BIS through the Schroeder and Reichstag Banks.[39]

Max and Paul Warburg were directors for Farben, while Metz of Farben was a director for the Warburg Bank of Manhattan. The powerful families of the banking cartel sat on most Nazi corporations and banks, and vice versa. John Foster and Allen Dulles were spurious lawyers for this web, working for IG Farben, Rockefeller & Schroeder, the Schroeder Bank, GAF, with UBC and BIS acting as conduits for money laundered to the Nazis. Both Dulles were CFR, with John becoming Secretary of State and Allen CIA Director. Prescott Bush and his son George served on UBC's board. Prescott Bush was a driving force behind the creation of the CIA that Rumsfeld later appointed George to run. Ed Harriman was a mentor to Prescott, while the Harrimans held large ownership in UBC; Harrimans also bought the oldest bank in the US, Brown Brothers.[40]

Emphasizing the unbridled power of Rex Deus was Woodrow Wilson, who later orated three radio addresses in 1921 warning the American public of the Illuminati takeover of the US banking system. He underscored that there is a power so organized, so complete, and so pervasive that none had better speak above their breath when they speak in condemnation of it.[41] One must analyze all this global conspiracy by the evidence brought forth; all these far-flung, clandestine factions must be working under one umbrella organization, in unison, to bring about the universal, spurious religion of the end times, together with world government.

CHAPTER 75

GLOBAL GNOSTICISM

> But I am afraid that just as Eve was deceived by the serpent's cunning, your minds may somehow be led astray from your sincere and pure devotion to Christ. For if someone comes to you and preaches a Jesus other than the Jesus we preach, or if you receive a different spirit from the one you received, or a different gospel from the one you accepted, you put up with it easily enough … for such men are false apostles.
> —2 Corinthians 11:3–13

Let us now steal a moment to consider the Gnostics. How did Gnosticism weave its way into the fabric as a Genesis 6 Conspiracy imperative?

Gnosticism was popular and powerful in Jesus' time; in fact, Gnosticism reached its pinnacle around 200 C.E.,[1] even though it has risen again and again in other incarnations over the last 2,000 years.

Early Christians believed the founder of Gnosticism to be Simon the Magus,[2] spoken of in the New Testament as Simon the Sorcerer;[3] although, Simon was not the founder, for Gnosticism was flourishing previous to Simon. Simon was, however, a weighty dignitary for Gnosticism and mysticism of that period. Scripture views him as the first heretic[4] and a sorcerer from Samaria who astonished people with his magic. He boasted he was someone great; even his followers thought he had divine power, known as the "Great Power" (Acts 8:9–10). When Simon saw the power of the Holy Spirit working in Peter and John, he offered to purchase the power, but of course, he was rejected (Acts 8:18–25).

For early Christians, Simon was a false prophet who thought of himself as a messiah figure. He cast doubt upon both Jesus' and Peter's authority, acting adroitly in the Spirit of the Antichrist. According to Baigent and Leigh, Christians viewed Simon's power as sorcery, believing he was employing his powers in an endeavor to usurp the early Christian church. Simon was thus an early Antichrist prototype for all black magicians and necromancers to follow, including Aleister Crowley.[5] Simon was likely educated in Alexandria, where he would have learned all of the mystical arts and knowledge that had been gathered there in the infamous city of ancient learning and the epicenter for modern mysticism.[6]

Not only did Simon the Magus vindictively try to cast doubt upon Peter's authority in the Gnostic accounts,[7] but also Gnostics further believe James (Joseph of Arimathea), not Peter, eventually inherited the apostolic succession from John and Jesus. Gnostics believe Simon Magus was a favored disciple of John the Baptist and that John named Simon as his successor.[8] Gnostics also believe John the Baptist was an Essene and not a monotheistic Christian or Jew.

As noted by Robert Smith, until the eighteenth century, all older dualist sects now called Gnostic were classified as Manicheans.[9] Manicheans were followers of Mani, who drew breath from 216 C.E. to 276 C.E.[10] Christian Gnosticism was conceded by historians to have been the largest influence upon Mani. Mani was raised among (numinous) Jewish Christians, the Elchasaitans—Gnostics that were linked back to the Gnostic Essenes of the Dead Sea region. Mani rebelled against the puritanical nature of the Nazarite Essenes and then later collected books of sacred knowledge gathered from Egyptian Gnostics. During the first century to the third century C.E., the Gnostics of Alexandria and Syria gathered all mystical thought together and then overlaid it with Christianity.[11]

Manicheans were persecuted by Catholicism as practicers of a pagan religion. Mani claimed to be an apostle of Christ, but Manicheans and Paulicians saw themselves valiantly as Christian dualists. Mani further considered himself a messenger from God and a successor to Christ, and he thought that he was the end of a long line of heavenly apostles. Does this ring familiar? Roman Catholic literalists purged Christian mystics, identifying Gnostics as heretics, along with any who disagreed with them. Catholicism maintained this methodical persecution to the point that by the sixth century C.E., it seemed that the interpretive sects had all but been wiped out. Evidently, the only surviving sects of the allegorical approach communed in diminutive enclaves among the Manicheans, Messalians, and Paulicians.[12]

Cathars believed genocidal purges made against the Christian Gnostics in the fourth to sixth centuries forced the true church underground, along with allegorical interpretations of Scripture, and that it awoke with a new sense of exuberance in the tenth century among the Bogomils.[13] Freemasonry believes it is the current underground supplier to the world for Manichean and Cathar dogma.[14]

Manicheans were a palpable dualist, good-versus-evil religion built upon the ancient Egyptian religion, along with various versions of Asian and Middle Eastern mysticism, Greek philosophy, alternative interpretations of (mystical) Christianity and Judaism. Manicheanism was Gnosticism, according to Bauval and Hancock, the chief rival religion to Roman Catholic hegemony.[15] Mani fanatically believed he was the continuation of a lineage of prophets and enlighteners that began with Adam and included Buddha, Zoroaster (Zarathustra), and Jesus; he believed that he, and they, were the messengers of the true, universal religion that would someday replace all others.[16] Mani additionally counted Hermes, Plato, Seth, Enoch/Thoth, Noah, and Abraham as saviors of humankind.[17] Manicheans regarded Hermes as equal to Zarathustra, Plato, Buddha, and Jesus, for all were known as “the Good Ones to the World.” Mani believed all these emissaries were sent from God as apostles for different generations.[18]

The Gnostic/Theosophist dogma of messengers/prophets sent to every generation and every people is a clever manipulation that craftily perverts the true doctrine of messengers from God Most High. These purported polytheist prophets of false gods and Satan are intermixed with authentic prophets such as Moses, Abraham, Mohammad, and Jesus and corrupting the monotheist message of God's messengers. This intermingling's design is to confuse and persuade the ignorant and the naive that a combination of polytheism, Gnosticism, and Theosophy is the true religion of the world.

Generally speaking, Gnostics tend to divide themselves into sects, such as Archontics, Sethites, Babelites, etc., just as Christians have many denominations. Gnostics tend to place inordinate importance upon genealogies; it is a distinguishing and acknowledged mark of Gnostic literature that expresses Gnostics' sense of identity (and loyalty) through complex genealogical myths of origin.[19] It was to these endless lists of genealogies that Paul was speaking to in 1 Timothy, with regard to Gnosticism (1 Tim. 1:3–4). The genealogical record is, and was, a distinguishing mark of the Essenes, Rex Deus, and the Dragon Court.

Gnosticism is a particular form of universal mysticism that incorporates the traditions of India, Persia, Egypt, Chaldea, Greece, Rome, and the Druids. Mackey notes that old Gnosticism was not an original religious system but rather a cosmogony, a religion, and a philosophy comprised of the old Grecian and Orientalist systems, including the Platonism of the Greeks, the Parisism of the Persians, and the Kabbalah of the Jews. All came together as a new conglomeration of mystical philosophy and religion that further derived its leading doctrines from Plato-Avesta, the Kabbalah, the Vedas, and ancient hieroglyphs from Egypt.[20] In fact, according to Baigent and Leigh, Hinduism, Buddhism, Taoism, mystic Christianity, mystic Judaism, and mystic Islam are all considered Gnostic, just as Hermeticism (Sabians) is Gnostic.[21] Daoism, specifically, is a religion that seeks immortality through cultivating Dao (gnosis), the doctrines and secrets of the immortals.[22] Gnosticism is a unifying populace religion that I call "global mysticism" or "global Gnosticism."

Gnostics believe their unifying religion originated in Persia with Zoroastrianism,[23] but its roots go back much further. Zoroaster/Zarathrustra was thought by some to be a pagan Persian priest (circa 660–583 B.C.E.);[24] he was brutally slain at age seventy-seven on his own altar by rival priests of the old religion. Most historians date the visionary priest back to 1200 B.C.E. and to the Indo-Aryans, when the supreme god, Mazda, commissioned Zoroaster to restore order. He believed there existed both the supreme god of good, Ahura Mazda, and the wicked spirit of evil, Angra Mainyu, primordial twins who were equal but opposite by choice. Zoroaster enshrined dualism into the Aryan pantheon, whereby Amrita immortals were created to help Mazda, while Devas were later created to promote evil for Indra and the hostile spirit. The hostile spirit invaded the perfect world of Mazda, creating two warring factions that will continue until the end times, when newly descending immortals and a promised messiah will wipe the earth of wickedness; a river of fire will incinerate the hostile spirit.[25] One cannot ignore how these doctrines parallel monotheism, suggesting to me the Qur'an is correct when it notes monotheistic Zoroastrianism scripture was perverted at some point with polytheism.

By the beginning of the first millennium B.C.E., Avestan Aryan Zoroastrianism migrated to Iran,[26] steadfastly increasing its influence and populism. By 241 C.E., Parthian King Shappur began his reign by calling on the god Ahura Mazda to buttress his claim to the throne and to unite his empire under one dualist religion. Evolved Zoroastrianism was the first creed religion that set its beliefs down in a statement of oaths. This new, state-sponsored religion drew its subjects together into a holy community, binding them to a single purpose—every subject of Shappur was a holy soldier set adroitly against the demonic spirited Ahriman.[27] This political/religious solution was enthusiastically implemented later by Constantine with Catholicism and by modern Freemasonry and Gnosticism.

Islam subsequently pushed Zoroastrianism out of Persia; the refugee remnant migrated to India to live among the Parsee, of which 75 percent profess to be Zoroastrians.[28] Like most of the ancient, pagan religions, Zoroastrianism survived, obscured within Gnosticism and Theosophy, through Mithraism and then Manichaeism. No doubt, this is likely because of Mani. Mani claimed to have had visions as a child from Ahura Mazda.[29]

Hermeticism originated in Egyptian science and was later blended with Neo-Platonism, Zoroastrianism, Gnosticism, and Judaism.[30] Today, the Mandaean/Sabian/Hermeticism cosmology is believed to be the surviving global Gnostic religion, and Theosophy is its western heir. Mandaeans derived from the mingling of Gnosticism with Zoroastrianism; Mandaeans further believe they are the followers and disciples of John the Baptist, whom they believe founded the Mandaean sect. They further claim that they originally lived among the Gnostic Nazorean sect of Palestine led by John the Baptist, and they believe John the Baptist was a Gnostic, just as they also believe Jesus was a Gnostic.[31] Remember, too, that Simon the Magus was believed by Gnostics to have succeeded John the Baptist.

As to John the Baptist being a Gnostic, a Sabian, a Mandaean, a Zoroastrian, or any polytheist, these ideas are utterly false and spurious. The Qur’an completely backs John the Baptist as a monotheistic messenger and prophet from the true God Most High and the one who cleared the way for Jesus.[32]

Mandaeans name their priests “Nazoreans,” as guardians of the true faith.[33] The Nazarite sect originally derived from ancient Judah. Samson of the tribe of Benjamin was considered Nazarite, and Jesus was also considered to be a Nazarite by Gnostics. The Merovingian kings promoted themselves as Nazarite kings of Benjamite descent, who held Samson in high esteem. Gnostics have twisted the original Nazarite meaning, transforming its authentic discipline into that of those who guard and keep the secret knowledge from heaven. Accordingly, the Mandaean name derives from Mandayya, meaning “heavenly knowledge.”[34] They guard the illicit knowledge from heaven and the Seven Sacred Sciences, just as the Freemason organizations do.

All Gnostic sects were considered Manicheans after the third century C.E. Manicheans survived in remote enclaves until late in the sixth century C.E., when Manichaeism once more burst into a dominant religion.[35] Manichaeism grew to be a worldwide religion with its own canon. It surged from southern Mesopotamia to the Atlantic in the West; to the Pacific in the Far East; and included people of Egypt, North Africa, Spain, Gaul, Italy, and the Balkans.[36] Manicheans preserved the traditions of Alexandria, as did the Syrian Gnostics, who also included those who believed in mystical Christianity that they later passed down to the Bogomils in the tenth century C.E. and the Cathars in the twelfth century C.E. Manicheans were completely anti-Christianity as it applied to literalist Catholics; Catholics expelled the dualists to the distant east in the seventh century.[37]

Manicheans were a younger sect than some of the earlier Christian Gnostic sects, but they were (at least) a century older than the Messalians, who were also persecuted by Catholicism.[38] According to Steve Runciman, Messalians were Christian Gnostics who traced their heritage back to the infamous city of Edessa, to the mid-fourth century C.E., home of the Shroud. The Messalians survived into the seventh century C.E., where it is thought that they were likely adopted into the Paulician sect. Messalians were renowned as the keepers of secret knowledge and the keepers of Gnostic tradition, which Runciman believes included the library of ancient knowledge later inherited by the Bogomils. Messalian refugees survived into the eleventh century C.E. in the Balkans, home of the Bogamils.[39]

The monk Peter of Sicily, who wrote History of the Manicheans Who Are Also Called Paulicians, circa 820 C.E., noted Paulicians traced their heritage back to a Constantine of Mananalis of Armenia, circa 641 C.E., and to certain Christian texts. Even though Christ was a central figure with the Paulicians, they, like the Bogamils and Cathars, refused to accept Catholic literalism regarding Jesus. Paulicians rejected the cross and the material sacraments of Christianity, the Old Testament, and parts of the New Testament. Paulicians, like the Bogamils and Cathars, believed they were the bona fide church, and that the Roman Catholic and Orthodox churches were imposters.[40]

Constantine IV of the Byzantia executed Constantine of Mananalis around 665–668 C.E. The Paulicians survived this ordeal, but around 811–813 C.E., Byzantine Emperor Michael I slaughtered the Paulicians. By 840 C.E., the Paulicians had retreated into Arab territories. In 975 C.E., the Paulicians were still causing trouble and were then deported to the Balkans and Bulgaria, where they disseminated their dualist religion, just as the Messalians were previously deported to the home of the Bogamils.[41] It seems clear to me that the Bogamils came about as a conglomeration of Manicheans, Messalians, and Paulicians. Hence, Catharism was the conspicuous western offshoot of the Bogamils of the Balkans and unquestionably was the Templar religion.

Gnostics believe in the perfect, omnipotent, divine source, the parent god.[42] Yahweh of the Bible falls below this god on the hierarchy of the pantheon. Gnostics believe the God of the Jews, Yahweh/Adonai, to be just one of many subordinate gods, one of the many angels that serve the parent god,[43] in the same manner Nimrod believed. This impious, Gnostic god of Israel, named “Ialdaboth”[44] and “Demiurge,” is a brutal god of destruction.[45] Ialdaboth is the imperfect god, the craftsman produced by Wisdom/Sophia, according to Gnostic literature, and thus distinct and separate from the omnipotent and perfect parent god.[46] Gnostics state that God is impious in His madness for declaring Himself to be God and that no other gods exist apart from Him.[47] Gnostic scripture recorded Ialdoboth was arrogant for stating He is a jealous God and that there is none like Him.[48]

Cathars believed Jehovah was the devil who created the material world. He was the vengeful and violent God of the flood. Cathars judged Jehovah by His alleged evil deeds recorded in the Old Testament, rejecting God and, therefore, saying all those who adopt the Old Testament capitulate with the devil.[49] Thus, Lucifer cleaned up the mess created by God.

CHAPTER 76

A THOUSAND POINTS OF LIGHT

"For God knows that when you eat of it your eyes will be opened, and you will be like God, knowing good and evil." When the woman saw the fruit of the tree was good for food and pleasing to the eye, and also desirable for gaining wisdom, she took some and ate it. She also gave some to her husband, who was with her, and he ate it. Then the eyes of both of them were opened.

—Genesis 3:5–7

If you pay attention to globalist allegory, you will often hear the phrase "A Thousand Points of Light." What is the implication of this seemingly innocuous, poetic prose George Bush, Sr. exploited in one of his many illuminated and encrypted speeches to the world?

"A Thousand Points of Light" is an arcane metaphor symbolizing the promised thousand-year New Age reign of enlightenment introduced by the end-time religion and world government. It is also figurative language representing the spurious spark of the divine held within the spirits of humankind. The figurative spark has been disseminated throughout the world over the ages. Polythists believe this spark is encoded in the DNA of a select elite. It can be released through a connection with the universal life force by uniting the world through a vibrating, harmonic convergence. The spark of the divine cannot be ignited unless the people of the world unite under one government, in what Gnostics believe to be their true religion. Once world unity is achieved, the age of enlightenment seeking Gnosis will begin; the spark of the divine will reunite, permitting the ascension of the initiated elite into godhood.

Consequently, Gnostics believe Ialdaboth/Demiurge is the Creator God of earth who enslaved humans in matter, preventing them from becoming like gods who live in the spirit realm.[1] Ialdaboth, the evil god of the flood, who does not hold humankind's better interests in mind,[2] made a mess of the universe.[3] Gnostics believe Jehovah imprisoned humankind on earth through the mother of all evil, ignorance, and therefore, knowledge is freedom.[4] Gnostic myth holds that it is the mission of "After Thought" (Life/ Zoë/Sophia) and the Holy Spirit to assist humankind in collecting the power stolen by Ialdaboth, now widely spread in the genuine Gnostic race,[5] the exclusive posterity of Nephilim.

Lucifer is called the "architect god" and not a creator god, for Lucifer did not create the universe from nothing; rather, he designed the universe out of existing material.[6] Thus, Lucifer fixed the mess created by Ialdaboth. To this end, the title Demiurge is a derogatory Greek phrase that translates as "a lowly public craftsman," the name thereby slanders God as a lowly deity that created an imperfect world for His personal turf, all to force humans to worship Him.[7]

According to Gnostic theology, when Eve and then Adam ate of the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil, they ate the beautiful fruit of gnosis, or knowledge. According to Pike, Adonai was an evil demon, forbidding Adam to eat of the fruit of knowledge, but Adam obeyed an angel of light (Lucifer) and ate from (the good side of) the tree.[8] St. Iraneous professed in Gnostic literature that Wisdom (Sophia/mother of Ialdaboth) cunningly led Eve away from Ialdaboth via the Snake, whence both Adam and Eve then became acquainted (all knowing/gnosis) with the power superior to all and then rebelled away from Ialdoboth.[9] Hancock and Bauval note The Nag Hammadi Texts depict the serpent as a hero and a benefactor to humankind, for after Adam and Eve ate from the Tree of Knowledge, they awakened to their luminous nature.[10] Adam and Eve then became like gods, knowing both good and evil[11] and the seven spurious sciences.

As a result, Adam's descendants achieved very high levels of knowledge, even to the point of manipulating the antediluvian physical world with clever machines and devices, whereupon Demiurge intervened once more with the flood to restrict human potential. Hence, the flood was designed to punish humanity for having risen so high; it was designed to remove the light (knowledge) from among humankind. Survivors were then thrown into toil to survive, but some fortunately maintained the antediluvian knowledge to benefit a future generation, when a general awakening will once more occur[12] via A Thousand Points of Light.

Satan, then, is believed to be the great emancipator of Adam and Eve, freeing them from the bonds of ignorance. Gnostics additionally believe each person of a specific race contains within his or herself a hidden seed of the divine that is crying to be released from its prison, the person's body, so that it can reside in its natural home, the spirit world of the gods.[13] This hidden seed is the power stolen by Ialdoboth that Zoë, and supposedly the Holy Spirit, are assisting the Gnostic race in collecting. This is the spirit of globalization, which will join the collective seeds of the divine, enabling discriminating elite to vibrate into godhood. From the descendants from the antediluvian Gnostic Sethite sect, according to Gnostic expert Bentley Layton, springs a "race" (the descendants of Nephilim, Rex Deus bloodlines, Gnostics, and Theosophists)—a race where the so-called seeds (Point of Light) lie hidden, waiting to be freed.[14]

The Gnostic/New Age church claims to be the heavenly posterity on earth tracing back to Seth. Gnostics refer to themselves in myth to be the Posterity of Seth, the Offspring of Light, the Perfect Race, The Immoveable Race, and Those Ones.[15] Gnostics believe Seth was the father of the Living and the Immoveable Race, also known as the Posterity of the Eternal Seth,[16] a race of Nephilim. Sethianism, or Sethian Gnosticism, claims to be a spiritual race of humanity descended from the Seth created by the angel Autogenes in the likeness of the angel Adamas.[17] This was the infamous Emmakha Seth[18] and not the biblical Seth. Gnostics believe the Old Testament genealogies recording Adam through Noah were contrived to emulate the alleged true royal bloodlines descending from Emmakha Seth and other Nephilim.

Gnostics believe the only way to escape the bonds/matrix of matter is through gnosis and the secret knowledge imparted by Gnostics.[19] Gnostics believe theirs is a knowledge religion.[20] They believe Lucifer will release man’s mind and restore it to perfection and that the true application of knowledge is in distinguishing good from evil.[21] The intercession of the gods (fallen angels) grants them gnosis (Seven Sacred or Liberal Sciences), which guarantees the immortality of the soul.[22] Layton confirms Gnostics and most polytheists believe salvation is acquired through gnosis.[23]

Seemingly in the same spirit of gnosis supplied from the gods, American, Australian, and British medical associations chose a heretofore unexplained mystical emblem to represent their (Snake) associations. Self-admitted from volume 270 of the Journal of the American Medical Association, the emblem is a serpent coiled around a plant or staff, or more accurately, the Tree of Knowledge and Wisdom.[24] The snake in mysticism represents wisdom, just as the serpent led Eve and Adam to the Tree of Gnosis[25] that was “desirable for gaining wisdom.”[26]

This obscure snake motif is suspiciously similar to Hermes’s staff that was entwined by two snakes[27] and depicted with winged sandals, the curious caduceus known as the Magic Staff.[28] It represents a kind of mediation between heaven and earth,[29] just as the World Tree, Mount Hermon, the Great Pyramids, and ziggurats did. Mercury (Thoth/Hermes/Enoch), the provider of knowledge to humankind, is often depicted in mysticism with a snake coiled around his staff.[30] Thoth/Hermes was the mentor of doctors, magicians, and alchemists in first-time Egypt[31] and in later mystic cultures. The American and British medical associations and the Royal College of Surgeons have claimed this motif, the staff of Hermes, as their symbol!

Just as curiously, other worldwide medical organizations have similarly employed two coiled serpents spiraling around the winged caduceus/staff of Mercury/Hermes. Unger’s identifies Hermes as the son of Zeus and Naiad, the daughter of Atlas, who wore winged sandals,[32] also portrayed as having been worn by Mercury. Professional medical associations tend to utilize the single serpent motif, whereas commercial medical associations tend to adopt the dual serpent motif wrapped around the winged caduceus of Hermes.[33]

According to Gardner, the central staff with the dual serpent motif represents the spinal cord and the sensory nervous system, while the two uppermost wings signify the brain's ventricular structure. The small node at the top of the staff is the pineal gland and in combination with the wings is known, in yogic circles, as "the Swan." It is emblematic of an enlightened being, the utmost realm of Grail consciousness achieved by the Knights of the Swan and epitomized by such Grail heroes as Perceval and Lohengrin. In Hermetic Egyptian Mystery schools, the process of enlightenment was expressed in the Thirty-Three Degrees rising through the Thirty-Three combined vertebrae of the spine, sacrum, and coccyx, until finally reaching the pituitary gland that invoked the pineal body (expressed by the pineal gland at the top of the staff/ spinal cord), which is also why Freemasonry adopted Thirty-Three Degrees.[34]

Of course, these symbolic details are not coincidental. We should not find it surprising or shocking that the medical society is rooted in Egyptian Mystery Schools. The so-called secular medical, scientific, and educational organizations pay homage and owe their roots to the Royal Society, the Invisible College created by the Snake Brotherhoods, Freemasons, and Rosicrucians. The snake motif was further adopted by the Luciferian organization that I believe is Rex Deus, The Learned Elders of Zion, to represent their globalist intentions.[35]

In addition, the original Egyptian priests of the Great White Brotherhood, whose symbolism now blatantly adorns the Illuminati, were the priestly craftsmen of the Therapeutate that sponsored wisdom and healing (medicine); and incredibly, they were synonymous with and famous for their serpentine emblem, according to Gardner.[36] The Egyptian Great White Brotherhood was an ultra-secret and ultra-powerful conclave (Snake Brotherhood) of priests immersed in the preservation of antediluvian knowledge, from which the Illuminati eagerly adopted their inheritance and appellation.

Digging back even further into mystical Egyptian roots, we arrive back in Mesopotamia, where we find the symbol of wisdom was none other than the symbol of Enki. Enki was affectionately known as "The Lord of the Sacred Eye" (the All-Seeing Eye of Freemasonry and Egypt), which not surprisingly was represented by a serpent spiraling around a rod[37] or stem or staff or Tree (of Knowledge). One Hebrew word for "serpent" was nachash, but this word could also be translated as "diviner" or "he who unveils secrets."[38] Finally, the horned serpent coiled around the staff was the hieroglyph used by ancient Mystery Schools for "god."[39]

The snake motif was inherited by the medical associations from Asclepius, the ancient Greek credited with being the Father of Medicine, and a statue of him ordaining the Capodimonte Museum in Rome includes the same emblem,[40] a staff coiled around by a serpent.[41] Some Roman legends further recorded Asclepius as the god of medicine.[42] Romans knew him as Asclepius the father (god) of medicine, a Greek from Thessaly, who lived circa 1200 B.C.E.[43] Asclepius' son, Hypocrites, is the famous character of lore that all doctors swear to when they take the Hippocratic Oath.[44]

Gardner writes that ark, according to the Oxford Word Library is an obsolete form of the modern word arc, equivalent to the Latin arca, and thus "arcane" derives from the Latin arca, meaning "a box or a chest, as ark, or Ark of the Covenant." He notes that something hidden within an a box, chest, or ark is additionally called arcane and that other genitive words of arca, such as "archive," bring to mind such mysterious, hidden treasures, knowledge, and records as the Chamber of the Archives and the Archives of the Masons. Genitive words springing from arca are words such as "arch," which spawned other interesting words, such as "archaic," "architecture," "arcade," and "archon,"[45] all of which contain provocative links to Freemasonry, the Templars, and mysticism. Other derivatives, such as "archaeology," the science of ancient things and the critical evaluation of ancient records,[46] suggest to me that one cannot deny the curious link between Arca and Lucifer. The great archon of mysticism, the Great Architect of the Universe, dwells in a House of Judgment called the Archeion.[47] "Arcane" is a spurious word.

The apostle Paul was speaking to this global Gnosticism and mysticism when he said, "… but I am afraid that just as Eve was deceived by the Serpent's cunning [gnosis], your minds may somehow be led astray from your sincere and pure devotion to Christ. For if someone comes to you and preaches a Jesus other than the Jesus we preached …" (2 Cor. 11:3–4). Again, it was the Gnostics that Paul spoke against to Timothy: "… command certain men not to teach false doctrines any longer, nor devote themselves to myths and endless genealogies" (1 Tim. 1:3). He instructed

Timothy to teach against the false doctrine that encouraged deviations from and beliefs that did not conform to the glorious gospel of God. Mackey suggests that Paul was speaking against the powerful Gnostics of that time: "… to avoid profane and vain babblings, and oppositions of science, falsely so called." Mackey believes the translation from Greek should read "false gnosis," not false doctrine or science, as it does in the Gnostic rendering of 1 Timothy.[48]

Note that Paul referred to the folly of endless genealogies, reminding us that Gnostics, Rex Deus, and all organizations plotting The Genesis 6 Conspiracy hold dear to their hearts and causes endless falsified genealogies and bloodlines. The apostle wrote, "What harmony does Christ have with Belial [Satan]? What does a believer have in common with an unbeliever?" (2 Cor. 6:15). The true, glorious gospel of God does not have anything in common with Gnosticism. Remember, Jesus is the Word made flesh from God.[49] Jesus is the Christ and Messiah of the Old Testament, New Testament, and the Qur'an;[50] all monotheistic Scripture testifies on Jesus' behalf.

The largest Judean Gnostic sect at the time of Jesus was the Essenes. They were kin to the Templars through the Rex Deus. In fact, Albert Mackey writes that the similarities of Freemasonry and Essene rituals could only be accounted for in the understanding that they both have the same origin. Like Freemasons, Essenes instructed their initiates in secret knowledge they obtained in due course from their ancestors,[51] which had its beginnings in antiquity. Essenes did not admit women into their ranks, just as the Templars and Freemasonry did not. Essenes commemorated three levels or degrees of enlightenment and initiation, with various ceremonies like those of Freemasonry. Essenes popularized the practice of having a particular sign to recognize members, just as Freemasonry does.[52] And now, all the contemporaneous secret societies take their sacrilegious marching orders from the descending Essene Order of the Brothers of the Red Cross, the nefarious Rosicrucians.

CHAPTER 77

THE ROSICRUCIANS

> Pharaoh then summoned his wise men and sorcerers, and the Egyptian magicians also did the same things by their secret arts. Each one threw down his staff and it became a snake.
> —Exodus 7:11–12

What key authors of the Middle Ages used their revolutionary ideas and prose to accelerate the formation of secret societies[1] and, specifically, the Rosicrucians? What is the unexplained role Rosicrucianism plays in The Genesis 6 Conspiracy?

The famous five were Thomas More (1477–1535), Abbey Rabelais (1494–1553), Abbey Johan Valentin Andrea (1586–1654), Robert Fludd (1560–1626), and of course, Francis Bacon (1560–1626).[2]

Sir Thomas More authored the book Utopia about a magical island (Atlantis) governed by a socialistic/communistic republican government, where all religions were tolerated and all were free to cultivate their intellectual capabilities.[3]

Abbey Rebelais, an accepted Mason and mystic, presented society with the constitution of a society of free men,[4] along with his book Gargantua and Pabtagruel, a collection of curious stories regarding rampaging giants[5] teeming with the green language, Legominism.[6]

Abbey Johan Valentin Andrea penned The Universal Reformation of the Entire World.[7] Andrea was a German Lutheran minister[8] (mole) and a Grand Master of the Priory of Sion, as you may recall.

Robert Fludd's considerable successes as a writer firmly established him as a defender of the Rosicrucian Order, and he was the founder of several Rosicrucian societies in London.[9] And, as you will recall from a previous chapter, Fludd was a Grand Master of the Priory of Sion and a great Kabbalist.

Finally, we consider the infamous and notorious Sir Francis Bacon, who wrote La Nova Atlantis, a story of a republic headed by a secret society of intellectuals from the fields of "Letters and Sciences."[10] The members of this secret society referred to each other as brothers who were devoted in complete freedom to philosophical discussions to improve the conditions of the lower classes and to advance the true religion.[11] As previously revealed, Bacon was a member of the Rosicrucian Order.[12]

We must additionally contemplate Marsilo Ficino's numinous influence upon medieval society. Ficino's patrons were the Medicis of Italy, and he founded a Neo-Platonic society in Florence (circa 1460 C.E.). Ficino's philosophy, according to Naudon, left a significant impression on the next generations influencing Cornelius Agrippa, Thomas More, and Rebelais.[13] Ficini first translated for the Medicis lost Greek texts of Plato, Neo-Platonism, Orphic hymns, and esoteric material that purportedly dated back to Egypt and the pyramids. Ficini then developed a syncretic philosophy inspired by Zoroaster, Hermes, Orphus, Pythagorus, Plato, the Kabbalah, and Christian (mystic) philosophy, which he recorded in Manuel De Philosophie Moderne.[14]

Adding to this syncretic movement was yet another secret society that ostensibly predisposed a palpable prejudice upon Freemasonry and Rosicrucianism. Henry Collins Agrippa furtively founded this organization, The Guild of Mages, in 1510. It studied the forbidden sciences, and its members were masters of alchemy and magic. The Guild of Mages, according to the Michael Mair (1568–1622) manuscript, gave birth to the Brothers of the Gold Cross fraternity in Germany in 1570[15] and is thought variantly to be the root organization for the Rosicrucians.

The shadowy Snake Brotherhood intimately connected to all other spurious organizations is the Rosicrucian Order. Its esoteric thought was at a climax in Germany during the seventeenth century and was the furtive root for Nazi occultism, according to Baigent and Leigh.[16] Hence, this was the age of the Rosicrucian Manifestos and Rosicrucian enlightenment.

During the eighteenth century, Germany was a hotbed for mystical and esoteric forms of Freemasonry that included such illustrious members as Friedrich Wilhelm II. In truth, the British Rosicrucian organization of 1888, the Theosophist Order of the Golden Dawn, was directly linked back to Germany. It included such famous members as William Butler Yeats and Aleister Crowley. A half century earlier, British writer, occultist, and Rosicrucian propagandist Edward Bulwer-Lytton, acting as a conduit for German esoteric thought, composed his book Strange Story, which promoted the mystical German concept of Vril, a mystifying substance contained in the blood that would engender a Master Race of Supermen.[17]

Rosicrucians are an organization fabled to have been founded by Father Christian Rosencreutz.[18] He purportedly established Rosicrucianism in 1378 to illuminate humankind; the objective was to spread gnosis to all humankind.[19] Rosencreutz studied all forms of mysticism under knowledgeable Adepts during his numinous tour through the Middle and Near East. He wrote two infamous books, Fama Fraternities and Discovery of the Fraternity of the Most Noble Order of the Rosy Cross, which were published posthumously in 1614 and 1615 in Germany. These two small books, containing less than twenty-five pages each, are renowned as the Rosicrucian manifestos. After returning to Germany from his mystical engagements, Rosencreutz formed a very, very small fraternity.[20] The small fraternity began with four members and then grew to eight, all of whom later set out to the four winds of the earth to reform and transform the world.[21]

In 1604, the tomb of Christian Rosencreutz was found (not coincidently), ten years before the publishing of Fama Fraternities.[22] It was the Abbot of Adesberg, Johan Valentin Andrea, who likely became the unintentional, true founder of Rosicrucianism, for it was he who first published Rosencreutz’s works. In 1616 C.E., Andrea again published another Rosicrucian work titled The Chemical Wedding of Christian Rosenkreutz. All of Andrea’s numinous publications enjoyed great success.[23] But, according to some Masonic historians, Rosencreutz was a hoax. According to Gittins, Rosencreutz was merely a character created by Johan Valentin Andrea as an arcane, mystical figure for his syncretic movement, the establishment of a perfect utopian society based on science, mystical faith, and reason.[24]

In 1623, Rosicrucianism made its first subversive public appearance under the name College of the Brothers of the Rose Cross, claiming to possess the perfect knowledge of the Most High. This new brotherhood was formed with thirty-six mysterious members at the core. They were known as the Invisible Ones. One cannot help but notice the similarity to the Invisible Colleges created some twenty years later in England and in France, both formed by Rosicrucians and Freemasons. The (Snake) Brotherhood was a skilled order much like the Cathar Perfecti, according to Hancock and Bauval; all were medical doctors.

Rosicrucianism integrated into the Freemasonry movement in 1760,[25] the same year the Royal Society gained its charter. Rosicrucianism has been credited with exercising the biggest influence over Freemasonry; Rosicrucians transformed Freemasonry from operative to speculative.[26] According to Gittins, as aristocrats began to dominate Freemasonry during the Dawn of Reason, speculative Masonry then took its new place with Progressive thought, alongside the Royal Society.[27] In this spirit, then, understand that it was indeed the Rosicrucians who actually founded the Royal Society/Invisible College with the help of Freemasonry. The mission was to build a House of Solomon, the idealistic Temple for the Sciences imagined and conceived by Sir Francis Bacon and Sir Thomas More.[28]

Originally, alchemists, members of a quasi-philosophical organization seeking the Philosopher's Stone and the elixir of immortality, claimed Rosencreutz to be their founder. Rosicrucians are lovers of chemistry.[29] Alchemists seek to transmute metal into gold and to produce the elixir of immortality.[30] Alchemists are physical Rosicrucians who adopted metals and their transmutation, the elixir of life, and their universal solvent as symbols.[31]

Rosicrucianism is a secretive, Hermetic philosophy,[32] just as Hermes/Thoth/Enoch is considered the father of alchemy.[33] Rosicrucians were chemical philosophers who blended religion with the secrets of chemistry.[34] Alchemy shares a common ancestry with shamans, magicians, smiths, and miners. They believe in the maxim “As Above So Below.” Rosicrucianism retains the promise of a repository of ancient knowledge, according to Marshall.[35] It is a secret society that extracts vows of silence,[36] just as all other cults of mysticism do.

The Rosi Crucis has been recorded as far back as 3500 B.C.E. in Mesopotamia. It was the distinguishing Mark of Cain, identifying the royal bloodline of the Sangreal, particularly denoting the (royal) matrilineal succession of the Uterine Womb (chalice) of the Grail Queen, and of course, the Grail was the perpetual blood of matriarchal Dragon queen succession, the maternal blood celebrated as the Supreme Excellence (Star Fire).[37]

The standard superficial symbol for Rosicrucianism is the rose cross, similar to that of the Templars, who wore it as their emblem, and of the Fisher Kings, who bore it as a birthmark—the Mark of Cain. The Templars in fact adopted the Rosicrucian name as well as the arcane allegory of the pelican in its nest that depicts the bird with its wings wide spread, feeding six of its young on its own flesh and blood, both of which were later adopted by the Masonic Order of the Knights of the Rose And Cross.[38] As we learned previously, the Brothers of the Red Cross was an ancient, mystical order of Rex Deus.

It is said that the Masters hold out a rose as a remote reward for initiates and impose the cross on all who enter into their order. In actuality, Rosicrucianism is made up of two words, rosi and crux. Both are Latin words meaning “rose cross.” Ros signifies dew, which to alchemists is the solvent of gold or an elixir. Crux is a Latin word equivalent to light in its allegorical interpretation, because the figure of the cross exhibits three letters, from which Lux is derived. Lux is, of course, the root for its derivatives “light” and “Lucifer,” just as we have already learned. Alternatively, crux is the chemical hieroglyph for light.[39] Thus the authentic elixir of immortality is light.

Another source defines “Rosicrucian” as rosi, meaning “dew,” and “crucus,” meaning cup or chalice, echoing the Holy Grail and the ritualistic blood consumed from chalices and cauldrons descending from Sarmatian and Atlantean legends, as well as the antediluvian consumption of Star Fire, known also as the “Menstruum of the Red Dragon.”[40] Menstruum is the alchemy solvent that causes an action on metal, which is compared to the supposed action of the ovum in menstruation.[41] Note, too, the Star Fire rituals are traditions kept alive in the Sangreal/Grail and Rosi Crucis cultures and organizations[42] of the Gnostics and Rex Deus. This, then, is the same allegory as before; the dew of the elixir of immortality, and of the Grail, is the heavenly knowledge or light.

The Grail allegorically represented to the Priory of Sion, the feminine aspect of nature that was represented in antiquity with a ∨ symbol, which alternatively represented both the ancient chalice and also the planet Venus. This ancient hieroglyph resembling a cup, a chalice, and a vessel is an allegory for the woman’s womb of the royal, matriarchal bloodline descending from the feminine goddess.[43] Once more, all the secret symbols and allegories of this secret society lead directly back to alleged royal bloodlines of Jesus and the Nephilim, as well as to imagery linking all back to the Red Dragon, Satan.

The five-petal rose of the Rosicrucians is the dog rose. It is a symbol for reincarnation because it can fruit without being pollinated; therefore, it can die but be born again identical to itself.[44] In the thoughts of Dan Brown, the oldest of the rose genera, likely the Rosa Rugosa, had five petals that modeled pentagonal/pentagram symmetry, like the guiding star of Venus. Remember from previous chapters that the five-petal rose was synonymous with the Holy Grail and the infamous Priory of Sion.[45] Let us not forget the rather uncoincidental connection and imagery of the word rose, or rosa, to Rosi Crucis and the Rosicrucians. This is not a coincidence but rather finely scripted Legomin, precise imagery and allegory craftily woven together over the millennia.

The mystical rose references the mysterious properties of the planet Venus. Venus is, of course, a clever allegory of light representing Lucifer, while the orbit of Venus, when placed against the backdrop of the zodiac, forms a five-pointed star (a pentagram). In Freemasonry, the five-petal rose is intimately related to the five-pointed star of the Venus orbit, for the points of the star fall between the petals.[46] The apple, then, is referred as the “fruit of Venus” (the fruit of good and evil from Eden and the Golden Apples) because a halved apple portrays the orbit of Venus, and thus a five-pointed star, pinpointed by the position of the pips.[47] Venus traces a perfect pentagram/pentacle across the ecliptic sky every eight years[48] and thus anchors all these allegories together. The five-pointed star overlays the dog rose with a bright light in the center, representing the sun; this (unaccountably) adorns most ceilings in Freemason temples.[49]

The five-pointed star was the identical mark that the founder of the Invisible College, Robert Moray, received as his mark of Freemasonry. It represents in Freemasonry and Rosicrucianism (and likely other mystical organizations) their god, the Grand Geometrician of the Universe (Lucifer). It is the symbol that Robert Moray associated with secrecy, invisibility, and true worth.[50] Let us not overlook, as well, that a five-pointed star forming a pentagram is associated with Satanic cults, and other evils of this world, by occult writers.

The pentagram unaccountably is found in most cultures worldwide. I believe the pentagram is as an elemental symbol emanating from the 6,000-year Genesis 6 Conspiracy, along with the snake and dragon. According to Greer, the Pythagorean (Snake) Brotherhood used the pentagram as a secret sign of recognition. By the Middle Ages, the pentagram found a place in magic as a symbol of power and appeared in the English poem Sir Gawain and the Green Knight. Greer further notes the pentagram was identified as the most important symbol in magic and the emblem of Satanism by the French occultist Eliphas Levi (1810–1875). Wicca and twentieth-century Satanism adopted the pentagram from occult sources influenced by Levi, whereby Christians thereafter generally defined the pentagram as the primary symbol of devil worship.[51]

Hence, Rosicrucianism is a cunning system of mysticism founded upon the Kabbalah. Esoteric scholars link speculative Masonry (and thus, Rosicrucianism) to the Kabbalah, the “opaque mystical Jewish discipline” of biblical interpretation.[52] Mackey additionally writes that Rosicrucians were all Theosophists holding true to doctrines of angels and demons, elements, the influence of heavenly bodies on man (astrology), magical numbers (numerology), suffunigations, and other sorceries.[53] Remember, Robert Lomas states that the Rosicrucians were the first scientists and the last of the sorcerers. He further notes the Rosicrucians proudly claim to speak to demons and fallen angels:[54] spirit guides and Avatars. The Rosicrucian Order is regarded to be an “inner world group” of great Adepts holding knowledge, power, and wisdom that essentially make them demigods compared to mundane humans. These are Adepts who answer directly to the College of Invisibles, the obscure source of the knowledge and force behind the Rosicrucian movement[55] and the invisible world government.

Rosicrucians regard Qayin (Cain) of Genesis to be the artificer of metals of the highest order, and they hold his posterity in the same high regard. Tubal-Cain is the holder of Plutonic theory, the knowledge (from the underworld and its god Pluto/Hades in Greek mythology) of the actions of internal heat, and therefore, a most prominent alchemist.[56] In the same manner, the Goat of Mendes (Azazel) is directly associated with alchemy, according to Gardner,[57] as is the pentagram. According to Gardner, the emblem of Rosicrucians, the Rosi Crucis, is more accurately described as a dragon incurved to circle a red cross,[58] known also as the Mark of Cain. Rosicrucianism is directly connected to Cain, the seven corrupted sciences, Nephilim, and fallen angels of the antediluvian epoch. The Rosi Crucis was a lucid sign known to the ancient Egyptians as Ourobous—understanding this is the same tradition of Ormus, the Elm Tree of the Knights Templar tradition. The word alchemy derives from the Arabic al-kemia, meaning "the black land," and is the science of Egypt,[59] black magic.

Freemasonry is a preparatory organization for Rosicrucianism. Freemasonry is a nucleus to feed the growth of Rosicrucianism through providing a select few Freemasons deemed worthy enough to enter the Rosicrucian Order, in a similar manner as Freemasonry also provides selected and enlightened initiates to the Illuminati. Rosicrucians choose the "select coterie" of Freemasons, the most mystical and the most suitable, to elevate them to the higher Mysteries of the brotherhood. Rosicrucians are the apex of the Freemason initiated hierarchy; they are already illuminated and deemed worthy to learn even greater Mysteries held by the Rosicrucian Order,[60] the superior elect of the Illuminati.

One of their modern American fraternities is known as AMORC: Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis of the Great White Brotherhood, obviously referencing back to the Illuminati and to Pharaoh Tuthmusis III, the king who reorganized Egyptian Mystery Schools and who originally founded the White Brotherhood.[61] AMORC believes its roots include the eighteenth-century Golden and Rosy Cross Order and the Ormus Order of Alexandria (circa 46 C.E.).[62] AMORC's founders, H. Spencer Lewis and Savritri Devi, the first major Nazi theoretician, place Akenhaten as the forerunner of their ideas, while AMORC declares their Rosicrucian initiations date back to Akenhaten.[63]

According to Kabbalist Neil Silberman, Freemason and Rosicrucian organizations have preserved a treasury of lore and symbols that gave way to the Theosophy movement, and today they serve as one of the most important metaphysical foundations for the New Age movement.[64] Therefore, Masonic Rosicrucianism sponsored Theosophy and the New Age movement, which, in turn, absorbed the various Gnostic sects, the Rosicrucians, Rex Deus, and Freemasonry. In this regard, the Dutch Rosicrucian organization, The Lectoorium, defines itself as a Gnostic spiritual school. Its members eagerly look forward to the coming New Age that will bring forth a New Man[65] (Nephilim), a belief that ties these organizations and religious doctrines together. All Gnostic and pantheistic organizations eagerly await a reincarnated form of Hitler's Third Reich, complete with a super or superior race, an Antichrist or false messiah figure, and a renewed holocaust waged against the saints of God.

The network of the spurious community is astounding in its size, complexity, and hierarchical structure. All work for the coming of the false messiah, the one whom Hitler, just before he killed himself, advised his followers to wait for and serve when he came. He believed the one destined to come after him was Lord Maitreya, the infamous third Antichrist of the Gnostic alchemist and likely Rosicrucian Nostradamus. For it is the coming Antichrist that those of the spurious religions believe will herald the advent of the millennium of peace, or the Third Reich that Hitler endeavored to bring about. It will be as Ruth Montgomery, the author of Herald for the New Age, notes: "a thousand years of peace."[66]

The spurious millennium is merely the spurious rival to the Judeo/Christian millennial reign of Christ described in Revelation[67] and is another incantation of Hitler's Third Reich. As per the Theosophist Constance Cumby, who wrote A Planned Deception, the conspiracy for a universal religion includes the installation of a world messiah, who is allegorically called Lord Maitreya, to reign over a world government; he is the future Buddha.[68]

CHAPTER 78

THE NEW AGE MILLENNIUM

And I saw the souls of those who had been beheaded because of their testimony for Jesus and because of the word of God. They had not worshipped the Beast or his image and had not received his mark on their foreheads or their hands. They came to life and reigned with Christ a thousand years.

—Revelation 20:4–5

It is a grave mistake to predict who from the Rex Deus bloodline will step forward out of the shadows of anonymity and into the adulating light of fame to seize the Davidic throne. We must, however, be wary of the Unicorn bloodline belonging to the House of Stuart, for the Stuarts’ alleged claims of unified, royal bloodlines offer incredible nostalgic and romantic appeal to the chivalry of the past. The Unicorn dynastic legacy may well be offered as an olive branch of hope to a world inundated with cynicism and void of respect and hope in the leadership of their leaders.

According to Knight and Lomas, the contemporary Rex Deus families include the Counts of Champagne, the Lords of Gisor, the Lords of Payen, the Counts of Fontaine, the Counts of Anjou, de Bouillon, St. Claire De

Gisor, St. Claire De Neg, Brienne, Joinville, Chaumont, the St. Claires, and the Hapsburgs[1] (thirteen families). Originating Rex Deus bloodlines were introduced to other families through marriage: Blanchefort, Sinclair, Plantard, and Hapsburg/Lorraine. For example, Marie De Saint Claire, a descendant of Henry Saint Claire of Rosslyn Chapel, married Jean De Gisor, the first independent Grand Master of the Priory of Sion.[2]

We should look to the Hapsburg/Lorraine house with the same degree of skepticism, for they also possess intriguing history that is burgeoning with Rex Deus bloodlines. The Hapsburgs keep a three-dimensional monument dedicated to their Rex Deus heritage in the form of forty statues designed to bring to life images of the Merovingian dynasty. All this appears to have been done after the Atlantean spirit. In Atlantis, the people also erected three-dimensional monuments in honor of the original queens and kings of the Atlantean empire.[3] The Hapsburg monument includes Clovis, Theoderic, Arthur, and King (of Jerusalem) Godfrois de Bouillon. It is a three-dimensional Sangreal legacy throughout the ages,[4] for the Hapsburgs regard themselves as Priest Kings, just as their ancestral Merovingians kings believed. The Hapsburg dynasty married into the Rex Deus dynasty through the eighteenth-century union of the Houses of Lorraine and Hapsburg, via Marie Antoinette. The House of Hapsburg/Lorraine is regarded as one of the contemporary heirs to the Merovingian dynasty and the Rex Deus bloodline.[5]

Be aware of the Plantard family, as well. Pierre Plantard was the Grand Master of the Priory of Sion. He claimed to be a direct descendant of Dagobert II of the Merovingian dynasty and that the Priory of Sion apparently possessed the genealogical records to verify this.[6] Many believe the only two direct lineages descending from the Merovingian bloodline today are those of the Sinclair and Plantard families.[7] Whoever Lord Maitreya might be, today he lives in moderate anonymity, but we should look for clear Rex Deus ties when he steps out of the shadows and into the light.

As we discussed previously, the Bible predicts a ten-horned or ten-toed empire will resurrect out of the ashes of the old Roman Empire in the last days, which would bring about the coming of the Antichrist,[8] Lord Maitreya. This is exactly what the spurious, globalist forces are endeavoring to bring about. The World Constitution and Parliament

Association, a Rockefeller supported foundation, includes in its vision a world divided into ten constituencies. The Club of Rome also has arrogantly divided the world into ten economic and political regions.[9] This is no coincidence; the God of gods preordained it. Secret societies are endeavoring to recreate the age of enlightenment, the reincarnated, antediluvian age of Atlantis, by reestablishing antediluvian rule that reigned supreme over Atlantis.[10] They sincerely believe the essential arts and knowledge of our present civilization trace their beginnings back to the great Antediluvian empire of Atlantis through Egypt,[11] along with the secrets they possess. This is The Genesis 6 Conspiracy destined to place the new Nimrod, the Antichrist, at the head of world government for 1,000 years— the reincarnated Fourth Reich.

The renewal of Atlantis is yet another allegory of King Arthur and the Grail legends. Excalibur, the famous sword of Arthur, symbolizes a key to Atlantis that was hidden in England. The key is the location of certain wisdom and knowledge, along with additional keys to unseal the antediluvian knowledge that is to remain sealed and hidden until people that possess the right level of knowledge and wisdom are able to unlock it. The withdrawal of Excalibur represented the rebirth of the new Atlantean race,[12] just as Camelot and Arthur’s reign did.[13] America was conceived to achieve, as a global model, the ideal commonwealth in the political world. As Marrs notes, America is the stepping-stone, the great plan, to bring about the New Atlantis,[14] just as the Templars, Freemasons, Rosicrucians, and Francis Bacon had envisioned.

I cannot say the spurious factions will raise up Nephilim as kings for the future, spurious millennium, but I cannot rule it out either, based on all that I have discussed in this book. What we can expect is that these rulers will cling to their ancient bloodlines that, indeed, do link them back to Nephilim. What I can state with cryptic certainty is the spurious religion will once more reign supreme as the queen of kingdoms.[15] The religion of Cain will once more rise to dominate the world. The religion of the light[16] will once more cast its seditious, sinister shadow upon the entire earth. It will be the New Age of Nimrod and Babel, reincarnated in all its allegorical glory. Satan’s end time shadow will be the final act in The Genesis 6 Conspiracy.

The Antichrist will either be possessed (Avatar) by Satan or by the fallen angel Abaddon:

> The beast, which you saw, once was, now is not, and will come up out of the Abyss and go to his destruction. The inhabitants of the earth whose names have not been written in the book of life from the creation of the world will be astonished when they see the beast, because he once was, now is not, and yet will come.
> —Revelation 17:8–9

Abaddon, or Apollyon, is the leader of the angels of the Abyss (Rev. 9:11). This will undoubtedly be the destroyer Azazel, who introduced war and violence to the descendants of Cain, and the fallen one who will possess the Antichrist. Abaddon/Apollyon are the Greek appellations for "the destroyer."

In addition, the Antichrist will be glorified as the allegorical symbol of Orion (Azazel), who the Great Pyramids and the Sphinx point to and honor. Orion is the home of Osiris, and to his left is Sirius, the star of Isis.[17] The beast will be symbolic of Osiris the sun god, and of course, of Lucifer, of whom all these are symbolic, so that the world will worship Lucifer and not God. This act of heresy will condemn humankind to oblivion, except for the saints who will hold true to God saving part of humankind from this black prospect.

Lord Maitreya will permit each person the opportunity to decide what is right and what is wrong in what will be a solemn game of global situational ethics. The inhabitants of the world will be compelled to choose to worship and follow the Antichrist, Lucifer, and their New Age religion or follow the alleged evil God of the Christians, Israelites, and Muslims. This duty-bound choice will be punctuated by the forthcoming galactic war of rebellion to free the inhabitants of the earth from the oppressing Adonai and his angels. The decision to follow the Antichrist and fight for freedom will be sealed by the mark of the Beast, a sign of their new covenant and choice.

Lord Maitreya is believed by some to be alive now, residing somewhere anonymously in the world, awaiting only his fateful "Day of Announcement."[18] These events are prophesied by Christianity, Judaism, and Islam, as well as all the spurious religions. Expect curious discoveries will start to take place, including discoveries of the secret knowledge of Nimrod and Hermes that will storm world opinion. Look for startling discoveries emanating out of Egypt that will likely come from secret chambers at the feet of the Great Pyramids and the Sphinx, as well discoveries in England and Central America.

The sparkling knowledge of Atlantis and Cain will magically make its reappearance through these diverse kinds of discoveries, for their whereabouts and contents are already known, awaiting only the predestined age to impress the world and the Terminal Generation preordained to be deceived. Hermes was believed to have hidden his inherited, great antediluvian knowledge somewhere in Egypt. The Giza monuments are believed to be a memorial to the flood erected by a highly advanced antediluvian civilization. Somewhere in Giza the famous Hall of Records was buried, which contains the entire antediluvian body of knowledge of this Golden Age of perfection. Egyptian papyrus makes many references to the hidden chambers called the Chambers of Archives, or Hall of Records, hinting it was buried close to the Sphinx.[19]

All these legends pertaining to spurious vaults of antediluvian knowledge are kept alive and well today, according to Hancock and Bauval, through the Rosicrucians, Theosophists, and Freemasons.[20] Whether or not this knowledge is discovered at these locations or at Rosslyn or on Oak Island or a combination of all the above, the knowledge will contain all the antediluvian knowledge, as well as the knowledge of Solomon, the Cathars, the Templars, and Rex Deus, for the Sinclairs and Freemasonry are the guardians of all such things.

Secret, spurious knowledge, such as antigravity from Mu (a theoretical force in Theosophy used by the ancients to lift heavy stone blocks into place to build their cities and monuments), will abound in the New Age. The world will be vibrating with expectancy as it celebrates these fantastic discoveries en route to global occupation. As a result, then, people sharing common consciousness through transcendental meditation create a figurative conduit that is not restricted by the laws of physics; the web/matrix of the life force heals everything, creating world peace; the life force (parent god) will vibrate at peak efficiency, creating the Maharishi Effect: godhood.[21] The thousand-year reign of Lord Maitreya will beckon; humanity will anticipate ascension into godhood. The New Golden Age will beckon with all its hopes, promises, and enlightened false prophets.

Hogwash! The people of this Terminal Generation will be compelled to choose between God, certain persecution, and genocide or the false prophet, false messiah, false freedom, false peace, and the false millennium. These will be the perilous days of the tribulation for the true faith, the Time of Jacob’s trouble, the last seven years of this age. Armageddon will beckon, beginning with World War III, when descendants of the giants Gog, Magog, Meschech, and Tubal, the descendants of the Scythians now living in Russia, will march on Israel with a great alliance of armies at the mid-point of the last seven years, shattering the age of peace.[22]

This will be the end times, the period just before the entrance of the real Messiah, Jesus, who comes to save the world from itself and then usher in the true millennium of peace.[23] What has happened will happen again; nothing is new under the sun. We are certain to turn full circle and go back to our antediluvian heritage, where we will stand face-to-face and eye-to-eye with the ongoing, generational Genesis 6 Conspiracy; only this time, the conspiracy will be thwarted forever.

SECTION VII: The House of Dragon

BLOODLINES OF THE PREHISTORIC GIANTS

CHAPTER 79

THE FAIRY KINGDOMS

> Among the lamp stands was someone "like the son of Man" dressed in a robe reaching down to his feet and with a golden sash around his chest. His head and hair were white like wool, as white as snow, and his eyes were like blazing fire. His feet were like bronze glowing in a furnace, and his voice was like the sound of rushing waters.
> —Revelation 1:13–15

Why is this generation unaccountably bombarded with spectacular imageries depicting heroes and mythologies from epochs past? And what heretofore unexplained messages do these numinous tales convey in these fantastic allegories?

Seemingly innocuous allegories jammed into our entertainment and literature covertly bridge our misunderstood past with the terrible tribulation coming. In this spirit, then, consider this investigation essentially pivots around two mysterious allegories: dragons and fairies. Frankly, they are the "Rosetta Stone," the missing pieces connecting all the other pieces to The Genesis 6 Conspiracy and the bloodlines of the Antichrist.

So, then, what is the hidden relationship connecting the Fairy and Dragon Courts to the Holy Grail and Rex Deus? We taught previously that the contemporary Rex Deus conspiracy is 2,000 years old, dating back to the life and times of Jesus. Additionally, we learned that Grail legends were spawned by Rex Deus Houses and that the Holy Grail was, in truth, the Sangreal, the holy bloodlines that housed the secrets to the Kings of God dynasty.

What we must now absorb into our syncretic thought process is the notion that Grail, Fairy, and dragon legends are, according to both Gnostic and Masonic writers, one and the same.[1] When one notes any arcane reference to the shadowy Dragon and Fairy Courts, understand that this is deliberate Grail/Rex Deus bloodline Legominism.

The House of Dragon is the genuine House of Grail Kings,[2] the original Rex Deus from Genesis. The House of Dragon is the ancient powerhouse that the Sons of Jared have vowed generational war against, just as the ancient Israelites did. Sons of Jared believe the Dragon bloodline to be the actual and factual descendants of watchers/fallen angels and Nephilim, who they allege spawned the notorious, evil, (fairy) pharaoh kings and dictators who have dominated humankind throughout history.[3] This bold assertion is the same notion I have been building to and alluding to: the posterity of Nephilim will bring about the tribulation of the end times and the Antichrist! Today, Gardner states Dragon sovereignty is maintained in the Grail kingdoms, which hold the great and mysterious repository of ancient knowledge.[4]

In Celtic mythology, exclusive royal families carried what is renowned in Grail lore as “fairy blood.”[5] Romans viewed the Celts as a tall and fair-skinned people,[6] while fairies in Wales were called Tylwyth Teg, the “Fair Family.”[7] Tylwyth Teg is, in fact, the Welsh translation for “fairy.”[8] According to Gardner, fairy blood, the bloodlines of fairies (those of the lineage of fair folk), was originally conceived through philosophical (arcane) metaphors relating to fate; hence the word fairy derives from fee, or fey (fate).[9]

Fairy/faerie/fayyerie derived from French faes, which derived from the Latin fata, describing spirit beings that guide fate.[10] Neo-Latin Fays, the Fates of Italy, and the Fees of France are all the same beings, according to Evans-Wentz. These originating, immortal damsels variantly celebrated as

Fatue gave birth to the entire family of fees as they appear in Latin countries, which the Italians collectively recognized as the Greek nymphs known as fatuae.[11] Some believe fairies were supernatural beings that presided over all of human fortunes.[12]

Gardner knits these disparate threads together by proposing that Gnostic lore states fairy blood was originally understood to have held the fate, or destiny, of the Grail bloodline. Thus, fairy, Grail, and Dragon princesses of Gnostic literature were commonly known as Elf-Maidens and the Guardians of the Earth.[13] In the old languages, elf emanated from the female gender that originally derived from Elbe, or Ylbi, which, in turn, derived from the town identified as Albi (or vice versa) in the district of France, renowned as Languedoc. Languedoc was substantially the province that formed the Jewish kingdom of Septmania[14] and was home base to all the various Gnostic and mystical sects of Occitania belonging to The Genesis 6 Conspiracy. It was the infamous home of the Gnostic Cathars,[15] their name deriving from Greek katharos, meaning "pure,"[16] as well as the home of the transplanted Essenes, the Merovingians, the Templars, the Alains, the Kabbalistic Jews, and the Trojans and Scythians of antiquity. Ergo, this only serves to further underscore irrevocable fairy relationships with the Dragon Court in an intimate and mysterious manner, demanding that we examine the historically unexplained fairies very closely and very critically.

Cathars, as you will recall, were fully conversant with Ring and Grail culture fondly branding it the Messianic bloodline, the "Elven Race of Shining Ones" (fairies). Cathars were supporters and protectors of the Albi-Gens, the Elven bloodline that traced its arcane, matriarchal, and parallel bloodlines back through Mary Magdalene, Miriam, Bashemath, and Lilith.[17]

The genocide waged against the Cathars by Catholicism that began in 1244[18] became known to history as the Albigensian Crusade.[19] The crusade first began at the city of Albi, in the region of Languedoc, the home of the Elbe, the elf-maidens and fairies, hence the name Albigensian Crusade. Remember, too, the spurious knowledge and manuscripts allegedly kept at Gellone, in Languedoc, supposedly possessed the potential to bring Catholic Christianity to its knees with respect to the virgin birth and the Resurrection; thus came the Inquisition and the Cathar genocide. Purges against Gnosticism early in the first millennium forced them underground until the tenth century, when the Bogamils burst back onto the world scene,[20] whereby the Bogamils exported their religion to France through missionaries from the Balkans. By the mid-eleventh century C.E., Catharism was well on its way to becoming the majority religion in France and was expanding rapidly into Germany and England.[21]

Cathars believed their ancestors were the authentic apostles and that a Catholic conspiracy denied Gnostics the right to their destiny.[22] Cathars viewed themselves, then, as an ancient counter-conspiracy, whose naissance dated back to the first millennium.[23] This counter-conspiracy was recorded in the 1798 book by Abbe Barruel, Memoires Pour Server A l'Histoire du Jacobism, and in the 1861 book L'Histoire de Satan by Abbe Lecanu, which detailed and described the fever pitch of this all-out war the originating Manicheans (who, to my surprise) had declared on Catholicism. This little-known all-out war within early Christianity was once more picked up by the German conspiracy writers Eckert and Krause, in the nineteenth century and then later by most Masonic writers.[24]

According to Naudon, Manicheans further resolved to infiltrate the city of Rome. They sought to establish Rome as their home office for apostles, where they could then easily infiltrate and penetrate Catholicism. Not only did Manichean moles infiltrate from the inside of Catholicism, but also they further penetrated and dominated the Builder Guilds of Rome, the Collegia, and became known as the Johannite Brothers.[25]

The Roman Church, then, did not identify Cathars as a new, upstart, heretical religion; rather, Rome viewed Cathars as practicers of the old Manichean religion, returning from the dead. Bogamils began nearly 200 years before the Cathars and often were confused with the Messalians because of their proximity in the Balkans and similarities of their religions. Bogamils had also coexisted with the Paulicians, who were, in truth, Manicheans. Historian Steve Runciman believes the Bogamils were a Gnostic collaboration of Paulicians and Messalians.

In 1167, Bogomil Bishop Nicetus traveled to Occitania to make doctrinal changes with the Cathars, for the relationship was that of senior to junior, with the Bogomils being the home church. By the end of the twelfth century, the dualist church had returned with vengeance, stretching from the Black Sea to Biscay; Gnostic bishops operating from Constantinople to Toulouse entered the thirteenth century as clear rivals to Rome. In fact, both the Cathars and the Bogamils were active in their sedition to overthrow Catholicism and replace it with Gnostic gods and religions.[26]

Now, Albigensianism derived from Albi-Gens, the Elven bloodline.[27] Hence, Albigensian, otherwise unaccountably, means the "bloodline of fate/ fairies." They are one and the same. Cathars alternatively referred to the messianic succession of Mary Magdalene, the Sangreal, as the Albi-Gens, the Elven bloodline[28] of the (false) messiah. Thus, the Albigensian Crusade was equally a crusade levied by the Roman Church against the rival Even/Fairy bloodline of the Antichrist and against the rival form of mystical Christianity.

Languedoc was ground zero for western European Gnostic thought and doctrine; it was the epicenter for Roman Catholic opposition. The Cathar religion was a sister Gnostic religion to the Essenes/Rex Deus, which had another sister Gnostic religion in France known as Albigensianism,[29] linking the Cathars with the Gnostics, Rex Deus, and Grail bloodlines and the Cathars to fairies through the Albigensian religion.

Fairies were the Shining Ones of the Cathar Elven race; they were the ones to light the way, epitomizing the kingly tribe of the Ring Lords tradition, the Shining Ones of Tuatha Denaan. The Grail race, which is also vicariously known in lore as the Shining Ones, dates back to ancient Mesopotamia, to the Grail bloodline of the Anunnaki (Nephilim), the original Shining Ones, as you will recall from the first half of this book, from whence the Grail race and all genitive and associated races and bloodlines received their appellation.[30]

The Shining metaphor, of course, is rooted in fallen angels, false gods, and numinous Nephilim allegory. For example, the Veda sky god was called Dyaus, and recognized in Latin as Deus. It is known as Devos in Slavonic, Dia in Irish, and *Zeu*s in Greek; all mean "Bright One."[31] So, too, was El, as in El Shaddai, Elohim, and El Elyon, from ancient Canaan, home of Abraham after Ur, employed to identify the Lofty Ones, which alternatively were defined as Shining Ones in Sumeria. The Shining Ones of Sumer were variantly recorded as Elohim; they were also described as An, meaning "heaven," from which Anunnaki, gods, and overlords derive, for the ones of heaven came to earth and procreated Nephilim. The ancient Shining Ones were the An-Anan-Na-Ge, the "Fiery Sons of Heaven."[32]

Elf, then, is rooted in the Hebrew, Canaanite, and Sumerian word El, a Shining One, as in El Shaddai and Elohim used in the Bible. Theosophists believe El is also a Babylonian derivative of Ellu and Ilu in Akkadian. When the Grail/Ring/Dragon tradition spread across Europe, El became Elly in Wales and Aillil in Ireland.[33] Ellyon connects back to fairies, because it translates as the "goblin race."[34] El is known also as Aelf in Saxony and Elf in England. To this end, El is also equivalent to the Anglo Saxon word Engel and the Old French word Angele, which became the word we know as "angel."[35] All angels are beings of light that glow with their brilliance; they are the true heavenly Shining Ones.

Just to keep things straight, Elohim from the biblical perspective is somewhat different than the spurious perspective that has manipulated it for its own purposes. El is a generic designation, according to Unger's, for a god and was employed in the Old Testament for heathen deities such as El of Canaan. Therefore, the El of the Hebrews is a different El than the spurious forces would have you believe. Remember, El of Canaan was a bloody tyrant, a morbid, lustful character, who murdered uncompromisingly and persistently copulated with human females.[36] He was a Shining Being, a fallen angel, and one of the roots to the spurious mythology. The spurious El and variant suffixes attached were not the same as the biblical El Shaddai or Elohim, God the Most High; they were merely imposters and pretenders.

Elven fairies originated with the Viking and Germanic traditions, from which the Rex Deus Bruce, Sinclair, William the Conqueror, Knut, and Rollo families originated. King Arthur partnered equally with the Viking Rex Deus Gawain in a Grail (San Greal) alliance against the Romans. The Romans in England fell to Arthur's alliance of Welsh, Picts, Scotts, and Norse early in the fifth century C.E. The elven queens and kings of the Norse dynasties possessed magical power and were known alternatively as elves and alfs.[37]

Gawain was part of Arthur's Round Table of Knights, where these noble emissaries presented themselves as the living, ironclad Ring. In all representative customs of the fairy culture dating back to the Tuatha Denaan and the Scythian kings, their social structures were firmly based in designated seats known as Raths, which were round or circular. In other words, the Round Table was a recreation of the Fairy Ring of kingship,[38] the "mystical Brotherhood of Great Heroes."[39] The knights sat at the Round

Table as the kingly representatives that they were, as a symbol of united Ring Kingship, just as the Anunnaki Ring Lords had done at Nippur and in Atlantis before the flood.

The originating Norse Bruce and Sinclair families intermarried into the Rex Deus bloodlines, just as Gawain of Arthur lore and his descendants did in Wales and Britain. William the Conqueror in 1066 then merely reclaimed his family's kingship, originating with Knut's Viking empire centered in London from 1000–1025, which was seized from Arthur and Gawain's posterity by Saxons. Harold II of London was attacked but then defeated Harold Haardrade, king of Norway, but three days later, William the Conqueror, the Norman descendant of Rollo, attacked Harold II and prevailed.[40]

The Normandy invasion led by Rollo over a century beforehand led to the 912 C.E. Treaty of Saint Claire-Sur-Epte, which transferred Normandy to the Elven/Rex Deus Normans; this was merely the beginning of the premeditated retaking of San Greal territory (Brittany, Wales, and England) that was ruled over by Arthur and Gawain. What is important is that all the Gnostics of southern France, the Rollo/Elven bloodline of the Norse, and the Grail kingships of Wales and Britain were evidently all part of the very same web of bloodlines and religions that included Ireland and later Scotland.

The Sinclairs were originally descended from the Earl Rognvold that reigned over More in Norway. Rognvold was granted the lands in Orkney by King Harold I and later bore a son named Hrolf, better known as Rollo, who invaded France in 912 C.E., where he later signed the treaty with King Charles of France, the Treaty of St. Clair-Sur-Epte. Hrolf More/Rollo and his cousins all changed their names to St. Clair, establishing themselves as the protectors and the Dukes of Normandy. One should not be surprised to learn that the new name translates as "holy shining light."[41]

The newly formed St. Clair families, the Jarls of More, then intermarried with various families from French nobility (Rex Deus). Normandy was next to the lands settled by the Jewish Zadokite priests (the Essenes, the princes of Jerusalem, Rex Deus, whom they married); these families included names such as the Lords of Gisor, Payen, Fontaine, Anjou, de Bouillon, Brienne, Joinville, and Chaumont. The grafting of royal families was more than compatible, for both the Norse and mystic Essenes held similar religious beliefs, even to the extent that the Norse believed that the royal families all descended back to the god Thor through his various offspring of demigods (Nephilim). In fact, Niven Sinclair wrote in the fifteenth century C.E. that he believed Christianity had been hijacked by the Pauline cult so that proper attention was not given to Mother Earth (Gaea).[42]

The goddesses of fate were three sisters who spun the destiny of the world and were the same as the three Greek and Roman Fate deities.[43] They were superhuman women who loved mortal humans, were skilled in magic and astrology, and that wove great influence over the lives of humankind.[44] The Fates showed up in many literary works, such as Shakespeare's tragedy Macbeth.[45]

Francis Bacon was thought to be Shakespeare in some circles. Bacon was a Gnostic Adept of the Mysteries, a Freemason, a Rosicrucian, and the inspirational founder of the Royal Society, which elucidates why Shakespearian literature gushes with mystical doctrines such as fairies. Certainly, Bacon was a generous patron of Shakespeare and was known to have authored plays from the age of twelve, starting with The Birth of Merlin, and he grew up around the Strand Theater. Ben Jonson, also a Shakespeare contemporary, sneered that Shakespeare knew very little Latin and less Greek and exclaimed with vexation that he could not comprehend how such a man, a butcher's son with meager education, could have possibly created such a body of work saturated in all the erudition of the age.[46] Greer adds Shakespeare came from an illiterate working family and received at most a grammar school education, while his literature executed first-rate knowledge of English, the classics, and Cambridge slangs.[47]

In fact, Evans-Wentz notes Shakespeare's prose seems to have been shaped from his substantial (but unaccounted for) knowledge of Rosicrucian occultism, where such spirits as fairies, gnomes, goblins, and pixies hold an important place.[48] Many of Shakespeare's works are nothing more than Rex Deus history covertly encoded with genealogies and Legomin allegories set to poetry, including King Lear, A Midsummer Night's Dream, Richard III, Hamlet, and Macbeth. Both Shakespeare and Michael Mair, one of the founding fathers of the Rosicrucian Order, possessed the same publisher, Thomas Creede.[49]

Shakespeare related the name of the fairy queen, Titania, in Midsummer Night's Dream back to the Titans.[50] Her name was extracted from the Roman poet Ovid and his work Metamorphoses, written 1,600 years before.[51] Shakespeare gave the name Titania to Oberon's wife after the daughter of the Titan Coius. Coius was one of six sons and daughters of Uranus and Gaea that included Oceanus, Creus, Hyperion, and the most famous Kronos and Iapetus.[52] In Ovid's work, Diana was dubbed with Titania, because she was definitely a daughter of the Titans. To this end, Gardner notes that it is then not surprising that Titania is reminiscent of the Dianic Caille Dauine forest people of the Ring lord Fairy strain.[53] Metamorphoses depicted the Titanic rebellion in its opening.[54]

Titania's husband, Oberon, the king of the fairies, is also saturated in Grail, Nephilim, and Ring Lord allegories. Oberon is synonymous, according to Gardner, with Alberic, the dwarf lord of Nibelungenlied, and synonymous with Aubrey, the historical twelfth-century elf king. Prior to Shakespeare, Oberon appeared as the dwarf king Oberon in the French tale Huan De Bordeaux. Thus, Shakespeare's Oberon seemingly is part of the Grail/Ring/ Fairy bloodline that descended from Scota and Niul, according to Gardner.[55]

Oberon/Aubrey/Alberic descended from the Albi-Gens of the Elven/ Fairy/Grail/Ring race. Oberon further derives from the Teutonic Ober, according to the Oxford English Dictionary, which, in turn, derived from lndo-European/Aryan Ubar and originally from the Scythian word Uper. Reign, derived from ron, hence Ober Rgn, Over Reign, and Oberon, which were arcane equivalents to the overlords and high kings of the Elven, Fairy, and Tuatha bloodlines. Uper was a very important word of the Tuatha Denaan for palpable reasons and derived from the Central European tradition of the Oupieres, a tradition of the vampire, i.e., the night operative of Vlad, the Prince of Darkness, known also as Dracula/Dragon. Overlord/Oberon was also equivalent to the British "Pendragon," according to Gardner.[56]

In the earliest Scythian and Sumerian traditions, the abiding symbol of the Ring Lords was the Ourobus, which was a serpent clutching its own tail. With a cross positioned above the ring, the Ourobus became the symbol for the masculine Orb of the sovereign regalia. With the cross positioned within the ring, the Ourobus represented the Holy Grail itself, which was identified with the Rosi Crucis (Rosicrucianism) and clearly demonstrates that the Ring and Grail are synonymous.[57] With the dragon reaching to clutch its tail, it then transforms into a dragon incurved into a circle that surrounds the Rosi Crucis/Mark of Cain. The Menstruum of the Red Dragon was memorialized in an engraving by Lucas Jennis in 1625 for Lampspringck's De Lapide Philosophico, which was accurately named "the Ouroboros," and which translates as "the philosopher's stone."[58]

Similarly, Puck in Midsummer Night's Dream was described as a sprite, an ancient Scythian ghost warrior, known also as a Shining One and identified with Robin Goodfellow, a goblin.[59] Teutonic doctrines of old Germany recorded forest sprites as Hodekins, from which the first syllable, hod, is believed in Gnostic and Theosophist lore to be the root for "hood," as in Robin Hood.[60] Goblins in Ring Culture lore were the attendants of the Raths, the Nephilim kings of the royal seats and dwellings of the Ring. Hence they were variantly recorded as the custodians or guardians of the wealth, wisdom, and knowledge of the ages; they were the treasurers and archivists[61] of The Genesis 6 Conspiracy.

Ruddy fairy (fate) queens and goddesses were the mother aspect of goddess worship[62] in fairy mythology, which originated with Isis. Fairy queens and goddesses are vicariously known in Rex Deus literature as fairy godmothers, just as in the fairy tale Cinderella. Fairy expert Cassandra Eason notes Cinderella was merely an (arcane Rex Deus) allegory for the struggle of the apostolic succession of James/Joseph of Arimathea against the Catholic apostolic succession of Peter, reflected in the way Cinderella challenged the status quo[63] with the help of her fairy queen, the fairy godmother.

CHAPTER 80

ORDO DRACONIS

> Then another sign appeared in heaven: an enormous red dragon with seven heads and ten horns and seven crowns on his heads. His tail swept a third of the stars out of the sky and flung them to the earth.
>
> —Revelation 12:3

Why did Fairy, Celtic, Welsh, and British kings of history maintain colorful titles of Pendragons, the Overlords/Oberons? And why were the original Pendragons not successive heirs but appointed from purity of Gaelic stock documented by Druidic elders?[1]

The first British Pendragon was Cymbeline from the House of Camulot, dating from 10 C.E.[2] But why was dragon symbolism introduced to fairy kingdoms at this historical intersection? And why is dragon symbolism important?

Gardner wrote that respected Druidic leaders carefully chose the originating, founding British family from exclusive Dragon families selected to be the “Kings of Kings”[3] in the messianic Dragon tradition. The last British Pendragon was Cadwaldr of Gwynedd. He died in 664 C.E., when Britain fell to the German Anglo Saxons.[4] This was the Arthurian Welsh dynasty, whereby Arthur, the great Celtic chief, led his people against the Saxons[5] and the Romans.

Before their downfall, the Royal House of Celtic Britain was known as the famous Red Dragon dynasty of Wales,[6] a remarkable appellation when set alongside the infamous passages from Revelation portraying Satan to be the Red Dragon.[7] The Red Dragon has surprisingly represented Britons throughout the last 2,000 years, while the army calls their cavalrymen "dragoons," a word that historian and author Fergus Flemming says derived from dragon and is traceable back to the days of Roman occupation and Arthur. Similarly, by the eleventh century, the dragon represented the British, Scots, and Cimry. Arthur's celebrated battle standard and helmet crest had a dragon, and he was curiously depicted in a 1290 C.E. manuscript with the Sarmatian Dragon.[8] The Dragon has been incorporated into the ensign of the Prince of Wales and appears on the Welsh flag.[9]

Of the twenty-eight statues immortalizing Rex Deus dynastic kings raised in Innsbruck by the Hapsburgs, included at the center of one row representing the alleged founder of the Hapsburg dynasty, is Arthur clutching Excalibur. Arthur is decorated with a chain wrapped around his neck, with a writhing, seething dragon representing his office. Guinevere, wife of Arthur, was likened to a crowned serpent that was a religious symbol of the Sarrassin, the ancient people of Britain.[10]

Noting that Arthur's dragon was that of the Sarmatian Dragon, let us now inquire about just who the ancient Sarmatians were. Sarmatians were a people credited with likely importing the Arthurian legends to Britain. They originated from the Black Sea region, the same place as the Cimmerians, one of the names of the three originating Celtic Welsh dynasties of the Grail and home to the noteworthy Scythians and Alain. Remember, Grail and Arthur legends were merely Christian gloss for the true cult; all authors provide Arthur with a veil of Christianity, but the legends clearly are not Christian in origin.[11] These unexplained, Rex Deus legends are Celtic through and through and are likely authentic legends from Scythia and Sarmatia.

Ancient Scythian lore contained legends of magic swords (Excalibur) and golden chalices (Grail) for the consumption of blood.[12] Scythians were known for scalping their enemies and then drinking their blood from old skulls.[13] The Sarmatians developed smith skills from the Scythian tribe of Kaybs, which derived the Celtic word Caliburn and or ex-kalyburn, which eventually became Excalibur.[14] Similarly, Reid noted Grail quests were embedded with the Celtic doctrine of regeneration (reincarnation) and held long-concealed but real history in their allegories.[15] The Sarmatians, in fact, were a cousin race to the Scythians.[16] All this connects back to Scythia being the home of the Keltoi/Galatians.

Sarmatians were mercenaries for the Roman army; they displayed as their battle standard their Roman title "Draconius" for their cavalry.[17] The carrier of the banner, or battle standard, was also called Draconious. Romans captured the Sarmatians into their army specifically for Britain. Their body armor was constructed of small-scale-like plates tarnished to a green color, which gave them the appearance of lizards or snakes, or as the second-century C.E. Greek geographer Pausanias noted, like dragons. After the Romans withdrew from Britain in 410 C.E., Vortigen became the Welsh king and was elected the Pendragon. He then unaccountably adopted the Sarmatian banner, the Red Dragon, which is the Welsh flag of today.[18]

The leader of the Sarmatian mercenaries at the time of their introduction to England, circa 170 C.E., was Lucius Artorius Castus.[19] One cannot ignore the coincidence of the timing and similarity in names to King Lucius of the Grail dynasty, who came to power in 180 C.E., nor can one ignore the name Artorius, which is one possibility for the original root for Arthur.

Scythians, Cimmerrians, and Sarmatians of the Black Sea region eventually synthesized into one people, but legend also has it that the famous Amazon female warriors of Greek mythology interbred with the Scythians, forming a new people renowned as the Sauromatiae, or better known as the Sarmatians.[20] Greeks knew them formally as the Sauronatiae.[21] By 200 B.C.E., Sarmatians dominated Scythia, causing Cimmerrians and Scythians to fade into Sarmatian society, forming the greater Sarmatian/Scythian nation, which was very easily done, for they all contained the same heritage, pantheon, and culture.[22] Herodotus explained that even by his time, 484–425 B.C.E., Scythia had already become recognized as Sarmatia.[23]

Sarmatians placed the dragon at the apex of their mystic paragon, while Sarmatian translates literally as "lizard people." In antiquity, lizards, snakes, serpents, and dragons were all considered one and the same.[24] We could then, in all likelihood, label the Sarmatians "the dragon/serpent people" or “the dragon/serpent nation.” Sarmatians are conceded to have descended from the Aryan race,[25] roaming Nephilim of Atlantis, who held the appearance of vipers, as you will recall.

The rise of Roman Christianity and fall of the British Pendragon ended the heady days of the dragon, but the bloodlines recorded continued in secrecy, holding their positions of authority in Europe, Britain, and the Near East,[26] including the Norse and Merovingian Rex Deus branches. This was Merlin’s message communicated in Grail lore, when he commented on the end that was befalling his era that must endure for a time. He was referring to the rise of Roman Christianity. Merlin, a Druidic Adept, was describing the twofold events that included the decline of Druidic mysticism, which held sway over and control of the Celtic monarchies, and the fall of the Dragon Court of both the British Celtic monarchy and the Merovingian dynasty to the Roman Christian-dominated Anglo Saxons and alternative French Catholic-sponsored monarchs.

Druidic/Gnostic pantheism burrowed underground, hidden by the cover of Celtic Christianity that demonstrated its loyalty to Rome on the surface but remained true to its Gnostic beginnings underneath. In this way, Celtic Christianity enthusiastically supported such memorable historical turning points as Rollo, William the Conqueror, Robert the Bruce, and the House of Stuart rising to prominence and power.

Gardner recorded that in 1408, the Dragon Court was formally reestablished in mainland Europe through Sigismund Von Luxembourg, the king of Hungary and a descendant of Luisgnan, Dragon King of Jerusalem. Sigismund was crowned the Holy Roman Emperor (King of Jerusalem),[27] just as Godfrois of the Templars, Priory of Sion, and Rex Deus was crowned before him and which the Antichrist will likewise be crowned in the future. The formal Dragon Court remained in dormant hibernation and exile after the fall of the Merovingian dynasty in France, in mainland Europe; until 1408, although, it remained active in the English kingship through William the Conqueror and the Stuart kingship via Robert the Bruce.

The Dragon Court was toppled in England after the fall of the Stuart dynasty, which was replaced by the Hanoverian dynasty of Germany that reigns to this day. In Europe, the Dragon Court remained alive mostly through the Hapsburg dynasty of Austria, even though it is still alive in the Luxembourg bloodline[28] and likely the Spanish monarchical bloodline.

Gardner maintains that in Britain, the Draconian order known as the Rosicrucian Anglicae has maintained the Dragon tradition to this day in secrecy. The Ordo Draconis resides within the infamous Royal House of Stuart[29] and its descendants, as well as in other mystic organizations of Great Britain.

The Imperial and Royal Court of the Dragon contains an inner secret court (Snake Brotherhood) identified as Sarkany Rend, which acts as a repository for their ancient knowledge.[30] All this is reminiscent of the secret inner courts of the Freemasons, Gnostics, Rosicrucians, Theosophists, and all mystic religions and organizations. The Sarkany Rend was registered in 1408 at the High Court of Budapest as the Imperial and Royal Dragon Court, the Ordo Draconis. All this was done while England was in its late Plantagenet era and before the Stuarts became the kings of England. The Dragon Court was then formally reconstituted under King Zsigmond of Hungary while Europe was in political turmoil.[31]

Zsigmond inherited the Dragon legacy in 1397, when he drew up the Ordo Draconis (Brotherhood of the Snake) with twenty-three nobles that included Vladislav Jagello; Christopher III; the kings of Poland, Denmark, and Norway; King Aragon of Lithuania; and many other important nobles of Europe. The members all wore the sign of the Rosi Crucis, and then later in 1439, the Duke of Norfolk joined the order. Zsigmond was then crowned Holy Roman Emperor in 1411. Today the order includes Prince Michael of Albany, the head of the Royal House of Stuart, and much of the European royalty, where the House of Stuart acts as its protectorate.[32]

This Dragon fraternity was resurrected to become the successor to the ancient Dragon Court of Egypt and, in particular, Heliopolis, where the Great White (Snake) Brotherhood of the Therapeutate resided. The Dragon Court was established, according to Gardner, as a Pharonic institution of science and scholarship, where the Royal Court provided for the priestly pursuits and teachings of Thoth, just as the Great White Brotherhood of Tutmosis III also did in Egypt. It was the obligation of these Masters to ensure the purity of the continuing royal bloodline that was perpetuated through the Dragon queens of the matrilineal Grail succession,[33] just as it was in ancient Egypt.

What is no coincidence to all this secrecy of Snake Orders is that Vlad III, the Prince of Walachia and the military governor of Transylvania was inexplicably inducted into the Sarkany Rend, the Order of the Dragon, in

1439, by none other than King Zsigmond Von Luxembourg himself. This was the nefarious family of Vlad the Impaler, who the character Dracula was based upon. In fact, Vlad II was known as Lord Draconis, which derived the variant appellation “Dracul.” Vlad III inherited his father’s Dragon office, becoming Dracula, the “son of a Dragon.”[34]

The under-investigated Vlad was the overlord (Oberon) of the old Scythian traditions; he was known to be of fair skin (pale), with reddish hair and green eyes, a Noble Celt. Vlad was educated in the Mystery School of Solomon in Austria; he was an Adept of alchemy who was also known to be an Adept of the Star Fire culture, the blood-drinking cult of Nephilim. Vlad was affected by sunlight and became a night person, or night operative, known again, not without coincidence, as a night operating Oupiere, as in the traditions of Oberon that we have already detailed. Vlad the Oupiere was known to have had his mystical powers enhanced through the consumption of Star Fire,[35] blood.

It is hardly a surprise, then, to have had Dracula’s Legomin character based almost entirely on Vlad the Impaler, linking him to the immortal, bloodsucking vampires of mythology, from the night-operating, pale skinned, blood drinking Nephilim tradition, all after the pursuit of immortality. Add to the characterization the ferocious fangs of the cobra or serpent, and you have completed the profile of the modern vampire of literature, allegorizing the Dragon Court and their ancestral links back to Nephilim. And, of course, the vampire nation is always cast as enemies of Christianity that are locked into a perpetual dualist and eternal battle waged between good and evil.

The insignia the surviving Dragon Court of Luxembourg adopted for its emblem was a dragon incurved to a circle around a red cross. This is the emblem of the Rosicrucians, the birthmark of the Merovingians, the Ouroboros, and the original Rosi Crucis, which was established before 3000 B.C.E., the infamous Mark of Cain.[36]

Also consider that the Rosicrucians unaccountably reserve particular reverence to both Tubal-Cain and Cain with regard to primordial knowledge. Rosicrucians were the mystical group that spawned Theosophy through its treasury of prehistoric knowledge, lore, and secret symbols, and Rosicrucians also spawned the Royal Society/Invisible College of England to cultivate this spurious knowledge at the dawn of the Age of Reason. One concludes Rex Deus nobles and the Ordo Draconis spawned the Rosicrucian Order.

Today, the power of the Dragon Court operates through Freemasonry, the Illuminati, and Rosicrucianism, along with all its powerful corporate, political, and religious empires sponsored by Rex Deus. We must acknowledge that the Dragon Court and Rex Deus are one and the same.

Let us now inspect the curious history and allegory of the Dragon.

CHAPTER 81

SERPENTS AND DRAGONS

So the Lord God said to the serpent, "Because you have done this, 'Cursed are you above all livestock and all wild animals. You will crawl on your belly and eat dust all the days of your life. I will put enmity between you and the woman, and between your offspring and hers; he will crush your head, and you will strike his heel.' "

—Genesis 3:14–15

The joint legacy of the serpent and the dragon was that of the prehistoric crocodile; it was the most sacred of all creatures in antiquity.[1]

The primordial crocodile was indelibly renowned, without explanation, in Egyptian tradition to be the most plausible representative for the pre-Eden serpent. Is this why polytheists believe the prehistoric serpent should not be confused with the cold, venomous, legless, slimy, and speechless snake it is today?[2]

Ginzberg noted the original serpent was created to be king over all animals,[3] thus legitimizing its originating messianic and kingship allegories and linking its sponsorship to seraphim angels. All this also lends itself to supporting the legends of Satan refusing to bow to the progeny of apes, Adam, because original serpentine/Saurian beings were akin to the seraphim angels. Saurian/serpentine beings were seemingly the first intelligent beings created to be kings over all animals.

Antiquity concluded that the numerous varieties of serpents were originally beings walking on two legs, until the infamous event in Eden, when God declared serpents would then crawl on their bellies.[4] Thus they lost their limbs for conspiring in the fall of humankind from grace and innocence. Remember, the pre-Eden serpent was recorded without explanation as the craftiest of all pre-Eden animals.[5] No doubt, degrading the crafty serpent to the lowliest of animals only infuriated Satan and his seraphim allies even more.

Some believe that all the serpent allegories infesting the disparate cultures around the globe reflect an ancestral memory, where serpents and reptiles may have been the dominant species on earth at one time,[6] whispering unexplained memories from ancient epochs of Saurian and reptile dominance over mammals in the little-known age of dinosaurs. Remember, in the age before God created Adam and the people of day six, the mammal kin to primates, known today as man, seraphim angels controlled the earth. Likely, dinosaurs and other reptilian beings were the watcher’s privileged life forms. All this was reflected in Star Trek Voyager’s account of an ancient, intelligent, and superior race of Saurians that evolved from dinosaurs and had originally dominated the earth before the age of humans.

Possibly, a serpent-like being with intelligence similar to a human may have been might have been the dominant species, possessing kingship rights. Remember Satan’s jealousy and seditious actions towards God and Adam after God created the mammal Adam to be lord of the earth. Kingship was not originally given to Adam but was later lowered to earth from heaven, by seraphim fallen angels to the viper/serpent-like Nephilim. In a similar fashion, the Lord of the Rings trilogy memorializes these forgotten, ancient epochs and then announces the new epoch and dominion of man at the former epoch’s denouement, with elves, fairies, trolls, and all immortal beings sailing off into the sunset to the otherworld.

The kingly and highly evolved serpent was punished for being the vessel of evil for Satan.[7] Serpents were likely the pre-Eden protégé of kingship for seraphim angels on earth, just as vipers, serpent-like Nephilim, were seraphim protégés designed for kingship after Eden. This, then, was likely at the core of the violation against the laws of creation by the seraphim angels. Dark angels were, in part, endeavoring to replace the kingly and Messianic inheritance of Adam's seed with the New Man, the reptilian variant of humans in the form of Nephilim, all in the spirit of the serpentine/Dragon/Saurian heritage of ages past.

Legend proposes that the pre-Eden serpent was similar in appearance to the crocodile and dragon; hence the joint legacy and the kingly aptitude of the messianic dragon represented in Egyptian ancient society by the sacred crocodile. In fact, ancient Egyptian mythology remembers the kingly aptitude of the crocodile as dating as far back as Menes, the first dynastic Pharaoh, from around 2900–3100 B.C.E., when the crocodiles were strangely recanted as fighting in battle alongside the Egyptians. Hence, crocodiles have been honored ever since. Even Osiris was celebrated as the serpent from the sea and as the serpent king.[8]

Ginzberg and Josephus wrote that, indeed, Jewish legends recorded that the pre-Eden serpent resembled man and that this obscure serpent was the cleverest of animals; it stood upright and was very large,[9] and it ate the same food as man.[10] This advanced variety of serpent was as tall as a camel, stood on two feet, and did the work of humans.[11] As a consequence of Eden, it lost its power of speech, lost its hands and feet, lost its ears, lost its wings,[12] lost its size, and lost its mental advantages—and had poison inserted under its tongue to always signify the serpent as the enemy of humankind.[13]

The (royal) serpent fell from grace as the highest form of being to the lowest form of animal in creation, in a most similar and striking fashion as Lucifer the seraphim archangel fell from grace and heaven as the enemy of humankind.[14] This, then, elucidates Jesus' curious remarks: "'Lord, even the demons submit to us in your name.' He replied, 'I saw Satan fall like lightening from heaven. I have given you authority to trample on snakes and scorpions and to overcome all the power of the enemy.'"[15]

The best-written record of the pre-Eden serpent and its fall at Eden is recorded in the Hagadah. It is generally included among Gnostic gospels, alongside the Dead Sea Scrolls, Christian Apocrypha, and the Kaballah, among other documents.

> Among the animals the serpent was notable. Of all of them he had the most excellent qualities, in some of which he resembled man. Like man he stood upright upon two feet, and > in height he was equal to a camel. Had it not been for the fall of man, which brought misfortune to them too, one pair of serpents would have sufficed to perform all the work man has to do, and, besides, they would have supplied him with silver, gold, gems, and pearls. As a matter of fact, it was the very ability of the serpent that led to the ruin of man and his own ruin. His superior mental gifts caused him to become an infidel. It likewise elucidates his envy of man, especially his conjugal relations. Envy made him meditate ways and means of bringing about the death of Adam.[16]

The Hagadah then records God punishing the Royal Serpent for its wickedness:

> The mouth of the serpent was closed, and his power of speech taken away; his hands and feet were hacked off; the earth was given of him for food; he must suffer great pain in sloughing his skin; enmity is to exist between him and man; if he eats the choicest viands, or drinks the sweetest beverages, they all change to dust in his mouth; the pregnancy of the female serpent lasts seven years; men shall seek to kill him as they catch sight of him; even in the future world, where all beings will be blessed, he will not escape the punishment decreed for him; he will vanish out of the Holy Land if Israel walks in the ways of the Lord.[17]

The Hagadah further records the royal nature of the pre-Eden serpent, again lending support to its mythical, royal origins:

> Furthermore, God spoke to the serpent: “I created you to be king over all animals, cattle and the beasts of the field alike; but you were not satisfied. Therefore you will be cursed above all cattle and above every beast of the field. I created you of upright posture; but you were not satisfied. Therefore you shall go upon your belly. I created you to eat the same food as man; but you were not satisfied. Therefore you shall eat the dust all the days of your life.”[18]

The serpent was king over all animals before God created Adam, the New Man. Indeed, Adam was a New Man, a man that serpents no longer reigned over. Adam was a new pedigree and somehow different from the humans of day six, for Adam was created as a single being, uniquely designed for a separate destiny, while Eve was created later from Adam’s rib to provide a suitable mate from the same DNA and bloodline.[19] This conclusion is backed by the Kabbalists, who, according to Karen Armstrong, clearly identified two distinct narratives to human creation, where God created humankind in Genesis chapter one and then created Adam for a special commission in chapter two.[20]

The unexplained humans created on day six were created in plural: “male and female he created them.”[21] They were likely created in great numbers because their commission was to be fruitful and multiply to the point of filling and subduing the entire earth.[22] The Qur’an states that, indeed, the people of day six did proliferate into vast numbers that settled throughout the world.[23]

Adam was a higher form of human. The unexplained humans of day six were created both male and female from God and the angels: “God said, ‘Let us make man in our image, in our likeness’” (Gen. 1:26), whereas Adam was created in a separate event, from the dust of the earth, and then had the breath of God breathed into him to become a special being (Gen. 2:7). All this was further underlined later in Genesis, when the lineage of Adam and Seth was listed (Gen. 5:1–3), further underlining Adam was created in singular and referred to as “him,” while the people of day six were created in plural as male and female and referred to as “them.” The passage goes on to note that Seth was born as the son of Adam, the second in Adam’s lineage, inexplicably suggesting Cain was not of Adam’s loins, further noting Seth was born in the likeness and image of Adam, again suggesting a difference in appearance from Cain and the people of day six.

Proposing a different creation and time frame for the people of day six is a most contentious issue, but it does bring many unexplained details into focus. The separation into two different creations of humans frees the Bible from the 6,000 years of chronology, dating back to Adam, for the people of day six could have been created at any time before the creation of Adam but after the renewal of the earth (Genesis 1:2), answering the questions about how humans date back hundreds of thousands of years.

The “renewal of the earth concept” I am proposing derives from the precise language employed in Genesis 1:1-2: “In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth. Now the earth was formless and empty, darkness was over the surface of the deep, and the Spirit of God was hovering over the waters.” The word “now” opening verse 2 suggests to me there was a period of time between “the beginning” and “now” when the Spirit was hovering over the waters, and when the earth had somehow “now” become formless. Similarly, Psalm 102:25 states: “In the beginning you laid the foundations of the earth, and the heavens are the work of your hands” but this psalm does not state the Spirit was sent at this point, possibly suggesting that at a later point the Spirit was sent “to renew the earth” perhaps from some form of disaster like an asteroid. The “renewal of the earth” after the earth somehow had become formless and empty sometime after the beginning, then, seems to elucidate the enigmatic Psalm 104:30: “When you send your Spirit, they are created, and you renew the face of the earth,” once more suggesting the earth was renewed at some point in time. Further the “renewal of the earth” concept becomes crystalized when one considers the alternate translation the NIV Bible provides in verse 2 where “now the earth was” could alternatively translated as “became” (Genesis 1:2 note a). The alternate translation significantly changes the verse (and thus its meaning) to: “Now the earth became formless and empty.” Ergo, the “renewal of the earth” concept opens the possibility to the idea that earth could indeed be billions of years old, while working harmoniously with scientific conclusions. The “renewal of the earth” concept additionally works with science’s other notion that the human race is much older than 6,000 years, when we consider the people of day six were created well before Adam in Eden; perhaps thousands of years.

Further evidence derives from the belief that Cain took a wife from among this separate stock of humans (Gen. 4:17), as there were no records of Adam having any other children at that point other than Abel—no daughters. This further brings into alignment the rationale for the Rosi Crucis, the Mark of Cain, after Cain was banished from Eden, for Cain was clearly afraid that other humans would kill him:

> “I will be a restless wanderer on the earth, and whoever finds me will kill me.” But the Lord said to him, “Not so; if anyone kills Cain, he will suffer vengeance seven times over.” Then the Lord put a mark on Cain so that no one who found him would kill him. So Cain went out from the Lord’s presence and lived in the land of Nod, East of Eden.
> —Genesis 4:13–16

Cain clearly took a wife from other humans dwelling in Nod.

Further, the people of day six were permitted to eat anything they chose; they were hunters and gatherers, nomads who were commissioned to spread to the four corners of the earth. Freemasonry, as you will recall, believes humans were nomadic and later abandoned that lifestyle, building great monuments to worship their gods, antediluvian buildings and monuments that demanded great knowledge and exacting science.[24] Thus, the nomadic people of day six were likely reorganized and transformed by Cain and his knowledge of the Seven Sacred Sciences. Remember, ancient civilizations seem to have sprung together out of thin air, espousing advanced knowledge, culture, and civilized behavior, which appeared fully mature.

Conversely, the descendants of Adam and Seth were agrarians, farmers who were vegetarians. In fact, the descendants of Adam and Seth were not permitted to consume meat until after the deluge, when God then permitted the progeny of Noah to eat meat. Additionally, the language in Genesis 2 is precise in its choice and exacting in its application, if one chooses to note it.

Certainly, one must conclude the preamble to Adam's creation expresses a distinct time, commission, and agrarian existence:

> … When the Lord God made the earth and the heavens—and no shrub of the field [orchards] had yet appeared on the earth, and no plant of the field [grain and vegetable fields] had sprung up, for the Lord God had not sent rain on the earth, and there was no man [Adam] to work [farm] the ground, but streams came up and watered the whole surface of the ground—the Lord formed the man [Adam] …
> —Genesis 2:4–7

Scripture is not referring to wild plants and trees here but to organized farming and to the birth of modern civilization that unaccountably sprang into existence from thin air; whereas the people of day six remained hunters and gatherers, until they, too, were civilized by Cain and the dark angels. This contrarian conclusion shows why only the complete genealogies of Adam's descendants were recorded in Scripture, for Adam was created as a special human for a special destiny; whereas Cain diluted his rebellious bloodlines with the humans of day six. Clearly, Genesis was speaking about two separate human creations, just as the Bible outlines two separate accounts.

The Popol Vuh appears to back up this contrarian conclusion that Adamites were a distinct people separated from the people of day six. From this account, the original antediluvians were very, very poor, wearing ragged animal skins for clothes, until they accepted the leadership from their new gods, likely Cain and his pantheon of dark angels. The antediluvians of the Popol Vuh were created as four races, from black through white, as you may recall. They multiplied in great numbers and in many tongues across the surface of the earth. The day six races were created to nourish, worship, and sustain the gods at some time after the separation of the sky and earth from the watery chaos (day one) that somehow involved the Leviathan-like serpents Tepeu and Gucumatz. The aboriginal antediluvians, then, were subsequently taught the arts, crafts, and sciences, by their gods and kings, (Snake) gods such as Quetzalcoatl, resulting in the construction of cities like Chichen Itza and Mayapan. It was not until these four races forgot to honor the gods that the gods darkened the skies and sent the black rains of the deluge.[25]

The pre-Eden serpent may very well have been an equal to the humans of day six, and it may even have been a competing being for the dominion of the earth. But once God had created and elevated a human being in the form of Adam, a being that contained the breath of God, a being that would inherit the earth for eternity, then the entire earthly equation was disrupted. The seraphim-sponsored serpents were then clearly subordinate to the Adamite mammals and prime to be manipulated or possessed by Satan. The serpent that deceived Eve and Adam was, indeed, an intelligent, royal being that spoke and walked upright.

Isaac Asimov believed the serpent of Genesis and the dragon in Babylonian mythology were one and the same, that a dragon is merely a huge serpent with wings, where the fiery breath represents the serpent's venom.[26] Job, too, describes the fire-breathing Leviathan as a multi-headed dragon,[27] a dragon known also in Greek lore as a Hydra.[28] The New Testament in Today's English notes the serpent was a name given to the dragon that appears in Revelation.[29] Finally, according to Nelson's, a dragon is an imaginary beast, a word used to describe sea serpents, (land) serpents, and crocodiles.[30] Therefore, let it be understood once and for all: dragons are a kind of serpent in antediluvian history, legend, and related allegories.

Thus, the dragon/serpent/crocodile was the most appropriate beast pantheists could have devised for their messianic kingship, reflecting allegiance to Satan and seraphim angels. The New Testament In Today's English notes the dragon is thought by modernists to be an imaginary beast, understood to be like a huge lizard, which is also called a serpent, appearing in the Bible as the devil,[31] thereby also connecting Dragon kingships back to their sponsor, Satan. The antediluvian dragon/serpent was then the majestic animal of kingship before Eden. And after that, it was employed as an allegory for the kingship sponsored by seraphim angels, which was once more lowered from heaven to earth, both before and after the flood, to the descendants and followers of Cain and the seraphim-like Nephilim, by serpent-like angels.

Dragon mythology has worldwide appeal. It permeates all cultures. All cultures have a name for dragon, even though the animal cannot prove itself to have existed. Dragon-like monsters unexplainably appear in remote cultures such as the Hopi, Huron, and Zuni. Mythologists Calvert Watkins and Joseph Fontenrose view the enduring patterns of dragon mythology as the fundamental myth plot of Western civilization, the story of stories, while Fontenrose further advocates that dragon mythology is an expression of an essential, cosmic dualism (polytheism).[32]

Drakon was the Greek word for dragon, meaning "serpent," just as the ancient Sumerian words Usumgal and Mus-Usumgal translate as "serpent" and are metaphors in praise of gods and kings. The ancient, holy crocodile was known as Draco, the mighty dragon of kingship, whence the title "Pendragon" (head dragon) was contrived in the Celtic British kingdoms,[33] and from whence the Roman word for dragon, draco, derived.[34] Draco is Latin for "dragon" and derived from the Greek word draconia, which was originally described in antiquity to be a serpent-like creature with wings. Furthermore, draco derived from the original drakon, or draconta, which alternatively translates as "to watch"[35] in the spirit of infamous seraphim watchers, the angels that bore wings. The angelic posterity, the Nephilim/Anunnaki were remembered in antiquity as watchers, rulers, and kings and all appeared like serpents/ dragons. Moreover, variant forms of reptile serpents with wings likely thrived before Eden, as well, suggested by the fact that numerous legends recorded wings were removed from the serpent, along with other body parts.

The dragon, too, was an ancient symbol for power and heroes[36] adopted by the antediluvian and postdiluvian kingships. Jonathan Evans notes dragons were symbolic wonders of the world, and Tolkien describes them as part of the perilous realm of faerie: fairy tales, fantasy literature, and imaginative fiction.[37] Our literature and entertainment overflows with covert allegories cloaking intrigue. Seemingly, the dragon was the key metaphor for patriarchal bloodlines (male), while the fairy represented the matriarchal bloodline (female).

Thus, the ancient Egyptian crocodile god was epitomized by the god Sobek but was also called "Messeh," while its Mesopotamian equivalent was Mus-Hus, a giant, serpentine quadruped,[38] likely the same as Mus-Usumgal (Sumerian for "serpent"). Mesopotamian and Egyptian royalty were called Dragons because they were anointed in the fat of the Mus-Hus, or Messeh; kings were then called "Anointed Ones" and "Messiahs."[39] The prowess of the crocodile represented the kingly aptitude of the Messianic Dragon[40] (kingship), with specific emphasis on Messianic (false), otherwise identified as the Antichrist. Remember, Rex Deus propagates a messianic royal bloodline of the Grail and Fairies and that the Grail/Fairy bloodline was the matriarchal Dragon bloodline. Rex Deus holds a joint desire to introduce the false Snake messiah, establishing him as king of the world and Jerusalem. The future Antichrist is rooted figuratively and genealogically in Nephilim Dragon kingships of the Ring.

Rex Deus regards its members to be a fusion of many strains of royal bloodlines, including those of Aaron, David, Saul, Akenhaten, the Scythians, the Trojans, the assorted Benjamite exiles, Temar, Jesus, James, Mary Magdalene, and amazingly enough, even more. The Grail/Fairy/Dragon/ Ring dynasty began 3,000 years before Jesus.[41] It crossed over the great deluge into contemporary times. It spread from Egypt, Mesopotamia, and Scythia to the balance of the world, establishing the alleged true race of kings and dynasties of the Ring Lord Culture. The Grail/Dragon dynasty, according to Gardner, passed to the West mostly through the Merovingians, who united through marriage with the Pendragons of Britain through Faramund. The Merovingians believed they were linked with parallel Dragon blood strains from Ham and Tubal-Cain that somehow survived through the royal houses of Scythia.[42]

Scrutinize all literature and entertainment that promotes heroes, Titans, dragons, fairies, elves, ancient treasure, ancient knowledge, aliens, vampires, werewolves, and Mother Earth, for all are designed to prepare this unsuspecting generation for enslavement and genocide.

CHAPTER 82

LEVIATHAN

In that day, the Lord will punish with his sword, his fierce, great and powerful sword, Leviathan the gliding serpent, Leviathan the coiling serpent; he will slay the monster of the sea.

—Isaiah 27:1

Leviathan is an allegory for Satan, a dragon; a gliding serpent;[1] the red dragon and serpent of Revelation;[2] and possibly the furious, horned, red dragon known as Mushusso in Mesopotamia.[3]

What can prehistoric records tell us about Leviathan, creation, and the little-explained rebellion of angels before the advent humankind? And how is Leviathan relevant to The Genesis 6 Conspiracy?

Baal, the great storm god, was alternatively known in parallel allegoric form as the bull and was called variantly a dragon, a serpent, and the celebrated slayer of the chaos monster Yam in the Ugaritic Texts.[4] Canaanite legends of Baal pre-date the surviving hard copy records of the Bible. In the pantheistic version, Baal, the great weather god, bludgeoned the gods of the sea and rivers, Prince Yamm and Judge Nahor, confining them to their proper spheres. Baal's father, El, the great bull god, then rewarded Baal with a mansion worthy of his valor.[5]

Baal was the god that defeated the chaos monster of the sea in these legends,[6] the great Leviathan recorded in Job and other parts of the Bible, which is known in Near Eastern mythology as Tiamet. In this tradition, all the gods of Babylon shrunk before Tiamet, the monster of the sea,[7] the goddess and dragon of disorder.[8] The Epic of Gilgamesh noted the female Creation Mother, Tiamet, was slain tossing half the corpse to heaven so that salt water would no longer cover dry land.[9] Marduk killed the great female dragon of the primal saltwater and then strung his bow across the sky as a sign of his great victory over the Waters of Chaos.[10]

Marduk split Tiamet in two, like a shellfish, and then confined half to the sky and half to the earth[11] (male and female). Tiamet is known in Near East mythology as the great World Dragon or Cosmic Dragon; she was a dragon described in the Enuma Elish of Babylon, the Mesopotamian epic of creation, as possessing a vast serpentine body that was impenetrable to weapons, with two forelegs, an immense tail, and huge horns on her head. Together with Apsu (male), she produced the heavens, earth, and spawned the gods.[12] Tiamet, Apsu, and Leviathan were all primordial gods from the chaos, whose names translate as “abyss,” “void,” or “bottomless pit.”[13]

The biblical Leviathan was a creature more than 900 miles in length, with seven heads (Job described it as a Hydra) and more than 300 eyes; it was invulnerable and encircled the world in the great Abyss, or depths of the cosmic ocean.[14] Unger’s notes the Leviathan as an animal writhing or gathering itself into its folds, the same description that is used for crocodiles and serpents.[15] Biblical legends of Leviathan note it was the mightiest creature of creation that eventually required the slaying of the female, for two such creatures would have destroyed the earth.[16]

Unger’s further notes that it is apparent there is a close parallel with the biblical Leviathan to the seven-headed Canaanite monster, Lotan, of the Ugaritic Texts.[17] In fact, Lotan, the seven-headed dragon of the sea recorded in “Raw Shamra” is considered by Carol Rose to be the same monster as Tiamet and Leviathan,[18] while Jonathan Evans notes that Yamm was frequently called “Lotan.”[19] Just as Lotan and Tiamet were the sea monsters that caused Chaos and the seas to rage, so did the Leviathan: “He (Leviathan) makes the depths churn like a boiling cauldron and stirs up the sea like a pot of ointment” (Job 41:31). Psalm 74:13–14 records God destroying the ancient, multi-headed Leviathan: “It was you who split open the sea by your power; you broke the heads of the monster in the waters. It was you who crushed the heads of the Leviathan."

So, too, does the Bible describe Rahab, a mythological sea monster.[20] Again this mythical sea monster is also related to the churning of the primordial seas:

> Who is like the Lord among the heavenly beings? In the council of the holy ones God is greatly feared; he is more awesome than all who surround him…. You rule over the surging sea; when its waves mount up you still them. You crushed Rahab like one of the slain.
> —Psalm 89:7, 9–10

Job 26:12–13 declares, "By his power he churned up the sea; by his wisdom he cut Rahab to pieces. By his breath the skies became fair; his hand pierced the gliding serpent."[21] Rahab is actually referred to as a dragon in the King James Version: "Art thou not that hath cut Rahab, and wounded the Dragon?" (Isa. 51:9).

According to Nelson's, these inscrutable Rahab recordings refer to an evil power overcome by God; God's smiting of Rahab signifies God's power over the chaos of the primeval waters of creation.[22] These are the same primeval waters talked about in both Canaanite and Babylonian mythologies. It is likely that Rahab, Leviathan, Lotan, Tiamet, Nahor, Apsu, and Yam were all one and the same monster at the time of creation.

As per Ginzberg, Rahab was the angel of the sea who rebelled at the creation of the world; God commanded Rahab to swallow the sea for his rebellion, but Rahab refused, whence God then proceeded to slay Rahab. On day three of the Genesis creation account, the primeval waters refused to remain separated into upper and lower waters, but they only imitated their chief, Rahab, in their rebellion. According to Ginzberg, this is the defiance and destruction at creation that God met with, which the Bible skirts around.[23]

According to biblical legends, the prince of darkness did not obey the command of God for the creation of the world, and God then rebuked him for his rebellion. Allied with the prince of darkness were the dark waters, the primeval waters/matter; the waters sent above were female, while the lower waters were male, and if they were allowed to rejoin, the world would have plunged back into a state of chaos, just as it had existed before; therefore the God of Scripture tore them apart, into the sky and the earth,[24] just as the Babylonian and Canaanite legends recorded. Certainly, polytheist beliefs recall the snake-like being weaving through the cosmos known as the Evil One or Saturn/Satan rebelled at creation but was thwarted by God during the first three epochs/days of creation.[25]

Genesis only records the separation of upper and lower waters, which was supported in Isaiah 43:16, without noting the rebellion. The details of the rebellion are recorded in Psalm 18:7–15, but few connect them to be the same account. Similarly, Psalm 104:4–9 records in detail the account of tearing the rebellious waters back apart and permanently confining them to their homes to ensure the separation of sky and earth, thus providing the earth with both dry land and sea.

Job 26:11–13 records Rahab's slaying: "The pillars of the heavens quake, aghast at his rebuke. By his power he churned up the sea; by his wisdom he cut Rahab to pieces. By his breath the skies became fair; his hand pierced the gliding serpent." Portions of the battle of God and Rahab have been scattered inadvertently throughout Isaiah, Job, and the Psalms,[26] but seemingly the crushing of Rahab's skull (Psalm 89:10 and Psalm 74:13) is directly related to the separating the sky from the earth in creation myths. Bauer states that surely what cannot be coincidence is that so many creation stories begin in darkness, with chaotic waters, which must be split so that life might begin on dry land.[27]

According to David and Margaret Leeming, Egyptian creation myths are relatively constant and the same story divided by different allegories. This includes the source of all things: the primeval waters and their chaotic presence.[28] Celtic creation myth recalls the earth being formed out of the primeval waters of chaos, just as Vedic traditions recant creation from the beginnings of the churning ocean.[29] Chinese variants from the Shu Ching recount that God commissioned emissaries to earth, which was blanketed with water, but were resisted by dragons, whereby God sent Yu to defeat the dragon. Jonathon Evans notes that Egyptian, Indian, Chinese, and Mesopotamian creation dragons all represent the destructive waters of chaos, the enemy of creation gods and order.[30] The chaotic waters of Genesis are a constant in almost all mythologies and cultures around the world regarding the creation.

The Satapatha Brahamana declares that in the beginning there was only darkness and water,[31] while the Rig Veda conjures up a great dragon named Ahi, or Vrta/Veritra, who strangles seven great rivers—a story that is repeated throughout the Vedas.[32] Veritra was the first-born dragon, the dragon of the deep, known as well as Ahibudhnya in several other Vedic hymns.[33] This dragon was slain by Indra,[34] by his crushing the head of Veritra,[35] just as God did in Genesis. Indra slew the dragon with heavenly approval of his deed, on a mountain, with heavenly bolts of thunder and lightning, which broke Veritra into pieces.[36]

Like the legends of the Near East, Norse legends feature the famous cosmic dragon, the world serpent, Midgardsormr/Lormungandr, which resided in the outer seas and separated order from chaos. The sea monster was destroyed by Thor striking the Mudguard Serpent to create heaven and earth. Middle Earth (featured in Tolkien's Lord of the Rings trilogy) was thereby formed between the waters and the air for humankind, which featured the World Tree in the center.[37] Tolkien leaned heavily on Norse mythology while mixing in heavy doses of Atlantean and Greek.

Similarly, Ovid's Metamorphoses recalled the formation of the earth from a formless chaos. Greeks recorded that before the beginning there was chaos, whereby the elements were separated into air, which rose up, and earth, which sank and floated on the primordial waters.[38]

Mistec accounts begin with an orderless world left in darkness; water covered the slime and ooze that was the earth.[39] The Popol Vuh records the earth and the sky were separated from the watery chaos through words, where the earth emerged out of the waters forming valleys that spawned life. At this time, two gods, Tepeu and Gucumatz, were great serpents possessing great feathers (scales) that swam in the waters.[40] Again, the similarity to Genesis is uncanny, particularly when you understand creation was completed by the Word of God, who is Jesus in both the Bible and the Qur'an.[41]

In the famous Egyptian creation account from the primordial waters of chaos, the ordered universe first came to be at the word of Ptah. The Great Mother and the presence of the Great Eye, known as the sun/Atum, Ra, and Ptah, created the cosmos within the surrounding chaos of waters.[42] Egyptian mythology recalls Ra then slaying the serpent of the dark waters and chaos who's known variantly as Apep and Apophis.[43] The World Parents were then separated into Nut/sky and Geb/earth to bring order to the chaos by their father, Shu/air.[44] This separation then created the primeval mound/earth.[45]

Now let us quote from Genesis:

> In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth. Now the earth was formless and empty, darkness was over the surface of the deep. And the Spirit of God was hovering over the waters…. And God said, "Let there be an expanse between the waters to separate water from water," so God made the expanse and separated the water from under the expanse from the water above it. And it was so. God called the expanse "sky." And God said, "Let the water under the sky be gathered to one place, and let the dry ground appear." And it was so. God called the dry ground "land" and the gathered waters he called "seas."
> —Genesis 1:1–9

Pantheistic legends are identical recountings of scriptural creation, but Genesis has exacting detail with perfect chronology. First the cosmos was created by God. This was done within the surrounding, chaotic waters of the universe, just as Genesis states there should be an expanse between water, separating the water under the expanse from the water above the expanse and the surrounding, chaotic water. Then, God separated the sky/Nut from the earth/Geb, creating order and thus creating the land/primeval mound, middle earth.

In 1908, Nicola Tesla identified ether as the water of the obscure expanse, the water above. He noted this ether was a tenuous fluid filling all space with a spinning motion, similar to a whirl in water in a calm lake. Once in motion, this water becomes matter, but when still, it reverts back to its normal state.[46] Ether was thought of in Greek mythology as the essence of space, while Aristotle and Pythagorus identified ether as the fifth element. Newton described ether as an invisible substance permeating the universe like a living spirit. Einstein concluded ether is necessary for the laws of physics to exist and that without ether, there would be no light, no space, and no time.[47] Chalk another point up for the accuracy of Scripture.

Place all this alongside the Babylonian and Canaanite mythologies of Baal/Marduk slaying the seven-headed sea dragon of chaos, Tiamet/Lotan/Yamm. Baal/Marduk cut Tiamet/Lotan/Yamm into two pieces, fashioning one into the sky and the other into the earth, and you can see how all versions are the same uncanny narrative. Biblical descriptions of the Spirit hovering over the waters (Gen. 1:1) and God slaying the Leviathan of the chaotic sea neatly fuse together as the same narrative.

Now, recall that Reid notes dragons were regarded as the same as cherubs, centaurs, griffins, and sphinxes, understanding that all are cherubs. The terrible gargoyles portrayed on the Gothic cathedrals were also dragons of antiquity,[48] representing fallen angels. Flying dragons were, in all likelihood, a different form of prehistoric serpent, in the spirit of their kin the fallen angels, while flying dragons of biblical record were seraphim angels. These fallen gods were carved without explanation into the cathedrals by the Essene descendants. Hence, one then wonders: was the rebellion at the renewal of the earth the great angelic rebellion?

CHAPTER 83

THE BULL CULT OF MELCHIZEDEK

It enters the inner sanctuary behind the curtain, where Jesus, who went before us, has entered on our behalf. He has become a high priest forever, in the order Melchizedek.

—Hebrews 6:19–20

Melchizedek is the first Jebusite/Canaanite documented in the Bible. He was the high priest, according to Gnostics and Theosophists, of the god El-Elyon, God the Most High, whom Melchizedek blessed Abraham in the name of El-Elyon (Shaddai).[1]

The Canaanites/Jebusites understood Zedek to be the (rebellious) sun god, while Melchi derived from Malak or king, which derived from councilor or member of God's Council. So how and why was such a holy patriarch of the Bible drafted by spurious forces?

Molech is synonymous with Malak, meaning king, according to Cassell's Precise Bible Dictionary,[2] and variantly chronicled as Melek and Molek in Hebrew, also meaning king.[3] Other variations of Molech in the Bible are Milcom[4] and Malcam/Micom[5] and, of course, Moloch in the New Testament.[6] Remember, Molech was the demigod, the notorious son of Baal, while Baal was the son of El and or Dagon in Canaanite and

Mesopotamian pantheons respectively,[7] who popularized the bull cult into the Middle East, which may explain why some mythologists claim Baal was the son of Dagon and the Cup-Bearer to El.[8]

Baal was part of the apex of the Canaanite pantheon[9] and known by several names in the Bible: Baal-Berith (El-Berith),[10] Baal-Zebub,[11] Beelzebub,[12] and known in Canaan as Baal-Zebul and Aliyan Baal. Baal and related deities were by and large portrayed as mating bulls symbolizing fertility,[13] but it is the bull cult aspect that is important—the cult of Atlantis, Benjamin, and the Essenes. You will remember the notorious bull cult incident of the golden calf during the Exodus,[14] as well as King Jeroboam I of Israel, who fashioned two idols of golden calves he erected at Bethel (Beth Aven) and Dan,[15] which were steadfastly condemned by Hosea and Amos.[16] According to Unger's, Jeroboam did this to accommodate the Canaanite bull cults.[17]

The Baal cult and Israelite religious rivalry was fought furiously throughout Israel's history and was best exemplified by Jeremiah: "They think the dreams they tell one another will make my people forget my name, just as their fathers forgot my name through Baal worship" (Jer. 23:27). In addition, the often-quoted conflict between Elijah and the prophets of Baal on Mount Carmel, where Elijah knew he must destroy Baalism and his prophets during the reign of King Ahab of Israel (1 Kings 18:16–46), is yet another example.

Molech, son of Baal, also haunted the Israelites. Molech, as in "Melchi" of Melchizedek and its genitive Enochian Essene sun cult, was a Semitic deity who demanded the sacrifice of children, a custom robustly forbidden by Moses and Israelite Law.[18] Even so, this did not prevent the perpetual resurgences of Molech worship, for Solomon, according to Unger's, built an altar to Molech at Topheth,[19] while the Old Testament noted Solomon did evil in the eyes of God, for Solomon worshipped outlawed gods, such as Ashtoreth and Molech/Milcom, building a high place for Molech, recorded as Chemosh (1 Kings 11:1–8), the Moabite equivalent for Molech. King Manasseh of Judah, during his idolatrous orgy, additionally honored Molech (2 Kings 21:3–7 and 2 Chron. 33:3–7), as did King Jehoiakim, who vicariously revived the Molech/Baal Cults (2 Kings 24:3–4). Similarly, King Ahaz of Judah unwisely reignited the Molech/Baal cult (2 Kings 16:1–5) that Amos and Hosea had previously condemned[20] and that Jeremiah and Ezekiel condemned.[21]

Early depictions of Molech portrayed him to be a man with a bull's head,[22] just as the Minotaur and the Quinataur were portrayed. According to Plutarch, Euripides stated the Minotaur was a mingled form where two strange shapes possessing different natures, bull and man, were combined.[23] All this is not mere coincidence. Knight and Lomas confess to the striking similarity between Molech/Baal and the bull of Minos, who designed the legendary Labyrinth on Crete.[24] King Minos was the son of a father also named Minos, who, in turn, was the Nephilim offspring of Zeus and Europa.[25] Most historians conclude Minos lived during the Cretan Neopalatial period, circa 1720–1450 B.C.E., but I believe the context and the details of the myth date the legend back to the antediluvian epoch and in the Prepalatial period, circa 3200–2000 B.C.E., and perhaps a little before. Bauer further suggests the Minotaur myth likely preserves a very old tradition of human sacrifice (antediluvian). Note also that the Minoan language is distinctly Indo-European[26] (Aryan).

This legend likely links allegorically to back to the angelic rebellion and the prince of darkness, the angel of the sea, and the angel who had the form of a bull that enticed Leviathan and the waters to rebel against God on days two and three of creation.[27] Poseidon, the dragon and angel of the sea (waters), was alternatively personified as a bull. Remember, Poseidon, god of the sea, was the father of the bull cult, and the bull was the most sacred animal of Poseidon.[28]

The Minotaur came about through the bestial copulation of King Minos's wife, Pasiphae.[29] A white bull had been sent to Minos by Poseidon to be sacrificed, but Minos substituted another inferior bull, so Poseidon caused the white bull to mate with Pasiphae as punishment. The Minotaur, meaning "bull of Minos," came from this copulation; it was known to be a child-consuming cannibal,[30] just as Molech was a man with a bull's head who demanded child sacrifices as requisite of worship. King Minos did not dare to provoke Poseidon any further by killing the monster, so he built the Labyrinth to imprison the beast and then fed it innocent children to keep it nourished.[31]

King Minos waged and then won a war fought against the antediluvian Athenians, imposing a cruel tribute to supply yearly: seven young men and seven young virgins that were to be eaten by the Minotaur and satisfy the anger of the gods,[32] likely Poseidon. Prince Theseus, son of Aegeus, then stepped forward, hiding among the third ship full of tributes as one of the seven young men, subsequently saving Athens from this appalling tribute by defeating King Minos and slaying the Minotaur.[33]

The bull cult of Egypt, renowned as the bull cult of Apis or the Osiris/Apis cult, eerily bore similar traits. The cult originated when a calf was born from the sacred womb of Isis, and when the calf died, it became Osiris; the Apis bull was associated with all Horus kings since. The Labyrinth of Serapis was built as a gigantic, subterranean labyrinth for Apis bulls that had died, Horus kings.[34] It was a place where mummified corpses of the Apis bull were transformed into sun gods like Osiris.

These Egyptian bull mythologies are eerily similar to the Quinataur and Minotaur mythologies and are an esoteric dimension to the Atlantean and Enochian sun cults. Keep in mind the island of Crete and the Minotaur legend of the bull cult of Poseidon when you reflect upon Baal, Molech, and Benjamin with regard to the bull cult of the Israel epoch, for they are all interconnected. In addition to all this, the Canaanites actually believed they originally migrated from the island of Crete,[35] likely bringing the bull cult of Atlantis with them that later became manifested in Baal and Molech.

The connections become even clearer when you remember that Canaanite builder craftsmen commissioned by Phoenician King Hiram of Tyre to build the first Jerusalem temple believed they were direct blood descendants of (Masonic) craftsmen that built the [36]ancient Mycenaean royal castles and Cretan villa palaces.[37] Tyre was settled by refugee Sidonians and a few sacking Philistines who were unaccountably immersed in Cretan building technology. Both Philistine temples and the temples of Tyre unexplainably honored the fish-god Dagon.[38] In fact, according to Freemason Joseph Hippolyte Da Costa in History of the Dionysian Artificers, in 1820, Hiram Abif belonged to an ancient society of Dionysian Artificers that were associated with another group of Ionians, those who had built the ancient temple of Diana at Ephesus.[39] This (Masonic) antediluvian legacy of builder priests survived throughout the epochs, eventually being inherited by the Gnostic Manicheans who worked their way secretly into Christianity as builder priests and architects of the Roman Collegia. The Gnostic Cistercian and Benedictine monks of Celtic Christianity then inherited this same legacy, passing it on to the Mason guilds of Europe, which were later dominated by the Benedictine Templars and later passed on the builder priest legacy to Freemasonry.

Similarly, one ponders whether or not there is a connection to the infamous figure Anam' Malek, whom we learned about in the first half of this book. If you will recall, he was a pitiless Babylonian god, whose name translated as "Anu is king."[40] This was the infamous figure connected to the Nephilim and the mortal god Amalek/Lamech. Molech, too, was a merciless, mortal god, whose variant is also Malek, meaning king—most coincidental! You may recall the Babylonians sacrificed their children in fire to Anam' Malek, just as the cult members did for Molech. It would appear Anam' Malek legends possess the same antediluvian allegories and roots as the Minotaur.

Along a related vein, the Philistines also migrated from Crete,[41] bringing with them similar beliefs to those of the Canaanites and Babylonians, as witnessed by their god Dagon/Baal, which was portrayed as half man and half fish (Poseidon).[42] Remember, it was Oannes/Enoch, the fish deity of the Babylonians, who escorted the Anunnaki down from the mountains and begat the antediluvian kingship of the Pishdadian kings, as well as the postdiluvian kingship of Nephilim. As you will recall, the Cretans, the Minoans, and the Santorinians all worshipped under the shadow of the bull cult of Atlantis. All this further explains both how and why the Philistines easily adopted and assimilated the Canaanite cult of the bull into their society. All this is no coincidence, and it is out of this cannibalis—and child sacrificing of the bull cult that the parallel Canaanite Order of Melchizedek steps forward, with all its false pretenses.

This, then, was the syncretic Canaanite Order of Melchizedek, which is and was a purposeful perversion of the Hebrew Order recorded in the Bible. However, the spurious forces believe that David believed himself to be part of the Canaanite Order when he succeeded the Jebusite/Canaanite throne of Jerusalem, inheriting Melchizedek's throne.[43] And this is what the spurious forces misconstrue when they note David's reference in the Psalms,[44] whereby David then inherited the priest king role of the god El-Elyon, the God Most High, of the Jebusites.[45]

The contemporaneous Masonic Order of Melchizedek consequently follows the (perverted) Canaanite Order, claiming it to be the true Order, and further reclaiming Melchizedek, Abraham, David, Solomon, and Jesus as its descending patriarchs.[46] The Gnostics possess a gospel of Melchizedek, which, not surprisingly, denotes its spurious followers as Children of Seth,[47] the Gnostic Nephilim Seth, who maintain the spark of the divine required for the harmonic convergence and ascension into godhood when the world unites under one world government and religion. In fact, James Robinson goes on to note that Melchizedek was identified with the Gnostic savior, Seth, and thus the final form of Melchizedek was a product of Sethian Gnosticism,[48] worshipping El.

Remember, though, the violent god El of the Canaanites was not the God El-Elyon and El-Shaddai of the Bible. Spurious forces merely manipulated the similarities between El and El-Shaddai for their long-term misdirection of history, in preparation for the last generation. Thus, the bull cult of Poseidon was one of the foundation stones for the Essene religion. The Canaanite Order of Melchizedek was the perverted and spurious order of priests, who worshipped the bloodthirsty tyrant, the evil god El, father to Baal and grandfather to Molech. This order was not the holy, biblical Order of Melchizedek that worshipped the God Most High, El-Shaddai, but it was the spurious order adopted by the nonconformist Jewish Essenes.

Unger's notes the order of Melchizedek discussed in Psalm 110:4 was explained by Gesenius and Rosenmueller to be an order that maintained the dignity of a king and a priest. Unger's goes onto note that Melchizedek's parents are not listed in the Bible, but Melchizedek presents a Christ like priest king example (Hebrews 5:6-10; 7:1-5) of Jesus' reign in the millennium.[49] Melchizedek was the king of Jerusalem. He blessed Abraham after rescuing Lot in the War of Four Kings Against Five, for Melchizedek was an unexplained a priest of the God Most High in Genesis, to whom Abraham gave Melchizedek a tenth of everything (Genesis 14:18-20; Hebrews 7:1-5). One should expect the Antichrist to illegally seize Jesus' priest king titles as: the King of Jerusalem and the (false) Messiah, legitimized to be a (spurious) Priest King from the Order of Melchizedek of Canaan

THE ESSENES

Then he brought me to the entrance of the north gate of the house of the Lord, and I saw women sitting there, mourning for Tammuz. He said to me, "Do you see this, son of man? You will see things that are even more detestable than this." He then brought me into the inner court of the house of the Lord, and there at the entrance to the temple, between the portico and the altar, were about twenty-five men. With their backs towards the temple of the Lord and their faces toward the east, they were bowing their faces east, they were bowing to the sun in the east.

—Ezekiel 8:14–16

Let us now reintroduce the Gnostic ancestors of the Templars, Priory of Sion, and Rex Deus, the famous Essenes, into the chronology.

Why would this prominent Jewish sect inexplicably celebrate being the (spurious) Sons of Zadok (Melchizedek)?[1] Why did this Zadokite priesthood call themselves the sons of light, just as the Tuatha Denaan were known as the lords of light[2] and just as Gnostics and Freemasons are the children of light?

"Zadokite" was a Hebrew/Aramaic title for the descendants of the royal priestly lineage, known vicariously as Rex Deus.[3] The little-understood, ascetic Essene communities were the first cells of organized monasticism[4] in the West. They unaccountably considered themselves to be an Enochian Judaism sect descending from Enoch (the evil). They unaccountably cherished the serpent/dragon as an ancient symbol of the Essene Therapeutate heritage,[5] the infamous White Snake Brotherhood of Egypt. Essenes further held the book of Jubilees, and anything to do with Enoch, in the highest regard. They based their calendar on the solar year, under the guidance of the ancient Enochian calendar, which ran contrary to the Jewish lunar calendar.[6] It was their peculiar practice to pray in the morning by turning themselves towards the sun, in defiant contrast and opposition to the other Israelite sects, who prayed in the direction of the temple.[7] Essenes disobediently worshipped in the first and second temples by kneeling in white robes towards the sun at dawn, worshipping Tammuz (and Ishtar) from the Chaldean pantheon,[8] a rebellious practice that outraged Ezekiel during the age of the first temple.[9]

Essenes were a very old, distinct, separate, and rebellious Sabian sect set shamelessly against the famous Sadducees and Pharisees recorded in the New Testament, which Jesus spoke to and against. Essenes, as witnessed by Ezekiel in the passage introducing this chapter, were unquestionably in existence and thriving as a rival, counter sun/bull cult to Zionism circa 700 B.C.E. Only after the successful Maccabean rebellion against the Greek empire were Essenes expelled from the temple by the Hasmonian dynasty.

Essenes were a vigorous sun cult that, according to Knight and Lomas, were an alliance of Enochian and Zadokite priests descending from the Melchizedek cult of Canaan. Essenes became known to history and legend as the Zadokites (Zedek the encoded sun god component of Melchizedek), Princes of Jerusalem who escaped to Europe after 70 C.E., forming the families that eventually founded the Knights Templar. Essenes were the sons of light and righteousness that secretly served the pagan bull god Molech. This mystical Enochian and Canaanite Melchizedek cult burrowed deep into Judaism, regaining complete control of the second temple just before its destruction. This, then, lends corroborating credence to the statements recorded in the Dead Sea Copper Scrolls that more secret documents were buried under the Jerusalem temple and were some of the mysterious documents, treasures, and knowledge carried off to Scotland by the descendants of the Zadokite princes of Jerusalem,[10] the Knights Templar.

The Zadokite priesthood was all but wiped out in 72 C.E.,[11] during the Roman/Jewish wars. Lomas and Knight note several Zadokite priests escaped to the south of France, where they formed the leading families of Europe while protecting their genealogies.[12] They were renowned as the old aristocracy, who longed for the return to the days of greatness of Israel, where the Royal House of David reigned. Most records and genealogies of the Davidic legacy of Jesus' family were lost in the Roman holocaust, but a few select and relevant documents supposedly survived and were transported with the refugee guardians of the Messianic Heirs.[13]

Eusebius, Bishop of Caesarea, knew the Messianic Heirs as the Desposyni, an exclusive order reserved for only the immediate family and heirs of the dynastic Royal Family of Jesus. Desposyni translates as "belongs to" or "heirs of the Lord." Julius Africanus, suspiciously of Edessa, 160–240 C.E., confirmed a few Desposyni had kept their own secret and private records and genealogies, which included their own recollections, all to preserve the aristocratic bloodlines of the Essenes, which of course, included Jesus' family, the Desposyni.[14]

After the death of James, 61–62 C.E., Symeon, son of Clopas and cousin to Jesus, became the next episcipus, or bishop, of Jerusalem. And, according to Eusebius, the early Jerusalem church continued to exercise leadership led by Jesus' family until after the genocide brought on by Emperor Trajan.[15] During the latter years of his reign (98–117 C.E.), the Roman Empire was troubled by growing numbers of Christians and was confounded about what to do about the problem. Consul Pliny of Asia Minor was so worried he wrote Trajan, asking to confirm instructions to hunt them down.[16] Even before Pauline Christianity gained control over the Roman Empire through Constantine, the Essenes and Desposyni were continually under threat of persecution by the Romans, who considered them to be enemies to the stability of the empire.[17]

In fact, the second-century C.E., historian Hegesippus recorded in Hypommenata that Emperor Vespasian (69–70 C.E.) ordered all the members of the Messianic House of David and Jesus should be put to death, and they were subsequently hunted down like outlaws, resulting in the Rex Deus Essenes going permanently underground. Hegesippus additionally wrote that Emperor Domotoan (81–96 C.E.) ordered the execution of the Desposyni by Imperial Decree and that some of those seized were Zoker and James, sons of Jesus' brother Jude. Again, Hegesippus reported the same sort of persecution during the subsequent reign of Emperor Trajan, circa 110 C.E.[18] Eusebius, in fact, documented in his composition History of the Church that Symeon was martyred by Trajan.[19] This, then, is likely why the Desposyni were welcomed into the Celtic kingdoms and hidden for protection, for both the Celtic culture and the Desposyni were determined enemies of both the Roman Empire and then later the Roman Church.

Eusebius confirmed that, notwithstanding these persecutions to the death, the Desposyni leaders survived and remained the heads of their sects through strict dynastic progression.[20] Friar Malachai Martin in 318 C.E. confirmed the survival of the Desposyni, when a little-known Desposyni delegation optimistically traveled to Rome seeking a serious audience with Bishop Sylvester. While there, the Desposyni vigorously argued the Church should be located in Jerusalem and not Rome, and that the head of the Church should be a descendant of Jesus (or his family), but their demands were in vain[21] and summarily dismissed.

As the Zadokite families were becoming the most powerful families in Europe, they began to call themselves "Rex Deus," Latin for "Kings of God." Lomas and Knight write that the descendants of those Zadokite priests returned to Jerusalem in the eleventh century as the Knights Templar, once more linking the Essenes dynastic descendants directly to the Templars through the European nobility, Rex Deus, and the Priory of Sion. Masonic rituals, even to this day, bear witness to, while steadfastly memorializing, the refugee Zadokite priests and their founding of the Knights Templar.[22] Remember, the Essene royalty reveled in their furtive view of themselves as the old aristocracy (of Jerusalem and David), who longed for Priory of Sion's dream, the return to the great days of Israel under the rule of the Royal House of David.[23] Hence, the direct dynastic ancestry connecting the Knights Templar to the princes of Jerusalem has been preserved and honored to this day in the higher degrees of Freemasonry rituals that trace Essene genealogy back to the Jewish priests (and Desposyni) that escaped Jerusalem in 70 C.E. and who, in turn, traced their genealogies back to Solomon and Moses. Masonic testaments further confirm that in 1118 C.E., a group descending from the princes of Jerusalem was founded that became famous as the Knights Templar.[24]

In addition, the Templar belief they descended from builder priests who descended from an older order of builder priests that helped build the Solomon temple is also contained within these Freemasonry rituals.[25] Brewster, in his book Lawrie's History, and Dr. Oliver in his book Antiquities, connect the Essenes to the builders of Solomon's temple through a group identified as "Asisidians," an order of the Knights of the temple of Jerusalem. Brewster argues Essenes were an ancient fraternity originating with an order of architects that built Solomon's temple. Could these have been the descendants of the builder gods from Atlantis and their priestly orders, the seven sages, or followers of Horus? Certainly, Pliny asserted that Essenes had survived as an ancient order for thousands of years before his time,[26] thereby dating the sun/ bull cult of the Essenes back to the time of the flood.

The builders of the first temple were a combined labor force from Israel that included skilled craftsmen, along with skilled Canaanite craftsmen provided by King Hiram of Tyre and Canaanite craftsmen from Byblos.[27] Chief of the craftsmen was the famous Huram Abi, a man of great skill,[28] a Master Craftsman of the metals who oversaw the metal work for the temple.[29] Huram's variant is known as Hiram in Hebrew,[30] and he is the famous Hiram Abif of Freemasonry lore who is irrevocably linked with King Hiram. Each is considered in Freemasonry (and other associated organizations and religions) as a Grand Master of the black arts and sciences, the Seven Sacred Sciences.[31] Remember, Solomon is celebrated by Gnostics and Theosophists as a great sorcerer of the black arts and crafts, possessing skills and knowledge he supposedly inherited as part of his kingship rites, which were passed down through history from Moses as black arts he allegedly learned in Egypt,[32] which were somehow passed down from Hermes and Enoch (the evil).

According to Phoenician historian Gerhard Herm, King Hiram employed craftsmen who were descendants of the architects and master builders (likely Philistines), who built the Mycenaean royal castles and the Cretan villa palaces,[33] thus extending this royal lineage of master architects back into history, likely to the antediluvian epoch. Remember, Cretan history is divided into three palatial periods, including the Prepalatial period, beginning in 3200 B.C.E.[34] or before. These craftsmen were the famous, ancient collective the Dionysian Artificers of Tyre, according to Ian Gittins, and they built most of the ancient temples in the Middle East; the ancient order of Freemasonry claims this as part of their legacy. Masonic historian Manly Hall further confirms the Dionysian Artificers were a secret society with doctrines much like the modern Freemasons. They taught architectural technology, alongside the wisdom of Solomon, to their new Israelite initiates in Jerusalem for centuries.[35] This knowledge then merged and was protected within the mystical Essene Order before being passed onto Pythagoras.

Historical connections to the Knights Templar and the alleged royal Essenes begin with the second temple and with a famous biblical individual named Zerubbabel. Unger's defines Zerubbabel as "seed, or progeny of Babel/ Babylon" and states that he was the head of the tribe of Judah at the time of the return of Judah from captivity in Babylon.[36] The prophet Haggai recognized him as the dynastic Davidic heir and identified him as the one chosen by God to usher in a new era that would return the people of Judah to Jerusalem, where a new temple would be built.[37] In fact, Zerubbabel is irrevocably linked to the start and successful completion of the holy temple as the branch, or Davidic heir.[38]

The Bible refers to Zerubbabel as the son of Shealtiel;[39] although, he is called the son of Pedaiah, the brother of Shealtiel, in 1 Chronicles 3:19. Josephus referred to Zerubbabel as the son of Salathiel, of the posterity of David, and of the tribe of Judah.[40] The discrepancy of genealogy lies in the fact Shealtiel died without a male heir, whence Pedaiah married his sister-inlaw to fulfill his Levite duty. And, according to Jewish Law, Zerubbabel was later regarded as the son of Shealtiel and his legitimate heir,[41] even though Zerubbabel was still biologically the son of Pedaiah.

Nelson's Bible Dictionary refers to Zerubbabel as a "shadowy figure" remembered as one of the primary builders of the second temple, who emerged as the political and spiritual leader of the tribe of Judah at the time of the Babylonian captivity. He led the first group of captives back to Jerusalem and set about rebuilding the temple. For twenty years Zerubbabel was closely associated with the prophets, priests, and kings, until the temple was dedicated.[42] Matthew 1:12 records Zerubbabel was the son of Shealtiel, son of Jeconiah (Jehoiachin), who was the king of Judah during Babylonian captivity recorded in 1 Chronicles, which also recorded Zerubbabel as the grandson of Jehoiachin through Pedaiah. Zerubbabel's blood relationship to Jehoiachin eventually made him Jehoiachin's legal successor and heir to the throne of Judah, which consequently established him as a direct descendant of David and Solomon[43] and, according to the Bible, an ancestor of Jesus (Matt. 1:5–17; Luke 13:23–32).

Zerubbabel somehow obtained considerable status among his Persian captors and was likely in some form of the king's special service, since the Persian king appointed him the governor of Judah.[44] With this mysterious and unexplained status, Nelson's records Zerubbabel also became known as the "Prince of Judah" while in captivity during the reign of Darius.[45] The unexplained special status must have derived from Zerubbabel's royal bloodlines. He and Jeshua, the high priest, later received authorization from Cyrus to rebuild the temple,[46] forging a remarkable partnership of cooperation among the captives; prophets; and the Persian kings, who funded and supplied material for the project.[47]

The second temple was completed around 515–516 B.C.E., but mysteriously, Zerubbabel is not recorded in connection with the temple dedication, even though the temple became known to history as Zerubbabel's temple.[48] Haggai the prophet, too, promised a special blessing to Zerubbabel from God for his holy work at the temple.[49] Zerubbabel inexplicably disappears from biblical history after the temple dedication and is never biblically mentioned or written of again, nor does another seed of David ever rise to govern Judah and Jerusalem.[50]

According to Masonic legend and ritual, Zerubbabel was initiated into a very special order while in Babylon, the Knights of the Sword. He was armed with the sword Nebuchadnezzar received from Zerubbabel's grandfather, King Jehoiachin, when he was taken captive. We do not know whether or not this order was in existence before or not, but we do know that Zerubbabel in Freemasonic history became its leader and Grand Patriarch in a special order of the Princes of Jerusalem. It was King Darius who inexplicably initiated Zerubbabel into this order, making him the

Knight of the East,[51] which again goes to support the mysterious rise of importance of Zerubbabel under the reign of Darius.

Zerubbabel then returned to Jerusalem and presented himself to the council of the Sanhedrin, where the newly formed brethren called Knight Masons were formed from the Princes of Jerusalem. Lomas and Knight write this Knight Mason Order was reticently renowned as the Royal Arch Masons that rebuilt the temple; Zerubbabel, the prophet Haggai, and the high priest Joshua allegedly led this curiously mystical organization. This mystical Order of Knight Masons was reincorporated by the descendants of the Princes of Jerusalem/Essenes/Desposyni in 312 C.E. through Emperor Constantine. The conversion of Constantine was celebrated in the founding of the Order of the Red Cross.[52] Markale writes that this order was an ancient Gnostic order directly connected to and part of the Essenes,[53] the Order of the Brothers of the Red Cross.

The revived order was decreed to don an emblem on their armor, proudly displaying the red cross and sixteen mystical stars; Constantine then decreed this conclave of knights should become his personal bodyguards. The rose and the lily were subsequently adopted as emblems of their divine being; mystically, these emblems represented the Rose of Sharon and the Lily of the Valley,[54] which I will come back to with respect to the Amalekites and descendants of Esau. The Fleur De Lis, the Lily of the Valley, later became the coat of arms for the Priory of Sion,[55] and the rose became synonymous with the Grail and the Priory.

This reticent order once again reunited to conquer the Holy Land. It included the famous de Bouillon, who unfurled the banner of the cross in 1099 as one of the founders of the Knights Templar, a member of the Priory of Sion, a descendant of the Merovingians, a descendant of the Princes of Jerusalem, and a descendant of the Desposyni. According to Knight and Lomas, in 1118, these eleven Knights of the Cross of Constantine once more took their vows at the hands of Amelfo Guavi Mundos, prince and patriarch of Jerusalem. The knights then retook the names Princes of Jerusalem and Knights of the East and West[56] in honor and remembrance of Zerubbabel and his founding organization indoctrinated under King Darius of Persia.

The ancient Masonic institution, as recorded by Craft Legends, was inherited by the Essenes as successors. The Essenes then transmitted their reticent tenets to Pythagorus and his Mystery School at Crotona, where the tenets were disseminated throughout Europe,[57] likely through Rex Deus organizations. This is how some of the knowledge of the Dionysian builders of Tyre was passed down to the Roman Collegia, via Pythagoras, in the second century B.C.E.[58]

In this spurious line of thought, Moses, the Israelites, and the House of Judah are considered the heirs to the Royal Dragon Houses of both Egypt and Babylonia and are celebrated as the House of Gold under the same ideology that the Stuarts hold the same title. Moses and the new line of Aaronite priests allegedly inherited all the treasures and secret knowledge of the House of Gold, the Dragon Court of Egypt. In time, this powerful collection of wealth and knowledge eventually established the Royal House of David, Solomon, and Jesus as the new House of Gold,[59] which passed down its legacy and secrets to the Zadokite priesthood.

The white-garbed Essenes were members of a cult that studied and preserved knowledge from the ancients, according to Josephus.[60] Essenes considered white garments proper attire for all occasions.[61] They were a secret society preserving their secrets and the names of their guiding angels even unto death.[62] Likely Paul's letter to the Colossians identified and denounced the ascetic Essene cult with this warning: “Do not let anyone who delights in false humility and the worship of angels disqualify you for the prize” (Col. 2:18).

Josephus went on to note that what the Essenes honored most, after God, was Moses and that if anyone blasphemed Moses' name, the Essenes put them to death.[63] Gardner notes these white-garbed Essenes were, in truth, the inheritors of the Egyptian Therapeutate that Moses was supposedly indoctrinated under, according to Theosophist doctrine, and who also inherited Egyptian knowledge and secrets, which were preserved under the watchful guardians of the Levite and Aaronite priesthoods. Gardner goes on to state the Essenes were Therapeutates who closely aligned themselves, as allegedly did Jesus, with the famous mystics and healers of the white-robed Egyptian Therapeutate[64] as the inheritors of antediluvian knowledge and philosophy. Therapeutic medicine is defined as “the branch of medicine that deals with the treatment of disease”; nature cures while physicians treat,[65] again tying the medical associations of the world back to mystic roots. It is likely Paul was specifically denouncing the Essene ascetics in Colossians when he warned against those who judge what you eat and those who deceive through “hollow and deceptive philosophy, which depends on human tradition and the basics of this world rather than on Christ” (Col. 2:8, 16, 20–23).

So, too, does Unger’s describe the Essenes as having close ties to the Coventers of Damascus, John the Baptist, and the Egyptian Therapeutate.[66] Josephus described Essenes as inquiring after roots and medicinal stones to cure sickness.[67] Gardner also claims the Essenes received medical knowledge from the ancients and practiced medicine accordingly. In fact, Gardner noted the title “Essene” likely derived from the Aramaic word Assaya, meaning “physician,” which corresponded to the Greek word essenoi.[68] Essenes were a mystical order of physicians and scientists in the spirit of the Great White Brotherhood, modern medical organizations, and the original Royal College physicians.

Essenes cherished the dragon/serpent as a symbol of the Essene Therapeutate. To this end, the dragon/serpent was also identified with wisdom and healing. The dragon was held as a symbol of wisdom in antiquity, for dragons, like serpents, were thought to be conveyers of enlightenment and the keepers of knowledge, just as the serpent Satan and his assorted seraphim compatriots were regarded as conveyers of enlightenment and the providers of knowledge. Essenes upheld the traditions of the dragon and its identification with wisdom and healing,[69] in addition to being the inheritors and guardians of the antediluvian Dragon Court and secret knowledge.

Essenes alternatively named themselves Gnostic Nazarenes, where “Nazarene,” in this case, derives from the Aramaic Natzar, meaning “to guard or to watch.” They were “guardians” of sciences, custodians of the secrets to the universe, and the watchers for the enlightened science.[70] Essenes believed they were the guardians of the arcane secrets and knowledge of David and Solomon[71] that was inherited by Moses from the Egyptian Therapeutate. Essenes are claimed to be the very same cult as the mystical (counterfeit) followers of John the Baptist, the alleged Nazorean Mandaeans, who combined Gnosticism with Zoroastrianism.

Templar writers noted the Essenes were the inheritors of the Seven Sacred Sciences. In addition, they purportedly received additional knowledge from the watchers, deities who oversaw the universe,[72] just as the Essenes did. The Essenes then adopted the name Watchers, or Nazarenes, for they guarded and watched over the sacred antediluvian knowledge. This then accounts for the high level of respect and worship the Essenes held for their special fallen angels, the original watchers, to the extent they would not deliver the names of their dark angels, even under torture and unto death by torture.

It was the little-known Gnostic Essenes who cleverly corrupted the pre-Canon New Testament through writing alternative but false gospels side by side with the heresy of inventing the false Messianic bloodline maintained through Jesus' alleged sons. The Essenes were followers and the guardians of the Davidic Messianic bloodline and of a mortal Jesus in particular.

The Essenes were a cryptic, mystical sun cult of apocalyptic, messianic fanatics and zealots devoted to celibacy and austerity through The Manual of Discipline; it is likely that Jesus and Paul spoke specifically against this faction in Matthew and Colossians.[73] This Royal House of Jesus and Judah that dated back to Solomon and David, the inheriting Dragon bloodline, eventually became renowned as the House of Gold.[74] Theosophists note that Frankincense, gold, and myrrh that were presented as gifts to the infant Jesus by the three famous Magi from the east[75] were traditional substances owned by Priest Kings/Fisher Kings/Nazarites of the Grail (Dragon) bloodline, and thus, these unexpected gifts offered by the Magi allegedly identified Jesus symbolically as a dynastic Priest King of the House of Gold,[76] or Dragon Court.

So, then, Essenes were mystical Judeans; they were Kabbalists who based much of their understanding upon the Kabbalah that originally derived from pagan Egyptian beliefs.[77] Jewish alchemists/Kabbalists believe Moses and Hermes are their patriarchs. They believe Moses learned all the wisdom of the Egyptians (alchemy and the other Sacred Sciences), and they back this up by quoting Acts 7:22,[78] where it states, "Moses was educated in all the wisdom of the Egyptians and was powerful in speech and action." To this end, one would further conclude the mystical religions include Qur'an references to support this revisionist theory of Moses as pharaoh, for the Qur'an recorded the leaders of Egypt and Egyptian sorcerers all slandered Moses as a "learned sorcerer" whose sorcery would be proven false.[79] Judean Kabbalists (and Essenes), according to Peter Marshall, further (dissonantly) draft King Solomon as a patriarch alongside Moses, again (disingenuously) quoting 1 Kings,[80] noting that Solomon excelled in the wisdom of the East and was greater than the wisdom of Egypt.[81]

Kabbalism is regarded as one of the core elements and as a symbolic source for western occultism because its mythology claims Kabbalism was first revealed to Adam in Eden.[82] Now, Kabbalah derives from the Hebrew word QBL, meaning "to receive"; Kabbalists/Essenes are the receivers and caretakers (watchers) of divine knowledge.[83] Others define Kabbalism as deriving from the ashes of Enochian Judaism, and they define the word as "received tradition." The Essenes then were created sometime before the first century B.C.E. from Enochian Kabbalism.[84] In fact, Kabbalists and Essenes believe Kabbalism is based on knowledge received from a select company of angels (fallen), which was maliciously given to disobedient children of the earth (Cainites), according to Kabbalist writers.[85] The largest collection of Jews practicing Kabbalism in the time of Jesus was replanted and took root in Septmania, also recognized as the province of Languedoc.[86] The Essenes obviously survived and survive to this day among the Kabbalists and Gnostics, along with their ancient beliefs.

The apocalyptic flavor and doctrines of Essene culture were, in fact, the antithesis to the Roman Christian Apocalypse. The prophetic writings of the Essenes purported to install their mystic messiah on the world throne through war, whereas the Roman Christian Apocalypse prophesies that Jesus will inherit the earthly throne after the Antichrist, the Gnostic messiah, usurps power for three-and-one-half years, thus saving humankind from utter destruction and perpetual war.[87]

Freemasonry begrudgingly accepts convenient portions, for the most part, of the Old Testament, only for the sake of their Sangreal chronology and, therefore, Freemasonry's self-proclaimed legitimacy stemming from the Essenes, Jesus, David, Solomon, and Moses. Freemasonry conveniently qualifies this grudging and limited acceptance by proclaiming what Freemasonry believes to be a well-known and well-understood contamination of Scripture, or a rewriting of Scripture that served the purposes of latter, historical Israeli regimes, just as the radical followers of Fascist Islam also contend about similar contaminations regarding the Old Testament. Freemasons hold their own so-called uncontaminated version within their organizations. So let us now venture into these so-called revisionist corrections to Judeo-Christian history maintained by the spurious alliance, rewrites that will permeate the end-time religion.

CHAPTER 85

MOSES, AKHENATEN, AND THE ARMANA DYNASTY

It was the same Aaron and Moses to whom the Lord said, “Bring the Israelites out of Egypt by their divisions.” They were the ones who spoke to Pharaoh king of Egypt.

—Exodus 6:26–27

Why do Freemasonry, Theosophy, and secular science vigorously quarrel with biblical history before the advent of Moses and less vociferously thereafter? Why do spurious forces accept and delight in the bloodlines from Moses through David, Solomon, and Jesus?

Quite simply, their alarming, revisionist, and counterfeit history outrageously repositions Moses’ pedigree from the priestly tribe of Levi and Israel to Egyptian royal bloodlines, making him the son of a pharaoh.

This posthumous, Theosophist precept holds that House of Moses was Egyptian, as Scripture has recorded. They believe Moses and the Israelites were somehow the hereditary heirs to the Royal Houses of Egypt and Babylonia. Theosophists believe the Lord of the Mountain, El Shaddai, whom they regard as Enki, passed all secrets from the Egyptian House of Gold, from the priests of Egypt (White Brotherhood of Therapeutate), to a new line of Aaronite priests with the fall of the Armana dynasty, which ultimately ended the legitimacy of Egyptian dynasties.[1] Theosophists further believe this eventually established the Royal House of David, Solomon, and Jesus as the new House of Gold (Dragon Court). This mystical, Aaronite priesthood is the cornerstone linking the Essenes back to the Great White Brotherhood through their inheriting the religion of Enoch the Evil and Hermes, which was subsequently concealed within the numinous fringes of Israelite culture.

Conspirators believe the Royal House of Pharaohs was the second equal pillar coexisting in parallel with the originating Dragon Court, reigning alongside Chaldean mysticism organized by Nimrod in Mesopotamia. The Royal Dragon Courts of Egypt and Mesopotamia worked diligently together in securing pure bloodlines for the succession of kingship, all in the same spirit as Rex Deus. Pharaohs married often for strategic reasons; they selected wives to interbreed with and to regenerate their royal bloodlines with diverse but recognized "original strains" from pure Mesopotamian Dragon dynasties.[2]

This thereby perpetuated the patrilineal descent of the pharaohs, while heightening the matriarchal bloodlines in the subsequent generations. Pharaohs commonly married their half-sisters born of different mothers to progress the dynastic lines. Pharonic dynasties, although kingships generally reigned through patrilineal descent (Dragons/Ravens), conversely perpetuated their dynasties through female matriarchy (Fairies/Owls). Daughters of Dragon kings with pure matriarchal Dragon blood were wedded to kings to propagate new Fairy dynasties.[3] For these reasons, then, matriarchal bloodlines descending from Mary Magdalene, Scota, Temar, Miriam, Bashemath, Lilith, and Isis/Gaea have been meticulously documented through the millennia by dedicated, spurious chronologists.

Biblical narratives describing Moses' birth and subsequent adoption into the Royal House of Egypt[4] are believed in the Theosophical world to be convenient rewrites and additions to the original text. Theosophists point to Exodus 2:1–10 as proof that Moses was indeed an Egyptian, citing the incident where the seven Midian daughters described him as one,[5] for he looked and was dressed like one, but, of course, he was not. Theosophists further point to Exodus 4:10, where Moses expressed doubt to God because he was of slow speech and tongue, concluding that Moses was not slow of speech but rather not fluent in the Hebrew language because he was born and raised an Egyptian.[6] Theosophists steadfastly dismiss the validity of Old Testament accounts of the Exodus, even though events were overwhelmingly confirmed with more detail in the Qur'an.[7]

Conspirators enthusiastically point to the Greek historian Manetho, an adviser to Ptolemy I. Manetho recorded Moses in Egyptian history as an Egyptian priest from Heliopolis, the home of the infamous Great White Brotherhood.[8] Conversely, Moses was recorded in Scripture as raised from a baby by the Egyptian Royal House, complete with all its privileges and education. Hence, Moses was likely educated in the Mysteries by the Great White Brotherhood at Heliopolis and likely only spoke Egyptian and not Hebrew.

As incredible as it may first sound, Theosophists (and all who hold true to The Genesis 6 Conspiracy) believe Akenhaten was Moses.[9] The unexplained nature of the Akenhaten era resided in the fact that he was forcibly deposed from power. Even though history curiously does not bear witness to Akenhaten's death, seemingly, Akenhaten completely disappeared from the face of the earth upon Smenkhare's death or disappearance,[10] reinforcing Theosophist doctrine that Akenhaten disappeared as Moses. Furthermore, after the fall of the Armana dynasty, the Dragon Court of Egypt ceased to exist in Theosophist history, for Horemheb, the pharaoh that overthrew the Armana dynasty, was not of royal blood of any variety.

This mind-boggling identity theft, then, vicariously continued the patriarchal bloodline of the Egyptian Dragon Court through Israel and eventually through David and Jesus, all the while perpetuating a renaissance matrilineal branch through Scota and the Irish. Therefore, Theosophists desperately declare the Exodus was their dramatic, revisionist, misconstrued, and unprecedented turning point in history, which witnessed both the new dawn of Israelite mysticism through the priests of Aaron and the Levites and later purportedly produced the offshoot branch of the Essenes as well as the survival of the patriarchal branch of the Egyptian Dragon Court, all through Moses.

The hypothesis that Moses was Akenhaten has inexplicably been propagated for more than a century by Theosophists, New Agers, Gnostics, and so-called scientific organizations, while PBS, the History Channel, and other organizations seemingly bent on destroying Christianity and holding a bias in favor of world government also continue to popularize this heresy. Historian Susan Wise Bauer has commented that this theory has no historical basis and is incredibly difficult to square with any other credible dates for the Exodus.[11]

Akenhaten/Amenhotep IV/Tutmosis IV was deposed from power around 1361 B.C.E., which accounts for all the desperate efforts by biased secular humanists and Theosophists who are determined to date the Exodus to this century. Biblical chronology clearly states the Exodus occurred 480 years from the start of the building of the temple; the construction of the Jerusalem temple commenced in the fourth year of Solomon's reign.[12] Solomon's forty-year reign began in 1020 B.C.E. and it ended in 980 B.C.E., which places the start of the Exodus at 1496 and its end in 1446 B.C.E. Calculating the number of years, utilizing the secular date for the fall of Jerusalem at the end of Zedekiah's reign at the hands of the Babylonians in 587 B.C.E. to the start of Rehoboam's reign (son of Solomon), and utilizing biblical chronology, we arrive at a total of 393.5 years. This readily dates the end of Solomon's reign to 980 B.C.E.

Moreover, David Rohl audaciously redefines Egyptian chronology by stating that in the Third Intermediate Dynasty, two distinct but identical Egyptian king lists, which are shown to run one after the other, ought to, in fact, run concurrently, effectively changing the generally accepted Egyptian chronology by 400 years. What the new chronology produced was a date for Moses' birth of 1540 B.C.E. and an Exodus date of 1446 B.C.E., under the reign of Pharaoh Dudimose in 1450–1446 B.C.E.[13]

I believe the fanatical persistence in retaining both Akenhaten as Moses and the erroneous dating of the Exodus with Akhenaton's reign to around 1350 B.C.E. originate in the Theosophist Anno Lucis doctrine. Calculating the chronology from the Bible readily estimates the birth of Adam at about 4253 B.C.E., using the conclusion above as the basis that the Exodus began in 1496 B.C.E., and then backdating by use of scriptural genealogies of all the patriarchs. Conversely, Anno Lucis, the year Satan was cast from the heavenly government, was around 4000 B.C.E., according to Theosophy. Now, if you calculate the difference between Adam's birth and the Exodus using biblical chronology, one arrives with 2797 years. Now, subtract 2797 years from Anno Lucis, and you arrive magically at circa 1350 B.C.E., precisely the era of Akenhaten's reign. Theosophy tends to date all things in reference to Anno Lucis. Because spurious forces have corrupted secular education, they deny relevant truths and archaeological discoveries so that they can manipulate Egyptian chronology and history in general. In the process, Scripture's credibility is vindictively debased and denied.

Even after Akenhaten was deposed, he was considered to be the living heir to the throne of Egypt by Theosophists.[14] Akenhaten had inherited direct Dragon bloodlines from Mesopotamia, for he was nephew to King Tushratta of Mittanni; his father, Amenhotep III, had married Mittanni princesses, just as Akenhaten would do.[15] Meanwhile, Horemheb, the eventual usurper of the throne of the Armana dynasty, was not from royal blood. Ergo, Akenhaten was considered the surviving patriarchal branch of the Egyptian Dragon Court in Israel via Moses; even in banishment, Akenhaten was still considered the rightful heir to the (Dragon) dynasty, the true Royal Mose or Mosis.[16]

The concept in Egypt of a God with no image was well established before the birth of Akenhaten[17] and is generally used to boost the argument promoting Akenhaten as Moses, but this argument withers when set against the biblical chronology. What is more probable is that the omnipotent power of God exercised in the many miracles and plagues recorded in the Exodus narrative left an unforgettable impression on both Egypt and its kings. Egypt's historic humiliation at the hands of the Hebrew slaves and all the Exodus miracles of conquest opened the door for the Egyptians to adopt the omnipotent Creator God with no image. All this substantiates the hatred thereafter adopted by Egyptians once Akenhaten was deposed and Aten worship overturned, which was ruthlessly levied against both Akenhaten and Aten worship.

Akenhaten was therefore considered the Royal Mose, or Musis,[18] variantly acknowledged as the Royal Egyptian Mosis,[19] where the Egyptian mose and the Greek mosis translate as offspring. Tutmosis (Tutankhamun) is one example of its application.[20] We noted earlier in this book that the name for the Egyptian crocodile god was Messeh, while the Mesopotamian equivalent was Mus-Hus.[21] The Babylonian and Egyptian messiah and its derivative messianic derived from Messeh and Mus Hus in Theosophist doctrine.[22] The Egyptian title "Mus Hus" was the originating, spurious source for the messianic bloodline from the crocodile/serpent/dragon cult, of which Akenhaten was part. All these titles are pronounced the same as the Hebrew Moses.

One can readily appreciate just how easy it would be to infer the Akenhaten/Moses connection through employing these titles of Akenhaten to Moses, as well as Akenhaten being the pharaoh that introduced monotheism and the god with no image to Egypt. One objectively could have concluded the same concerning any pharaoh, however, for all pharaohs would have held the Royal Mosis title as part of their royal inheritance, just as the English bestow the Prince of Wales title on the male heir to the English throne. Certainly, before Moses' banishment, he was recorded as the Royal Mosis.

On the other hand, biblical records readily counter this Theosophist dissent by specifically stating the naming of Moses by its Hebrew meaning, that Moses was drawn out of the water by the Pharaoh's daughter, just as Scripture records, for it sounds very close to the Hebrew word for "draw out."[23] The word for drawing out in Hebrew was Moshe, and/or Moshui.

Horemheb was not of royal blood. So in order that the Theosophists could legitimize the survival of the originating San Greal of the antediluvian epoch, the patriarchal Dragon bloodline, they required a plausible lineage, which manifested itself by conveniently transforming Akenhaten into Moses and then from Moses down through the Israelite priesthood. Horemheb did not bare a legitimate heir, and thus a new, posthumous dynasty was founded under Rameses, the son of the troop commander Seti.[24] But again, this was not Royal Dragon blood. If Akenhaten did survive under the guise of Moses, he was one of two surviving refugees from the Egyptian patriarchy once the Armana dynasty was overthrown.

Smenkhare, brother to Akenhaten, succeeded to the throne of Egypt. Some traditions state that Scota was daughter to Smenkhare,[25] while other traditions identify Scota as the daughter of Akenhaten.[26] What is important to remember, though, is that Scota married royalty from Scythia, a man named Niul. Scythians were the legendary (Dragon) bloodlines of royalty that the exiles of Benjamin intermixed with. Scythians held the parallel Titanic/Nephilim Dragon bloodlines stemming through Japheth (Iapetus), also mythologized as the great Anu, the brother of Ham.[27] Japhethian royal bloodlines descended from Zeus to Hercules, through a half woman, half Snake that bore a son named Scythes,[28] founder of the Scythians, who produced the serpent/Dragon people called the Sarmatians and the Royal Dragon descendant that married Scota.

The Theosophical belief is that Aaron, brother of Moses, entered into an alliance with Niul, the husband to Scota. Where all this ties together is that Theosophical doctrine identifies Smenkhare as Aaron, brother of Moses,[29] just as Smenkhare was brother to Akenhaten. Again, Theosophists manipulate Scripture to underscore their beliefs pointing to Exodus 7, where Aaron performed the miracle of the staff,[30] which somehow validated Aaron's status as a pharaoh to the new pharaoh, who ostensibly and unbelievably somehow did not know Aaron/Smenkhare[31] or Moses/Akenhaten.

Smenkhare's mother was Tey the Yokabar[32] (Scripture records that Moses', Miriam's, and Aaron's mother was Jochebed[33]). Smenkhare was the son of Aye, with Tey being the sibling of Akenhaten in typical pharonic incest, for the father of Akenhaten was Amenhotep III, while Aye was the son of, or descendant of, Akenhaten, even though the mother of Smenkhare and Akenhaten was Tey. Smenkhare was also the grandson of Tuya and Yusuf (Joseph). Smenkhare mysteriously disappeared from history, like Akenhaten,[34] again fueling Theosophist lore that Smenkhare became Aaron after being deposed.

As per Gardner, the properly enunciated Smenkh-ka-ra and its variant, Smenkh-ka-ro-on, creates from the phonetic ending the name Aaron.[35] Aaron was the founder of the religious Israelite priesthood establishment under Moses' instruction,[36] thus transforming Smenkhare to the joint founder of the Israelite priesthood, complete with Royal Dragon bloodlines. Theosophists trace their mysticism back to Moses and Smenkhare through the Essenes, which, of course, carry with them the secrets of the Therapeutate and the Great White Brotherhood of Heliopolis. Theosophists assert that both Akenhaten/Moses and Aaron/Smenkhare were educated in the greater Mysteries as pharaohs at Heliopolis, home of the White Brotherhood.

Akenhaten/Amenhotep IV's father was Amenhotep III, also chronicled as Anen.[37] Both Akenhaten and his father were well known to have married Mesopotamian princesses to bolster their Dragon blood strains.[38] Discussing events somewhat before Akenhaten, Gardner notes that the descendants of Esau were mythologized to have become pharaohs of Egypt through the union of Tuya and her husband, Yusuf, which produced the famous Amarna pharaohs. The Armana dynasty included Akenhaten, Smenkhare, Tutankhamun, and Aye,[39] with Tutankhamun as the last Armana king.[40] Armana derived from the word Imrn or Imran, which was Hebrew for Amram.[41] Coincidently, Moses' father was recorded biblically as Amran.[42] The father to Anen/Amenhotep III and Aye was Yuya.[43]

Moses' sister, Miriam,[44] was affectionately known in Scripture as "the prophetess" (Exod. 15:20–21). Micah 6:4 calls her one of the three leaders sent by God to lead Israel, along with Moses and Aaron. She was a powerful prophet and leader of Israel, who organized a mini-rebellion when Moses took yet another wife, this time a Cushite at Merabah-Kadesh.[45] We learned earlier that this rebellion cost both Aaron and Miriam the privilege of entering into the Promised Land. Miriam, in Jewish legends, held the uppermost respect from the Israelites. In fact, Numbers 12:15–16 records that the Israelites refused to march for a week until Miriam was healed from leprosy, forcibly demonstrating the respect they maintained for her. The next time Scripture mentions Miriam, though, is in Numbers 20:1, the account of her death and burial at Kadesh. Scripture is frustratingly stingy with respect to Miriam's documentation.

Some Theosophists believe Miriam to have been a sister to Tutankhamun, but this person was likely another Egyptian other than Miriam, a person who also went to Sinai and who was acknowledged to be Tutankhamun's sister.[46] This was likely Miriam's and Moses' daughter in Theosophist lore, known as Khiba-Tashit, who was said to originate the House of Gold/Dragon dynasty of David. It was through Miriam and Moses, by their alleged daughter Khiba-Tashit that the alleged Dragon bloodline passed down through the generations to David.

Theosophists believe Miriam to have been the true matriarchal heiress (Owl of the Dragon Court) that went to Sinai with Moses as the wife of Moses,[47] as well as the half-sister to Akenhaten/Moses,[48] which elucidates why Miriam would have been so upset at Moses marrying yet another wife, a Cushite. Remember, it was common for pharaohs to marry their sisters and half-sisters to maintain the purity of the bloodlines, as well as to marry someone from the Dragon Court of Mesopotamia. Ancient royal families did not believe mortals, other than family, were divinely descended; thus, they married their half-sisters.[49] Miriam was believed in this line of thinking to have been the half-sister of Akenhaten (Moses) and also his wife, as the junior queen to Nefertiti.[50]

Miriam is first introduced to us biblically in Exodus, in the Song of Moses and Miriam. Exodus describes her as taking a tambourine and then leading all the Israelite women with tambourines in a celebration of dance and music at the sight of the Egyptian army drowning in the Red Sea (Exod. 15:1–21). Although not named, Miriam is believed by many to be the sister named in Exodus who watched the daughter of Pharaoh draw Moses from the river. This daughter of Pharaoh adopted the baby and then searched, found, and offered for the mother of Moses, Jochebed, to be the nurse for Moses (Exod. 2:1–10).[51]

Miriam was known, then, Theosophically, as "Queen Kayak" in the Pharonic dynasty and "the beloved Mery-Khiba"; Mery translates as "beloved" in ancient Egyptian. Mery-Khiba was a tremendously popular queen, because, unlike Nefertiti, Mery-Khiba (Miriam) bore a son for Akenhaten (Moses), who became Tutankhamun.[52] This is how Tutankhamun and Khiba-Tashit were brother and sister. Miriam's nomative is thought to have derived from Mery in this line of thought and is the root variant for Miriam and Mary. For these reasons, then, there ought to be no mystery as to why Tutankhamun is adulated in the secular sciences, archaeology, literature, entertainment, and in New Age beliefs.

Mery-Khiba's mother was a Mesopotamian (Dragon) princess from the Mitannian dynasts, a Nephilim dynasty that was held in the highest esteem at that time. Mery-Khiba voluntarily entered into exile with Akenhaten, and thus became famous as "Mery-Amon" and Moses' wife, who later became Miriam, producing through her esteemed matriarchal lineage the daughter (Khiba-Tashit) who eventually founded the Royal House of Judah. Supposedly, this came about through Mery-Khiba and Moses' daughter, Khiba-Tashit, the sister of Tututamun, who later married Rama from Judah, consolidating the line that then descended down to David. This, then, renders Miriam to be a highly influential figure in the House of Gold and the Israelite Dragon Court, linking the House of David back to the Egyptian and Mesopotamian originating strains.[53]

All these baffling genealogies connecting David to Mery-Khiba/ Miriam and to Akenhaten/Moses are nowhere to be found in the Bible, but Theosophists rationalize their acceptance of them by arguing that these genealogies were diligently deleted from Scripture to deny the Dragon Egyptian and Mesopotamian roots to the Royal House of David.[54] Only Ram is listed in the Scriptures, but no wife is recorded by name.[55] The truth, however, is all these curious coincidences of history evaporate once the authentic chronology of Scripture and Rohl are accepted.

CHAPTER 86

JOSEPH

The scepter will not depart from Judah, nor the ruler's staff from between his feet, until he comes to whom it belongs and the obedience of the nations is his…. Joseph is a fruitful vine…. Your father's blessings are greater than the blessings of the ancient mountains, than the bounty of the age-old hills. Let all these rest on the head of Joseph, on the brow of the prince among his brothers.

—Jacob's Blessing in Genesis 49:22, 26

Moving further back into Theosophist revisionist history, we now turn to Yuya, grandfather of Akenhaten.

Why is the Dragon king Yuya, or Yusuf, in revisionist history drafted to be Joseph,[1] son of Jacob? Why is this connection necessary to substantiate their revisionist history and to solidify the credibility of the bloodlines of the Antichrist?

The biblical Joseph was the son of Jacob, son of Isaac, son of Abraham. Joseph was sold into slavery in Egypt by his brothers, who were jealous of him,[2] and to an Egyptian official named Potiphar.[3] Joseph, of course, was the Israelite from the famous Exodus narratives who became the vizier of Egypt[4] and the famous founder of two of the original twelve tribes of Israel that Moses led out of Egypt.

So, too, was Yuya, a Semite not of royal Egyptian blood; he, too, was a vizier for both Tuthmosis IV and Akenhaten's father, Amenhotep III, according to Egyptian author Moustafa Gadalla. Yuya's Egyptian titles included Holy Father of the Lord of Two Lands, just as the Pharaoh's title was the Lord of Two Lands, suggesting that Yuya fathered a pharaoh, Anen/Amenhotep III and Aye. Along the path of this kind of discourse then, understand that "Joseph" in Egyptian is spelled with a y, while the o would become a u, giving us Yuseph,[5] a very close variant of Yuya and Yusuf. In the same manner, Joseph was recorded as Yosef in Aramaic.[6] It is quite conceivable that the names are variants of each other.

Theosophist dreamers love to (mis)quote Genesis, posthumously raising Joseph to the status of a pharonic dynastic founder: "So then it was not you [his brothers who sold Joseph into slavery] who sent me here, but God. He made me father to Pharaoh, lord of his entire household and ruler of all Egypt" (Gen. 45:8). Biblical legends underscore Joseph was not the father of a pharaoh but rather that at the age of seventy-one Joseph became the viceroy of Egypt for forty years, possessing all the power and authority of Egypt once Pharaoh died. This included being guardian to Pharaoh's son, Mayron, but Joseph did not become a pharaoh because he was an alien, even though he had the support of many.[7] Joseph was a vizier of Egypt and guardian to Pharaoh's children, but Joseph was not the physical parent spawning Egyptian kings, as disingenuous polytheists would have you believe.

Now Tuya, also identified as Touiou, wife of Joseph/Yuya, held the title "Asenath," which was Egyptian for "belonging to the goddess Neith."[8] She was a daughter of Potiphera, who Pharaoh gave to Joseph as a wife, and she was one of the mothers to the twelve tribes of Israel, but the Bible says nothing more about Asenath.[9] Lorraine Evans states that Tuya was daughter of Tiye, the wife of Amenhotep III, and she was a priestess of the god Min in the Delta region.[10]

According to Jewish legend, Potiphar/Potiphera, the Egyptian official Joseph was sold to, adopted Asenath/Tuya, as Asenath/Tuya's original parents, Dinah and Hamor, had abandoned her.[11] Conversely, the Bible recorded Joseph's wife, Asenath, as the daughter of a priest of Heliopolis, also recorded as On,[12] the home of the infamous Great White Brotherhood. On was the city where Potiphar was trained to be a priest.[13]

Potiphar was the high Egyptian official of Pharaoh who purchased Joseph as a slave from the Midianites,[14] thereby placing Joseph and Tuya/Asenath in the same house, at the same approximate time. Strangely, Potiphar did not consider Joseph a mere slave, inexplicably sending him to be trained in the arts (Seven Sacred Sciences, likely at On, where Potiphar resided). Potiphar's wife, Zuleika is also recorded in legend as having firmly believed the stars foretold Joseph would marry into her family, through her daughter, Asenath,[15] which is likely where the rumors of the Armana dynasty and Joseph began. By all relevant accounts, it seems likely that Tuya/Asenath and Joseph/Yuya were the same historical figures, but they were not physical parents to the famous Armana dynasty, but rather adoptive parents or guardians, just as Scripture has accurately recorded.

Similarly, Gardner surprisingly added that Tuya/Asenath was the granddaughter of Tuthmusis III, just as Evans recorded Tuya was the daughter of Amenhotep III, the founder of the White Brotherhood of the Therapeutate of Heliopolis. Tuthmusis III and Amenhotep III are one and the same Pharaoh, with each name merely denoting a different title. Tuthmusis III brilliantly reorganized the ancient Mystery Schools of Egypt (and Nimrod); he then founded the Great White Brotherhood of the Master Craftsman, and it was this mystically dominated, pharonic Dragon Court of Egypt that provided for the priestly Pursuits of Thoth,[16] which apparently Moses and Aaron were educated at. Tuthmusis III originally founded this new order in Heliopolis.[17] Few recognize that Amenhotep III was additionally renowned for wedding numerous (Owl) princesses from the numinous Mittanni, Mesopotamian, and Kassite dynasties and was himself a nephew to King Sudarna II and grandson of King Artadama, both of Mittanni.[18]

Heliopolis was originally recorded as On, according to Gardner and Scripture, and eventually became known as the Therapeutate that later greatly influenced the Essenes.[19] On was renowned as the chief city of Egyptian science.[20] During the lifetime of Herodotus, who visited Egypt during the fifth century B.C.E.,[21] the priests of On/Heliopolis were recognized around the ancient world as the most learned men in the history of Egypt. Directly associated with the Temple of the Sun was a medical school and a training center for the priests of On.[22] Greek philosophers both attended and studied in these institutions, just as Asenath, wife of Joseph was also a priestess of On/ Heliopolis.[23] On was devoted to the worship of the sun god Ra, celebrated as the Heliopolis, which was Greek for “Sun City.”[24] Heliopolis is referred to in Jeremiah as the “Temple of the Sun”; and in the KJV Bible as Beth-Shemesh;[25] and alternatively, as Awen, and On, in Ezekiel.[26] On was the religious capitol of Egypt from 2900 B.C.E. forward and was referred to in many discovered manuscripts as the City of the Sun.[27]

Tuya, then, through her father, Tutmosis III/Amenhotep III, descended from Igrath, daughter of Esau and Bashemath. Esau and Bashemath played important revisionist roles in the posthumous grafting of the holy bloodlines of Abraham with the Dragon Court. Gardner documented Igrath as the mother to Queen Sobeknefru (Mahalath the Crocodile goddess), and it was she who established the parallel matriarchal Dragon Court in ancient Egypt. Igrath was the renaissance Dragon queen of Egypt,[28] who descended from a mysterious and pure Dragon branch.

The Dragon Court appears to have grafted into Yuya/Joseph’s descendants’ bloodlines through Yuya’s wife, Tuya, via Esau, Bashemath, Igrath, and Mahalath and through Tutmosis III/Amonhotep III Dragon bloodlines. It is important to keep at hand the mythological importance of Esau, from whom the Dragon Court first allegedly entered the seed of Abraham. Some of the Edomites interbred with the giants, forming what became recognized as the Great Amalekite Nation. This union of Abrahamites and Nephilim was the mysteriously pure, pharonic source of the Dragon blood/Nephilim blood, which supposedly contaminated some of the seed of Abraham through the Dragon queen Igrath and then Tuya, wife of Joseph. This established Igrath as a parallel, powerful, and pure branch of the Dragon matriarchy.

CHAPTER 87

ABRAHAM, ESAU, AND ISHMAEL

> Esau said, "Isn't he rightly named Jacob? He has deceived me these two times: He took my birthright, and now he's taken my blessing!"
>
> —Genesis 27:36

Why do Theosophist mythologies tend to discredit Esau's brother, Jacob, and Jacob's biblical birthright?[1]

Both Esau and Jacob were competing sons for Abraham's birthright—one for monotheism and one for polytheism. The Qur'an steadfastly testifies Jacob was recognized as a loyal messenger/prophet of God, along with his sons, who received all the blessings and birthrights from Abraham.[2]

Esau and Jacob were twin brothers, with Esau being the firstborn. Esau should have inherited the blessings and birthrights from Isaac, but he did not. However, Masonic and Gnostic authors believe Esau and Bashemath's descendants, the Edomites/Amalekites, were indeed Dragon Court heirs through Bashemath and additional other wives from the Dragon Court that Esau also married.[3] The descendants of Esau inherited the kingdom of Idumaea (Edom),[4] with the titles of Dragon kings and Owl queens for eternity,[5] suggesting treacherous and traitorous actions undertaken by Esau and his descendants through intermarrying into the rival and competitive messianic and kingship bloodlines of Nephilim.

In Theosophist history, Esau married the Egyptian Bashemath,[6] the daughter of Ishmael, who was half-brother to Isaac through Abraham and Hagar,[7] thus identifying the source of Dragon blood in Theosophist lore to Esau and the Edomites' royal descendants. This was likely the genesis and then the motivation for the formation of the Great Amalekite Nation discussed previously in this book, which joined the descendants of Esau with the Horites and Hittites. Horites and Hittites were Nephilim that curiously and continuously conjugated with Edomites, along with Royal Egyptian Dragon bloodlines. It would have been Amalek, grandson of Esau, who would then have officially inherited the unified Dragon title.

The Bible, however, does not totally agree with this scenario of Esau and his wives. Scripture records Esau married two wives when he was forty. He married Judith, daughter of Beerie the Hittite (Nephilim), as well as Basemath, the daughter of Elon the Hittite (Nephilim) (Gen. 26:34). Scripture also records Basemath as the daughter of Ishmael and sister of Nebaoith (Gen. 36:1–5). Nebaoith was the firstborn of Ishmael (Gen. 25:13). Perhaps Elon was yet another wife of Ishmael, for Ishmael was married to Mahalath.

Scripture also records that Esau married Adah the Canaanite, the daughter of Elon the Hittite, suggesting that Adah was the Hittite and not Basemath; although, Hittites dwelled among Canaanites, and so both may have been considered Canaanite, Hittite, and Nephilim. Scripture further records Esau married the Horite Ohilibamah and the daughter of the Horite/Nephilim Chief Anah, son of the Nephilim Zibeon (Gen. 36:1). Therefore, Esau would have begun new Israelite and Dragon dynasties through marrying Egyptian, Horite, and Hittite branches of matriarchal royalty.

The Great Amalekite Nation was the union of the matrilineal Amalekite/ Horite/Hittite Dragon Court of Nephilim and Egyptian matriarchal Dragon blood to the scriptural royal lineage through the intermarriages with Esau with Bashemath, Ohilibamah, Adah, and Anah. This was yet just another reason the Israelites were commissioned to eradicate this tripartite Dragon Court that was both mysteriously and uniquely pure. All these mysteriously pure and previously unexplained bloodlines rested within the Royal Houses of the Amalekites, which further held alternative royal, messianic bloodlines from Abraham through Esau and from Abraham to Hagar and Ishmael, to Basemath, Mahalath, and Igrath.

The Bible records Hagar, grandmother of Bashemath, as the Egyptian maidservant to Abraham's wife Sarah.[8] The Theosophist discourse lists Hagar as a daughter of Pharaoh, Sensuret I, whom we will discuss later—a Pharaoh that descended from Nimrod.[9] Biblical legends further support this notion that Pharaoh gave Sarah his daughter Hagar as a maidservant, for he preferred this to Hagar becoming just another mistress in another harem.[10] Hagar bore Abraham a son, Ishmael, because Sarah was barren (Gen. 16:1–15) and could not provide Abraham with an heir until much later, when God corrected her affliction. The New Testament recognizes Sarah and Hagar as metaphorical for two distinct (and often overlooked) covenants between God and the Israelites descending from Sarah and God and the Arabs descending from Hagar (Gal. 4:21–31).

Ishmael, then, was raised at first to succeed in government as the firstborn of Abraham, until Isaac was later born to Sarah, causing Sarah to look ill upon Hagar and Ishmael as dangerous rivals to Abraham's inheritance.[11] Ishmael, then, was Dragon blood through the royal matrilineal branch of the Egyptian pharonic bloodline from Sensuret I, which, one could argue, began a new kingship dynasty in complete Dragon tradition. Hagar shuffled Ishmael off to the desert of Paran to live, supplying Ishmael with an Egyptian wife; although, no name was provided for her in the Bible.[12] However, Gardner provides the name Mahalath.[13] Once more, biblical legends support this mix of Scripture and mythology by noting Hagar returned to Egypt specifically to choose an appropriate wife for Ishmael,[14] which, in all likelihood, would have been from Egyptian royalty.

Mahalath was daughter to Pharaoh Amenhotep II,[15] the son of Sensuret I. She held the Egyptian title of the first Dragon queen of Egypt (due to her pure Nephilim/Amalekite blood) and was the daughter of Igrath, as we have already covered. Malahath then enhanced the purity of the Dragon bloodline, the newly spawned matriarchal dynasty of Ishmael. Scripture does record the name Mahalath but inexplicably as the name of Esau's wife, in place of Basemath,[16] instead of Ishmael's wife. But, as Unger's states, Mahalath could have been Basemath's original name, as it was traditional for wives to accept new names when married,[17] which likely, then, was the source for Ishmael's wife's name of Mahalath. This would require that Esau then married Ishmael's wife. Or, what is more likely chronologically and in ancient tradition, is that Mahalath's daughter carried with her the same name as her mother, thus clearing up the confusion over Esau's various wives.

So now we have Hagar of royal Egyptian Dragon blood bearing Ishmael and then marrying Ishmael off to Mahalath and into further Egyptian and other Dragon strains, for Mahalath was the daughter of Amenhotep II and Igrath. Remember, one of the daughters of Esau and Bashemath appears to have been Igrath,[18] once again, according to Gardner, who then intermarried into the Egyptian Dragon Court.

Now back to Tuya, the wife to Joseph. She was the granddaughter descended from Igrath (daughter of Esau) and Amenhotep II/Tutmosis II, while Tiye, daughter of Tuya, was also related to Mahalath, wife of Ishmael, for Mahalath was also daughter of Igrath and Amenhotep II. Their bloodlines intermingled later through Tuya and Joseph, with Esau and Bashemath,[19] once again bringing more Dragon blood into Joseph's descendants, according to Theosophist lore.

Tiye was the junior wife to Amenhotep III/Tutmosis III, the daughter of Yuya/Joseph and Tuya/Asenath, and, of course, was descended from Esau through her mother, Tuya. Amenhotep III/Tutmosis III had originally married his sister Sitamun, who was still a child, to inherit the matrilineal succession of the Dragon kingship; he later married Tiye to have an adult wife. What is important about Tiye is that she allegedly reared two very famous offspring: Nefertiti and a boy named Amenhotep IV/Akenhaten/Moses.[20]

All this testifies to the Theosophist belief that the descendants of Esau became pharaohs through Joseph and Tuya, which produced the Armana kings of Akenhaten, Smenkhare, Tutankhamun, and Aye. They both held parallel royal bloodlines containing the Dragon San Greal, as well as the Abrahamic bloodlines, which contained the birthright blessings and the Messianic blessings from God. All this further implies that the Armana kings were jointly Amalekite-spawned Nephilim/Dragon kings as well, along with the Babylonian strain descended from Nimrod.

This close Egyptian/Amalekite kinship certainly testifies to the uncommon hatred the Amalekites held against the Israelites, at least from a Christian, scriptural perspective. Amalekites and Egyptians were Nephilim-inspired nations that carried within their royal bloodlines a parallel, or antithesis, messianic inheritance, even to the point where the Dragon messianic bloodline incorporated the rival Ishmaelite and Edomite Covenants and the alleged Messianic birthrights of Abraham. The Amalekites were driven, then, from the scriptural perspective, with unbridled hatred to eliminate their parallel Jacobite rivals, the Moses-led Israelites during the Exodus, possessing the true Messianic inheritance, which the Amalekites believed they held, too, through Esau and Ishmael.

The blood oath between the Amalekites and the Israelites originated in the antithesis kingships sponsored from heaven, one from God and one from fallen angels led by Nephilim. No doubt, the very close kinship of royalty between the Egyptians and the Amalekites held considerable weight and loyalties, contributing to the Amalekite genocide waged against Israel in support of their Egyptian brethren.

In addition, the ancient Midianites were also blood enemies of the early Israelite nations, attacking incessantly, at every opportunity, through to the end of the age of the Judges. The Midianites, too, had a covenant and an inheritable blessing argument with the Israelites. In Scripture, we read Abraham had a second wife, in addition to Hagar, named Keturah, who bore six additional sons that included Midian, the patriarch of the Midianites (Gen. 25:1–5). This complication arose after Sarah bore Isaac and after Hagar bore Ishmael, when Abraham decided to marry Keturah.[21] The Midianites would also have had vested interest in extinguishing the line of Isaac and Jacob so that they, too, could claim the Abrahamic Covenant, blessings, and birthright.

What is important to all this detail is that Moses/Akenhaten and Aaron/Smenkhare, the founding governmental forces and religious basis of Israel (the priesthood), were both believed to have held Dragon bloodlines stemming from Esau and Ishmael in Theosophist lore and through intermarriage, in equal partnership with the Egyptian bloodline, which we have yet to examine. Furthermore, all this reconnects, through intermarriage, part of the birthright and blessings back to the Dragon bloodline that passed down from Jacob to Joseph and then to his sons, Ephraim and Manasseh.[22] The only segment of the Israelite bloodline missing was the Messianic blessing passed on to Judah from Jacob[23] and then eventually to David.

Judah, to whom the Judaic/Christian Messianic bloodline was passed (the scepter and ruler's staff),[24] married an unnamed Canaanite woman, the daughter of Shua. The lost Testament of Judah identified Judah's wife as Bathshua, meaning "the daughter of Shua."[25] Judah fathered as his firstborn son Er, who married a woman named Tamar.[26] The Bible does not state the nationality of Tamar, but one concludes from the text that she, too, was likely Canaanite, in the same manner that the Testament of Judah suggests that Tamar likely was Canaanite.[27] God put Er to death for his wickedness before he was able to conceive a son with Tamar.[28] Tamar later tricked her father-in-law, Judah, into sleeping with her by posing as a prostitute, thereby conceiving twins boys, including a son named Perez.[29] Thus, the Messianic bloodline descended biblically down through Perez from Judah and Tamar.

Tamar was an important name that continually resurfaces in the messianic bloodline, including the transplanting of Zedekiah's throne of Judah to Ireland via one of his daughters named Tamar at the fall of Jerusalem in 587 B.C.E. A woman named Tamar was also a daughter of David (2 Sam. 13:1–3). And a woman with the same name is listed as the only surviving daughter of Absalom (2 Sam. 14:27). The name continually pops up in biblical narratives,[30] thereby suggesting something important and perhaps something dissonant reflected metaphorically in the name, and it is in its symbolism connecting to Sarah where the secret is contained.

The Gnostic gospel the Qumran Genesis Apocryphon records Abraham perceiving himself as a cedar tree, while his wife Sarah was a palm tree. The palm tree allegory is a significant metaphor in the royal, matriarchal Messianic bloodlines. The distinction of the royal palm tree is believed in this line of Theosophic thinking to have originally derived from the lineage of TubalCain.[31] In fact, the palm tree allegory does descend back to the antediluvian epoch and Atlantis in many legends.

The palm tree was known then as the Great Mother Ceiba (Mother Earth) in Central American legends, and in the ancient Mayan CChilam Balam manuscripts recovered by the Spanish in the seventeenth century. The Ceiba is remembered both as a great tree that flourishes in Guatemala and as the tree that was established at the place of destruction, as a memorial of the deluge cataclysm. So, too, was the palm tree cited in Cherokee legends, where it was also planted in the location where the great meteorite of the deluge struck. The palm tree suddenly rose up at the impact site of the deluge, where the stars of Pleiades struck the oceans, in the Iroquois, Great Lakes, Tennessee, and Carolina Native American legends, suggesting to Frank Joseph that the palm tree was an allegory for the mushroom cloud created by the impact.[32] All this suggests an arcane secret regarding Sarah and Tamar/Temar, conceivably connecting both Theosophically with Nephilim and antediluvian mythology.

The palm oasis southeast of Aqaba was originally named Tehama/Teima/ Tema, from the vehement heat of the desert sand; it is from this root the name Tamar and the oasis's name is thought to have derived.[33] Tehama/Thamara is likely the place referred to by Ezekiel, thought to be located somewhere on the southern border of Palestine on the road from Hebron to Elath.[34] Palm trees, of course, are common foliage at an oasis, and tamar was one of the Hebrew words utilized for "palm."[35]

All the arcane dissent inserted by spurious forces disingenuously links the matriarchal branch of the Hebrew Messianic bloodline with esoteric palm tree allegories and their sinister, antediluvian ties. It significantly links close and misconstrued ties to Sarah and the various Tamars of scriptural and mythological history to antediluvian treachery. In addition, Tamar, the wife of Er, has been mythologized as descending from royal Hametic succession; she was believed to have been an obvious choice as a founding matriarch for the Messianic lineage of Israel because of her Royal Hametic Dragon bloodlines. Tamar, as I have already noted, bore Perez/Pharez by Judah, which initiated the Abrahamic Messianic bloodline and eventually manifested itself in David[36] and later in Jesus.

The parental partnership of Temar and Judah inserted the matriarchal Dragon Court, according to Theosophist revisionist history, into the Messianic segment of Israelite royal succession, through Temar's Hametic royal bloodline, completing the hijacking of the Abrahamic birthright tripartite through Yuya/Joseph, Tuya, and the religious Levite establishment founded in Aaron and Moses and, of course, the twin Messianic birthright of Abraham and the Dragon Court through Tamar and Judah. And yet the connections run even deeper than this. Remember, too, Theosophist history recants Khiba-Tasherit married Ram to originate the messianic lineage.

Isaac, father to Esau and Jacob, son of Abraham (Gen. 21:1–7), and half-brother to Ishmael has been mythologized in Theosophy to have not been the son of Abraham. Theosophists believe this, even though the Bible emphatically states Isaac was his son (Gen. 21:5), and the Qur'an further testifies to Sarah and Abraham producing Isaac at a very old age through the intercession of God.[37] It is the popular Theosophist line of thinking that there was not a miracle of pregnancy granted to Abraham at the age of one hundred and to Sarah at the age of ninety (Gen. 17:17–18) but that this was an elaborate cover story and a convenient rewrite of biblical history by later biblical writers to hide the real story.

Isaac in Theosophist mythology was thought to have been the son of Sarah and Pharaoh Sensuret I.[38] According to this thinking, Sensuret I was the pharaoh Abraham and Sarah encountered in Genesis during their trip to Egypt, where the pharaoh took Sarah into his court because of her great beauty, not knowing she was Abraham's wife. Pharaoh Sensuret I thought Sarah was Abraham's sister, according to Genesis.[39] In this Theosophist line of thought, Sensuret I did sleep with Sarah, producing Isaac through this union.[40] You remember Sensuret I. He was grandfather to Mahalath, the wife to Ishmael, while Hagar was Sensuret I's daughter. Now Sensuret I was also the father of Amenemhet II, Igrath's husband, whose daughter was Mahalath,[41] wife of Ishmael, and whose lineage produced the Armana kings through Esau and Bashemath.

As part of this revisionist marriage contract with Pharaoh, Sarah was rewarded with Hagar, the Pharaoh's daughter, as recorded by Jewish legends.[42] This supposedly introduced the Egyptian Dragon bloodline into Isaac through Sensuret I and Sarah, as his parents from the beginning, uniting Dragon blood with the threefold blessings granted to Abraham that flowed through both Jacob and Esau and then onto the three segments of Israelite royal succession: Moses and Aaron/Levites, Ephraim and Manasseh/birthright, and of course, Judah/ Messianic bloodline.

This particular Theosophist line of treachery deliberately severs the biblical royal bloodline from Noah to Abraham that originated with Adam at the birth of Isaac, leaving only Ishmael and the sons of Keturah, which included the Midianites, to carry Abraham's bloodline, while diminishing biblical legitimacy by design.

Ishmael is, of course, regarded as the father of the Arab nations and thereby explains the Arab/Israelite erroneous schism over the Old Testament. Fascist and mystical Muslim sects promote that Ishmael, and not Isaac, carried Abraham's bloodline and blessings in an identical manner as the Theosophists do. They claim the Israelites corrupted the Old Testament to cover these things up, even though the Qur'an steadfastly testifies to the accuracy and truthfulness of the first two testaments, as well as the legitimacy of Isaac's posterity.

This revisionist approach deliberately reroutes the tripartite birthright blessings granted by God through Abraham. It reroutes the Abrahamic bloodline through Ishmael and Mahalath, to Esau and Bashemath, to Igrath and Tutmosis II/Amenhotep II, to Joseph and Tuya, and finally to the Armana kings—and in particular, to Akenhaten and Smenkhare, whom Theosophists call Moses and Aaron. The Theosophist lineage presents the parallel Dragon birthright blessings as transmitted through Sensuret I, with his Dragon heritage, which descended down to him from Nimrod, Ham, and beyond. In this line of thought, the Abrahamic bloodlines and Covenant blessings are reintroduced back into the Messianic succession with the birth of the Armana dynasty, thus enhancing even more glamour and pedigree in the numinous Egyptian dynasty that supposedly survived through Moses/Akenhaten.

This revisionist bloodline bound the matriarchal bloodline transmitted through Sarah the Palm Tree to being allegorically (and dishonestly) descended from the Hametic/Cainite ancestry, as well. In the Theosophist perspective, all bloodlines descended, not from Noah and Abraham and Sarah to Isaac, but from Nimrod, Ham, and Cain; and then through Sensuret I and Sarah to Isaac; and then from Abraham and Hagar to Ishmael. Hence, Ishmael carried Abraham's true bloodline blessings and a new Dragon bloodline because Hagar was also the daughter of Sensuret I. Joseph united these two alleged Dragon and Abrahamic birthright blessings and covenants at that point through marrying Tuya, creating the famous Armana dynasty as well as the Abrahamic Messianic bloodlines and blessings that were united with Dragon bloodlines later through Judah and Tamar. Whichever genealogy you choose to use, the Theosophists have rewritten themselves into them all.

Delving even further back into the biblical patriarchal succession in partnership with the Theosophical mythology, we find that the biblical and alternative histories once more continue to intermingle, this time with respect to Sarah, the supposed matriarchal Dragon queen known as the Palm Tree. The Ethiopian chronicle Nazum Al-Jawahir cites Terah, father to Abraham, as husband both to Tohwait, the mother of Sarah, and Yawnu, the mother of Abraham.[43] This would account for Abraham's biblical statement to Pharaoh Sensuret I and King Abimelech that Sarah was his sister, even though Sarah was also his wife, because Sarah was the daughter of Abraham's father but not the daughter of Abraham's mother.[44] Sarah and Abraham had the same father but separate mothers and were then half-brother and sister to each other, in the same tradition that pharaohs married their half-sisters. Josephus confirmed that Abraham and Sarah were half-brother and sister.[45]

Tohwait was recorded in the Syriac M'arath Gaze as Nayaryath and variantly recorded as Nfry-Ta-Tlewnen, the former wife of Pharaoh Amennemet I, meaning Tohwait was wife to both Terah and Pharaoh, just as Sarah was wife to Abraham and according to Theosophist mythology, allegedly wife to Pharaoh. Tohwait's son by her Egyptian marriage was the succeeding Pharaoh Sensuret I, the purported Pharaoh that claimed Sarah as his consort that bore Isaac.[46] This would have been a classic pharonic gambit to further enhance his succeeding bloodlines with additional matriarchal Dragon blood. Tohwait must have married Terah after Pharaoh Amennemet I, likely after the Pharaoh had died, for this to be factual.

Conversely, Sarah received her alleged matriarchal Dragon bloodline from the Egyptian Dragon Court, descending from Ham and Nimrod, by her mother Tohwait, the Egyptian wife of Amennemet I, explicating the Theosophist doctrine regarding the palm tree allegory of the Dragon matriarchy concerning Sarah and Temar. Sarah seemingly was the preordained inheritor of the Arcane Mother Earth/Palm Tree/Dragon queen titles for whatever reasons.

Certainly, Sarah's unexplained biblical (and pantheist) histories and name suggest a secretive royal significance according to biblical author J. R. Porter.[47] Theosophists and biblical scholars both contend Sarah's name was actually a Canaanite/Hametic word meaning "queen" or "prince."[48] Thomas Cahill, Unger's Dictionary, and the niv Red Letter Bible all conclude that the meaning to the title Sarah was "princess."[49]

CHAPTER 88

THE KINGS OF NIMROD AND HAM

The sons of Ham: Cush, Mizraim, Put and Canaan…. Cush was the father of Nimrod.

—Genesis 10:6–8

With all this intermingling of Abraham’s family tree with Egyptian pharaohs, it is now necessary to examine the mythological roots of the kingship in postdiluvian Egypt. What were the relationships between Egyptian pharaohs and the Dragon bloodlines descending from Ham, Nimrod, and beyond?

Mizraim settled Egypt along with his father, Ham,[1] and Hermes. However, it was Nimrod, post-Babel, who sponsored the kingship in Egypt. Nimrod, according to Theosophist mythology, was the father of the first postdiluvian pharaoh of Egypt.[2] Apparently, sometime after Mizraim’s people colonized Egypt, a second wave of aggressive, dynastic Hamites sponsored by Nimrod vanquished Egypt, bringing all the dynastic trappings with them, including the intermarrying of the dynastic family to keep pure the Anunnaki/Nephilim bloodlines, which the Pharaohs became famous for.[3]

This fantastic claim was supported by a collection of Aramaic writings called the Targum,[4] the Old Testament translated into Aramaic,[5] utilized by Jewish temple priests to aid in interpreting and understanding key texts.[6]

These Aramaic writings stated Nimrod was the father of a pharaoh, even though no name was provided,[7] but Rohl names this pharaoh as likely Aha, who is generally associated with Menes,[8] the founder of the Pharonic form of kingship after the deluge, circa 2900–3100 B.C.E. Aha, also known as "Hor-Aha" and Manetho's "Athothis," is thought by some to be either the son of Narmer or Menes.[9] Another Ethiopian text on the Old Testament names the pharaoh son of Nimrod as Yanuf, known also as Anedjib, who reigned around 3000 B.C.E., thereby establishing by either source the first postdiluvian Egyptian kingship stemming from Nimrod[10] as the originating patriarchal Dragon blood of the pharaohs.

Further, Gardner suggests that Raneb, pharaoh of the Second Dynasty, circa 2852–13 B.C.E., was a grandson to Nimrod, even though the Bible does not list any sons or descendants of Nimrod in Genesis or 1 Chronicles, likely for these Nephilim reasons. In his genealogies, Gardner additionally listed Boethus, son of Nimrod, as Pharaoh Hotep-Serhemwy.[11] This, then, was how Hagar, the Egyptian mother of Ishmael, was linked as a descendant of Nimrod. Nimrod, then, through partnering with Nephilim, spawned through his progeny the postdiluvian kingships of Egypt and Babylonia.

Just as Nimrod was second generation, so was another interesting gentleman, Enmerukar, the second ruler of Uruk/Unug-Ki.[12] Kar, from this nomative, is Sumerian for "hunter"; thus, Enmerukar was King Enmeru, the hunter, just as Nimrod was.[13] Enmerukar was acclaimed to be Lugal, literally meaning "a great man" (or large man), which was the title of a king[14]—again, just as Nimrod was a large and a great man/king. The original spelling for Nimrod would have been Nmr in Hebrew, while Nimru in Akkadin also meant "hunter."[15] Both variants are strikingly similar to Enmeru, and they are likely the same appellation.

We know from the Bible that the Master Mason Nimrod rebuilt Erech, the city of Uruk, after the flood. We also know from secular records that Meskiagkasher originally reestablished Uruk circa 2800–3000 B.C.E.[16] Akkadian records state that Enmerukar expanded the antediluvian city of Uruk/Unug-Ki.[17] According to Rohl, Enmerukar (Nimrod) inherited the kingship and throne of Uruk from his father, Meskiagkasher (Cush), and became the first postdiluvian Priest King (Fisher King), whom the pharaohs, Merovingians, Grail kings, and Rex Deus then modeled themselves after. The Fisher King Enmerukar subsequently proclaimed as one of his first acts the adoption of the goddess Inanna as the partner deity to Enki (Satan). As you may guess, she was the mountain goddess, the great Mother (Earth) goddess, Ninkhursag,[18] when Enmerukar (unaccountably) reestablished Enoch's mysticism in Chaldea after Babel.

Finally, the great Enmerukar was recorded in Akkadian lore as the king who ordered a ziggurat built at the holy island of Eridu, in direct opposition to Enlil/Adonai, thereby locating the Tower of Babel at Eridu, the original Nun Ki, and not Babylon, as is commonly concluded. Babylon did not enjoy a ziggurat, according to Rohl, at this time. Moreover, Babylon represented a much older location that had existed before (pre-flood), which allegorized the Tower of Nun Ki, meaning "the mighty place on earth." Rohl believes this place was later named Babel in an allegorical play, from the Akkadian word Bab-Ilu, meaning "gate of the gods," and the Hebrew word Balal, meaning "to confuse."[19]

Eridu was the antediluvian city built by Enoch/Uanna and named after Enoch the Evil's son Irad; this was the city of Enoch/Uanna where the high priest of Enki/Satan originally dedicated a shrine to Enki[20] (Satan), the rival of Enlil/Adonai/God. Eridu was the legendary city where kingship first descended from heaven, marking the division between the old world of hunters and gatherers and the new world of civilization[21] for the people of day six. Nimrod/Enmerukar, then, defiantly rebuilt the two cities of the Evil Enoch as part of his renaissance rebellion against God. Nimrod rebuilt Eridu/ Irad as Babylon and later rebuilt Uruk/Enoch/Hanoch after Babel.

According to the Sumerian epic Enmerukar and the Lord of Aratta, Enmerukar/Nimrod wanted to build for Enki/Satan a shrine like a holy mountain (Mount Hermon), but Ninurta's Pride and Punishment, another Sumerian epic, reveals that Enlil/Adonai thwarted Enmerukar/Nimrod/ Ninurta's pride for doing this. Enlil/Adonai then changed the speech of humankind, which had been one, just as the Bible recorded at Babel. This was mankind's first postdiluvian endeavor to create an artificial mountain, to bring the gods back to earth from heaven to worship once more, as well as to reestablish the new House of Heaven assembly (Nippur).[22] The new Nippur was the place where kingship would once more be awarded from heaven, reinstating Nephilim and their Nephilim bloodlines, the renaissance Ring Lords. Nimru and Enmeru were simply variants for Nimrod the Hunter, the second king of postdiluvian Uruk.

As you will recall, Nimrod was the first mortal to hold universal sway, possessing the power of the messiah, the Royal Musis/Mu-Hus/Moses. Nimrod's complete, false messianic bloodline of the Dragon then married into the surviving Nephilim. Remember, Nimrod reintroduced the abomination of drinking blood to his subjects,[23] again cementing Nimrod's reign as the postdiluvian genesis to the antediluvian Dragon Cult of giant demigods and Enochian mysticism.

The first king after the flood and after Utnapishtim, according to the Sumerian King List, was Meskiagkasher,[24] the king who resettled Uruk before Enmerukar. Is Kash from Meskiagkasher actually Cush or Kush, the father of Nimrod,[25] as suggested by Rohl? Certainly the Sumerian King List recorded Meskiagkasher migrating on the sea to a land of mountains, just as the Bible recorded Cush as doing so. Meskiagkasher's brother was thought to be none other than the leader of the ancient falcon tribe of Egypt, the descendants of Horus, known as "The Far Distant." This mysterious Horus-king of Egypt was none other than Mizraim, son of Ham, and brother to Cush.[26] Therefore, according to Sumerian legend, Meskiagkasher must have been Cush, the brother of Mizraim, and the son of Ham/Utnapishtim.

"Mizraim" appears to be more of an epithet than a name: M-asr translates "from the Egyptian" m and "followers of Asra, or Asar (Asr)," and its plural suffix (im) forms: "as the followers of Asar."[27] Again, according to Rohl and Sitchin, the followers of Asar were, in fact, the followers of Osiris[28] and the followers of Horus, all the time remembering Hermes was the adviser to Osiris, meaning that Hermes was then an adviser to the figurative Mizraim/ Horus and Ham/Osiris after Babel and in Egypt. Thus, Rohl wrote the name for the land of the Pharaohs derived from an epithet for its leader, which leads us back to Sumeria, because Utnapishtim was the great ancestor and first of the order of the Horus kings of the god Atum.[29]

In Mesopotamian mythology, Asar/Osiris was the son of Enki, also chronicled as Marduk in the Babylonian pantheon and likely also Asshur of the Assyrians. Rohl also notes Asshur held the cultic sun-disc symbolism, Ahura Mazda, a god worshipped by the Zoroastrians, while Horus was descended from Asar/Osiris/Ham/Utnapishtim, just as Egyptians still call him Mizraim (El-Masri).[30] Therefore, in Theosophical mythology, was Utnapishtim actually the Sumerian Ham and the hero king of the great flood? Both Ham and Utnapishtim survived the flood. Was this a revisionist Ham, the one known alternatively in various cultures as the new, figurative Osiris?

The Hamite coat of arms was thought to incorporate a dragon, according to Gardner. Even more disturbing, Ham, in spurious history, was designated archon/ruler of the tenth age of Capricorn, just as Lucifer was the great goat of Capricornus, and Ham's symbol was an alleged inverted pentagram of the goat of Mendes, the infamous Azazel of the fallen angels.[31] Adding to all this infamy, the zodiacal goat was evidently first introduced into Egypt by Pharaoh Raneb, the grandson of Nimrod, in 2800 B.C.E., to the city of Mendes. Therefore Khem of alchemy and Rosicrucianism is referred to as the Khem of Mendes, whose emblem was the inverted pentagram.[32] Khem was further allegorized into the story of Ham's Dragon appellation.

Ham was further credited with being the founder of the Persian succession of kings emanating from Sumeria and Chaldea. Ham's name from this succession was Chem-Zarathrustra,[33] the ancient, original religion of the Essenes, alchemy, Manichaeism, Bogomilism Gnosticism, Freemasonry, the Templars, and Rosicrucianism. This unexpectedly ties Ham to the sun disc cult of Ahura Mazda and Osiris/Asar of the followers of Horus and to Avestan Zoroastrianism passed down from the unaccounted-for Indo-European Aryans/Nephilim.

The dissonant bombshell, however, is that pantheists believe Nimrod; his father, Cush; and his father, Ham, along with Japheth, did not descend from Noah but rather from Tubal-Cain, Lamech, and Cain and that they represented the true postdiluvian Grail or Dragon kingship.[34] They then passed down this Grail/Dragon kingship to the pharaohs of Egypt and Babylon, then to the Royal House of David, and finally to Rex Deus. This thereby separated Ham and Japheth from the Noahic succession of the postdiluvian epoch, just as Scythian, Dragon, Celtic, and British legends have suggested, which we have already covered. What likely happened was Nimrod and his descendants later fused Noah's descendants with the Nephilim scourge that also survived the flood once they cohabitated with the Nephilim and intermarried with them. The mongrel progeny then overlaid a pantheistic mythos over the biblical and Noah accounts, creating a fused and revisionist historical mutant.

In this warped genealogy assembled by Gardner, Ham descended from Cain's royal succession of priests. Cain (but more likely Enoch) was the originating founder of the Magian priests called Zarathustra, also recognized as Zoroaster,[35] who Ham was also equated with in the postdiluvian, Persian succession of kings. Note, too, Zoroaster was symbolized also by the sun disc (of Enoch), just as Ham and Mizraim carried the sun disc to Egypt under the banner of Horus. Remember, as well, that Gnosticism attributes the source for their global religion (through the Essenes and Mandaeans) to ancient Zoroastrianism[36] and Enoch, who originally founded Zoroastrianism.

Ham's brother, Japheth, was recorded as Iapetus in Greek mythology, the founder of Greeks. He is mythologized as descending from Tubal-Cain, Lamech, and Cain.[37] Scriptural descendants of Magog and Gog settled Scythia after the deluge, understanding that Magog was the son of Japheth (Gen. 10:2). Also note that Gog, as you will recall, translates as "giant," which suggests Japheth's rebellious sons accepted the names of giants after settling among them.

This disenfranchised house of Saul from the tribe of Benjamin obviously intended to rekindle their coveted royal bloodline back to legitimacy through the binding of their house through marriage with a parallel Dragon bloodline descending from Japheth/Magog (giants) on at least two occasions in antiquity. The Benjamites then exported this reincarnated legitimacy to the royal houses of the Sicambrium Franks, who, in turn, intermarried with the royal houses of France.

The Japheth/Magog Dragon strain additionally intermarried with Scota, daughter of Moses/Akenhaten, who exported that particular branch of the Dragon lineage to Ireland, along with the Nimrod/Ham strain, where they, too, intermingled with Temar of the House of David, the house that established the Celtic Fairy/Dragon Court of Ireland, Scotland, and Britain. The Japheth/Magog Dragon bloodlines further intermarried with the Tuatha Denaan and Fairy bloodlines of Ireland, Europe, and Scandinavia. And let us not forget the Sarmatian/Scythian intervention into the Briton Royal Courts that significantly reinforced the Dragon inheritance. Finally, all these particular Celtic bloodlines eventually intermarried with the Merovingian dynasty through Faramund, which already held both the Benjamite (Mary Magdalene and Sicambrium Franks from Scythia) and House of Jesus

(David) Dragon bloodlines that all were later reunified in the House of Unicorn, the Stuarts.

CHAPTER 89

HAM AND JAPHETH

This is the account of Shem, Ham and Japheth, Noah’s sons, who themselves had sons after the flood. The sons of Japheth: Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Tubal, Meschech and Tiras. The sons of Gomer: Ashkenaz, Riphath and Togarmah. The sons of Javan: Elishah, Tarshish, the Kittim and Rodanim.

—Genesis 10:1–4 (also see 1 Chronicles 1:5–7)

Why is there significance to the spurious forces’ belief that only Shem was the true son of Noah? And why is it necessary for spurious forces to slander biblical authors as fabricating the notion that Japheth and Ham descended from Noah?
